Presumption of Ineffective Counsel — Irreconcilable Conflict — Error in Failure to Investigate Timely Request for Substitution of Counsel: Generally, a defendant must establish both parts of the two-part test in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668, 80 L Ed 2d 674, 104 S Ct 2052 (1984), to prevail in showing ineffectiveness of counsel: (1) that counsel made errors so serious that counsel was not functioning as the counsel guaranteed by the constitution; and (2) that counsel's deficient performance prejudiced the defense and deprived defendant of a fair trial. However, in some cases, counsel's performance is so deficient that a presumption of ineffectiveness arises and the second part of the test becomes unnecessary. Only when surrounding circumstances justify a presumption of ineffectiveness can a constitutional claim of ineffective counsel be sufficient without inquiry into counsel's actual performance at trial. Here, a presumption of ineffectiveness could have arisen by an actual conflict of interest or by an irreconcilable conflict, but in either case, once the presumption was established, the second part of the test did not need to be satisfied. To establish an irreconcilable conflict, defendant must show a complete collapse of the attorney-client relationship. New counsel should be appointed if defendant shows by material facts that there is a total lack of communication or ineffective assistance of counsel, but bare unsupported allegations are insufficient to justify appointment of new counsel. In the present case, Wilson filed a pro se petition for postconviction relief, alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. The District Court found that it had erred by denying a hearing when Wilson requested substitution of counsel but denied the petition on grounds that Wilson had received a fair trial. On appeal, the Supreme Court applied St. v. Vessey, 967 P2d 960 (Utah Ct. App. 1998), holding that when reviewing an error in failing to investigate a defendant's timely request for substitution, the question is not whether the defendant received effective assistance of counsel at a subsequent trial, but whether the conflict with counsel was sufficient that it required substitution of counsel at the time that the request was made. In Wilson's case, it could not be determined whether the District Court gave adequate consideration to the merits of Wilson's substitution request based on the facts at the time that the request was made or whether denial of the petition for postconviction relief was based simply on the court's observation of counsel at the time of trial. The order denying the petition was vacated and the case remanded for further proceedings. Wilson v. St., 1999 MT 271, 296 M 465, 989 P2d 813, 56 St. Rep. 1096 (1999). See also St. v. Zackuse, 250 M 385, 833 P2d 142 (1991), St. v. Jones, 278 M 121, 923 P2d 560, 53 St. Rep. 864 (1996), St. v. Gallagher, 1998 MT 70, 288 M 180, 955 P2d 1371, 55 St. Rep. 284 (1998), and St. v. Molder, 2007 MT 41, 336 M 91, 152 P3d 722 (2007), in which it was held that because no request for new counsel was made, a separate hearing to consider a continuance motion was unnecessary. Molder was followed in St. v. Racz, 2007 MT 244, 339 M 218, 168 P3d 685 (2007).

Transfer of Youth Court Case to District Court Not Violative of Minor's Constitutional Rights: Spina argued that the statute allowing transfer of her Youth Court case to the District Court resulted in violation of her rights under Art. II, sec. 15, Mont. Const., which guarantees to minors the same fundamental rights afforded to adults, and under this section, which guarantees the right to a fair trial. The Supreme Court considered alleged violations of the right against self-incrimination, the right to effective assistance of counsel, the right to a fair trial, and the right to a presumption of innocence, finding that Spina's arguments were without merit. The transfer statute did not violate Spina's constitutional rights. St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Filed With Supreme Court — No District Court Jurisdiction to Amend Pleadings on Remand: Boucher filed with the Supreme Court for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court remanded to District Court for an evidentiary hearing on whether Boucher was denied effective assistance of counsel because of counsel's failure to investigate and formulate a defense based on the victim's history of making false accusations of sexual assault. On remand, Boucher sought to offer additional evidence of ineffective counsel unrelated to the issue remanded. Although a District Court has the discretion to grant or deny a motion to amend a postconviction petition when the petition is filed with that court, in cases like this when the petition is originally filed with the Supreme Court and remanded, the District Court does not have authority to grant leave to amend the pleadings to include allegations not included in the original petition. Petition for Postconviction Relief — Only Record-Based Claims Barred by Statute or Res Judicata: In 1993, Hagen was convicted of deliberate homicide and aggravated assault and appealed to the Montana Supreme Court, raising the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court. Hagen then filed a petition for postconviction relief, raising nine claims of ineffective assistance of counsel and argued that: (1) none of the claims could have been raised in his earlier direct appeal; (2) all claims were appropriate for his petition because an evidentiary hearing was required for all nine issues; (3) appellate counsel was ineffective in raising a particular issue in his previous direct appeal; and (4) if some or all of the claims relating to ineffective assistance of trial counsel should have been raised in his direct appeal but were not and were therefore barred, his appellate counsel provided ineffective assistance in failing to present those issues in his direct appeal. The state responded that six of Hagen's claims were procedurally barred by 46-21-105 because they could have been raised in his previous appeal, that one claim was barred by res judicata because it had been raised and decided in his previous appeal, and that three of Hagen's claims were not supported by the record or by the law and could therefore be decided on their merits without an evidentiary hearing. The District Court refused Hagen's request for an evidentiary hearing on his petition for postconviction relief and dismissed the petition, holding that the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel was raised in Hagen's direct appeal and had been decided by the Supreme Court, that Hagen's adequate remedy of appeal had been pursued, and that the petition for postconviction relief failed to state a claim for relief. Hagen appealed the dismissal of the petition to the Supreme Court. As an initial observation, the Supreme Court pointed out that although all of the issues raised by Hagen in his appeal of the District Court's denial of his petition for postconviction relief concerned ineffective assistance of counsel, not all of those claims were raised in the previous direct appeal and only those claims that were raised or that could have been raised in that previous direct appeal based upon the trial record were barred by 46-21-105(2) or the doctrine of res judicata. Citing In re Petition of Evans, 250 M 172, 819 P2d 156 (1991), and St. v. Bromgard, 273 M 20, 901 P2d 611 (1995), the Supreme Court further pointed out that those issues that are not record-based are properly brought to the Supreme Court by a petition for postconviction relief and that the District Court erred in failing to make that distinction and dismissing all of Hagen's ineffective assistance claims just because some of those claims may have been legitimately barred. The Supreme Court then individually reviewed each of Hagen's ineffective assistance claims and held that: (1) the manner in which mental evaluations of Hagen were disseminated during the trial was a matter of record and was therefore barred; (2) failure of Hagen's trial counsel to object to evidence introduced at trial was a matter of record and was therefore barred; (3) eliciting certain cross-examination testimony was based upon record evidence and was barred; (4) shifting the burden of proof during counsel's closing argument was a matter of record and barred by 46-21-105 and res judicata; (5) failure to investigate facts that could have provided a defense was properly raised in the postconviction relief petition because there could be no record evidence on this issue; (6) failure of trial counsel to present impeachment testimony was in part resolved during the appeal and was therefore res judicata and, with regard to one potential witness, was a matter of failure of trial counsel to investigate, could not be a matter of record, and therefore was not barred; (7) failure of trial counsel to properly prepare witnesses for trial was not and could not be reflected in the trial record and therefore was not barred; and (8) failure of appellate counsel to raise the ineffective assistance of trial counsel could not have been a matter of record evidence by its very nature and was therefore not barred from consideration in the postconviction relief petition. Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999), followed in St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001), and St. v. Upshaw, 2006 MT 341, 335 M 162, 153 P3d 579 (2006). See also St. v. Schaff, 2001 MT 130, 305 M 427, 28 P3d 1073 (2001), in which the question of voluntariness of a plea because of ineffective assistance of counsel was remanded for a hearing, despite the previous disposition of other voluntariness claims on direct appeal, because discussions between defendant and counsel were not record-based and thus could be presented only through postconviction proceedings.

Failure of District Court to Hold Hearing After Initial Inquiry Indicated Possible Ineffective Assistance — Remand for Hearing: Gallagher was charged with one count of felony assault (now assault with a weapon). At a hearing intended to be a change of plea hearing, LaFountain, Gallagher's public defender, put Gallagher on the witness stand. Gallagher testified as to the conflicts between him and LaFountain, those conflicts being LaFountain's advice to Gallagher that Gallagher plead guilty when Gallagher did not want to do so and a personality conflict between Gallagher and LaFountain. Gallagher then requested the District Court to appoint different counsel, but no change of counsel was made. Shortly before trial, LaFountain filed a motion to withdraw, but the motion was denied. Citing Billings v. Smith, 281 M 133, 932 P2d 1058 (1997), the Supreme Court determined that the District Court did make an adequate initial inquiry into Gallagher's complaint of ineffective assistance when the District Court heard testimony by Gallagher, at what was supposed to be a change of plea hearing, concerning the conflicts between Gallagher and LaFountain. However, the Supreme Court also held that the first hearing put the District Court on notice that Gallagher's complaints were seemingly substantial and that the District Court should therefore have held a second hearing to further investigate those complaints. Because the District Court failed to hold a second hearing, the Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court and required that the District Court hold a second hearing to determine if Gallagher's right to effective assistance of counsel was denied, saying that if his right was denied, then the judgment and sentence against him are vacated, including any fines and costs imposed, and that a new trial is ordered. St. v. Gallagher, 1998 MT 70, 288 M 180, 955 P2d 1371, 55 St. Rep. 284 (1998), followed in St. v. Weaver, 2001 MT 115, 305 M 315, 28 P3d 451 (2001), and in Halley v. St., 2008 MT 193, 344 M 37, 186 P3d 859 (2008).

Failure to Interview Witnesses Whose Statements Were Read by Counsel and Admitted by Defendant: Defense counsel did not render ineffective assistance by not interviewing witnesses whose written statements were reviewed by defense counsel and admitted to be accurate by defendant, who told defense counsel that he had killed the victim. St. v. Thomas, 285 M 112, 946 P2d 140, 54 St. Rep. 1068 (1997).

Failure to Investigate for Mental Problem — Absence of Evidence to Support One: Defense counsel did not render ineffective assistance of counsel by not investigating whether defendant's mental condition at the time that he killed the victim was a mitigating circumstance as to the death penalty. Defendant vehemently objected to the idea. Counsel's observations of defendant led him to believe that defendant was not suffering from a mental disease or defect. Defendant's history did not indicate a mental disease or defect at the time of the killing. St. v. Thomas, 285 M 112, 946 P2d 140, 54 St. Rep. 1068 (1997).

Potential for Emotional Involvement as Juror Bias — Omissions by Counsel During and as Result of Voir Dire as Ineffective Assistance Warranting Reversal: Two prospective jurors expressed reservations about their ability to judge a case fairly, yet counsel failed either to follow up with additional questions about whether the prospective jurors could set aside their feelings and render a fair verdict or to exclude the jurors by challenge for cause or peremptorily. When counsel, for no apparent reason, abandons a client's right to challenge a juror, error is attributed to counsel. The presence on a jury of even one juror who cannot fairly assess the credibility of witnesses is considered prejudicial. Counsel's failure to take steps to prevent the presence on the jury of two such jurors constituted ineffective assistance of counsel and reversible error. St. v. Chastain, 285 M 61, 947 P2d 57, 54 St. Rep. 1044 (1997), following U.S. v. Eubanks, 591 F2d 513 (9th Cir. 1979), overruled in St. v. Herrman, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), to the extent that a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel for failure to challenge prospective jurors in voir dire can be determined from a record that is silent as to counsel's reasoning, and overruled regarding whether claim of ineffective assistance of counsel for failure to challenge prospective jurors in voir dire can be determined from a record that is silent as to the counsel's reasoning in St. v. Vukasin, 2003 MT 230, 317 M 204, 75 P3d 1284 (2003).

Failure by Attorney to Investigate Effect of Defendant's Medication as Deficient Representation — Lack of Evidence of Effect of Medication on Defendant — No Prejudice: Defense counsel's failure to investigate the nature, effects, and amounts of defendant's medication was not a strategic decision based on professional deliberation and constituted deficient representation under the first prong of the Strickland test for ineffective assistance of counsel. However, in determining that the drug had no negative effect on defendant, the District Court considered the testimony of a psychiatrist who established that the drug in question could interfere with executive brain functions and have negative side effects on a person's judgment, and therefore the failure to investigate resulted in no prejudice to defendant. The fact that defendant expressed remorse did not excuse counsel's duty to investigate the amount and effects of the medication. The court's findings were not clearly erroneous and were supported by substantial evidence in the record, including defendant's own testimony that the drug did not affect him mentally. Bone v. St., 284 M 293, 944 P2d 734, 54 St. Rep. 890 (1997).

Failure to Object to Testimony — Choice of Trial Tactics in Presentation of Evidence Held Not Ineffective Assistance as Matter of Law — Failure to Object to Prosecutor Comment on Credibility Held Not to Be Denial of Effective Assistance of Counsel: Hanson was convicted of sexual assault and deviate sexual conduct. He retained different counsel and appealed his conviction, alleging ineffective assistance of counsel because his trial counsel failed to object to the testimony of three witnesses. The Supreme Court held that Hanson's trial counsel may have failed to object as a matter of trial strategy because his strategy was to disprove the credibility of the witnesses' testimony through cross-examination or through the testimony of other witnesses. The Supreme Court also held that one comment by the prosecutor on the believability of the testimony of an expert witness may have been improper but, in this case, did not rise to the level of ineffective assistance of counsel. St. v. Hanson, 283 M 316, 940 P2d 1166, 54 St. Rep. 678 (1997).

Counsel's Abandonment of Appeal — Postconviction Claims: All claims foreclosed from appeal because of counsel's abandonment of appeal may be raised in a postconviction petition. Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997). In a subsequent proceeding, the state and Hans disagreed as to which claims were properly before the Supreme Court as part of the second amended petition for postconviction relief. Clarifying the 1997 Hans I decision, the court held that under this case scenario, Hans was entitled to raise two types of issues: (1) those issues that could have been raised in a direct appeal but for counsel's abandonment of the appeal; and (2) those issues properly raised in a petition for postconviction relief under 46-21-101 that had not already been raised. In the future, a defendant whose counsel has abandoned an appeal should raise, in one petition for postconviction relief, the claim that counsel was ineffective in abandoning the appeal, all claims that could have been raised on direct appeal, and all claims that would normally be appropriate in a petition for postconviction relief, including challenges to the validity of the sentence and other ineffective assistance claims. In this case, Hans's objections to sentencing procedures were not properly preserved but were properly brought under the postconviction relief proceeding pursuant to 46-21-101. Those objections, as well as the ineffective assistance claims not raised in the first petition for postconviction relief, were not subject to dismissal as requested by the state. In re Petition of Hans, 1998 MT 7, 288 M 168, 958 P2d 1175, 55 St. Rep. 21 (1998). See also In re Petition of Evans, 250 M 172, 819 P2d 156 (1991), and St. v. Nelson, 274 M 11, 906 P2d 663 (1995).

Ineffective Assistance Claims Denied — No Right to Miranda Warning When Defendant Requests Psychiatric Exam — Duty to Inform Defendant of Consequences of Participation in Evaluation: The defendant alleged that counsel failed to provide effective counsel based on lack of communication, adequacy of advice regarding mitigated deliberate homicide, adequacy of advice regarding mental illness, requesting and agreeing to the dissemination of mental health evaluations, ineffectiveness of the investigation and preparation for trial, and abandonment of the appeal. The Supreme Court denied the petition for postconviction relief except to allow the defendant to amend the petition to address appealable sentencing issues. The defense counsel's acquiescence to dissemination of the mental health report pursuant to 46-14-202 is not grounds for a finding of ineffective assistance of counsel. Subsequently decided case law cannot be used to judge an attorney's conduct at the time of representation. A defendant has no constitutional right to be informed of Miranda rights when, through the defendant's attorney, the defendant requests a psychiatric exam. Counsel has a duty to inform a defendant of the consequences of participation in a psychiatric evaluation. In this case, the defendant was not prejudiced by the defense counsel's alleged failure to inform the defendant of the right to remain silent during the mental health evaluation. Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997).

Postconviction Relief Denied — Counsel Not Ineffective — Guilty Plea Properly Entered — Mental Health Evaluators' Failure to Advise Defendant of Rights Not Violation of Due Process — Petition Allowed on Appealable Sentencing Issues: The defendant, who was 14 years old at the time of a school shooting incident, pleaded guilty to four counts and was sentenced to the Department of Corrections for 100 years. The defendant petitioned for postconviction relief based on the claims of ineffective assistance of counsel; that the guilty plea was not entered knowingly, voluntarily, and intelligently; and that the defendant was denied due process because the mental health evaluators did not advise the defendant of the right to counsel, of the right not to submit to evaluation, and that statements could be used against him. The Supreme Court denied the petition for postconviction relief except to allow the defendant to amend the petition to address appealable sentencing issues. Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997).

Motion for Continuance Must Be Treated as Request for Substitution of Counsel: Smith moved the trial court for a continuance in order to have time to find new counsel. The trial court denied the motion without any inquiry as to Smith's reasons for his request, giving Smith only the choice of keeping his court-appointed counsel or representing himself. The Supreme Court held that regardless of the form of Smith's motion, the trial court should have treated it as a request for substitution of counsel and that the lower court had erred in not conducting at least an inquiry into whether Smith's complaints were substantial enough to warrant a hearing on the effectiveness of his counsel. Billings v. Smith, 281 M 133, 932 P2d 1058, 54 St. Rep. 96 (1997), followed in St. v. Gallagher, 1998 MT 70, 288 M 180, 955 P2d 1371, 55 St. Rep. 284 (1998).

Failure to Request Instruction on Nonaggressor Principle of Self-Defense — Claim That Victim Was Aggressor — No Ineffective Assistance: Assault defendant's defense was that the victim was the initial aggressor. No one testified that defendant was the aggressor. The court instructed on self-defense, including the rule that the person using the defense cannot have been the aggressor, but did not instruct on exceptions to the rule. Defense counsel decided as a tactical matter not to request an exceptions instruction because it would not be consistent with the defense that the victim was the aggressor. That decision was based on informed professional deliberation and was not the result of neglect or ignorance. Thus, there was no ineffective assistance of counsel. St. v. Gonzales, 278 M 525, 926 P2d 705, 53 St. Rep. 1015 (1996).

Motion for New Trial Properly Denied — Attorney Assistance Not Ineffective: Swan argued that he was ineffectively represented because his attorney failed to request an instruction on a lesser included offense, neglected to ensure Swan's presence at an in camera hearing at which the trial court considered and answered a note from the jury inquiring whether an assault instruction applied to a felony aggravated assault charge as well as a felony assault (now assault with a weapon) charge, and allowed joinder of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and felony aggravated assault charges. Finding that Swan failed to meet the first prong of the Strickland test, the Supreme Court held that Swan was effectively represented because counsel's performance was within the range of competence demanded of counsel in such cases and did not prejudice Swan in a manner that would have resulted in a different trial result. St. v. Swan, 279 M 483, 928 P2d 933, 53 St. Rep. 1246 (1996).

Attorney's Disclosure of Information Without Client's Consent — Presumption of Prejudice: Prior to defendant's trial for felony assault (now assault with a weapon), a court-appointed attorney moved to withdraw as counsel based on Rule 1.16, Montana Rules of Professional Conduct, which requires an attorney to withdraw when continued representation would result in a violation of the rules of professional conduct. The attorney informed the court that the defendant, against the advice of counsel, had communicated an intent to testify falsely at trial. The District Court denied the attorney's motion to withdraw, and the defendant was subsequently convicted of assault. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded, ruling that the attorney's disclosure of confidential information implicated the attorney's duty of loyalty and the defendant's constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel. St. v. Jones, 278 M 121, 923 P2d 560, 53 St. Rep. 864 (1996).

Effective Assistance of Appellate Counsel — Standards on Appeal: Brown was convicted of felony assault (now assault with a weapon), and the conviction was affirmed on appeal. Brown then filed a petition for postconviction relief, claiming ineffective assistance of his appellate counsel. The Supreme Court held, on Brown's various arguments why Hood, Brown's appellate counsel, was ineffective, that: (1) a proper interpretation of the law by counsel is, as a matter of law, not deficient performance; (2) Hood's analysis of trial counsel's reasons for not objecting to the admissibility of certain evidence was correct, given the Supreme Court's independent conclusion that failure of trial counsel to object was a matter of trial strategy; and (3) the Supreme Court would not reweigh the evidence as to whether Hood allowed Brown to review and comment on the appellate brief. Brown v. St., 277 M 430, 922 P2d 1146, 53 St. Rep. 692 (1996).

Failure to Inquire Into Claims of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel as Reversible Error: Weaver entered a guilty plea to charges of misdemeanor assault, issuing bad checks, and domestic abuse. Weaver subsequently filed a pro se motion to change his plea and a "motion to relieve counsel". At a sentencing hearing, the District Court Judge stated that she had reviewed "most of the motions that have been filed in these matters" but did not "see where they will have anything to do with the sentencing in this matter". The state argued as if the motion to relieve counsel was denied, but the Supreme Court noted that the record was devoid of any indication that the District Court had made even a cursory inquiry into Weaver's complaints about his counsel's representation. Citing St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996), overruled, to the extent that it stands for the proposition that a criminal defendant has a right to a "meaningful attorney-client relationship", in St. v. Gallagher, 2001 MT 39, 304 M 215, 19 P3d 817A (2001), the Supreme Court held that when a defendant files a motion to remove the defendant's attorney because of claims of ineffective assistance of counsel, the District Court must make a critical analysis of the defendant's complaints and, if the defendant has presented seemingly substantial complaints, must hold a hearing to determine the validity of the defendant's claims. Therefore, the Supreme Court held that the District Court erred in failing to take these steps regarding Weaver's claims. St. v. Weaver, 276 M 505, 917 P2d 437, 53 St. Rep. 495 (1996), overruled, to the extent that it stands for the proposition that a criminal defendant has a right to a "meaningful attorney-client relationship", in St. v. Gallagher, 2001 MT 39, 304 M 215, 19 P3d 817A (2001).

Failure to Appoint New Counsel During Posttrial Hearing on Counsel's Effectiveness: Finley contended that the District Court denied him his right to counsel's undivided loyalty under 46-21-201 by failing to appoint new counsel to represent him at a posttrial hearing regarding his counsel's effectiveness, at which his counsel confronted him concerning the sufficiency of his allegations of ineffectiveness and then took the stand to rebut those allegations. Section 46-21-201 was not in effect at the time of the hearing and thus did not apply; however, under 46-21-101, a postconviction hearing is a separate proceeding that is available after sentencing and applies when there is no adequate remedy of appeal. Further, under this section, the right to counsel is composed of two correlative rights—the right to counsel of reasonable competence and the right to counsel's undivided loyalty. The Supreme Court applied St. v. Zackuse, 250 M 385, 833 P2d 142 (1991), in holding that when a defendant and counsel have a conflict so great that it results in a total lack of communication or that if counsel fails to render effective assistance, new counsel should be appointed. The potential for substantial prejudice to Finley existed at the posttrial hearing, qualifying the hearing as a critical stage in the proceedings. It was error for the trial court to fail to appoint new counsel, at least for purposes of the competency hearing. St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996), overruled, to the extent that it stands for the proposition that a criminal defendant has a right to a "meaningful attorney-client relationship", in St. v. Gallagher, 2001 MT 39, 304 M 215, 19 P3d 817A (2001).

Failure to Offer Jury Instruction on Lesser Offense — Tactical Decision — Assistance Not Deficient: Leyba contended that he was denied effective assistance because his counsel offered only a deliberate homicide jury instruction when Leyba's defense was based on mitigating circumstances and his counsel should have offered an instruction that would have allowed the jury to consider whether he was guilty of mitigated deliberate homicide. However, the record indicated a self-defense theory at trial and that Leyba and his counsel made a tactical trial strategy decision, based on informed professional deliberation, to seek absolute acquittal on the self-defense theory. The decision was not the result of neglect or deficient performance on the part of counsel and was within the range of competence demanded of attorneys in criminal cases. St. v. Leyba, 276 M 45, 915 P2d 794, 53 St. Rep. 7 (1996), following Bashor v. Risley, 730 F2d 1228 (9th Cir. 1984), and St. v. Sheppard, 270 M 122, 890 P2d 754 (1995).

Refusal to Cooperate With Court-Appointed Attorney and Refusal to Proceed Pro Se — No Error to Proceed With Trial: Before trial, the defendant made a motion for substitution of counsel, which the court denied. At trial, the defendant refused to cooperate with his court-appointed counsel or to proceed pro se. Trial continued with no defense being offered. The Supreme Court held that the District Court had not abused its discretion in denying the request for a new trial and did not deny the defendant's constitutional right to the assistance of counsel by refusing to substitute court-appointed counsel, thereby giving the defendant the option of proceeding to trial with his court-appointed counsel or appearing pro se. The Supreme Court found that by not cooperating with the court-appointed counsel and not proceeding pro se, the defendant attempted to manipulate the District Court into appointing new counsel. The Supreme Court found that the court-appointed counsel did provide effective assistance and that only the defendant's noncooperation compromised the representation. The court cannot countenance manipulation of the sixth amendment in order to sabotage the criminal justice system. St. v. Craig, 274 M 140, 906 P2d 683, 52 St. Rep. 1158 (1995).

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Minute Entry of Defense Counsel's Comments Held Not Prejudicial on Charge of Bail-Jumping — Instruction on Notice to Attorney Not Prejudicial: Wereman was convicted of bail-jumping after a trial in which he testified that he failed to appear because he thought that the charge would be dismissed. The Supreme Court held that a comment by defense counsel, that counsel did not know where Wereman was, made earlier when Wereman failed to appear on a charge of aggravated assault, did not represent a conflict of interest between counsel and Wereman and did not constitute ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court stated that because Wereman himself stated that he failed to appear because he thought that the charges would be dismissed, not because he lacked notice, the comments by defense counsel contained in a minute entry did not impact on counsel's ability to represent Wereman and were not prejudicial. Citing St. v. Blackbird, 187 M 270, 609 P2d 708 (1980), the Supreme Court also held that the District Court's instruction imputing notice to Wereman from his defense counsel should not have been given but that in this case, the giving of the instruction was harmless error. St. v. Wereman, 273 M 245, 902 P2d 1009, 52 St. Rep. 958 (1995).

Ineffective Assistance Claims Denied — No Prejudice Shown Under Strickland Test: Applying the Strickland test for determining effectiveness of counsel, the Supreme Court dismissed defendant's claims that he was ineffectively represented at trial, during the penalty phase proceedings, and during the course of direct appeal, including claims based on: (1) failure to object to prosecutor's statements that defendant was intoxicated at the time of the crime, when that was in fact true, and to object to an intoxication instruction that was based on statutory language; (2) failure to object to closing arguments during which the prosecutor portrayed himself as the victim and narrated in the first person (following U.S. v. Necoechea, 986 F2d 1273 (9th Cir. 1993)); (3) failure to object to the lack of corroborating evidence regarding a witness's testimony when the objection lacked merit and would have been properly overruled (following St. v. Rodgers, 257 M 413, 849 P2d 1028 (1993)); (4) failure to investigate and pursue a mental defect defense after defendant's own psychologist of choice found him capable of going to trial (see Harris v. Vasquez, 949 F2d 1497 (9th Cir. 1990)); (5) failure to move for a substitute judge when there was no reasonable probability that the outcome of the trial would have differed with another judge presiding; (6) failure to request a change of venue absent evidence of juror bias and failure to adequately voir dire the jury when there was no reasonable probability that the outcome of the trial would have differed had voir dire been conducted more thoroughly; (7) ineffectiveness in investigating a witness's background when counsel's investigation fell within the wide range of competent assistance; (8) failure to investigate defendant's suicide attempt; (9) failure to object to certain jury instructions allowing inference of the existence of the requisite mental state from the acts of the accused (following St. v. Cowan, 260 M 510, 861 P2d 884 (1993)); (10) failure to object to instructions setting out the elements of aggravated kidnapping when defendant did not specify which of the alternatives in the instruction were objectionable (following Schad v. Ariz., 501 US 624, 115 L Ed 2d 555, 111 S Ct 2491 (1991)); (11) failure to object to the absence of Native Americans on the jury when, given recent census data, counsel could not have demonstrated that Native Americans were underrepresented on the panel; and (12) failure to object to the presence of armed officers in the courtroom (following Holbrook v. Flynn, 475 US 560, 89 L Ed 2d 525, 106 S Ct 1340 (1986)). Kills On Top v. St., 273 M 32, 901 P2d 1368, 52 St. Rep. 608 (1995).

Failure to Raise Claim of Erroneous Denial of Counsel Absent Legal Basis — Counsel's Trial Tactics — Not Deficient Performance: Counsel's failure to raise a claim of erroneous denial of counsel absent a legal basis for doing so does not constitute deficient performance. Further, decisions relating to presentation of the case, including whether to introduce certain evidence or to present witnesses, generally are matters of trial tactics and strategy and will not support a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. St. v. Henry, 271 M 491, 898 P2d 1195, 52 St. Rep. 516 (1995).

Failure of Counsel to Take Certain Trial Actions for Strategic Reasons — Assistance Not Considered Ineffective: Trial counsel's failure to attempt to introduce inadmissible evidence, failure to make an objection that lacked merit, failure to object to admissible hearsay rebuttal testimony, failure to request a mistrial, and other actions taken for strategic reasons did not constitute ineffective assistance of counsel. St. v. Hildreth, 267 M 423, 884 P2d 771, 51 St. Rep. 1086 (1994). See also St. v. Langford, 248 M 420, 813 P2d 936 (1991), and St. v. Rodgers, 257 M 413, 849 P2d 1028 (1993), and Adams v. St., 2007 MT 35, 336 M 63, 153 P3d 601 (2007).

Failure to Meet Second Prong of Strickland Test — No Prejudice Shown — Claim of Ineffective Counsel Denied: Denny's counsel neglected to investigate and interview several witnesses in her case, which satisfied the first prong of the Strickland test for ineffective counsel. However, because the potential witnesses were never interviewed, it was impossible to determine whether their testimony would have produced a different result. The second prong of Strickland was not satisfied because Denny could not demonstrate that counsel's omission prejudiced the case to such a degree as to deprive Denny of a fair trial. Denny's motion for a new trial on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel was properly denied. St. v. Denny, 262 M 248, 865 P2d 226, 50 St. Rep. 1537 (1993), following Nealy v. Cabana, 764 F2d 1173 (5th Cir. 1985), United States ex rel. Cross v. DeRobertis, 811 F2d 1008 (7th Cir. 1987), and Lawrence v. Armontrout, 900 F2d 127 (8th Cir. 1990), and cited in St. v. Hagen, 273 M 432, 903 P2d 1381, 52 St. Rep. 1048 (1995). Hagen was followed in St. v. Boucher, 1999 MT 102, 294 M 296, 980 P2d 1058, 56 St. Rep. 431 (1999), and St. v. Cady, 2000 MT 353, 303 M 258, 15 P3d 479, 57 St. Rep. 1491 (2000).

Failure to Oppose Admission of Evidence Absent Legal Basis — Not Deficient Performance: Counsel's failure to oppose the admission of evidence, absent a legal basis for doing so, does not constitute deficient performance. St. v. Bradley, 262 M 194, 864 P2d 787, 50 St. Rep. 1511 (1993), followed in St. v. Henry, 271 M 491, 898 P2d 1195, 52 St. Rep. 516 (1995).

Use of Psychiatric Report Not Violative of Right to Effective Counsel: Smith relied on Estelle v. Smith, 451 US 454, 68 L Ed 2d 359, 101 S Ct 1866 (1981), and Powell v. Tex., 492 US 680, 106 L Ed 2d 551, 109 S Ct 3146 (1989), in claiming that the state's use of a psychiatrist's report and testimony to establish aggravating factors and rebut mitigating evidence exceeded the scope of the examination as set by the trial court, violating Smith's constitutional right to effectively consult with his attorney prior to the examination. However, the court's citation to the report merely supplemented preceding citations to other evidence and did not serve as the court's sole support for any findings or exceed the scope of the examination. The state's use of the report and testimony was qualitatively different from the prosecution's use of psychiatric evidence in Estelle and Powell and did not violate Smith's right to effective assistance of counsel. St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 1388 (1993).

Defendant to Assert Desire to Appeal Conviction: The Supreme Court ruled that Walker had been informed of his right to an appeal and had not requested either of his counsel to file a notice of appeal and therefore had no basis for a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. Walker v. St., 261 M 1, 862 P2d 1, 50 St. Rep. 1115 (1993).

Advice to Enter Alford Plea Not Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Defendant contended that he was not provided with effective assistance of counsel with respect to his attorney's advice that he enter Alford pleas to the charged offenses rather than proceed to trial. The attorney was prepared to go to trial. On the morning of the trial, defendant asked him about an Alford plea, which the attorney explained to defendant and defendant understood. Thus, defendant did not meet the first prong of the Strickland test for proving ineffective assistance of counsel by showing that the attorney's performance fell below the range of competence reasonably demanded of attorneys. St. v. Cameron, 253 M 95, 830 P2d 1284, 49 St. Rep. 150 (1992).

Defendant Not Adversely Affected by Counsel's Drug Arrest: Defendant appealed his conviction for possession of drugs and drug paraphernalia, alleging that he was denied effective assistance of counsel arising from a conflict of interest because his attorney was subsequently charged with conspiracy to manufacture and distribute drugs and with tax fraud arising from the sale of drugs. The Supreme Court held that because the performance of defendant's attorney was not adversely affected by an actual conflict of interest, defendant was not denied effective assistance of counsel under the two-pronged standard established by the U.S. Supreme Court in Cuyler v. Sullivan, 446 US 335, 64 L Ed 2d 333, 100 S Ct 1708 (1980). St. v. Christenson, 250 M 351, 820 P2d 1303, 48 St. Rep. 1034 (1991).

Failure to Object to Substitution of Witness — Failure to Interview Witness: In order to prevail on a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel, a defendant must show that a reasonable probability exists that but for his counsel's deficient performance, the trial's outcome would have been different. Failure to object to the adding of a name to the list of witnesses 3 weeks before trial under the circumstances of this case was not deficient. Even if failure to interview a witness was deficient, in light of the overwhelming evidence against him, the defendant cannot make the required showing. St. v. McLain, 249 M 242, 815 P2d 147, 48 St. Rep. 664 (1991).

Ineffective Assistance Claim on Direct Appeal Res Judicata: An evidentiary hearing held on the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel resulted in a District Court decision that the Supreme Court reviewed and affirmed. On direct appeal, the claim was held to have been fully litigated and reconsideration was barred because additional review of the same issue between the same parties would negate the intent of the doctrines of res judicata and law of the case. St. v. Black, 245 M 39, 798 P2d 530, 47 St. Rep. 1677 (1990), distinguished in St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997).

When Ineffective Assistance Claims More Appropriately Addressed by Petition for Postconviction Relief: Relying on the decision in U.S. v. Birges, 723 F2d 666 (9th Cir. 1984), the Supreme Court held that ineffective assistance of counsel claims raised on direct appeal and involving the consideration of facts beyond the record would more appropriately be addressed by a petition for postconviction relief. A defendant whose claim of ineffectiveness was appropriately classified as a petition for postconviction relief was not constitutionally entitled to counsel because such petitions are civil in nature and are not governed by constitutional requirements for counsel. St. v. Black, 245 M 39, 798 P2d 530, 47 St. Rep. 1677 (1990), followed in Thurston v. St., 2004 MT 142, 321 M 411, 91 P3d 1259 (2004). See also St. v. Mallak, 2005 MT 49, 326 M 165, 109 P3d 209 (2005).

Denial of Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea Based on Ineffective Counsel: As set out in Hill v. Lockhart, 474 US 52, 88 L Ed 2d 203, 106 S Ct 366 (1985), when a guilty plea rather than the result of a trial is at issue in determining effectiveness of counsel, the defendant must demonstrate that but for counsel's deficient performance, defendant would not have pleaded guilty and would have insisted on going to trial. Failure to present such evidence, coupled with a lack of evidence showing that counsel's performance fell below the range of competence reasonably demanded of attorneys in criminal cases, was adequate to substantiate denial of defendant's petition for postconviction relief based on ineffective representation. St. v. Senn, 244 M 56, 795 P2d 973, 47 St. Rep. 1389 (1990), followed in St. v. Jungers, 245 M 519, 802 P2d 615, 47 St. Rep. 2229 (1990), St. v. Mason, 253 M 419, 833 P2d 1058, 49 St. Rep. 506 (1992), St. v. Bradley, 262 M 194, 864 P2d 787, 50 St. Rep. 1511 (1993), St. v. Duff, 262 M 288, 865 P2d 238, 50 St. Rep. 1561 (1993), and In re Petition of Hinman, 271 M 167, 895 P2d 609, 52 St. Rep. 351 (1995).

Failure to Question Witness: The defendant argued that he had been denied effective assistance of counsel because his attorney did not question a witness concerning the witness's statements that the defendant had not had an opportunity to molest the victim. The Supreme Court noted that the defendant's attorney chose to develop the evidence tending to prove that the defendant was not present in the victim's home on the night of the alleged incident. The court stated that such a decision was in the sound discretion of counsel and did not constitute ineffective representation. St. v. Henderson, 242 M 384, 791 P2d 442, 47 St. Rep. 817 (1990).

Defendant-Attorney Relationship Need Not Be Meaningful: The defendant alleged that he had received ineffective assistance of counsel because the lower court had denied his motion for substitution of counsel. The Supreme Court held that the record indicated that while the defendant and his attorney may have had a conflict, it had not resulted in a total communication breakdown. St. v. Albrecht, 242 M 403, 791 P2d 760, 47 St. Rep. 800 (1990).

Counsel's Refusal to Attack Testimony of Defendant's Wife: The defendant argued that he had not received effective representation because his attorney refused to attack the testimony of the defendant's wife. The defense attorney filed an affidavit indicating that she had not questioned the wife because she did not want to open the door for evidence that might lead to the introduction of the defendant's previous conviction for killing his first wife. The Supreme Court held that the attorney's decision was one of trial tactics and did not result in prejudice to the defendant. Hawkins v. St., 242 M 348, 790 P2d 990, 47 St. Rep. 783 (1990).

Defendant Not Prejudiced by Counsel's Attempt to Impeach State Witness: Defendant contended that his counsel's performance was deficient because he failed to adequately present evidence to impeach the state's key witness against the defendant. Defendant's allegations of error amount to an attempt to second guess his counsel's trial tactics and strategies. When, as in this case, no prejudice to defendant is shown, the court will not question counsel's professional deliberations. St. v. Stewart, 235 M 239, 767 P2d 296, 45 St. Rep. 2350 (1988), followed in St. v. Paulson, 250 M 32, 817 P2d 1137, 48 St. Rep. 838 (1991).

Effective Assistance of Counsel — Two-Part Test: In holding that the record does not support the defendant's claim of ineffective counsel, the Montana Supreme Court followed the two-part test adopted in St. v. Boyer, 215 M 143, 695 P2d 829, 42 St. Rep. 247 (1985). The defendant had to show that counsel's performance was deficient and that the deficient performance prejudiced the defense. In this case, the defendant's attempts to disqualify the judge were disallowed due to the defendant's own procedural error before counsel became involved in the defense. St. v. Hoch, 234 M 405, 763 P2d 1119, 45 St. Rep. 2007 (1988).

Failure to Hold Hearing Regarding Effective Assistance of Counsel — Reversible Error: Defendant represented herself after requesting removal of counsel and being denied appointment of substitute counsel. The trial court determined defendant was competent to represent and that she had made a knowing and voluntary waiver of counsel. However, it was error for the court to fail to hold an independent hearing to establish whether defendant had received effective representation and to determine the validity of her complaints concerning counsel. Failure to make such determination deprived defendant of the opportunity to make a meaningful choice to proceed pro se, infringing the right to effective assistance of counsel and the right to a fair trial, and constituted reversible error. St. v. Enright, 233 M 225, 758 P2d 779, 45 St. Rep. 1442 (1988) (overruled, to the extent that it stands for the proposition that a criminal defendant has a right to a "meaningful attorney-client relationship", in St. v. Gallagher, 2001 MT 39, 304 M 215, 19 P3d 817A (2001)), distinguished in St. v. Morrison, 257 M 282, 848 P2d 514, 50 St. Rep. 270 (1993) (overruled, to the extent that it stands for the proposition that a criminal defendant has a right to a "meaningful attorney-client relationship", in St. v. Gallagher, 2001 MT 39, 304 M 215, 19 P3d 817A (2001)), and St. v. Craig, 274 M 140, 906 P2d 683, 52 St. Rep. 1158 (1995), and followed in St. v. Weaver, 276 M 505, 917 P2d 437, 53 St. Rep. 495 (1996). See also St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996) (overruled, to the extent that it stands for the proposition that a criminal defendant has a right to a "meaningful attorney-client relationship", in St. v. Gallagher, 2001 MT 39, 304 M 215, 19 P3d 817A (2001)), in which failure to hold an initial determination of the substance of defendant's pro se complaints about counsel was held to be harmless error because the District Court held a posttrial hearing regarding counsel's representation, and Billings v. Smith, 281 M 133, 932 P2d 1058, 54 St. Rep. 96 (1997).

Request for Substitution of Counsel Denied — No Incompetence or Prejudice: Defendant asserted it was error for the District Court to deny his motion for substitution of counsel based on claims of attorney incompetence in the field of criminal law and prejudice due to the attorney being influenced by his brother, who had previously prosecuted the defendant. It was within the court's discretion to deny new counsel after finding that the attorney had practiced law, including criminal law, for 30 years. Further, prejudice and conflict of interest would be present only if the attorney's brother's prior prosecution of defendant and the charges at issue overlapped; however, the proceedings were entirely different. St. v. Martz, 233 M 136, 760 P2d 65, 45 St. Rep. 1370 (1988), followed in St. v. Zackuse, 48 St. Rep. 858 (1991) (apparently not reported in Montana Reports).

Claims of Ineffective Assistance Insufficient to Show Prejudice: Defendant claimed he received ineffective assistance of counsel due to his attorney's decision: (1) not to extensively cross- examine certain witnesses; (2) not to submit a self-defense instruction to the jury; and (3) not to challenge a juror for cause when no partiality or prejudice was shown. Defendant also claimed counsel was not adequately prepared for the sentencing hearing. The Supreme Court found counsel was prepared and that the alleged failures in assistance could as easily be classified as trial tactics. The court refused to second-guess counsel's tactics absent a showing of prejudice. St. v. Hurlbert, 232 M 115, 756 P2d 1110, 45 St. Rep. 923 (1988), followed in St. v. McColley, 247 M 524, 807 P2d 1358, 48 St. Rep. 290 (1991).

Manifest Necessity for Mistrial and Retrial — Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — No Basis for Reversal by Subsequent Trial Judge: After 1 day of trial, a trial court on its own motion exercised sound discretion in finding manifest necessity for a mistrial based on the conclusion that counsel was too inexperienced to defend a major felony charge involving conspiracy and accountability theories. The court also properly found that manifest necessity dictated the matter be retried and that the bar of double jeopardy did not prevent a retrial. On appeal, the Supreme Court distinguished Strickland v. Washington, 466 US 668, 80 L Ed 2d 674, 104 S Ct 2052 (1984), in noting that the second prong of the Strickland test was established for the consideration of action taken in the course of a complete trial. Because there was no way of showing whether counsel's conduct deprived defendant of a fair trial unless the trial had been allowed to go to a conclusion, Strickland was inapplicable. There was no basis for reversal of the mistrial decision by a subsequent trial judge. St. v. Moran, 231 M 387, 753 P2d 333, 45 St. Rep. 79 (1988). Opinion withdrawn, but issue affirmed in St. v. Moran, 231 M 387, 753 P2d 333, 45 St. Rep. 703 (1988).

Failure to Object — Tactical Decisions Within Counsel's Discretion: Defendant contended he received ineffective assistance of counsel because his attorneys failed to object to his arrest without a warrant, to most of the "other acts" evidence, to the original information until closing arguments, and to opinion testimony regarding the credibility of witnesses. The Supreme Court noted that the decisions on the timing and number of objections lie within counsel's tactical discretion and found that defendant failed to specifically show how these alleged errors constituted deficient performance. The court declined to allow unsupported allegations to brand counsel's performance as deficient. St. v. Matson, 227 M 36, 736 P2d 971, 44 St. Rep. 874 (1987), followed in St. v. Brown, 228 M 209, 741 P2d 428, 44 St. Rep. 1462 (1987), followed in St. v. Smith, 232 M 156, 755 P2d 569, 45 St. Rep. 955 (1988).

Waiver of Counsel at Sentencing Hearing — Pro Se Appearance Not Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Prior to a sentencing hearing, defendant filed a pro se motion for a new trial with over 50 pages of supporting documents in which he claimed that his counsel was ineffective. The motion was discussed at the hearing, and defendant's counsel was relieved from further duty but was appointed as standby counsel for defendant's reference for the remainder of the hearing. Defendant requested new counsel to pursue the claims set out in the motion, and the District Court explained that the matters raised in the motion could properly be raised on appeal, but not at the sentencing hearing. These facts, coupled with defendant's obvious familiarity with the criminal justice system, led to the conclusion that defendant was not denied effective assistance of counsel at the sentencing hearing. St. v. Martin, 226 M 463, 736 P2d 477, 44 St. Rep. 804 (1987).

Effectiveness of Counsel Who Withdrew Self-Defense and Mental Disease Defenses: It was not error for counsel to withdraw defenses of justifiable use of force and mental disease or defect when the former was unsupported by the facts and the doctors who examined defendant stated he did not have a mental disease or defect and could have acted with the requisite mental state. St. v. Docken, 222 M 58, 720 P2d 679, 43 St. Rep. 1058 (1986).

Failure to Object to Hearsay Testimony: While it was error for defense counsel in assault trial to fail to object to hearsay testimony and introduction of certain irrelevant evidence, such error, in view of the other supporting evidence, was not so prejudicial as to amount to ineffective assistance of counsel. St. v. Probert, 221 M 476, 719 P2d 783, 43 St. Rep. 988 (1986).

Decision to Call Witnesses — Trial Tactic — Not Grounds for Determination of Inadequacy of Counsel: The decision to call or not to call witnesses is a matter of trial tactics and is not a ground for a determination that the lawyer's representation of the client was not adequate. St. v. Elliott, 221 M 174, 717 P2d 572, 43 St. Rep. 723 (1986).

Effective Assistance of Counsel — Potential Charges Against Counsel as Conflict of Interest: Defendant asserted he did not receive effective assistance of counsel where his retained trial counsel mishandled the murder weapon and neither his counsel, the District Court Judge, nor the prosecutor informed him of the possible charges against his counsel which could have resulted in a conflict of interest between defendant and his counsel. The Supreme Court found that the record and findings made after the evidentiary hearing may have demonstrated improper action of counsel. However, given his conduct during trial, his testimony at the evidentiary hearing that he was not aware of any impending charges, the prosecutor's decision not to press charges but only refer the matter for investigation, and the lack of charges until the trial was completed, defendant was not denied effective assistance because of any misconduct of defense counsel or any failure to inform him of the possible charges prior to completion of the trial. St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986).

Defendant Not Prejudiced by Counsel's Lack of Diligence: It appeared defendant had his plea bargain practically guaranteed before Houtz was appointed. Houtz, after reviewing the case against his client, determined the plea bargain to be reasonable and fair. He therefore pursued and achieved finalization of that bargain. The Supreme Court also found the plea bargain to be reasonable and fair. The court was not persuaded that had defendant been advised of the victim's and a witness' inconsistent statements, he would have opted to proceed to trial on the attempted deliberate homicide charge. Thus, counsel's failure to advise his client of the complete case against him did not undermine the court's confidence in the eventual outcome, the plea bargain. St. v. LaTray, 220 M 358, 715 P2d 52, 43 St. Rep. 429 (1986).

Failure to Show Incompetency: Defendant was charged with two felonies occurring at about the same time and had been convicted of a felony 5 years prior to the current charges. Defendant pleaded guilty to avoid increased punishment as a persistent felony offender. Later, defendant sought to withdraw the guilty plea on grounds of coercion and ineffective assistance of counsel. The District Court denied the motion, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The defendant failed to show that his attorney's counseling was inadequate, incompetent, or not within the range of competence demanded of attorneys in criminal cases. Counsel was not ineffective when the attorney consulted with other criminal counsel and did all things to properly defend. St. v. Williamson, 218 M 242, 707 P2d 530, 42 St. Rep. 1551 (1985).

Failure to Give Mandatory Accomplice Jury Instruction — Harmless Error — Not Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: In petitioner's trial on the charge of attempted deliberate homicide, his lawyer withdrew a previous request, in a jury instruction mandated by 26-1-303, that testimony of an accomplice must be viewed with distrust. Petitioner's theory of defense was that his alleged accomplices had fabricated their testimony. The judge did instruct the jury that testimony of accomplices must be corroborated. In a proceeding for postconviction relief, the Supreme Court ruled that the court's failure to give the mandatory instruction was harmless error and that the withdrawal by petitioner's lawyer of the request for the mandatory instruction was not ineffective assistance of counsel under Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668, 80 L Ed 2d 674, 104 S Ct 2052 (1984). In re Gillham, 218 M 187, 707 P2d 1100, 42 St. Rep. 1508 (1985).

Failure to Raise Weak Search and Seizure Issue — Not Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: No illegal search or seizure was made when a private citizen, after allegedly promising a Deputy Sheriff to do so, went to the home of the woman who hired petitioner to kill her husband and obtained a gun (evidence of the alleged crime) from her. Petitioner's lawyer was not negligent for not moving to suppress introduction of the pistol as evidence at the time of the trial and not making it a subject for appeal. In re Gillham, 218 M 187, 707 P2d 1100, 42 St. Rep. 1508 (1985).

Six and a Half Weeks to Prepare for Burglary-Theft Trial — Sufficient Time: There was nothing to indicate that, when counsel for defendant convicted of two counts of burglary and one of theft had 6½ weeks to prepare for trial, the attorney had insufficient time to adequately prepare and nothing to indicate that effective assistance of counsel was denied. St. v. Robbins, 218 M 107, 708 P2d 227, 42 St. Rep. 1440 (1985).

Specific Acts or Omissions That Deny Fair Trial: In St. v. Boyer, 215 M 143, 695 P2d 829, 42 St. Rep. 247 (1985), the court adopted the test set forth by the U.S. Supreme Court in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668, 80 L Ed 2d 674, 104 S Ct 2052 (1984), for determining when ineffective assistance of counsel has occurred. Applying that test in the instant case, the court found no specific acts or omissions which would have denied the defendant a fair trial. St. v. Grant, 217 M 357, 704 P2d 1064, 42 St. Rep. 1248 (1985).

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim — Effect on Attorney-Client Privilege: When a convicted person files a petition for relief based on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel, the petitioner's comprehension of waiver of privilege or his knowledge and consent to waiver are irrelevant. The attorney in question has a duty to respond by affidavit or other sworn testimony to admit, deny, or qualify the allegations of fact made in the petition. In future cases, if a response from a defense attorney so charged is necessary, the Attorney General shall first apply to the Supreme Court for an order preserving the responding attorney from charges of discipline or malpractice for revealing necessary confidential information from such convicted person. Petition of Gillham, 216 M 279, 704 P2d 1019, 42 St. Rep. 806 (1985). Gillham was clarified in Marble v. St., 2007 MT 98, 337 M 99, 169 P3d 1148 (2007). See also Bone v. St., 284 M 293, 944 P2d 734, 54 St. Rep. 890 (1997), wherein it was held that failure to secure an order from the Supreme Court pursuant to Petition of Gillham did not constitute prejudice to defendant because the District Court that ruled on the petition did not rely on preliminary findings on the issue.

Remand to Determine Effective Assistance of Counsel:

Defendant was convicted of felony theft of a jackhammer. New counsel appealed on the grounds that defendant was denied a fair trial and effective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court remanded for an evidentiary hearing. The Supreme Court agreed with the findings and conclusions the trial court made at the hearing. Defendant's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel was not supported by the evidence. First defense counsel's decision to not call a defense witness at trial was clearly within the range of competence demanded of attorneys in criminal cases. The witness supposedly could have testified that he gave the jackhammer to defendant, but the witness' statement was not only inconsistent with known facts but destructive to the defendant's case. St. v. Field, 215 M 361, 697 P2d 1339, 42 St. Rep. 431 (1985).

The defendant was convicted of two counts of sexual intercourse without consent, and after a failure to perfect his appeal, the defendant's original counsel was disbarred. On appeal taken by the defendant's second counsel, the Supreme Court reviewed the record of the original trial wherein the defendant's first lawyer was shown to have been put on notice of the existence and location of evidence he did not properly examine and wherein it was shown that the first appeal was not perfected. Because it could not determine from these facts whether the defendant had received effective assistance of counsel at trial, the Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court for an evidentiary hearing on the issue. St. v. Boyer, 208 M 258, 676 P2d 787, 41 St. Rep. 321 (1984). On remand, it was found that counsel's efforts were effective and client was adequately represented. St. v. Boyer, 215 M 143, 695 P2d 829, 42 St. Rep. 247 (1985), followed in St. v. Aills, 250 M 533, 822 P2d 87, 48 St. Rep. 960 (1991), and St. v. Hanson, 283 M 316, 940 P2d 1166, 54 St. Rep. 678 (1997).

Failure to Procure Witness — Not Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Defense counsel failed to procure a witness, and defendant contended that this action constituted ineffective assistance of counsel. However, defendant did not contend that counsel was generally ineffective. The Supreme Court held that considering the circumstances surrounding the failure to procure the witness and the record of the proceeding, there was no ineffective assistance of counsel violating the defendant's constitutional rights. St. v. Harris, 209 M 511, 682 P2d 159, 41 St. Rep. 866 (1984).

Denial of Continuance When Attorney Informed of Appointment 25 Days Before Homicide Trial — Fair Trial and Effective Assistance Rights Denied: Attorney for defendant charged with deliberate homicide was relieved of his duty on December 14, and the new attorney learned of his appointment on December 30. On January 3, trial was set for January 24, and the new attorney was notified of the trial date on January 5. He spoke with the trial Judge on January 10 about a continuance, and on January 17 a motion for continuance was heard and denied. In the 7 days before trial, the attorney was able to interview only 8 of the state's 12 witnesses and could not locate possible defense witnesses or interview the state's pathologist. Refusal of the continuance was an abuse of discretion and reversible error requiring a new trial. The attorney's diligence was unquestioned, and though the state had a right to a speedy trial, the defendant's right to a fair trial must take precedence, particularly since defendant waived his speedy trial right. Defendant's rights to a fair trial and effective assistance of counsel were denied. St. v. Sotelo, 209 M 86, 679 P2d 779, 41 St. Rep. 568 (1984).

Capital Cases — Standard of Review for Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: The defendant was convicted of aggravated kidnapping and deliberate homicide and appealed the District Court's denial of his petition for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court declined to adopt a standard of review for ineffective assistance of counsel for capital cases different from the standard used in other criminal cases. The court found that numerous practical problems would be presented by such an approach and instead reaffirmed the application of the standard set forth in Cooper v. Fitzharris, 586 F2d 1325 (CA 9, 1978). The court also found that the defendant had not met his burden of proof of showing ineffective assistance of counsel whether the court applied the standard set out in Cooper or another standard urged by the defendant and set out in Knight v. St., 394 So2d 997 (Fla. 1981), and U.S. v. DeCoster, 624 F2d 196 (D.C. Cir. 1979). Fitzpatrick v. St., 206 M 205, 671 P2d 1, 40 St. Rep. 1598 (1983).

Conflict of Interest of Defense Counsel Waived or Not Proven — Ineffective Assistance Not Shown: Where the defendant was convicted of aggravated kidnapping and deliberate homicide, the District Court did not err in dismissing the defendant's petition for postconviction relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. The conflict of interest alleged by defendant in his trial counsel allegedly arose because his counsel had represented a codefendant to whom the defendant wanted to shift suspicion for the crimes committed. However, as a result of the first trial, the codefendant was acquitted of the charges and any attempt to shift suspicion would be impossible because the codefendant may not be retried. Even had there been a conflict of interest, the defendant, under the rationale of U.S. v. Partin, 601 F2d 1000 (CA 9, 1979), waived his right to raise the issue by his agreement at his pretrial hearing to accept Mr. Adams as his defense counsel, knowing that Mr. Adams had also represented a codefendant, and by not raising the issue of a conflict of interest at trial. Fitzpatrick v. St., 206 M 205, 671 P2d 1, 40 St. Rep. 1598 (1983).

Failure to Present Evidence in Mitigation of Sentencing — Ineffective Assistance Not Shown: Where the defendant was convicted of aggravated kidnapping and deliberate homicide, the District Court did not err in dismissing the defendant's petition for postconviction relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. The failure of defense counsel to raise the issue, at sentencing, of defendant's headaches and dizzy spells does not amount to ineffective assistance, as the defendant has not shown the relevancy of those headaches and spells to the sentencing process. Moreover, defense counsel did inform the District Court at sentencing that a previous statement of his concerning a murder committed by the defendant in prison was made mistakenly; but in light of other testimony, this slip of the tongue placed the defendant in an even more favorable light than the prosecution could have presented if the facts had become a contested point and was therefore nonprejudicial and does not show ineffective assistance of counsel. Fitzpatrick v. St., 206 M 205, 671 P2d 1, 40 St. Rep. 1598 (1983).

Failure to Use Evidentiary Material and Witnesses — Ineffective Assistance Not Shown: Where the defendant was convicted of aggravated kidnapping and deliberate homicide, the District Court did not err in dismissing the defendant's petition for postconviction relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. Defense counsel was not ineffective simply because he did not present evidence used in the trial of an acquitted codefendant and because he did not call witnesses urged by the defendant. The defendant overlooked the fact that in the trial of the codefendant, the state's key witness failed to appear. This fact alone explains the acquittal of the codefendant. There were also rational explanations for defense counsel's failure to call each of the witnesses urged by the defendant, such as the fact that the witnesses were hostile, had poor memories, or showed poor demeanor in the presence of the jury. A failure to call witnesses for these kinds of reasons does not show ineffective assistance of counsel. Fitzpatrick v. St., 206 M 205, 671 P2d 1, 40 St. Rep. 1598 (1983).

Insufficient Trial Preparation — Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Not Shown: Where the defendant was convicted of aggravated kidnapping and deliberate homicide, the District Court did not err in dismissing the defendant's petition for postconviction relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. The only item of evidence submitted by the defendant to support his claim of insufficient trial preparation by defense counsel was a caseload listing showing the criminal cases assigned to defendant's counsel. An examination of the exhibit showed that many of the cases had been dismissed or did not come to trial until after the trial of the defendant's case, and the exhibit did not otherwise show a preclusion of preparation time for defense counsel. An examination of the records also showed that the pace of court calendaring meant that cases filed after the defendant's could not mature into triable contested cases until after the conclusion of the defendant's trial. The defendant therefore failed to demonstrate that defense counsel was insufficiently prepared. Fitzpatrick v. St., 206 M 205, 671 P2d 1, 40 St. Rep. 1598 (1983).

Waiver of Portion of Record — Meaningful Appellate Review: Defendant contended he was denied the effective assistance of counsel because his trial attorney waived the recording of the voir dire and opening and closing statements. Defendant contended this failure to protect the record made it impossible to receive meaningful appellate review. The court held that more definitive allegations of error in the unreported portions were necessary to conclude that defendant was deprived of due process. St. v. Madera, 206 M 140, 670 P2d 552, 40 St. Rep. 1558 (1983).

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Mooted by Waiver of Counsel: Where the defendant pleaded guilty to one count of rape and later brought a petition for federal habeas corpus relief, the federal District Court found that although the defendant was entitled to representation at his sentencing hearing beyond an attorney who was simply "standing in", the court's finding that the defendant intelligently waived his right to counsel made the issue of ineffective assistance moot. Haynie v. Crist, 40 St. Rep. 923 (D.C. Mont. 1983) (apparently not reported in Federal Supplement).

Failure to Cooperate With Court-Appointed Counsel — No Right of Defendant to "Meaningful Attorney-Client Relationship": Where the defendant had been convicted of arson and sought to have his second court-appointed counsel replaced by arguing the failure of his attorney to communicate with him concerning his (the defendant's) version of the facts of his case amounting to an alibi defense, the District Court did not err in refusing to replace the second appointed counsel and the defendant was not thereby denied his right to effective assistance of counsel. The District Court record shows that the court took the defendant's request seriously, but there was simply no evidence shown at the second hearing on the issue to warrant appointment of a third lawyer, as the defendant's claim that his first and second lawyers were partners was not true. In Morris v. Slappy, 461 US 1, 75 L Ed 2d 610, 103 S. Ct 1610 (1983), the U.S. Supreme Court denied the existence of the "meaningful attorney-client relationship" test urged by the defendant. Moreover, the record shows that if defendant's counsel failed to present the defendant's view of the facts at trial, it was not caused by lack of diligence on counsel's part but by failure of the defendant to cooperate with his attorney. Therefore, any lack of communication between the defendant and his lawyer did not prevent effective assistance of counsel. St. v. Long, 206 M 40, 669 P2d 1068, 40 St. Rep. 1493 (1983), followed in St. v. Johnson, 221 M 384, 719 P2d 771, 43 St. Rep. 913 (1986), and St. v. Craig, 274 M 140, 906 P2d 683, 52 St. Rep. 1158 (1995).

No Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Appellate Brief Misleading: The Supreme Court refused to rule that the defendant had been denied effective assistance of counsel when in an effort to make the cumulative total of errors as high as possible, counsel for the defendant on appeal had misstated the trial record, had taken sentences from the trial transcript out of context, and had alleged as errors many items that were not errors at all or were trivial errors. The Supreme Court also pointed out that it is not ethical for a lawyer to advance an unwarranted claim on behalf of a client. St. v. Hall, 203 M 528, 662 P2d 1306, 40 St. Rep. 621 (1983).

Failure to Interview Witnesses or Argue Self-Defense or Lesser Offenses: Defendant, convicted of deliberate homicide and aggravated kidnapping, was rendered ineffective assistance of counsel and was prejudiced by counsel's conduct to the point that convictions were reversed when, among other things, counsel: (1) failed to talk to six character witnesses prior to presenting them at trial, and none of the witnesses had an opinion as to the character of the person involved and an attack upon that person's character might have damaged the state's case; (2) failed to present competent jury instructions to the trial court, including defenses and particularly self-defense, and argued against the state's proposed self-defense instruction; and (3) failed to argue mitigating circumstances and in summation argued defendant did not act in self-defense or commit negligent homicide, leaving the jury with only one option — conviction or acquittal of deliberate homicide as charged. St. v. LaValley, 203 M 393, 661 P2d 869, 40 St. Rep. 527 (1983).

Ineffective Assistance — Questions on Prior Charges and Convictions: Defense counsel questioned defendant on prior felony convictions and charges, opening him up to cross-examination on those matters. As a result, the jury had evidence from defendant regarding his involvement in an alleged burglary in which the circumstances and defense were almost identical to the present case. This was extremely prejudicial, indicated neglect or ignorance on the part of counsel, and was not within the range of competence demanded of an attorney in a criminal case. Ineffective assistance of counsel was rendered, requiring vacation of the verdict and remand for a new trial. St. v. Morigeau, 202 M 36, 656 P2d 185, 39 St. Rep. 2311 (1982). Morigeau and its progeny were overruled in Whitlow v. St., 2008 MT 140, 343 M 90, 183 P3d 861 (2008), to the extent that the "ignorance or neglect" test for ineffective assistance of counsel conflicts with the correct approach, which is the "objective standard of reasonableness" test set out in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). Whitlow was followed in St. v. Wing, 2008 MT 218, 344 M 243, 188 P3d 999 (2008), distinguishing St. v. Parker, 2006 MT 258, 334 M 129, 144 P3d 831 (2006), and in Maldonado v. St., 2008 MT 253, 345 M 69, 190 P3d 1043 (2008).

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Failure to Pursue Appeal: In 1972, the defendant was convicted of assault and rape. A Sandstrom-type instruction was given at his trial. After conviction, his counsel told him that a notice of appeal had been filed when no notice had been filed. The defendant wrote to a Justice of the Montana Supreme Court seeking a transcript and aid in appealing his conviction. Over the next few years, the defendant made several pro se attempts to get a transcript, which he believed was necessary in order to perfect an appeal. In 1981, a federal court ordered the Montana Supreme Court to review the defendant's conviction and to provide him with counsel. On appeal, the Montana Supreme Court found that use of the Sandstrom-type instruction rendered his trial unfair and his right to counsel was denied by the informal and summary disposition of his appeal. A new trial was ordered. St. v. Swan, 199 M 459, 649 P2d 1297, 39 St. Rep. 1522 (1982).

Failure to Seek Jury Instruction on Lesser Included Offense — Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Counsel for a defendant charged with deliberate homicide failed to offer an instruction on negligent homicide and objected to an instruction on mitigated deliberate homicide. Because the decision not to seek jury instruction on lesser included offenses was reasoned and tactical, it did not amount to a denial of effective assistance of counsel as guaranteed by the 6th amendment to the United States Constitution (similar to Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const.). Bashor v. Risley, 539 F. Supp. 259, 39 St. Rep. 960 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Effective Assistance of Counsel — Motion for Investigator Denied: Defendant moved for appointment of an investigator because the state's witnesses were located in several states and numerous counties. The motion was properly denied because witness statements had been provided, witness testimony had been summarized in various court documents, and the defendant's counsel had full opportunity to interview witnesses prior to trial. Defendant was not, on this basis, deprived of his right to effective assistance of counsel or fair trial by impartial jury. St. v. Powers, 198 M 289, 645 P2d 1357, 39 St. Rep. 989 (1982).

Effective Assistance — Claim Defense Wrong One and Not Based on the Evidence: Defendant convicted of felony theft and robbery could not have the convictions overturned on basis of alleged denial of effective assistance of appointed counsel where: (1) the defense was that the requisite "purposely or knowingly" mental state for the crimes could not have been formed due to defendant's heavy use of drugs and alcohol during the period prior to the crime; (2) defendant was convicted and a new attorney named; (3) defendant then claimed the defense was unfounded by the evidence and should have been based upon a discrediting of the witnesses testifying to defendant's identity; (4) the defense testimony on drug-alcohol usage did not appear to support the defense; and (5) the prosecution's identification evidence was so strong that the defense attorney had little choice but to choose not to base his defense upon discrediting it. St. v. Kubas, 197 M 185, 642 P2d 147, 39 St. Rep. 456 (1982).

Omissions of Counsel — Evidentiary Hearing: In his petition for postconviction relief, petitioner asserted that he was denied effective assistance of counsel. Many of the errors complained of involved failure to act and omissions rather than commissions. A mere review of the record cannot show that petitioner was entitled to no relief. He is entitled to an evidentiary hearing on this issue. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981), followed in Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182, 53 St. Rep. 1197 (1996), and distinguished in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999). See also Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Effective Assistance of Counsel: Defendant sought to substitute counsel on the afternoon before his scheduled trial date on the charge of robbery. The defendant also sought a continuance. When considering the motion for substitution of counsel, the court specifically questioned the defendant, after making him aware that his motion for continuance would not be granted, as to whether he still wanted substituted counsel. The defendant said he did. Defendant now argues that by denying his request for a continuance his attorney was unprepared and he was denied effective assistance of counsel. In denying his petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, the federal court said that the defendant could have cooperated with his court-appointed counsel or he could have chosen his own counsel in sufficient time for that counsel to become prepared. He did neither. He was not deprived of a right; he failed to exercise the rights he had. Spurlock v. Risley, 520 F. Supp. 135, 38 St. Rep. 1339 (D.C. Mont. 1981).

Effective Assistance of Counsel — Failure to Challenge Constitutionality of Statute: Failure of defense counsel to object to testimony of a rebuttal witness on the grounds that he had not received notice of the witness' testimony, based on a U. S. Supreme Court decision holding that an Oregon statute which required a defendant utilizing an alibi defense to furnish notice and a witness list violated due process because it did not provide reciprocal discovery for the defendant of the State's rebuttal witnesses, does not fall outside the range of competent counsel. The decision to challenge the constitutionality of a statute is a matter of legal judgment. St. v. Rose, 187 M 74, 608 P2d 1074 (1980).

Effective Assistance of Counsel — Failure to Challenge Juror: Failure of defense counsel to challenge juror, who informed the District Court on the last day of trial that he had been mistaken in denying acquaintance with defendant's accomplice since the juror and the brother of the accomplice had been acquaintances for 15 years prior to the trial but that this would not influence him, was not error. St. v. Rose, 187 M 74, 608 P2d 1074 (1980).

Effective Assistance of Counsel — Failure to Object to Hearsay: Failure of defense counsel to object to hearsay testimony does not by itself fall outside the range of competent counsel. Defense counsel should have objected during trial, but the fact that prior to trial defense counsel had made a motion in limine to exclude the evidence indicated that counsel had prepared for the case and had made the correct motion. St. v. Rose, 187 M 74, 608 P2d 1074 (1980).

Effective Assistance of Counsel — Failure to Object to Inquiry of Witness' Criminal Record: Failure of defense counsel to object to an inquiry into a defense witness' prior criminal record did not appear to prejudice the defendant in a case involving at least a dozen witnesses and several days of testimony. St. v. Rose, 187 M 74, 608 P2d 1074 (1980).

Effective Assistance of Counsel — Showing of Prejudice Required: When the claim of ineffective assistance of counsel rests on specific acts and omissions of counsel at trial, relief will be granted only if it appears that the defendant was prejudiced by counsel's conduct. St. v. Rose, 187 M 74, 608 P2d 1074 (1980).

Reasonably Effective Assistance — Failure to Move to Quash Information: Defense counsel did not move to quash the information for lack of probable cause, based on Aguilar v. Texas, 378 US 108, 84 S Ct 1509 (1964), on the grounds that the statements contained in the information were not supported by facts tending to show their reliability. The Aguilar decision did apply, and it was not error for counsel not to move to quash the information. St. v. Rose, 187 M 74, 608 P2d 1074 (1980).

Fair Trial — Right to Effective Counsel — Acceptance of and Cooperation With Counsel: The right to counsel encompasses the right to effective assistance of counsel. To determine the adequacy of counsel, Montana uses the "farce and sham" test, which requires proof that the counsel's performance was so woefully inadequate as to shock the conscience of the court and make the resultant proceeding a farce and a mockery of justice. The right to counsel does not give the defendant the unbridled right to discharge counsel on the eve of trial. Nor does the indigent defendant have the right to choose his counsel. The appointed counsel must be accepted except for good cause shown or unless counsel is waived altogether. Further, a defendant who refuses to cooperate in the preparation of his own defense cannot complain of error therein. St. v. Lopez, 185 M 187, 605 P2d 178 (1980). See also St. v. Strandberg, 223 M 132, 724 P2d 710, 43 St. Rep. 1591 (1986).

Effective Counsel — Delay of Payment to Appointed Counsel: Defendant's claims that the failure of the court to provide funds in advance for appointed defense counsel created a "chilling effect" and that by the time funds became available there was inadequate time in which to prepare a defense were rejected because defendant failed to show that the alleged lack of preparation prejudiced him in any way. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Effective Counsel — Representation of Codefendants: When the same attorney represented both codefendants by employing strategies to achieve mitigation of sentences that did not appear to conflict, the lower court's factual determination that effective assistance of counsel was afforded lay undisturbed. St. v. Henry, 577 M 426, 582 P2d 321 (1978).

Effective Counsel — Failure to Meet Burden: Petitioner failed to sustain his burden of proving he was denied effective assistance of counsel. In re Jones, 176 M 412, 578 P2d 1150 (1978).

Effective Counsel — Actions Adequate: Under the "farce and sham test" for evaluating adequacy of counsel, defense counsel attempted to "discover all the facts and circumstances of the crime" through "thorough investigation of the persons and events involved in the crime" and adequately conferred with his client, advising him of his rights and eliciting all matters of defense or ascertaining that none existed. St. v. Maldonado, 176 M 322, 578 P2d 296 (1978).

Effective Counsel — Problems Caused by Defendant: Defendant was not denied effective assistance of counsel when the problems encountered at trial were the result of defendant's own actions. St. v. Miller, 173 M 453, 568 P2d 130 (1977).

Failure to Call Witnesses Who Would Determine Truth: In an alleged felony theft the search for truth was less than vigorous by counsel, and the judge had a duty to sua sponte demand that a search for the truth be exhausted before the matter be decided. Failure to call witnesses enumerated by defendant who could help determine the truth denied defendant a fair trial and due process. St. v. Mickelson, 172 M 489, 565 P2d 308 (1977).

Effective Counsel — Representation Adequate: A trial is not a "farce or a sham" when retained counsel informed the court he was ready to proceed and the record shows counsel provided the defendant with more than the minimum required for effective assistance of retained counsel. St. v. Brooks, 171 M 45, 554 P2d 753 (1976). See also St. v. Dess, 207 M 468, 674 P2d 501, 41 St. Rep. 31 (1984).

Effective Assistance — Tests: Right to counsel includes effective assistance of counsel to assure constitutional guarantee of assistance essential to a fair trial. Failure of appointed counsel to prepare for trial by making a thorough investigation to substantiate defendant's version of what transpired on the day of the crime, coupled with counsel's failure to object to inadmissible evidence at trial, requires a finding that defendant was without effective assistance of counsel. St. v. McElveen, 168 M 500, 544 P2d 820 (1975), followed in St. v. Johnson, 221 M 384, 719 P2d 771, 43 St. Rep. 913 (1986).

RIGHT TO CONFRONT WITNESSES

Victim Testimony at Trial — Right to Confront Witness Satisfied: During his trial on stalking charges, the defendant complained that he was unable to see the alleged victim during her testimony. The District Court denied his request to be seated closer to her. After his conviction, the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court and argued that his right to confrontation had been violated. The Supreme Court cited testimony at trial that demonstrated the defendant was able to view the witness during her testimony, concluded that his trial satisfied the elements of confrontation, and affirmed the conviction. St. v. Weik, 2018 MT 213, 392 Mont. 415, 427 P.3d 52.

Hearsay Testimony of Doctor Proper Under Medical Examination Exception: After the victim arrived at work with a black eye and bruises all over her body, a police officer took her to a hospital, where an emergency room doctor examined her. During the examination, the victim identified the defendant as her attacker and described how he had lifted her off the ground by her throat and other details of the attack. The defendant was charged with felony aggravated assault and subsequently convicted. At trial, the defendant sought to exclude the emergency room doctor's testimony about what the victim had told the doctor at the hospital examination. The District Court allowed the testimony under the hearsay exception for medical examinations. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that the statements made by the victim to the doctor identifying the attacker and his actions were pertinent to diagnosis and treatment and therefore fell within this hearsay exception. St. v. Porter, 2018 MT 16, 390 Mont. 174, 410 P.3d 955.

Testimony of Doctor Treating Victim — No Violation of Confrontation Clause — Primary Purpose of Conversation Not to Create Out-of-Court Substitute: After arriving at work with a black eye and covered with bruises, the victim was taken by a police officer to a hospital, where she was examined by an emergency room doctor. During the examination, the victim identified the defendant as her attacker and described how he had lifted her off the ground by her throat during the attack. The defendant was charged with felony aggravated assault and subsequently convicted. At trial, the emergency room doctor was allowed to testify about what the victim had told the doctor despite the defendant's objection that the evidence was hearsay. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the primary purpose of the conversation was to allow the doctor to provide the victim medical treatment and not to create an out-of-court substitute for trial testimony. St. v. Porter, 2018 MT 16, 390 Mont. 174, 410 P.3d 955.

Proper Suppression of Evidence on Young Victim's Sexuality — Rape Shield Statute: The defendant was charged with sexual abuse of children and sexual assault. The state successfully filed a motion to exclude any evidence of the 13-year-old victim's alleged bisexuality at trial. After his conviction, the defendant appealed, claiming that the exclusion of that evidence violated his confrontation rights. The defendant claimed that the evidence provided context; however, the District Court ruled that the evidence was not being offered to rebut or contextualize but, rather, would serve to prejudice the victim. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, finding that the evidence was properly suppressed under the rape shield statute. St. v. Aguado, 2017 MT 54, 387 Mont. 1, 390 P.3d 628.

Police Dispatch Vehicle Information Not Hearsay — Used to Show How Officer Started Investigation — Not Used to Prove Vehicle Ownership: The trial court did not abuse its discretion when it admitted testimony concerning vehicle registration information received from police dispatch without a proper foundation for the business records exception. The intent of using the statement from police dispatch was not to prove the truth of who owned the vehicle. Instead, the intent was to explain how the officer proceeded with the investigation and how he came to positively identify the defendant from a prior booking photo. As such, the statement was not hearsay. Billings v. Nolan, 2016 MT 266, 385 Mont. 190, 383 P.3d 219.

Motor Vehicle Records Admitted as Business Records — No Abuse of Discretion: Stamped language on letters sent by the Motor Vehicle Division (MVD) to the defendants notifying them of their license suspensions stated that the sender testified the letter was sent to the person at the person's last address on a specific date. The District Court admitted the letters as administratively created contemporaneous business records over the defendants' objections that the letters were testimonial hearsay created to prove a fact at trial. The defendants appealed, claiming the letters were the only evidence that each defendant had a culpable mental state. However, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that 61-5-212 imposed absolute liability on defendants and therefore, although the District Court reached the correct result for the wrong reason, it did not err. Because of the plain language of Rule 902(4), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), the record-keeping requirements of the MVD, and the unreasonability of an MVD representative having to be present every time a driving record was necessary for trial, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the letters. Kalispell v. Omyer, 2016 MT 63, 383 Mont. 19, 368 P.3d 1165.

Exclusion of Evidence Under Rape Shield Law Proper — Plain Error Review Declined: The defendant was convicted of six felony charges, including incest, sexual assault, and sexual intercourse without consent. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the rape shield law had been properly applied and had precluded the defense from presenting evidence and argument concerning prior incidents of sexual abuse involving three of the victims. The defense claimed that the prior abuse had inflicted posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) in three of the defendant's victims, which caused them to make erroneous reports against the defendant. The court concluded that no evidence was offered to suggest the victims had suffered PTSD prior to the incidents with the defendant. The court also declined to undertake plain error review, finding that the defendant's substantial rights had not been violated by the County Attorney's closing remarks. St. v. Awberry, 2016 MT 48, 382 Mont. 334, 367 P.3d 346.

Error for District Court to Refuse to Admit Unauthenticated Documents During Revocation Hearing — Different Evidentiary Standard: During a revocation hearing, the defendant attempted to admit out-of-state documents to show that the state knew he was in Washington state after his escape from custody. The District Court admitted documents originating in Montana but refused to admit any documents from Washington state, including a postal receipt for registered mail. On appeal, the Supreme Court determined that both federal and state courts have allowed admission of similar unauthenticated documents in revocation proceedings and that the limitations courts place on the admissibility of documentary evidence in revocation proceedings arise solely out of concern for a defendant's sixth amendment confrontation rights. As such, the District Court's refusal to admit the unauthenticated documents was an error. However, the error was harmless, given that the defendant's substantive argument was rejected. St. v. Graves, 2015 MT 262, 381 Mont. 37, 355 P.3d 769.

Constitutional Right to Confrontation Not Violated by Admission of Skype Testimony: When the Municipal Court allowed a witness residing in California to testify via Skype, the defendant's constitutional right to confrontation was not violated because the technology allowed the court and jury to observe and hear the testimony of the witness in real time. Missoula v. Duane, 2015 MT 232, 380 Mont. 290, 355 P.3d 729.

Testimony From Civil Hearing Improperly Admitted at Criminal Trial — Motive to Develop Testimony Different: The defendant was charged with felony assault with a weapon and misdemeanor partner or family member assault after allegedly pointing a gun at his wife and firing to the side of her head. In a separate dissolution of marriage proceeding, the wife sought an order of protection and the District Court held a hearing on the matter. The defendant, unrepresented at this hearing, did not contest the order or cross-examine the wife. At the subsequent criminal trial, the wife did not appear; however, the District Court admitted her prior testimony under Rule 804(b)(1)(B), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). On appeal, the defendant argued that this violated his confrontation clause rights. The Supreme Court agreed with the defendant, holding that in order to introduce former testimony, the defendant must have had an opportunity to examine the declarant and a similar motive to develop the declarant's testimony. While an opportunity to examine the wife existed, the order of protection hearing and the criminal trial were not similar motives to develop testimony. St. v. Pingree, 2015 MT 187, 379 Mont. 521, 352 P.3d 1086.

Defendant Prohibited From Questioning Incest Victim at Trial About Prior Rape Allegations Without Evidence: During discovery, the defendant obtained a single-page report written by a social worker that contained a reference to the incest victim's allegation of a prior rape. At trial, the District Court determined that the report was not admissible under St. v. Anderson, 211 Mont. 272, 686 P.2d 193 (1984), because the reported allegation had not been proven false or admitted to be false and prohibited the defendant from questioning the victim about the existence and veracity of prior allegations. The defendant appealed, arguing that the District Court had applied Anderson incorrectly. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that a defendant is not entitled to question the victim on the stand about prior false allegations if there is no evidence that the victim had made a prior false accusation. St. v. Ring, 2014 MT 49, 374 Mont. 109, 321 P.3d 800, following St. v. Anderson, 211 Mont. 272, 686 P.2d 193 (1984), and State ex rel. Mazurek v. District Court, 277 Mont. 349, 922 P.2d 474 (1996). See also St. v. Hoff, 2016 MT 244, 385 Mont. 85, 385 P.3d 945.

Right to Confrontation Not Applicable to Revocation Hearings: The right to confront adverse witnesses does not apply in a revocation hearing because it is a civil proceeding. Furthermore, the Montana Rules of Evidence, including the hearsay rules, do not apply in a revocation proceeding. St. v. Macker, 2014 MT 3, 373 Mont. 199, 317 P.3d 150.

Sufficient Latitude Provided for Cross-Examination of Informant's Bias or Motivation to Testify: Following a conviction for vehicular homicide while under the influence, the defendant argued that the District Court improperly limited her ability to inquire about an informant's bias or motivation to testify falsely by prohibiting her from cross-examining the informant about a potential persistent felony offender designation. The Supreme Court held that the defendant had sufficient latitude to cross-examine the informant about his bias and motivation to testify falsely and that there was insufficient evidence that the informant's plea agreement was motivated by a potential persistent felony offender designation. St. v. Garding, 2013 MT 355, 373 Mont. 16, 315 P.3d 912.

Admissibility of Intoxilyzer Certification Documents — District Court to Determine Adequate Foundation Regardless of Hearsay Rules — White Overruled: The defendant was charged with felony DUI after a breath test revealed his blood alcohol content exceeded the legal limit. At trial, in the course of the charging police officer's testimony, the state offered into evidence two field certification documents for the Intoxilyzer 8000. The defendant objected to the documents, claiming that because the officer was not the author or custodian of the documents, they were inadmissible hearsay under Rule 803(6), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). The District Court admitted the documents and the defendant appealed his subsequent conviction. The Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that the admissibility of certification documents is also subject to Rule 104(a), M.R.Ev., (Title 26, ch. 10). This rule allows a court to determine whether there is an adequate foundation for a document without regard to whether it is hearsay. In so ruling, the Supreme Court overruled St. v. White, 2009 MT 26, 349 Mont. 109, 201 P.3d 808, to the extent it is inconsistent with St. v. Delaney, 1999 MT 317, 297 Mont. 263, 991 P.2d 461. St. v. Jenkins, 2011 MT 287, 362 Mont. 481, 265 P.3d 643.

Statutes Allowing Child to Testify Outside Presence of Criminal Defendant Constitutional: During the defendant's jury trial on incest charges, the District Court allowed the 6-year-old alleged victim to testify via two-way electronic audio-video communication, rather than in the presence of the defendant and the jury. On appeal, the defendant challenged the use of the audio-video testimony, arguing that 46-16-226 through 46-16-229, which allow a child witness to testify outside the presence of a defendant, violate a criminal defendant's right to confront witnesses. The Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of 46-16-226 through 46-16-229 on the basis that the statutes require an adequate showing of necessity and serve the compelling state interest of protecting a child witness from suffering further trauma. St. v. Stock, 2011 MT 131, 361 Mont. 1, 256 P.3d 899.

Videotaped Testimony of Pregnant Expert Witness Allowed: The defendant argued that the lower court erred in allowing the videotaped testimony of a pregnant DNA expert on the basis that the witness was unavailable. The Supreme Court, examining the totality of the circumstances, including the difficulty of rescheduling the trial due to the large number of witnesses, held that the state had made a good faith showing of the witness's unavailability and that there was no error on the part of the District Court. St. v. Norquay, 2011 MT 34, 359 Mont. 257, 248 P.3d 817.

Motion In Limine Properly Denied — No violation of Confrontation Clause: In a Youth Court proceeding, the defendant was adjudicated a serious delinquent youth and committed to the custody of the Department of Corrections until age 18 for various crimes, including the breaking of approximately 75 car windows and firing shots at moving vehicles and at least one pedestrian. During the proceedings, the Youth Court denied the defendant's motion in limine to exclude 10 statements taken from the defendant's interview with police that the defendant alleged constituted inadmissible hearsay because the statements were attributable to witnesses who were not testifying at trial. The Supreme Court affirmed. The Youth Court's admission of the taped interview did not violate the defendant's confrontation rights because the statements constituted adoptive admissions or the witnesses were available for cross-examination. In re T.J.B., 2010 MT 116, 356 Mont. 342, 233 P.3d 341.

Hearsay Testimony Regarding Statements Made By Witnesses at Scene Permitted — No Assertion of Error When Introduced by Defense: Defense counsel introduced the amended information from the prosecution's case that recalled statements made by witnesses identifying Dewitz at the scene of a crime. The prosecution then elicited testimony from an officer recalling the witnesses' testimony. Dewitz asserted that the testimony was inadmissible hearsay and contended that because the witnesses were unavailable, his right to confront witnesses was violated. The Supreme Court agreed that the testimony was hearsay but held that Dewitz waived the right to allege error on appeal because the objectionable testimony was elicited by defense counsel's own action in introducing the testimony into evidence. St. v. Dewitz, 2009 MT 202, 351 M 182, 212 P3d 1040 (2009). See also St. v. Harris, 1999 MT 115, 294 M 397, 983 P2d 881 (1999), and St. v. Smith, 2005 MT 18, 325 M 374, 106 P3d 553 (2005).

No Showing That Allegedly Withheld State Evidence Constituted Brady Violation — Due Process Not Violated: Giddings moved that the state's case should be dismissed because the state withheld evidence in a homicide trial, which prohibited defense counsel from having sufficient time to analyze scientific evidence to find exculpatory evidence and from having the necessary information to effectively impeach the state witnesses, resulting in a due process violation. The District Court denied the motion, and Giddings appealed. The Supreme Court held that Giddings failed to meet the criteria for showing an improper withholding of information under Brady v. Maryland, 373 US 83 (1963), by failing to prove that any of the information was exculpatory or to demonstrate a reasonable possibility that the evidence would have changed the outcome. Instead, Giddings offered only sweeping generalizations and broad accusations rather than the specific elements necessary to prove a Brady violation. Giddings also failed to establish that the state's actions denied the right to effective assistance of counsel or the right to confront the accusers. Denial of Giddings' motion to dismiss was affirmed. St. v. Giddings, 2009 MT 61, 349 M 347, 208 P3d 363 (2009).

No Right to Confront Witness With Irrelevant Evidence: Dunning contended that his constitutional right to confront witnesses was violated when he was not allowed to question the friend of the victim of a kidnapping and sexual assault regarding the victim's allegedly untruthful statement that she was pregnant in order to establish the victim's propensity to lie. However, the testimony would have been an improper attack on the victim using irrelevant evidence, and the constitutional right does not allow a defendant to confront a witness with irrelevant evidence. The possibility of the friend's testimony prejudicing the jury outweighed the probative value of the testimony, so the testimony was properly excluded. St. v. Dunning, 2008 MT 427, 347 M 443, 198 P3d 828 (2008).

Admission of Note Written by Homicide Victim Not Violative of Right to Confront Witnesses — Forfeiture by Wrongdoing Doctrine: Sanchez argued that admission at trial of a note written by Sanchez's admitted deliberate homicide victim violated Sanchez's right to confront witnesses. The Supreme Court noted that the confrontation clause applies only to testimonial hearsay, and in this case, the note was considered testimonial because the purpose of the note was to explain the victim's untimely death or poisoning, the intended audience reasonably included law enforcement, and circumstances surrounding the note indicated that an objective declarant reasonably should have anticipated that the state would use the statement at trial. However, the U.S. Supreme Court set out an equitable exception to the confrontation clause in Crawford v. Wash., 541 US 36 (2004), known as the forfeiture by wrongdoing doctrine. The doctrine states that one who obtains the absence of a witness by wrongdoing forfeits the constitutional right to confrontation. The Supreme Court agreed with the holding in U.S. v. Garcia-Meza, 403 F3d 364 (6th Cir. 2005), that a defendant whose intentional criminal act results in a victim-declarant's death benefits from the defendant's wrongdoing if the defendant can use the death to exclude the victim-declarant's otherwise admissible testimony, regardless of whether the defendant specifically intended to silence the victim. Therefore, Sanchez forfeited his right to confront the victim when he killed her and could not claim that his constitutional right to confront witnesses was violated when his admittedly deliberate wrongdoing prevented the confrontation. Although the trial court admitted the note based on hearsay exceptions without addressing the confrontation clause, the court's decision was nevertheless legally correct, and the Supreme Court declined to disturb the trial court's decision. St. v. Sanchez, 2008 MT 27, 341 M 240, 177 P3d 444 (2008). See also Sanchez v. St., 2012 MT 191, 366 Mont. 132, 285 P.3d 540, in which the Montana Supreme Court held that the U.S. Supreme Court's holding in Giles v. California, 554 U.S. 353, 128 S. Ct. 2678 (2008), that the forfeiture by wrongdoing doctrine applies only when the defendant kills another person specifically to prevent the person from testifying, was not retroactive and did not apply to Sanchez's conviction, which had become final long before the Giles decision.

Limitation on Opening Statement on Issue Unrelated to Charged Offense Not Abuse of Discretion: At Wilson's trial for tampering with evidence in a vehicle allegedly used in a homicide, the trial court prohibited Wilson from referring in opening statements to evidence concerning a coconspirator's motives to kill the victim. The court did not address any similar limits on cross-examination, and Wilson did not bring up the subject of motivation on cross-examination of the coconspirator. Nevertheless, because of the limitation on opening statements, on appeal, Wilson argued an inability to develop evidence regarding the coconspirator's prior false statements and motive to cover up the homicide and to tamper with evidence of the homicide, which purportedly violated Wilson's right to confront the witness. The Supreme Court disagreed. The main purpose of the right to confront a witness is to secure an opportunity for cross-examination, including the opportunity to expose the witness's motivation for testifying. However, this does not mean that a defendant may cross-examine a witness on any subject in any manner whatsoever without limitations imposed by the trial judge. Rather, trial judges retain wide latitude to impose limits on cross-examination based on various concerns, including confusion of the issues. In this case, the trial court limited opening comments regarding motivation for murder because the trial was not a homicide trial, but rather a trial for tampering with evidence, and motive was outside the scope of the tampering charge and would confuse the jury. Thus, the court did not abuse its discretion by limiting opening comments, and Wilson suffered no prejudice. Wilson's conviction was affirmed. St. v. Wilson, 2007 MT 327, 340 M 191, 172 P3d 1264 (2007).

No Error in Prohibiting Impeachment of Witness With Another Person's Out-of-Court Statement: Defendant argued that he was not allowed to impeach the testimony of a detective during cross-examination by showing that the detective's characterization of a victim's statement was inconsistent with the victim's prior statement to the police. The state objected to the victim's out-of-court statement as hearsay, and the trial court sustained the objection. Defendant argued on appeal that because the prior statement was not offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted but rather to impeach the detective's testimony, the prior statement was not hearsay and contended that the ruling violated his right to confront the witness. The Supreme Court disagreed. Error may not be predicated upon a ruling that excludes evidence unless a substantial right of the party is affected and an offer of proof is made. In this case, no substantial right was affected and no offer of proof was made, so the District Court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the victim's prior statement. St. v. Skinner, 2007 MT 175, 338 M 197, 163 P3d 399 (2007).

Limit on Cross-Examination of State's Witness Not Violative of Right to Confront Witnesses: Doyle contended that the trial court violated Doyle's constitutional right to confront witnesses by limiting Doyle's cross-examination of a state witness regarding the witness's prior criminal history and character and benefit to the witness from a plea agreement granting a lighter sentence in exchange for testimony against Doyle. The Supreme Court found no constitutional violation. Evidence of the witness's prior convictions was inadmissible for purposes of impeachment. Evidence of the witness's character was inadmissible for purposes of proving action in conformity with that character. Last, Doyle cross-examined the witness extensively about the benefits of the plea agreement, and the jury was adequately apprised of the potential biases and motives behind the witness's testimony in light of the cross-examination. St. v. Doyle, 2007 MT 125, 337 M 308, 160 P3d 516 (2007). See also St. v. Wagner, 2013 MT 47, 369 Mont. 139, 296 P.3d 1142.

Failure of Counsel to Perfect Direct Appeal — Remand: Following conviction in Municipal Court for partner or family member assault, Woeppel's trial counsel filed a notice of appeal to District Court. Woeppel obtained new counsel, but counsel failed to file a brief to perfect the appeal, and the appeal was dismissed. The new counsel ultimately withdrew because of a conflict of interest, and Woeppel's next new counsel filed a petition for postconviction relief on grounds that Woeppel was denied effective assistance of counsel and was denied the right to confront witnesses in the underlying case because the conviction was based on hearsay testimony. The petition was denied, and Woeppel appealed. The Supreme Court noted that trial counsel's notice of appeal objectively indicated Woeppel's intent to appeal and that it was only because appellate counsel failed to file a brief that the appeal was dismissed, resulting in prejudice to Woeppel. Denial of the petition for postconviction relief was reversed, and the case was remanded for consideration of any claims that Woeppel could have made on direct appeal, including the claim that because the conviction was based on hearsay, Woeppel's right to confront witnesses was violated. Woeppel v. Billings, 2006 MT 283, 334 M 306, 146 P3d 789 (2006).

Improper Extrinsic Evidence Delivered to Jury — Evidentiary Error Violative of Right to Confront Witnesses Warranting New Trial: At Parker's trial for assault with a weapon, the state introduced a tape of interviews with Parker's children containing the children's observations of the events in question. Unbeknownst to Parker, the tape also contained an interview with another party that implicated Parker. The tape was submitted to the jury during deliberations. Following conviction, Parker contended on appeal that the jury's exposure to the extrinsic evidence, which was never entered into evidence, violated Parker's right to confrontation. The Supreme Court agreed. The interview was of sufficient quality to prejudice Parker's defense and contribute to the conviction, so Parker's right to confront the witness against him was violated when the tape was delivered to the jury. The court remanded for a new trial. St. v. Parker, 2006 MT 258, 334 M 129, 144 P3d 831 (2006).

Admissibility of Hearsay Statements Made in Emergency Following Family Member Assault: During Mizenko's trial for partner or family member assault, the trial court admitted several hearsay statements made by the victim, Mizenko's wife, who did not testify. Mizenko contended that admitting the hearsay statements violated his constitutional right to confront witnesses against him, even though Mizenko had the opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses who related the hearsay statements, including a neighbor whom the wife had gone to for help, the emergency dispatcher who received the 9-1-1 call, and the investigating deputy. The dispatcher's testimony regarding the contents of the call was admitted without objection, and the deputy's testimony verified that the acts related on the call had occurred, so their testimony, even if objectionable, was cumulative and therefore harmless. The neighbor's testimony related statements that the wife made while in distress and while addressing a nongovernmental agent. The wife's cursory statements describing the circumstances, though evidence, were not created by the judicial process, and the wife had no reason to believe that her excited utterances would be used in court, so the statements were considered nontestimonial and properly admitted under the excited utterance exception of Rule 803, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). St. v. Mizenko, 2006 MT 11, 330 M 299, 127 P3d 458 (2006), followed in St. v. Paoni, 2006 MT 26, 331 M 86, 128 P3d 1040 (2006). See also St. v Cameron, 2005 MT 32, 326 M 51, 106 P3d 1189 (2005).

Testimonial Versus Nontestimonial Hearsay — Crawford Rule for Admissibility in Criminal Trial — Use of Emergency Calls: In Crawford v. Wash., 541 US 36 (2004), the U.S. Supreme Court bifurcated hearsay law from the constitutional confrontation clause (sixth amendment, U.S. Const.; and this section) by allowing hearsay against criminal defendants in only two instances: (1) if hearsay is testimonial, a defendant must have had an opportunity to cross-examine the declarant and the prosecution must show that the declarant is unavailable to appear at trial; or (2) if hearsay is nontestimonial, the hearsay must bear adequate indicia of reliability or particularized guarantees of trustworthiness. However, the Crawford court declined to define what constitutes testimonial hearsay. The Montana Supreme Court noted that the sixth amendment itself defines the indicia of reliability or particularized guarantees of trustworthiness necessary to admit testimonial hearsay by establishing confrontation through cross-examination as the minimally adequate index. Crawford characterizes a casual remark to an acquaintance as nontestimonial hearsay, and the word "casual" modifies the declarant's assumption as to what use, if any, the listener might make of the statement. When an objective declarant would reasonably expect the state to use a statement at trial, the sixth amendment demands that courts exclude such statements absent an opportunity for confrontation. When speaking to government agents or officials, a declarant should reasonably expect the government to seek to use those statements at trial, and when a declarant signs an affidavit or gives a recorded statement, the declarant should likewise expect the state to make use of those statements, so those statements are considered testimonial. However, a declarant who is alerting law enforcement of imminent and immediate danger, such as through a 9-1-1 emergency call, has much less of an expectation that the state will seek to make prosecutorial use of the statements at trial, depending on the content of the conversation and the particular circumstances that led to the call. If the declarant has objective reason to believe that an emergency statement would serve only to avert or mitigate imminent or immediate danger and the agent who receives the statement had no intent to create evidence, then the statement is presumed to be nontestimonial. Alternatively, if a declarant has clear reason to believe that the statement would be used in court as substantive evidence against a defendant, statements to a nongovernmental agent are nontestimonial. St. v. Mizenko, 2006 MT 11, 330 M 299, 127 P3d 458 (2006), followed in St. v. Paoni, 2006 MT 26, 331 M 86, 128 P3d 1040 (2006).

Inadmissibility of Reverse 404(b) Evidence — No Prejudice to State Prosecution: Defendant contended that the trial court improperly excluded character evidence regarding another person, which could have been introduced under the seldom used "reverse 404(b) evidence" theory to identify the other person as the author of various threatening letters. Defendant claimed that exclusion of the evidence violated the right to present a defense and the right to confront witnesses. Even though there was little risk that admitting the reverse 404(b) evidence would prejudice the state, most of the evidence was propensity evidence, and the evidence in question did not meet the modified Just test for admissibility of character evidence, so the District Court did not err in refusing to admit the reverse 404(b) evidence. St. v. Clifford, 2005 MT 219, 328 M 300, 121 P3d 489 (2005).

Consultation Between Judge and Jurors Outside Presence of Defendant Not Violative of Defendant's Right to Be Present at All Stages of Trial: After consulting defense counsel, the judge in Riggs's criminal trial met with two jurors outside Riggs's presence to address the jurors' concerns. One juror was concerned because he recognized a witness, and the other was concerned that he would have to forfeit a nonrefundable airline ticket because of the length of the trial. The judge addressed each concern off the record and concluded the matters. Riggs contended on appeal that the meetings violated his constitutional right to be present at all stages of trial. The Supreme Court agreed that a defendant's right to appear and defend in person is a fundamental right and that a defendant must be present throughout the entire trial. However, the court relied on U.S. v. Gagnon, 470 US 522 (1985), for the holding that a defendant has a right to be present at a given proceeding whenever the defendant's presence has a reasonably substantial relation to the fullness of the opportunity to defend against the charges. In this case, both interactions were brief interludes in a complex trial, Riggs had no role to play at either meeting, defense counsel consented to the trial court's approach, and Riggs made no persuasive claim of prejudice arising out of the episodes, so the Supreme Court concluded that Riggs's constitutional rights were not infringed. St. v. Riggs, 2005 MT 124, 327 M 196, 113 P3d 281 (2005).

Test Whether Witness May Testify as Expert on Child Abuse: Factors in the three-part test set out in St. v. Scheffelman, 250 M 334, 820 P2d 1293 (1991), for whether a witness may testify as an expert on child abuse are: (1) the expert must have extensive first-hand experience with children who both have and have not been sexually abused; (2) the expert must have a thorough and current knowledge of the professional literature on child abuse; and (3) the expert must have objectivity and neutrality regarding individual cases. In Riggs's case, the state called a child abuse expert who met the qualifications but who had a therapeutic relationship with one of the victims to testify concerning interviewing techniques applied in a sexual abuse investigation. Riggs contended that the trial court erred by allowing the expert to testify and by limiting the defense's ability to cross-examine the expert. The Supreme Court disagreed on both issues. Given the limited scope of the expert's testimony, the objectivity with which the expert could testify regarding interviewing techniques was not susceptible to being compromised by the therapeutic relationship with one of the victims, so the trial court did not err in qualifying the witness as an expert. Additionally, Riggs was afforded a fair and full opportunity to expose any potential bias of the expert, so Riggs's right to confront witnesses was not infringed. St. v. Riggs, 2005 MT 124, 327 M 196, 113 P3d 281 (2005). See also St. v. Whitlow, 285 M 430, 949 P2d 239 (1997).

Use of Nontestimonial Intoxilyzer Certification Reports in DUI Trial Not Violative of Defendant's Right to Confront Witnesses — Crawford Rule: At Carter's DUI trial, the state introduced three certification reports in order to demonstrate that an Intoxilyzer 5000 was working properly when Carter was tested. The officers who prepared the reports did not testify at trial. Carter initially contended that the reports were hearsay, but on appeal, Carter asserted that admission of the reports violated his right to confront witnesses. Although the Supreme Court will generally not address new arguments raised on appeal, the court applied the exception in Cottrill v. Cottrill Sodding Serv., 229 M 40, 744 P2d 895 (1987), in this case because of the new confrontation clause jurisprudence set out in Crawford v. Wash., 541 US 36 (2004), which was decided while Carter's case was pending. In Crawford, the U.S. Supreme Court for the first time distinguished testimonial and nontestimonial out-of-court statements, delineating testimonial statements, at a minimum, as applying to prior testimony at a preliminary hearing, before a grand jury, or at a former trial as well as to police interrogations. States are allowed flexibility in the development of hearsay law when nontestimonial hearsay is at issue. In Carter's case, the state asserted that the certification reports used at Carter's trial were nontestimonial evidence because they did not fall within the core group of statements that the confrontation clause was meant to address. The Supreme Court held that the certification reports were nontestimonial in that they were not substantive evidence of a particular offense, but rather constituted foundational evidence necessary for the admission of substantive evidence. Thus, Carter's confrontation right was not implicated despite the fact that the authors were not present to testify or be confronted. The court noted that a defendant is always free to subpoena authors of such reports if the defendant's pretrial investigation reveals that the reports are erroneous or are otherwise subject to attack. Therefore, in conformance with the Crawford rule, the Supreme Court exempted the certification reports from confrontation clause scrutiny and affirmed Carter's conviction. St. v. Carter, 2005 MT 87, 326 M 427, 114 P3d 1001 (2005).

No Constitutional Violation in Admission of Telephonic Testimony at Revocation Hearing — No Abuse of Discretion Upon Good Cause: To accommodate counsel, the state moved to allow the admission of telephonic testimony from two law enforcement officers who could not attend Megard's sentence revocation hearing in person. Megard objected, relying on Rule 611, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), and In re Marriage of Bonamarte, 263 M 170, 866 P2d 1132 (1994). The District Court held that neither the rule nor Bonamarte applied and that Megard's fundamental rights would be adequately protected, so the motion was granted. On appeal, Megard also contended that allowing the telephonic testimony violated his due process right and the right to confront witnesses. The Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court was familiar with the witnesses. Allowing telephonic testimony did not impede the ability to judge a witness's credibility in relation to other witnesses, who corroborated the testimony, because knowledge of a witness's identity and credentials may constitute a special circumstance under which telephonic testimony is allowed. Although telephonic testimony is generally not allowed in trials absent special circumstances or the parties' consent, evidentiary rules do not apply to revocation proceedings. Because a revocation hearing is not a criminal trial, Megard had no constitutional right to confront witnesses at the hearing. Further, Megard's due process rights were not violated because his counsel actually cross-examined the witnesses, and good cause existed for the District Court to admit the telephonic testimony to address scheduling conflicts. Even if error occurred, it was harmless, given Megard's failure to establish prejudice pursuant to St. v. Pedersen, 2003 MT 315, 318 M 262, 80 P3d 79 (2003). St. v. Megard, 2004 MT 67, 320 M 323, 87 P3d 448 (2004).

Discovery of Identity of Confidential Informant Properly Denied: DuBray contended that the identity of a confidential informant should have been disclosed in discovery. Applying the balancing test in Roviaro v. U.S., 353 US 53 (1957), the Supreme Court found nothing to persuade that disclosure of the informant's identity was warranted. The informant did not testify at trial, and DuBray offered nothing concrete or substantive to establish that disclosure was necessary to properly prepare for trial, that the informant might possess exculpatory information, or that the informant may have been involved in the crime. Mere speculation about possible relevancy of the informant's testimony was insufficient to warrant disclosure of the informant's identity. St. v. DuBray, 2003 MT 255, 317 M 377, 77 P3d 247 (2003). See also St. v. McLeod, 227 M 482, 740 P2d 672 (1987).

Improper Consideration of Hearsay Evidence Corroborating Testimony of Child Sexual Abuse Victim — Trustworthiness of Child's Statement Considering Totality of Circumstances: Defendant convicted of incest contended on appeal that the District Court erred in determining that the child victim's hearsay statements were admissible under the residual exception of Rule 804(b)(5), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), because the statements had comparable circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness, in violation of defendant's constitutional right to confront witnesses. Citing Idaho v. Wright, 497 US 805 (1990), the Supreme Court noted that reliance upon exceptions to the hearsay rule is permissible if the declarant's truthfulness is so clear from the surrounding circumstances that the test of cross-examination would be of marginal utility. Factors often identified by courts as indicia of the reliability of statements made by child witnesses in sexual abuse cases, such as spontaneity, use of language unexpected of a child of similar age, and lack of motive to fabricate, all relate to whether the child was likely to be telling the truth when the statement was made, but do not include factors that may be added using hindsight. Thus, in child sexual abuse cases, a court may not consider corroborating evidence when making a determination about the admissibility of hearsay statements under the confrontation clause, and the District Court in this case erred as a matter of law in doing so. However, after considering the totality of circumstances exclusive of the corroborating evidence, the Supreme Court found that the child's statements were supported by the particularized guarantees of trustworthiness necessary to withstand a confrontation clause challenge, so the District Court's admission of the child's hearsay statements was affirmed. St. v. S.T.M., 2003 MT 221, 317 M 159, 75 P3d 1257 (2003). See also St. v. Osborne, 1999 MT 149, 295 M 54, 982 P2d 1045 (1999).

Limitation on Cross-Examination Not Violative of Right to Confront Witnesses: Nelson was charged with five felony offenses, and as a result of a plea bargain, Nelson's accomplice testified for the state at trial. During cross-examination, the District Court prevented questioning about charges allegedly filed against the accomplice in another county. Nelson contended that restricting the scope of cross-examination violated his constitutional right to confront witnesses. The Supreme Court disagreed. Limiting the scope of cross-examination does not necessarily violate the right to confront an adverse witness. A District Court has discretion to exercise reasonable control over the mode and order of interrogating witnesses, and may limit the scope of cross-examination to those issues that the court determines to be relevant to the trial. The determination of relevance and admissibility is left to the sound discretion of the trial judge and will not be overturned absent a showing of abuse of that discretion. Nelson was afforded the constitutionally required level of inquiry, and the District Court did not violate the confrontation clause or abuse its discretion by limiting Nelson's questioning of the adverse witness concerning unrelated alleged but unsubstantiated charges in another county. St. v. Nelson, 2002 MT 122, 310 M 71, 48 P3d 739 (2002), distinguishing Alford v. U.S., 282 US 687 (1931), and Davis v. Alaska, 415 US 308 (1974), and followed in St. v. Garding, 2013 MT 355, 373 Mont. 16, 315 P.3d 912.

Denial of Writ of Habeas Corpus to Compel Attendance of Children in Abuse and Neglect Hearing Not Violative of Due Process Rights or Right to Confront Witnesses: The mother petitioned the District Court for a writ of habeas corpus demanding that her children be physically present for an abuse and neglect hearing because they were material witnesses and claiming that the writ was necessary to ensure her due process rights by having the children available to rebut allegations against her at the hearing. The petition was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although the mother was entitled to an opportunity for a meaningful hearing, that opportunity need not be provided at the expense of the children whose best interests were the paramount focus of the proceeding, and subjecting the children to direct and cross-examination could exacerbate the abuse that they had already experienced. Denial of the petition did not violate the mother's right to confront witnesses because the children were not her accusers and she had no right to confront them. Rather, the abuse and neglect case was brought by the state, and the mother had ample opportunity to confront and examine the state's witnesses and experts at the hearing, so her due process rights were met. Failure of Counsel to Object to Introduction of Inconsistent Prior Statements on Confrontation Grounds Not Considered Ineffective Assistance: Jenkins was convicted of deliberate homicide, aggravated kidnapping, and robbery after having been implicated in the crimes based in part on statements made to police and at trial by his wife, Mary. Mary suffered from dementia related to Alzheimer's disease and periodic memory lapses. As a result, in some pretrial interviews, she answered questions with declarative statements while in other interviews, even when asked the same or similar questions, she responded that she didn't know or couldn't remember. Nevertheless, at a pretrial hearing, it was determined that she knew the difference between truth and falsity, could express herself in court, and was competent to testify. At trial, she exhibited the same behavior. On direct examination, the prosecutor asked many of the same questions asked during the pretrial interviews, and although she answered some questions definitively, most of her testimony was that she didn't know or couldn't remember. On cross-examination, she often retracted the definitive answers she gave on direct examination, saying again that she could not remember. Following her testimony, the trial court allowed the prosecution to introduce the content of Mary's pretrial interviews through the testimony of the interviewing officers pursuant to the prior inconsistent statement exception to the hearsay rule, as set out in Rule 801(d)(1)(A), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). Jenkins objected on evidentiary grounds, but not on confrontation grounds, so the issue was not preserved for appeal. In a petition for postconviction relief, Jenkins claimed that he was denied effective assistance of counsel because his attorney should have objected on confrontation grounds. The District Court denied the petition, holding that there was no confrontation clause violation and that even if the objection had been made, it would not have affected the outcome of the trial. Jenkins then appealed the denial of the petition for postconviction relief. The state contended that Jenkins' right to confront witnesses was satisfied by his opportunity to cross-examine Mary and demonstrate to the jury her poor and unreliable memory. The Supreme Court concurred. The implications of admitting prior inconsistent statements was addressed in Calif. v. Green, 399 US 149 (1970), in which it was held that the confrontation clause is not violated by admitting a declarant's out-of-court statements as long as the declarant is testifying as a witness and is subject to full and effective cross-examination. Further, under U.S. v. Owens, 484 US 554 (1988), the confrontation clause guarantees only an opportunity for effective cross-examination, not cross-examination that is effective in a way that the defendant might wish. Even though Mary suffered from memory lapses, she was competent, appeared at trial, and was subjected to unrestricted cross-examination, giving Jenkins ample opportunity to demonstrate her inability to recall past events and giving the jury the opportunity to observe her testimony and judge the reliability of her memory as it pertained to both her in-court and out-of-court statements. Jenkins failed to show that an objection on confrontation grounds would have been sustained, therefore failing to demonstrate that his defense was prejudiced by his trial counsel's failure to preserve the issue for appeal. Jenkins was thus not denied effective assistance of counsel and his petition for postconviction relief was properly denied. St. v. Jenkins, 2001 MT 79, 305 M 95, 23 P3d 201 (2001).

What Form of Compliance of Instrument Used in Breath Test Required as Foundation for Breath Test Results: ARM 23.4.214 requires that all breath analysis equipment be sent to the state Forensic Sciences Division annually for laboratory certification. A person charged with an alcohol-related offense is entitled to the procedural safeguards contained in the administrative rule, so in order for the results of a defendant's breath test to be admissible, the state must lay a proper foundation by establishing that the instrument complied with ARM 23.4.214. During pretrial discovery, Delaney requested documentation that the instrument used to test his breath had been certified, and the state provided a copy of the laboratory certification form. At trial, Delaney moved to dismiss the results of the breath test, contending that the form was inadmissible hearsay that could not be used to lay the requisite foundation, and also maintained that failure to call the custodian of the annual certification records violated Delaney's right to confront witnesses. The state contended that it was not required to have the form admitted in order to lay a foundation for admissibility and that, consequently, it did not matter that the document was hearsay, but rather that all that was necessary was to establish to the satisfaction of the court that the certification had been performed. The District Court sided with the state and admitted the breath test results. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, noting that the determination of whether adequate foundation exists is within the discretion of the District Court and that that determination is made pursuant to Rule 104(a), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), which authorizes the examination of any proffered evidence, regardless of its admissibility, in determining the admissibility of challenged evidence. Under the identical federal Rule of Evidence, federal courts have found that the plain language of the rule extends to consideration of hearsay and other evidence normally inadmissible at trial. (See Bourjaily v. U.S., 483 US 171, 97 L Ed 2d 144, 107 S Ct 1775 (1987), and its progeny.) Thus, the District Court was allowed to consider the certification form in determining whether an adequate foundation existed without regard to whether the form itself was hearsay, and consequently, the state was not required to call the records custodian to testify. St. v. Delaney, 1999 MT 317, 297 M 263, 991 P2d 461, 56 St. Rep. 1267 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Woods, 272 M 220, 900 P2d 320, 52 St. Rep. 762 (1995), and St. v. Clark, 1998 MT 221, 290 M 479, 964 P2d 766, 55 St. Rep. 919 (1998), and followed in St. v. White, 2009 MT 26, 349 M 109, 201 P3d 808 (2009), with regard to necessity of proper foundation for admission of results of alcohol concentration breath analysis. White was overruled, to the extent it is inconsistent with Delaney, in St. v. Jenkins, 2011 MT 287, 362 Mont. 481, 265 P.3d 643. See also St. v. Johnston, 2011 MT 184, 361 Mont. 301, 258 P.3d 417 (holding that a breath analysis instrument must be inspected and calibrated at least every 31 days pursuant to ARM 23.4.213, not every 7 days, or its results may be suppressed).

Admission of Prior Testimony of Unavailable Witness at Second Trial Not Violative of Confrontation Clause: Hall was acquitted of aggravated assault at his first trial. At his second trial, the District Court allowed testimony of a witness from the first trial to be read into evidence because the witness was unavailable at the second trial. Hall alleged error because admission of the testimony violated his right to confront the witness in violation of this section. Under Rule 804, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), prior testimony is a recognized exception to the hearsay rule, and the rationale behind the exception is that there is a guarantee of trustworthiness at the time that the testimony is given. Although evidence may have surfaced after the first trial regarding an alleged conversation in which the witness's prior testimony was possibly rendered suspect, the reliability of the prior testimony was nevertheless inferred from the fact that the witness was under oath and subject to cross-examination at the time of the original testimony. Because the evidence was available for the jury to weigh when contemplating the weight to be given to the prior testimony, subsequent admission of the testimony at the second trial was not violative of Hall's right to confront the witness at the second trial. Trial Court Discretion to Limit Scope of Cross-Examination — Not Violative of Right to Confront Witnesses: At trial, Beavers wanted to cross-examine the officer who wrote him a citation regarding whether charges other than those listed on the citation might have been more appropriate. The trial court did not allow the cross-examination. However, limiting the scope of cross-examination does not necessarily violate a defendant's right to confront an adverse witness. The trial court has broad discretion to limit the scope of cross-examination to those issues that it determines are relevant to the case. Because charging a defendant is a prosecutorial function rather than a function of the arresting officer, here Beavers had no basis for his line of questioning the officer on grounds of reckless driving. The questions were irrelevant; thus, the trial court did not violate Beavers' constitutional right or inhibit his ability to defend the case. St. v. Beavers, 1999 MT 260, 296 M 340, 987 P2d 371, 56 St. Rep. 1035 (1999). See also St. v. Sullivan, 266 M 313, 880 P2d 829, 51 St. Rep. 827 (1994), and St. v. Hearsay by Young Child — Evidence of Material Fact More Probative Than Other Evidence — Circumstantial Guarantees of Trustworthiness — No Abuse of Discretion Found: Heen became suspicious that his 33-month-old granddaughter, Cassie, had been sexually abused by her stepfather, Osborne, Heen's son-in-law. Heen and his daughter, Jamie, Cassie's mother, talked to Cassie, who said or indicated to either or both Heen and Jamie that she had played with "daddy's rubber duck" and that the rubber duck was Osborne's genitalia. Cassie also gave information tending to implicate Heen, whom she called "Papa", as opposed to Osborne, whom she called "Daddy". A medical examination showed that Cassie had physical injuries consistent with sexual abuse. The District Court interviewed Cassie and found her unable to testify because she was extremely shy and may have been intimidated by the courtroom. The state relied upon the hearsay testimony by Heen and Jamie, and based upon that hearsay evidence, Osborne was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent. The Supreme Court applied the requirements of St. v. J.C.E., 235 M 264, 767 P2d 309 (1988), in which the Supreme Court required that three findings be made by a trial court in order for hearsay by a child to be admissible, one of those findings being that the hearsay must be evidence of a material fact and be more probative than other evidence. Osborne objected to introduction of the hearsay testimony, claiming that it was not more probative than other evidence, that evidence being Cassie's testimony implicating Heen. The Supreme Court held that Cassie's testimony implicating Heen was evidence of a different fact and was not probative as to the same material fact and that Cassie implicated Osborne. For those reasons, the Supreme Court held that Cassie's hearsay testimony implicating Osborne was admissible. The Supreme Court also reviewed whether, even though the hearsay testimony was admissible under Rule 804(b)(5), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), the testimony nevertheless violated Osborne's confrontation clause rights and held that pursuant to its opinion in J.C.E., it would defer to the District Court's finding that there were sufficient indicia of trustworthiness, from the evidence taken as a whole, and that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in making that finding. St. v. Osborne, 1999 MT 149, 295 M 54, 982 P2d 1045, 56 St. Rep. 589 (1999).

Evidence of Rape Victim's Alleged Involvement in Prostitution Properly Excluded: Ahto sought to introduce evidence of a rape victim's involvement in prostitution, contending that evidence of prostitution established his defense to felony assault (now assault with a weapon) charges and that the evidence related directly to her credibility and veracity as a witness and motive to testify falsely. The Supreme Court disagreed, finding that Ahto's speculative and unsupported allegations were insufficient to tip the scales in favor of Ahto's right to present a defense and against the victim's rights under the rape shield statute. Moreover, Ahto was given sufficient opportunity to question the victim's credibility and potential motives to testify falsely. Therefore, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in precluding Ahto from cross-examining the victim about her involvement in prostitution because that evidence would not have established a lack of credibility on the victim's part. Ahto further alleged that the trial court denied his right to confront witnesses by disallowing cross-examination after the state opened the door by inquiring as to the victim's employment, but did not demonstrate how he was prejudiced by the ruling. The Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's discretion in determining the latitude of cross-examination. St. v. Ahto, 1998 MT 200, 290 M 338, 965 P2d 240, 55 St. Rep. 851 (1998), distinguishing St. v. Scott, 257 M 454, 850 P2d 286 (1993).

Admission of Inadmissible Hearsay — Denial of Due Process Right: Allowing an employer to submit hearsay statements of witnesses with personal knowledge of alleged work misconduct without requiring that the witnesses testify in person at the eligibility hearing denied claimant of the right to confront and cross-examine the witnesses and was a violation of the constitutional right to due process, warranting reversal and remand. Bean v. Bd. of Labor Appeals, 1998 MT 222, 270 M 253, 891 P2d 516, 55 St. Rep. 927 (1998), distinguishing Richardson v. Perales, 402 US 389 (1971). See also In re Marriage of Bonamarte, 263 M 170, 866 P2d 1132 (1994).

Rule Governing Introduction of Crime Laboratory Reports Violative of Due Process and Confrontation Clause Provisions: Under the Montana Constitution, a criminal defendant is guaranteed the fundamental right to a face-to-face confrontation with an accuser, including the right to cross-examination. Further, the constitution's due process guarantee makes it the state's duty in a criminal prosecution to prove beyond a reasonable doubt every element of the crime charged. Rule 803(8), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), which governs the introduction of state crime laboratory reports, effectively requires a defendant to subpoena and produce the state's expert in order to rightfully take advantage of the confrontation clause. The rule also compels the defendant to produce evidence during the case in chief, which in many cases will be incriminating, should the defendant choose to test the state's case. Therefore, the portion of Rule 803 that governs the introduction of state crime laboratory reports violates both the confrontation clause in this section and the due process guarantee in section 17 of this article. St. v. Clark, 1998 MT 221, 290 M 479, 964 P2d 766, 55 St. Rep. 919 (1998), distinguished in St. v. Delaney, 1999 MT 317, 297 M 263, 991 P2d 461, 56 St. Rep. 1267 (1999).

Hearsay Statement by Witness Not Adopted by Defendant — Requirements for Finding Subpoenaed Witness "Unavailable": After having consumed drinks in Marysville, Widenhofer and Rothschiller were involved in a one-car accident on the Marysville Road. A car picked them up and took them to the closest business, the Silver City Bar. Because Widenhofer was injured, a highway patrol officer was called, who, upon arriving at the Silver City Bar, asked Rothschiller some questions about the accident. When he was in the patrol car with only the officer present, Rothschiller answered one of those questions by stating that Widenhofer was driving the vehicle. The officer then took both Widenhofer and Rothschiller to the hospital in Helena. After Widenhofer's injuries were cared for, the highway patrol officer continued to question Widenhofer; advised him that in the officer's opinion, alcohol was a factor in the accident; asked Widenhofer to submit to a blood-alcohol test; and read Widenhofer the implied consent form. Although Rothschiller was served with a subpoena by the Sheriff the night before a jury trial on Widenhofer's charge of DUI, Rothschiller failed to appear at trial. During the trial, the District Court allowed the highway patrol officer to repeat Rothschiller's answer, that Widenhofer was the driver of the vehicle. The Supreme Court reversed the decision of the District Court allowing the hearsay testimony. The Supreme Court held that the state's reliance on Rule 801(d)(2)(B), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), was misplaced because the District Court did not make an express finding that Rothschiller's statement was adopted by Widenhofer, as the District Court should have under the rationale of U.S. v. Schaff, 948 F2d 501 (9th Cir. 1991), and because the state did not present sufficient evidence that Widenhofer acquiesced in Rothschiller's statement. The Supreme Court noted that Widenhofer could not hear the conversation between the officer and Rothschiller and had no reason to know what Rothschiller was telling the officer. For these reasons, the Supreme Court held that Rothschiller's statement as to who was driving the vehicle was not adopted by Widenhofer and that Rothschiller's statement could therefore not be allowed under this exception to the hearsay rule. Widenhofer also objected to the hearsay testimony of the highway patrol officer because it violated Widenhofer's right under the sixth amendment to the United States Constitution and under this section to confront and cross-examine a witness. The Supreme Court held that the "unavailability" exception under Rule 804(a)(5), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), could not be invoked because under the analysis of Ohio v. Roberts, 448 US 56 (1980), that rule requires the prosecution to demonstrate the "unavailability" of a witness before hearsay evidence of the witness's statements may be introduced. The Supreme Court held that the state's "minimal" attempt to procure Rothschiller's testimony by serving a subpoena on him the night before trial did not constitute "reasonable means" of procuring his testimony. St. v. Widenhofer, 286 M 341, 950 P2d 1383, 54 St. Rep. 1438 (1997), followed, with regard to the standard of reasonable means of procuring witness's testimony, in St. v. Diaz, 2006 MT 303, 334 M 479, 148 P3d 628 (2006), and followed in St. v. McCollom, 2009 MT 257, 352 M 10, 214 P3d 1230 (2009).

Defense Interviews When Accompanied by Court Reporter Held Not to Be Depositions — No Right of Accused to Confront Witnesses in Interviews: After Robert's incarceration awaiting trial on forgery charges, defense counsel arranged to interview prosecution witnesses at the prosecutor's office. When defense counsel arrived, he was accompanied by a court reporter. Counsel told the prosecutor that the interviews were actually "depositions" and requested that Robert be brought from his jail cell, to which the prosecutor refused. The Supreme Court held that the "depositions" were only interviews, regardless of their characterization by defense counsel, because the prerequisites for a deposition provided in 46-15-201 had not been satisfied, no motion had been made to the court requesting the deposition, and notice had not been given of the time and place of the deposition. Citing St. v. Reynolds, 243 M 1, 792 P2d 1111 (1990), the Supreme Court held that Robert had no constitutional right to be present at the interviews because the right to confront witnesses is a right that applies at trial. St. v. Lane, 279 M 128, 927 P2d 989, 53 St. Rep. 1082 (1996).

Period of Conception — Rape Shield Statute Properly Used to Exclude Evidence of Sex With Other Family Members — Due Process Not Abridged: Weeks was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with his stepdaughter. The conviction was based in part upon DNA evidence and in part upon the testimony of Weeks's stepdaughter. After an in camera hearing, the District Court excluded evidence of sexual acts with other members of her family that occurred outside the time of conception. Weeks argued that the District Court made it impossible for him to challenge the credibility of his stepdaughter. The Supreme Court held that the rape shield law was properly invoked by the District Court and that allowing only the evidence of sexual acts with other family members that occurred within the calculated time of conception was proper. Citing St. v. Van Pelt, 247 M 99, 805 P2d 549 (1991), the Supreme Court held that the limitations imposed by the District Court did not violate Weeks's right to due process of law. St. v. Weeks, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477, 52 St. Rep. 78 (1995).

Failure to Object to Presentence Report — Right to Confrontation Not Precluded: Larson and his attorney received a presentence report but did not object, present witnesses, or offer other evidence to contradict the report, nor was a continuance requested to allow response and rebuttal to the report. Failure to exercise the affirmative duty to present evidence demonstrating inaccuracies precluded Larson's later claim that he was denied the right to meaningful confrontation. St. v. Larson, 266 M 28, 878 P2d 886, 51 St. Rep. 638 (1994). See also St. v. Trangsrud, 200 M 303, 651 P2d 37 (1982).

Evidence of Witnesses' Prior Crimes Inadmissible — No Violation of Right to Confront Witnesses: Gollehon contended that refusing to allow his questioning of the state's eyewitnesses, who happened to be state prison inmates, as to their prior crimes violated his constitutional right to confront the witnesses against him. However, proof of the witnesses' conduct would require examination of extrinsic evidence, which is inadmissible under Rule 608, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), and evidence of prior convictions, expressly prohibited under Rule 609, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). Balancing the probative value of the evidence with its potential prejudicial effect, the Supreme Court held that Gollehon's right to confrontation was not violated by the trial court's refusal to allow cross-examination of the witnesses' past criminal conduct. St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 1, 864 P2d 249, 50 St. Rep. 1250 (1993).

No Right to Discover Notes of Counselor Not Called or Used as Witness: Little was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault. During trial, Little moved for discovery of the notes of a counselor of one of the victims, which motion was denied by the District Court. The Supreme Court affirmed, citing St. v. Rhyne, 253 M 513, 833 P2d 1112 (1992). The Supreme Court held that Little had no right to discovery and no right to have the District Court examine in camera the notes of a counselor who was not a witness against Little and whose notes and opinions were not used by the prosecution. St. v. Little, 260 M 460, 861 P2d 154, 50 St. Rep. 1124 (1993).

No Right to Require Psychiatric or Medical Examination of Witness Not a Party: Little was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault. During trial, Little moved for psychiatric and medical examinations of one of the complaining witnesses, which was denied by the District Court. Citing St. v. Crist, 253 M 442, 833 P2d 1052 (1992), the Supreme Court held that Little had no right to force the psychiatric examination of a child victim of a sexual crime. Citing St. v. Goodwin 249 M 1, 813 P2d 953 (1991), the Supreme Court held that Little had no right to require a medical examination of one of the complaining witnesses. Citing St. v. Liddell, 211 M 180, 685 P2d 918 (1984), the Supreme Court also noted that former Rule 35(a), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), allows the mental or physical examination of a party not a witness. St. v. Little, 260 M 460, 861 P2d 154, 50 St. Rep. 1124 (1993).

Videotaped Testimony — Preliminary Showing of Necessity Not Required: When defendant was entitled to be present at videotaping of victim's testimony and to confront the accuser but chose not to, the essential elements required by the confrontation clause were present and, therefore, the procedure did not violate defendant's constitutional right to confrontation. St. v. Scott, 257 M 454, 850 P2d 286, 50 St. Rep. 353 (1993).

Failure to Allow Cross-Examination Concerning Separate Civil Trial Not Error: Stewart contended that the lower court had violated his right to confront a witness by not allowing him to cross-examine the witness concerning a separate civil action brought by the witness for wrongful discharge. The Supreme Court held that the lower court had not abused its discretion in ruling that the evidence of the civil trial could not be introduced to show bias on the witness's part and that therefore defendant's constitutional right to confront the witness had not been violated. St. v. Stewart, 253 M 475, 833 P2d 1085, 49 St. Rep. 540 (1992).

Screening of Child Witnesses at Trial — Conformity With Federal Constitution — Test — Failure to Raise State Constitutional Issue in Lower Court: Defendant argued that placement of a 6½-foot high by 10-foot wide opaque screen between himself and two child witnesses at his trial for sexual assault violated his constitutional rights to confront the witnesses against him. Defendant's failure to argue or object in the trial court on the basis of the Montana Constitution precluded consideration of the state issue on appeal. However, the Supreme Court cited Md. v. Craig, 497 US 836, 111 L Ed 2d 666, 110 S Ct 3157 (1990), and Coy v. Iowa, 487 US 1012, 101 L Ed 2d 857, 108 S Ct 2798 (1988), in finding that defendant's lack of opportunity for personal observation of the witnesses was not dispositive. Confrontation rights are not absolute but may give way to other competing interests so as to permit the use of certain procedural devices necessary to shield a child witness from the trauma of courtroom testimony. The test for determining necessity is: (1) the trial court must hear evidence and determine whether use of a procedure other than face-to-face confrontation is necessary to protect the welfare of the child witness; (2) the court must also find that the child would be traumatized, not by the courtroom generally but by the presence of the defendant; and (3) there must be a finding that the emotional distress suffered by the child in the presence of the defendant is more than mere nervousness, excitement, or some reluctance to testify. Federal standards having been met in this case, use of the opaque screen was not violative of the U.S. Constitution. St. v. Davis, 253 M 50, 830 P2d 1309, 49 St. Rep. 342 (1992).

Search by Probation Officer Based on Information From Police — Right to Confront Informant: Smith told police that drugs could be bought from Davis. Police bought drugs from Davis, who went into defendant's residence to get the drugs that he sold police. Police told defendant's probation officer, who then searched the residence and found drugs in defendant's bedroom. The unavailability of Smith at trial did not deny defendant the right to confront and cross-examine Smith. Smith's statement did not form the basis for probation officer's knowledge or search or for the conviction. Furthermore, Smith's reliability was not at issue. St. v. Hall, 249 M 366, 816 P2d 438, 48 St. Rep. 774 (1991).

Refusal of Immunity to Witness Invoking Fifth Amendment Privilege — Violation of Right of Confrontation: Defendant appealed his conviction of aggravated assault, contending that the District Court violated his right of confrontation by refusing to grant immunity to a witness to the assault who, following interrogation, invoked his fifth amendment privilege against self-incrimination before the defense counsel had completed full cross-examination. In reversing the conviction and remanding for a new trial, the Supreme Court held that because evidence relating to the assault, including statements about who instigated the fight and who fired the rifle, were in conflict, full examination was a critical aspect of the defendant's right of confrontation. St. v. Young, 249 M 257, 815 P2d 590, 48 St. Rep. 696 (1991).

Right to Confrontation Not Applicable to Revocation of Conditional Release — Civil Proceeding: The right to confrontation guaranteed by the sixth amendment to the U.S. Constitution (similar to this section) only attaches to criminal proceedings. The process established for the commitment, discharge, release, and recommitment of a person to the Warm Springs State Hospital, as established in 46-14-301, et seq., is civil in nature, and the confrontation clause does not apply to hearings held as part of that process. St. v. Edmundson, 246 M 241, 805 P2d 1289, 47 St. Rep. 1937 (1990).

Right to Confront Accusers Not Compelled Right of Pretrial Discovery: In determining whether a defendant was denied his right to confront witnesses because of the trial court's refusal to grant defendant's pretrial motion to obtain medical and psychological records of a sexual abuse victim, the Supreme Court adopted the reasoning in People v. Exline, 775 P2d 48 (Colo. App. 1988), holding that the right of a defendant to confront his accusers is not equivalent to a constitutionally compelled rule of pretrial discovery. Rather, the right of confrontation is a trial right, guaranteeing an opportunity for effective cross-examination. Additionally, the court cited Pa. v. Ritchie, 480 US 39, 94 L Ed 2d 40, 107 S Ct 989 (1987), in holding that the ability to question adverse witnesses does not include the power to require the pretrial disclosure of any and all information that might be useful in contradicting unfavorable testimony. St. v. Reynolds, 243 M 1, 792 P2d 1111, 47 St. Rep. 1143 (1990), followed in St. v. Donnelly, 244 M 371, 798 P2d 89, 47 St. Rep. 1600 (1990), in St. v. Rhyne, 253 M 513, 833 P2d 1112, 49 St. Rep. 577 (1992), and St. v. Lane, 279 M 128, 927 P2d 989, 53 St. Rep. 1082 (1996). See also St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979, 48 St. Rep. 588 (1991), which overruled Donnelly with regard to augmentation of sentence for failure to admit guilt.

Right to Confront Witnesses When Witnesses Assert Fifth Amendment: In a criminal case, the defendant argued that his right to confront witnesses was violated because the affidavits of the witnesses were used in the information filed against him, but in the trial, when examined, the witnesses refused to answer questions, relying on their fifth amendment rights. The Supreme Court ruled that the defendant's rights had not been violated because the affidavits were not submitted as evidence against him at the trial. St. v. LaPier, 242 M 335, 790 P2d 983, 47 St. Rep. 760 (1990).

Exclusion of Witness's Earlier Crimes — Impeachment by Showing Bias — No Denial of Confrontation: Hone, a witness to an assault, was on parole from a homicide conviction at the time the assault occurred. It was not error for the District Court to grant a motion in limine to prevent defense counsel from using that conviction for impeachment under an offer of proof, supposedly showing bias, that "he, Hone, would personally see to it that [defendant] served time in prison because a year at the pen had done him, Hone, a lot of good". The exclusion of the testimony did not violate the defendant's right to confrontation of witnesses because the uncorroborated allegation had limited probative value in relation to the credibility of the witness, and thus it was a valid exercise of discretion by the District Court. Sloan v. St., 236 M 100, 768 P2d 1365, 46 St. Rep. 214 (1989), followed in St. v. Haskins, 255 M 202, 841 P2d 542, 49 St. Rep. 922 (1992), and St. v. Sullivan, 266 M 313, 880 P2d 829, 51 St. Rep. 827 (1994).

Examination of Social Worker's File Not Allowed — No Violation of Constitutional Rights: Defendant in a child abuse case claimed his constitutional rights were violated by the District Court's refusal to allow him to examine the file of the social worker assigned to his case. The Supreme Court relied on Pa. v. Ritchie, 480 US 39, 94 L Ed 2d 40, 107 S Ct 989 (1987), in holding that Montana's child abuse confidentiality statute, 41-3-205, as it applies to file review, does not violate a defendant's right to confront his accusers. Further, as long as the trial court has the statutory authority to review the file in camera and to release material information from the file to the accused, defendant's right to a fair trial is fully protected. St. v. Thiel, 236 M 63, 768 P2d 343, 46 St. Rep. 182 (1989), followed in St. v. Donnelly, 244 M 371, 798 P2d 89, 47 St. Rep. 1600 (1990), and in St. v. Glick, 2009 MT 44, 349 M 277, 203 P3d 796 (2009), with regard to a trial court's in camera review of a defendant's access to confidential presentence investigation reports on witnesses. See also St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979, 48 St. Rep. 588 (1991), which overruled Donnelly with regard to augmentation of sentence for failure to admit guilt.

Expert's Testimony Allowable as to Credibility of Child Abuse Victim if Child Also Testifies: In determining whether the District Court properly refused to allow into evidence out-of-court statements made by a child abuse victim to a counselor, the Supreme Court held that testimony by an expert evaluating the credibility of a witness is inadmissible except when the witness is a child victim of sexual assault and the child also testifies. However, the expert may not identify the alleged perpetrator because identification requires only the common logic that is well within the capacity of a lay jury. St. v. J.C.E., 235 M 264, 767 P2d 309, 45 St. Rep. 2373 (1988), followed in part and distinguished in part in In re O.A.W., 2007 MT 13, 335 M 304, 153 P3d 6 (2007). See also St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453, 48 St. Rep. 62 (1991), St. v. McLain, 249 M 242, 815 P2d 147, 48 St. Rep. 664 (1991), and St. v. Riggs, 2005 MT 124, 327 M 196, 113 P3d 281 (2005).

Hearsay Admissible When Alleged Child Abuse Victim Unavailable as Witness — Child Hearsay Guidelines Established: In determining whether the District Court properly refused to allow into evidence out-of-court statements made by a child abuse victim to a counselor and a social worker, the Supreme Court held that Rule 804(b)(5), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), henceforth is the rule under which proferred hearsay, other than expert testimony, is considered for admissibility in cases of incest or other sexual abuse of children when the alleged victim is unavailable as a witness. The court also established guidelines for consideration by the trial judge in determining the admissibility of hearsay testimony proffered when the alleged child victim is unavailable. In using these guidelines, the question of admissibility remains in the discretion of the trial judge. St. v. J.C.E., 235 M 264, 767 P2d 309, 45 St. Rep. 2373 (1988), followed in St. v. Osborne, 1999 MT 149, 295 M 54, 982 P2d 1045, 56 St. Rep. 589 (1999), and followed in part and distinguished in part in In re O.A.W., 2007 MT 13, 335 M 304, 153 P3d 6 (2007). See also St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453, 48 St. Rep. 62 (1991), and In re O.A.W., 2007 MT 13, 335 M 304, 153 P3d 6 (2007).

Medical Diagnosis and Treatment Exception — Applicable Only to Medical Doctors: In determining that the District Court properly refused to allow into evidence out-of-court statements made by a child abuse victim to a counselor, the Supreme Court declined to extend the medical diagnosis and treatment exception under Rule 803, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), beyond medical doctors. The counselor is not licensed to render medical diagnoses and therefore cannot testify about such diagnoses under this exception. St. v. J.C.E., 235 M 264, 767 P2d 309, 45 St. Rep. 2373 (1988), followed in St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453, 48 St. Rep. 62 (1991), and distinguished in St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994), in which the medical diagnosis and treatment exception was extended to emergency medical technicians as first responders in a medical crisis. See also St. v. Thompson, 263 M 17, 865 P2d 1125, 50 St. Rep. 1683 (1993), in which child's statement to treating physician that identified stepfather as perpetrator was admissible.

Reasonable Restrictions on Confrontation of Child Witness: Defendant in an incest case contended his attorney could not conduct an effective interview unless defendant was present for consultation during the interview. The state argued that defendant's presence would harm the mental well-being of the minor victim. The Supreme Court held that the accused does not have a constitutional right to interview witnesses personally and that reasonable restrictions on the accused's access to the witness comports with the guarantees of the confrontation clause. A witness unwilling to be interviewed may be deposed, but an interview under circumstances directed by the witness would reflect unwillingness only if the attached conditions make it untenable for defense counsel to discover needed material. St. v. Smith, 235 M 99, 765 P2d 742, 45 St. Rep. 2190 (1988), followed in St. v. Sor-Lokken, 247 M 343, 805 P2d 1367, 48 St. Rep. 142 (1991). See also St. v. Pecora, 190 M 115, 619 P2d 173, 37 St. Rep. 1742 (1980).

Nondisclosure of Witness Proper: Defendant appeals from his conviction for criminal sale (now criminal distribution) of dangerous drugs, asserting that nondisclosure of the identity of a confidential informant was prejudicial. The court held that defendant did not meet the burden of showing that the informant would have been a material witness whose testimony might result in exoneration or that failure to disclose the identity of the informant would infringe defendant's constitutional rights. St. v. McLeod, 227 M 482, 740 P2d 672, 44 St. Rep. 1251 (1987).

Names of Anonymous Phone Callers Not Disclosed — Tips Not Essential Evidence — Right to Confront Witnesses Not Abused: The District Court allowed evidence and argument on the contents of two anonymous tips reporting defendant's speeding car, but the names of those giving the tips to police were not disclosed at trial. The defendant's right to confront witnesses was not impinged because the tips were corroborated by two investigating officers and were used in conjunction with evidence of the vehicle's excessive speed to effectuate a justifiable stop. The tips were not the essential evidence upon which defendant was convicted. St. v. Shaffer, 227 M 221, 738 P2d 491, 44 St. Rep. 1029 (1987), distinguishing Moore v. U.S., 429 US 20, 50 L Ed 2d 25, 97 S Ct 29.

Coconspirator Statements as Hearsay Exemption — Reliability Analysis: Coconspirator statements do not fall within a hearsay exception, but rather a hearsay exemption. Satisfaction of the requirements of Rule 801(d)(2)(E), M.R.Ev. (see Title 26, ch. 10), does not ipso facto satisfy the right of defendant to confront witnesses; rather, a separate Confrontation Clause Analysis designed to guarantee the reliability of the challenged coconspirator statements is required. Relevant criteria are: (1) the declarant's knowledge of the identity and role of defendant in the crime; (2) the possibility that declarant was relying on faulty recollection; and (3) the circumstances under which the statements were made, possibly indicating that declarant might be lying about defendant's involvement in the conspiracy. St. v. Stever, 225 M 336, 732 P2d 853, 44 St. Rep. 283 (1987).

Coconspirator Unavailable but Out-Of-Court Statements Admitted — Confrontation Rights Not Infringed: Where a material witness was made unavailable through a plea bargain agreement yet his statements as a coconspirator were admitted, the Supreme Court adopted the decision in U.S. v. Inadi, 475 US 387, 89 L Ed 2d 390, 106 S Ct 1121 (1986) in holding that defendant's right to confront witnesses under Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., and the sixth amendment to the U.S. Constitution was not violated since the Confrontation Clause does not require a showing of unavailability as a condition of admission of the out-of-court statements of a nontestifying coconspirator. St. v. Stever, 225 M 336, 732 P2d 853, 44 St. Rep. 283 (1987).

Witness Questioned Concerning Prior Inconsistent Statement: If a witness testifies at trial and is cross-examined concerning a prior inconsistent statement, the statement at trial is not hearsay. The defendant's right to confront the witness is not denied because the defendant may cross-examine the declarant and ask him to explain why he is giving a statement inconsistent with his prior one. St. v. Bell, 225 M 83, 731 P2d 336, 44 St. Rep. 56 (1987).

Alleged Constitutional Violation: Concerning an alleged constitutional violation (failure to allow defendant to confront witnesses by allowing hearsay evidence) when the error was not objected to at trial, a party must show prejudicial error and must satisfy one of the three requirements listed in 46-20-702 before the claim will be noticed on appeal. St. v. Cain, 220 M 509, 717 P2d 15, 43 St. Rep. 568 (1986), followed in St. v. Rodgers, 257 M 413, 849 P2d 1028, 50 St. Rep. 335 (1993), and St. v. Enright, 2000 MT 372, 303 M 457, 16 P3d 366, 57 St. Rep. 1590 (2000).

Inspection of Medical and Youth Court Records Denied — No Prejudice: The defendant, convicted of sexual intercourse without consent, contended that the District Court's refusal to furnish him the minor victim's hospital and Youth Court records for use on cross-examination prejudiced his right to "be confronted with the witnesses against him" under the sixth amendment to the U.S. Constitution (similar to Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const.). The Supreme Court held that 50-16-314 (now repealed) and 53-24-306 exempt confidential health care information from compulsory legal process. In St. v. Camitsch, 192 M 124, 626 P2d 1250, 38 St. Rep. 563 (1981), the Supreme Court "confine[d] the permissible use of . . . juvenile records to demonstrating, by cross-examination, a witness' bias, prejudice, or motive". The defendant in this case failed to show how use of the records could have demonstrated this or how he could have built a defense based on their use. He had adequate opportunity to cross-examine the victim in an effort to damage her credibility. The Supreme Court ruled that the confrontation clause does not require that a criminal defendant be allowed to impeach the credibility of a victim by compromising the confidentiality of medical treatment or Youth Court records; therefore, the defendant's sixth amendment right was not infringed. St. v. Mendenhall, 219 M 328, 721 P2d 1255, 42 St. Rep. 2060 (1985).

Cross-Examination — Pending Charges Against Witness — Trial Court Discretion: When a prosecution witness admitted under cross-examination that he had failed to appear on bench warrants from the State of Washington and that the Washington charges involved an allegation that he had stolen defendant's property, the witness asserted his privilege against self-incrimination. The District Court's limiting of the extent of the cross-examination on the pending charges did not violate defendant's right to confront witnesses and was not an abuse of the trial court's discretion. The privilege against self-incrimination is not waived by testifying for the prosecution. St. v. Short, 217 M 62, 702 P2d 979, 42 St. Rep. 1026 (1985).

Confidentiality of Records on Child Abuse and Neglect — Not Violative of Confrontation Rights: An attorney being disciplined for violating the confidentiality provisions of 41-3-205 did not prevail in his contention that the section conflicted with the right of confrontation guaranteed by Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., and the sixth amendment to the United States Constitution because the attorney, in his zeal to get information relevant to his client, did not make an application to the court for permission to disseminate the information. In re Wyse, 212 M 339, 688 P2d 758, 41 St. Rep. 1780 (1984).

Sex Crime Victim's Past Sexual Conduct and False Accusations — Admissibility — Veracity of Victim: Although there is a compelling interest in favor of preserving the integrity of a sex crime trial and preventing it from becoming a trial of the alleged victim and a general policy against sordid probes into a victim's sexual past, evidence on an alleged victim's past sexual conduct is admissible on the issue of veracity. To limit or bar cross-examination when there is evidence of prior false accusations by the alleged victim restricts the constitutional right to confront witnesses. The evidence is admissible only if the prior accusations were proven false or admitted to be false. If the prior charge was not adjudicated, the evidence is inadmissible. A separate hearing on the issue should be held outside the jury's presence. The evidence is properly barred when its only value is to prejudice the alleged victim's character and reputation. St. v. Anderson, 211 M 272, 686 P2d 193, 41 St. Rep. 1357 (1984), modifying St. v. McSloy, 127 M 265, 261 P2d 663 (1953), and followed in St. v. Fitzgerald, 238 M 261, 776 P2d 1222, 46 St. Rep. 1253 (1989), St. v. Rhyne, 253 M 513, 833 P2d 1112, 49 St. Rep. 577 (1992), St. v. Steffes, 269 M 214, 887 P2d 1196, 51 St. Rep. 1463 (1994), State ex rel. Mazurek v. District Court, 277 M 349, 922 P2d 474, 53 St. Rep. 678 (1996), and St. v. Ahto, 1998 MT 200, 290 M 338, 965 P2d 240, 55 St. Rep. 851 (1998).

Statements Attributed to Nontestifying Codefendant — Admissible Unless Blame Shifting: Defendant was convicted of deliberate homicide. On appeal, he contended that four statements attributed to his son, a nontestifying codefendant, were admitted in violation of the confrontation clause of the 6th amendment to the United States Constitution under the rule laid down in Bruton v. U.S., 391 US 123, 88 S Ct 1620, 20 L Ed 2d 476 (1968). In Bruton, the court reversed, based upon the fact that the statements were incriminating to Bruton and upon the recognized motivation of the codefendant to shift the blame to others. In this case the testimony was not crucial and did not involve the misuse of a confession. None of the statements contained an express assertion about past fact. The son's knowledge of defendant's role in the shooting was solidly established through other evidence. The chance that the son's statements were founded upon faulty recollection was remote to the extreme. The statements were spontaneous and were against the son's penal interest. There was no prejudice to defendant in the admission of the statements. St. v. Weinberger, 204 M 278, 665 P2d 202, 40 St. Rep. 844 (1983), followed in St. v. McCord, 251 M 317, 825 P2d 194, 49 St. Rep. 53 (1992), and St. v. Grimes, 1999 MT 145, 295 M 22, 982 P2d 1037, 56 St. Rep. 571 (1999).

Hearsay and Violation of United States Constitutional Right of Confrontation: Although the Confrontation Clause (sixth amendment, U.S. Const.) does not prevent the introduction of all hearsay statements, the federal District Court granted a Writ of Habeas Corpus to petitioner where, at his trial, testimony as to a prior inconsistent statement was admitted, but because of a genuine lapse of memory, the witness could not recall the basis for the statement, thus effectively denying the petitioner his right of cross-examination. Creekmore v. District Court, 571 F. Supp. 992, 40 St. Rep. 1638 (D.C. Mont. 1983).

Confrontation of Witnesses — Discretionary at Presentence Hearing: Defendant was convicted of aggravated assault for pointing a gun at another person during a barroom altercation. A presentence investigation was completed and provided to the defense. The presentence investigation contained a number of statements by witnesses whose names were ordered withheld by the court. Defendant objected to the consideration of those statements because he was not allowed to confront the makers thereof. The Supreme Court held that the right of cross-examination at a presentence hearing is a discretionary matter with the trial court and that defendant's due process right was protected because he was represented by counsel at the time the information was made known to him and he was given the opportunity to rebut the information. St. v. Trangsrud, 200 M 303, 651 P2d 37, 39 St. Rep. 1765 (1982).

Right of Confrontation — Harmless Error: A sheriff testified as to statements made by a defendant to the sheriff that incriminated codefendants. Because the defendant did not testify at trial, the codefendants' rights of confrontation were violated. However, because there was overwhelming independent admissible evidence of the facts contained in the defendant's statements, the error was harmless. St. v. Powers, 198 M 289, 645 P2d 1357, 39 St. Rep. 989 (1982).

Permissible Use of Records of Juvenile Crimes — Impeachment: Before his trial on charges of sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault, the defendant filed a motion to allow his counsel to inspect the Youth Court records of any complaining witnesses on the grounds that the records might have a bearing on the competency and veracity of those witnesses. The motion was denied, and the judge said he would examine the records to determine if any of the girls should be examined by a psychologist before testifying. The Supreme Court found that the judge's ruling denying the defendant's motion to inspect denied him the right to confront the witnesses against him. However, its review of the juvenile records convinced the court that the error here was harmless. It declined to adopt a rule allowing evidence of prior juvenile convictions to be used as evidence to attack the general credibility of a witness. The permissible use of those juvenile records was confined to demonstrating, by cross-examination, a witness' bias, prejudice, or motive. It was within the discretion of the trial judge to determine competency, and his findings would not be overturned absent an abuse of discretion. St. v. Camitsch, 192 M 124, 626 P2d 1250, 38 St. Rep. 563 (1981), distinguished in St. v. Mendenhall, 219 M 328, 721 P2d 1255, 42 St. Rep. 2060 (1985).

Character of Victim — Right to Witness and Confrontation — Sexual Intercourse Without Consent: While the sixth amendment guarantees a criminal the right to testimony of witnesses in his favor, it does not guarantee him the right to any and all witnesses, regardless of their competency or knowledge. There is the competing interest of the fairness and reliability of the trial. Here, in a sexual intercourse without consent case, the defendant was precluded by these rules from calling witnesses to establish the victim's sexual views and from cross-examining the victim concerning a quote on her jacket ("Liquor in the front, poker in the back"). Since the victim's character is not in issue and her sexual views are not probative of her truthfulness, and it is clearly within the judge's discretion to exclude this evidence if it is irrelevant or too prejudicial, the Supreme Court found no merit in defendant's argument that he was denied his right to confront witnesses. St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043, 37 St. Rep. 1942 (1980), followed in State ex rel. Mazurek v. District Court, 277 M 349, 922 P2d 474, 53 St. Rep. 678 (1996).

Photographic Lineup — When Not Overly Suggestive — No Right to Have Counsel Present: A defendant appealed from a robbery conviction. He alleged that a motion to suppress evidence relating to pretrial photographic lineup procedures should have been sustained. The motion was based on contentions that the victim's ability to identify him was tainted by the fact the victim had seen him in police custody shortly after the robbery and that the victim may have seen another photograph of him that had been in the custody of a police officer. The defendant also challenged the suggestiveness of the lineup because his attorney was not present. If the photographic identification process was so suggestive as to present a "substantial likelihood of misidentification", an in-court identification of the defendant would not be permitted. Under the circumstances of this particular case, there was not a substantial chance of misidentification. Further, the reviewing court followed a U.S. Supreme Court decision and stated that the confrontation clause is not violated by a photo-array identification process and therefore the right to counsel does not attach. Accordingly, the motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Dahl, 190 M 207, 620 P2d 361, 37 St. Rep. 1852 (1980).

Hearsay Exceptions Not Violative of Right to Confront Witnesses When Declarant Subject to Cross-Examination: A defendant is not denied the right to confront the witnesses against him by the admission under Rule 801 of the Montana Rules of Evidence of a prior inconsistent statement made by a third person or a statement made by a coconspirator, implicating the defendant, when the declarant testified as a witness and was subject to full and effective cross-examination. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980), followed in St. v. Pease, 222 M 455, 724 P2d 153, 43 St. Rep. 1417 (1986), and St. v. Charlo, 226 M 213, 735 P2d 278, 44 St. Rep. 597 (1987). See also St. v. Maier, 1999 MT 51, 293 M 403, 977 P2d 298, 56 St. Rep. 208 (1999), which was followed in St. v. Baker, 2013 MT 113, 370 Mont. 43, 300 P.3d 696, in which the Supreme Court noted that the right to confront includes only the opportunity for cross-examination, not any guarantee that it will elicit helpful evidence, and in St. v. Pound, 2014 MT 143, 375 Mont. 241, 326 P.3d 422.

Right to Fair Trial — Addition of Witnesses by State: Defendant was not denied a fair trial when the State was permitted to add to its list of witnesses after voir dire. One of the witnesses added had been listed by the defendant as one of his witnesses, and the court, at the time the witnesses were added, stated that it would grant a continuance to allow the defense to interview the new witnesses. This opportunity cured any prejudice that may have otherwise developed. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Right to Confront Witnesses — Introduction of Out-of-Court Statements — United States Constitution: The sixth amendment to the United States Constitution, the right to confrontation (similar to Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const.), is effectively denied a criminal defendant when out-of-court statements, made outside a defendant's presence, are introduced at trial and the maker of the statement is not present, does not take the stand, or invokes a privilege so as to deprive the defendant of an opportunity to cross-examine him. U.S. v. Brady, 579 F2d 1121 (9th Cir. 1978).

Intimidation of Witnesses: When protection was immediately provided for two witnesses upon discovery that they were being intimidated and the jury had all the facts before it to weigh those witnesses' credibility, the District Court sufficiently guarded the defendant's rights and a mistrial was not warranted. St. v. Booke, 178 M 225, 583 P2d 405 (1978), followed in St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005).

Defendant's Right to Be Present at Jury View: A defendant's constitutional right to be present at all stages of the trial and to meet his witnesses against him face to face includes the right to be present at a jury view. St. v. Musgrove, 178 M 162, 582 P2d 1246 (1978).

Extrajudicial Statements Implicating Codefendant: When a declarant testifies as a witness and is subject to full and effective cross-examination, the confrontation clause of the sixth amendment is not violated by admitting the declarant's out-of-court statements. St. v. Cripps, 177 M 410, 582 P2d 312 (1978), following Calif. v. Green, 399 US 149 (1970).

Access to Potential Defense Witnesses: Defendant was not deprived of due process or a fair trial by the State's investigatory procedure utilized in the questioning of potential defense witnesses who were initial criminal suspects. St. v. Baugh, 174 M 456, 571 P2d 779 (1977).

Reading of Nonadmitted Police Report to Jury: When jury deliberations were tainted by reading nonadmitted police report to the material prejudice of defendant's right to an impartial jury, to confront witnesses, and to assistance of counsel at every critical stage of trial, a new trial was required. St. v. Davison, 173 M 510, 568 P2d 159 (1977).

Independent Questioning of Judge at Sentencing Hearing: When, at sentencing hearing, the trial judge referred to an incident involving the defendant not mentioned in the trial or presentence report but known to the judge and asked defendant if he had anything to say with regard to it, and defendant, with representation of counsel, admitted the incident but made no statement in mitigation of it, there was no denial of the right of confrontation, and the judge could properly consider the incident in passing sentence. St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976).

RIGHT TO COMPEL ATTENDANCE OF WITNESSES

Defendant's Right to Counsel and Right to Trial Not Violated During Four Prior DUI Prosecutions — Enhancement of New DUI Charge to Felony Proper: Walker's 2005 DUI arrest was enhanced to a felony charge when driving records indicated that Walker had six prior DUI convictions. Walker alleged that four of the prior convictions were constitutionally infirm because Walker had not been advised of the right to counsel, the right to compel attendance of witnesses, the right to a trial by a jury, and penalty enhancement provisions. The District Court concluded that the four convictions did not violate Walker's constitutional rights and held that the prior convictions could be used to enhance the 2005 DUI to a felony. Walker appealed, and the Supreme Court considered each assertion in turn to determine whether Walker's waiver of the right to counsel and right to trial during the prior prosecutions was made knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily. The initial appearance arraignment documents that Walker signed after being charged with the prior DUI offenses adequately informed Walker of the right to counsel, and Walker indicated an understanding of that right and that an attorney was not desired. A waiver of rights form and a waiver of counsel form that Walker signed evidenced that understanding. It was also sufficient that Walker was informed of the right to call witnesses to attend the proceedings, even though the Constitution does not confer a right to compel witnesses to testify. Walker was also adequately informed of the right to a trial by jury and to a unanimous verdict, but it was unnecessary for the District Court to explain all the nuances or effects of waiving the right to a trial by jury. Lastly, the documents informed Walker that there might be indirect consequences of a guilty plea, including the possible loss of driving privileges and the use of the conviction in the event Walker was convicted of a crime in the future, but the District Court was not required to specifically inform Walker of the indirect consequence that a fourth or subsequent DUI might result in a felony charge, because whether Walker committed a fourth or subsequent DUI was clearly within Walker's sole control and was an indirect consequence of guilty pleas to the prior DUI offenses. Thus, Walker's prior guilty pleas were entered knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily, and the District Court did not err in allowing the use of the prior convictions to elevate Walker's 2005 DUI to a felony. St. v. Walker, 2008 MT 244, 344 M 477, 188 P3d 1069 (2008).

No Prejudice or Ineffective Assistance in Failure of Counsel to Procure Witness: At Diaz's trial for attempted deliberate homicide and robbery, the defense counsel was unable to procure the testimony of a witness who had allegedly confessed to the crimes, and Diaz asserted that this failure amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court disagreed. Despite the absence of the witness, Diaz still succeeded in addressing the alleged confession through the testimony of the state's lead investigator, who referenced the confession during cross-examination. The jury was thus apprised of the testimony, and the defense counsel was able to argue in closing that the confession exonerated Diaz. Because Diaz was not prejudiced when the witness did not appear, the ineffective assistance claim failed. St. v. Diaz, 2006 MT 303, 334 M 479, 148 P3d 628 (2006).

Exclusion of Testimony by Newspaper Editor and Reporter — Harmless Error: Defendant subpoenaed a newspaper editor and a reporter who had interviewed defendant's assault victim, but the District Court quashed the subpoenas pursuant to the Media Confidentiality Act, Title 26, ch. 1, part 9. Defendant contended that the District Court's action deprived him of the right to compel the attendance of witnesses and that his constitutional right should prevail over the media shield statutes. However, the state met its burden of showing that defendant was not prejudiced by the trial error because defendant was able to introduce the same evidence during cross-examination of the victim and made no additional offer of proof demonstrating the additional evidence that defendant sought to introduce through the editor and reporter. The media testimony would have added little or nothing to the report in the newspaper and other evidence introduced at trial. Absent a reasonable possibility that excluding the testimony contributed to defendant's conviction, quashing of the subpoenas was affirmed. St. v. Slavin, 2004 MT 76, 320 M 425, 87 P3d 495 (2004), followed in St. v. Kolb, 2009 MT 9, 349 M 10, 200 P3d 504 (2009).

Motion to Disclose Identity of Confidential Informer Denied — Overriding State Interest: The state may claim the privilege to refuse to disclose the identity of a confidential informant, subject to the balancing test in Roviaro v. U.S., 353 US 53 (1957). Under Roviaro, a defendant must show the need for disclosure and the need must be one that overrides the government's interest in preserving confidentiality. Here, Ayers did not meet the burden. The confidential information was based on third-hand knowledge, and the informant: (1) was neither present at the crime scene nor witness to any criminal activity, negating any hearsay exception; (2) had no continuous, active, or primary role in the alleged crime, negating the need for disclosure because of a possible entrapment defense; and (3) was not a material witness. Ayers was given the investigative report that summarized all relevant information provided by the informant. The report included the identity of all of the informant's sources, whom Ayers had the opportunity to call as witnesses. Denying disclosure of the informant's identity had little if any impact on Ayers' ability to prepare a defense, and denial of the disclosure motion was not error. St. v. Ayers, 2003 MT 114, 315 M 395, 68 P3d 768 (2003).

Denial of Writ of Habeas Corpus to Compel Attendance of Children in Abuse and Neglect Hearing Not Violative of Due Process Rights or Right to Confront Witnesses: The mother petitioned the District Court for a writ of habeas corpus demanding that her children be physically present for an abuse and neglect hearing because they were material witnesses and claiming that the writ was necessary to ensure her due process rights by having the children available to rebut allegations against her at the hearing. The petition was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although the mother was entitled to an opportunity for a meaningful hearing, that opportunity need not be provided at the expense of the children whose best interests were the paramount focus of the proceeding, and subjecting the children to direct and cross-examination could exacerbate the abuse that they had already experienced. Denial of the petition did not violate the mother's right to confront witnesses because the children were not her accusers and she had no right to confront them. Rather, the abuse and neglect case was brought by the state, and the mother had ample opportunity to confront and examine the state's witnesses and experts at the hearing, so her due process rights were met. In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

Mere Loss of Potential Witness Not Sufficiently Prejudicial to Implicate Due Process Rights: The mere loss of a potential witness does not constitute actual and substantial prejudice sufficient to implicate a defendant's due process rights, and defendant's bare speculation that a lost witness's testimony would have been exculpatory is insufficient to prove actual prejudice. However, in the present case, the testimony of two doctors who would have provided a key discussion on the mechanics of a workers' compensation incident, in the context of defendant Taylor's overall history and symptoms, but for their deaths during a lengthy preindictment period, was critically important to Taylor's defense. Without the doctors' testimony, Taylor was actually and substantially prejudiced in his ability to defend himself, warranting dismissal of the information. St. v. Taylor, 1998 MT 121, 289 M 63, 960 P2d 773, 55 St. Rep. 481 (1998).

Lack of Notice of Changed Testimony — Continuance Proper: It was not revealed to defendant until trial that the initial story of an alleged sexual assault victim had changed. Prior to the victim's in-court testimony, defendant was unaware that the victim had made more than one statement to the investigating officer. Nevertheless, on the grounds that the court's calendar was full and defendant should have subpoenaed the witnesses before trial, the trial court denied defendant's motion for continuance until other witnesses could be subpoenaed to test the victim's credibility. The Supreme Court noted that the credibility of a witness is of utmost importance between a sexual abuse victim and a denying defendant, often constituting the only defense available, and that a change in testimony goes to the credibility of the victim. A reasonable continuance would have satisfied defendant's constitutional rights with regard to compulsory process, due process, and fair trial, and denial of the motion was an abuse of discretion warranting reversal and a new trial. St. v. Timblin, 254 M 48, 834 P2d 927, 49 St. Rep. 617 (1992).

Compulsory Process — Non-American Witness: A defendant's right to compulsory process is not violated by the absence of a witness when an American court lacks the power to compel the attendance of a witness who is not a citizen of the United States. St. v. Twoteeth, 219 M 101, 711 P2d 789, 42 St. Rep. 1873 (1985).

Disclosure of Informant's Identity and Whereabouts — Balancing Test Required: Defendant was charged with sale of dangerous drugs (now criminal distribution of dangerous drugs). Defendant contended that he had been entrapped because a paid informant had used persistent and harassing techniques to get him to obtain drugs for him over a period of a month and a half. The informant left town after defendant's arrest. Defendant did not know the whereabouts or true identity of the informant. The District Court refused defendant's request to require the State to disclose the identity and whereabouts of the informant. On appeal, the Supreme Court relied on the balancing test set forth in Offerdahl v. District Court, 156 M 432, 481 P2d 338 (1971), to determine whether the defendant's interest in preparing his defense outweighed the government's interest in protecting the flow of information from the informant. The court found that the informant's identity should have been disclosed because his testimony was relevant to the issue of entrapment and because, based on the facts in this case, the balance weighed heavily in defendant's favor. St. v. Chapman, 209 M 57, 679 P2d 1210, 41 St. Rep. 550 (1984).

Basis for Subpoenas: The quashing of defendant's subpoenas did not violate defendant's right to compulsory process where the defendant failed to establish a foundation and basis for the subpoenas. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Evidence Properly Excluded for Lack of Foundation: Defendant charged with larceny by bailee was not denied the right to compulsory process even though the trial court excluded his offered testimony that money he retained out of his client's workers' compensation settlement was an offset for a fee the client owed him for other services. Defendant attempted to introduce this evidence through the testimony of a former Deputy County Attorney when it could only have been established by the testimony of the client or the defendant. In the absence of proper foundation testimony, the evidence was properly excluded. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Irrelevant Testimony: Defendant was not denied his right to compulsory process because of the exclusion of certain testimony when the testimony excluded was not relevant. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Requiring Demonstration of Materiality to Subpoena Out-of-State Witnesses: Requiring a showing of materiality before subpoenaing out-of-state witness, which requirement was the result of the submission by the defense of 40 out-of-state witnesses from such places as Alaska, Nevada, Illinois, and West Germany 2 weeks before trial, did not violate defendant's right to compulsory process. The purpose of the inquiry was to determine whether these were legitimate witnesses, and the defendant made no showing of prejudice with respect to his inability to obtain any of these witnesses. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

SPEEDY TRIAL

Fifteen-Year Preaccusation Delay: A defendant moved for dismissal of the case on the grounds that 15 years had elapsed between the crime and his accusation. The District Court ruled against dismissal. The Supreme Court reviewed de novo and explained that the right to a speedy trial applies after a defendant has been indicted, arrested, or otherwise accused of a crime, that the due process clause plays a limited role in guarding against oppressive preaccusation delay, and that a defendant moving to dismiss for unconstitutional preaccusation delay has a heavy burden of showing the delay actually, substantially prejudiced him. The Supreme Court found that the defendant had not met his burden, affirming the District Court's decision to deny the motion to dismiss. St. v. Laird, 2019 MT 198, 397 Mont. 29, 447 P.3d 416.

Pretrial Delay of 422 Days — Speedy Trial Violation: The defendant was arrested and charged with felony DUI. He was unable to post bond. About a year later, the defendant filed a motion to dismiss for a violation of his right to a speedy trial. The District Court denied the motion and the defendant pleaded guilty 4 days later, 422 days after his arrest. He was sentenced to the maximum 13-month commitment and released immediately because he had already been incarcerated for 26 days longer than the maximum sentence. On appeal, the Supreme Court analyzed the facts under the factors in St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 Mont. 442, 167 P.3d 815. Under the first factor, the Supreme Court found that the 422-day delay substantially increased the state's burden under factors two and four. Under factor two, the Supreme Court found no evidence that the state acted deliberately or in bad faith to delay the proceedings, but that the general lack of diligence resulted in factor two weighing slightly in favor of the defendant. Reversing the District Court, the Supreme Court found that factor three weighed in favor of the defendant, noting that a defendant's continued participation in plea negotiations cannot be equated with an attempt to avoid trial. The Supreme Court found that factor four weighed in favor of the defendant because his interest in preventing oppressive pretrial incarceration and minimizing his anxiety and concern were prejudiced by the length and conditions of his incarceration. St. v. Kurtz, 2019 MT 127, 396 Mont. 80, 443 P.3d 479.

Delay of 811 Days Attributable Mostly to State — No Speedy Trial Violation Under Balancing Factors: The defendant was arrested and incarcerated for DUI and freed on bond the same day. A total of 811 days elapsed before the start of trial. Of that time, the state was responsible for 451 days and the defendant was responsible for 360 days. The defendant filed a speedy motion within 30 days of the trial date. The District Court found no violation given that (1) all delays allocated to the state were institutional delays, (2) testimony and other evidence indicated that the defendant did not wish to proceed to trial for fear of conviction, and (3) no prejudice or detriment to the defense was suffered given that there was no pretrial incarceration; the defendant did not establish that pretrial delay was detrimental to his employment; the levels of economic hardship, anxiety, and concern experienced by the defendant did not exceed normal levels ordinarily experienced by those charged with DUI; and there was no evidence of lost, destroyed, or unavailable evidence or other impairments to the defense resulting from the delay. St. v. Heath, 2018 MT 318, 394 Mont. 41, 432 P.3d 141.

Two-Hundred-Day Trigger — Wrongly Calculated from Defendant's Arraignment, Not Date of Filing Information — Error in Not Addressing Speedy Trial Claim: The defendant was charged with four counts of felony violation of a protective order. The defendant's trial occurred 260 days after the state had filed the first charge against him. The District Court refused to analyze the defendant's argument that the trial date exceeded the 200-day trigger. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the District Court had wrongly calculated the number of days from the date of the defendant's arraignment, rather than from the date the information was filed, and had therefore erred in failing to address the defendant's speedy trial claim. St. v. Huffine, 2018 MT 175, 392 Mont. 103, 422 P.3d 102.

Balancing Factors Applied — No Speedy Trial Violation — Witness Reading from Transcript Error Not Grounds for Reversal: The District Court did not err in balancing the four speedy trial factors as set out in St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 Mont. 442, 167 P.3d 815. The Supreme Court balanced the factors, finding no speedy trial violation. The defendant was charged and convicted for sexual intercourse without consent and burglary. Under Rule 801(d)(2), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), the District Court did not abuse its discretion to allow officers to read out loud from a transcript of the defendant's statements to refresh the witnesses' recollection. The Supreme Court did not conduct plain error review of the District Court's failure to instruct the jury on elements of theft, because the alleged error did not compromise the fairness of the trial or the judicial process. The District Court erred in imposing more than one surcharge under 3-1-317. St. v. Bullock, 2017 MT 182, 388 Mont. 194, 398 P.3d 881.

Time Attributable to Institutional Delays Not Speedy Trial Violation — Defendant Did Not Show Prejudice: The defendant was charged with several felonies related to an attempted robbery. The defendant subsequently substituted her attorneys on two separate occasions and requested to substitute her third attorney before withdrawing the request. The defendant's motion to dismiss the charges for lack of speedy trial was denied by the District Court. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that of the 375 days of delay, 14 were attributable to the defendant. However, the Supreme Court also held that the District Court correctly determined that the defendant acquiesced in the delays caused by her requests for different attorneys, that the defendant did not show any actual prejudice in her pretrial incarceration, that the vast amount of delay was due to institutional delay, and in the absence of an evidentiary foundation there was no basis for finding undue prejudice to the defendant or that her counsel was ineffective. St. v. Llamas, 2017 MT 155, 388 Mont. 53, 402 P.3d 611.

Defendant in Jail in Another State — Detainer Not Mandatory — Speedy Trial: The defendant took a joyride through a Montana campground with a pickup truck that did not belong to him, damaging both the truck and campground property. On August 12, 2012, Sheridan County officials issued a notice to appear in Justice Court. The defendant was subsequently extradited to jail in Minnesota for a probation violation in that state. The defendant was released from Minnesota prison, appeared in Montana, and received a trial date set for September 12, 2013. The defendant then moved to dismiss the charges, alleging that the state had violated his speedy trial right because the state did not file a detainer while he was incarcerated in Minnesota. The District Court denied the motion to dismiss. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the state was not required to file a detainer and that the delay in trial was attributable to the defendant. St. v. Brekke, 2017 MT 81, 387 Mont. 218, 392 P.3d 570.

Defendant More Responsible for Delay Than State — No Speedy Trial Violation: The defendant was arrested following a high-speed chase in Yellowstone County and released. Days later, the defendant was arrested on a warrant issued by Silver Bow County. The two cases proceeded simultaneously, and a total of 626 days passed between the first charges being filed against the defendant and the start of his Yellowstone County trial. The defendant filed a motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial, which the District Court denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court analyzed the speedy trial factors set out in St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 Mont. 442, 167 P.3d 815, and affirmed, noting that the defendant had twice waived his right to a speedy trial and had taken other actions that indicated he did not actually want a speedy trial. St. v. Stewart, 2017 MT 32, 386 Mont. 315, 389 P.3d 1009.

Failure to Appear — Delay Attributed to Defendant — No Speedy Trial Violation: The defendant was charged with motor vehicle offenses in 2009. Although he received at least two notices to appear, he did not appear, and an arrest warrant was issued for him. The defendant was ultimately arrested in 2012. Prior to trial, he filed an unsuccessful motion to dismiss the 2009 charges for lack of a speedy trial. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the 1,288-day delay between being charged and the trial was attributable to the defendant and that he had not suffered substantial prejudice. St. v. Eystad, 2017 MT 29, 386 Mont. 291, 389 P.3d 1014.

Significant Delay in Turning Self in After Security Fraud Charges Filed — No Speedy Trial Violation: The defendant was charged with securities fraud and eventually turned himself over to authorities 134 days after the charges were filed. In all, a total of 650 days passed between the state filing an information until the defendant's trial. The defendant filed a motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial, which the District Court denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the Ariegwe factors did not weigh in favor of granting the motion and that the 134 days of avoiding the authorities seeking his arrest weighed heavily against him. St. v. Reynolds, 2017 MT 25, 386 Mont. 267, 389 P.3d 243.

Right to Speedy Trial Violated by 279-Day Incarceration on Drug Charges — Accused Deprived Access to Rehabilitation Programs: The defendant was denied his right to a speedy trial by a 279-day incarceration between his arrest and his guilty plea to drug possession when the state failed to timely submit lab analysis evidence for 102 days following the defendant's arrest. While the failure was not deliberate bad faith, it weighed very heavily against the state. The nature of the charges were simple, and the defendant was prejudiced by his inability to participate in drug rehabilitation programs and community placement due to his unduly lengthy incarceration, in conjunction with his obvious need for treatment. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed the District Court's denial of the defendant's motion to dismiss the charges and remanded the case for dismissal. St. v. Mayes, 2016 MT 305, 385 Mont. 411, 384 P.3d 102.

Trial Held Ten Months After Arrest — Delay Attributed to Back Log at Crime Lab — Right to Speedy Trial Violated — Conviction Reversed and Charges Dismissed: The defendant was arrested and charged with possession of drugs and drug paraphernalia. The defendant was jailed for approximately 10 months before his trial because of a backlog in testing at the state crime lab. The defendant was ultimately convicted even though he claimed he had been denied a speedy trial. On appeal, the defendant claimed that the four factors outlined in Zimmerman weighed in his favor. Although the prosecution alleged that it had no control over when the crime lab would test the results, the Supreme Court concluded that the state was not diligent in its prosecution because it did not attempt to locate another testing lab. Given the length of the delay, the reasons for the delay, the defendant's diligence in asserting his right to a speedy trial, and the prejudice suffered by the defendant for waiting in jail nearly a year before his trial on a nonviolent offense, the court found that the defendant's right to a speedy trial had been denied. Accordingly, it reversed his conviction and ordered the charges be dismissed. St. v. Velasquez, 2016 MT 216, 384 Mont. 447, 377 P.3d 1235.

Dismissal of Escape Charges and Refiling Seven Months Later in Different Venue — No Speedy Trial Violation: After the defendant failed to return to his prerelease center, he was charged with escape in Powell County the following day. The defendant objected to venue in Powell County. The state agreed that venue was also proper in Yellowstone County and dismissed the charges. After almost 7 months, and with the defendant being incarcerated the entire time, the state filed the escape charge in Yellowstone County. The defendant filed a motion to dismiss the charges for lack of a speedy trial, which the District Court denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the speedy trial clock began running when charges first were filed in Powell County, ran until that charge was dismissed, and started again when the state filed charges in Yellowstone County, but that the delay did not establish a constitutional speedy trial violation. St. v. Butterfly, 2016 MT 195, 384 Mont. 287, 377 P.3d 191.

Sentencing Not Included in Right to Speedy Trial — Sentencing Delay Possible Violation of Due Process if Purposeful or Oppressive: Fourteen months elapsed between the defendant's pleading guilty and being sentenced. Prior to sentencing, the defendant filed a motion to dismiss, claiming that the delay in sentencing violated his right to due process, which the District Court denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The court concluded that the constitutional right to a speedy trial does not extend from conviction to sentencing and that a sentencing delay that is either sufficiently purposeful or oppressive may constitute a due process violation but that neither factor was substantial or demonstrable in this case. St. v. Betterman, 2015 MT 39, 378 Mont. 182, 342 P.3d 971. The United States Supreme Court affirmed Betterman, holding that the guarantee to a speedy trial does not apply after a defendant has been found guilty at trial or has pleaded guilty to criminal charges. Betterman v. Montana, 578 US __, 194 L Ed 723, 136 S Ct 1609 (2016). See also St. v. Maloney, 2015 MT 227, 380 Mont. 244, 354 P.3d 611.

Speedy Trial Applies to Delay Before Disposition of Case — Due Process Applies to Delay Between Disposition and Sentencing: The right to a speedy trial applies from arrest to the date the case is disposed of by either the date of the beginning of a trial or a plea. The right to a speedy trial does not apply to sentencing; rather, due process protects a defendant from unreasonable delay in sentencing. St. v. Maloney, 2015 MT 227, 380 Mont. 244, 354 P.3d 611, following St. v. Betterman, 2015 MT 39, 378 Mont. 182, 342 P.3d 971. The United States Supreme Court affirmed Betterman, holding that the guarantee to a speedy trial does not apply after a defendant has been found guilty at trial or has pleaded guilty to criminal charges. Betterman v. Montana, 578 US __, 194 L Ed 723, 136 S Ct 1609 (2016).

No Waiver of Speedy Trial Until Court Accepts Guilty Plea — Consideration of Speedy Trial Argument Warranted: The defendant was initially charged with a DUI in Municipal Court. Later, an additional charge was added and the case was transferred to District Court. The defendant moved to vacate the trial date and set a change-of-plea hearing in District Court. However, before the plea hearing was held, the state dismissed the additional charge and the case was transferred back to the Municipal Court, which again arraigned the defendant and set a trial date. The defendant filed a motion to dismiss based on the lack of a speedy trial. The Municipal Court denied the motion to dismiss, citing that the defendant had filed a motion to vacate the trial date with the District Court. After conviction, the District Court affirmed denial of the motion to dismiss. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, holding that a defendant does not waive the right to a speedy trial until the defendant pleads guilty and the court accepts the guilty plea. The Supreme Court, further noting that 375 days had passed between the defendant's arrest and his plea, remanded the matter for the Municipal Court to consider the defendant's constitutional speedy trial claim. Helena v. Heppner, 2015 MT 15, 378 Mont. 68, 341 P.3d 640.

Speedy Trial Violated by 289-Day Delay in Motor Vehicle Trial — State's Obligation: Following his arrest for felony driving under the influence and misdemeanor traffic offenses, the defendant was incarcerated for 3 days and submitted to alcohol monitoring that cost $56 a week. The defendant made an initial appearance and a preliminary hearing was scheduled. This hearing was later vacated at the request of the defendant's counsel, but it was never rescheduled. The state did not take action until 178 days later, and the District Court scheduled a trial date that amounted to a 289-day delay. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the defendant was under no obligation to ensure diligent prosecution of his case and that, considering all of the factors, the delay amounted to a violation of his speedy trial rights. St. v. Zimmerman, 2014 MT 173, 375 Mont. 374, 328 P.3d 1132.

Constitutional Right to Speedy Trial Distinct From Right to Speedy Trial Under Interstate Agreement on Detainers Act: The defendant moved to dismiss an information filed against him arguing a denial of his right to a speedy trial under the sixth amendment to the U.S. Constitution and Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const. The District Court denied the motion based on the Interstate Agreement on Detainers Act (IAD) without considering the constitutional arguments. The Supreme Court held that the constitutional right to a speedy trial is distinct from the right to a speedy trial under the IAD and remanded for consideration of defendant's constitutional speedy trial rights. State v. Nickerson, 2014 MT 83, 374 Mont. 354, 322 P.3d 421.

Rescheduling of Trial Due to Defendant's Absence From Pretrial Conference — Good Cause for Delay — No Speedy Trial Violation: The defendant, charged with DUI, failed to appear in person for his pretrial conference even though two previous court documents notified him that his presence was required. Accordingly, the Justice's Court vacated the jury trial the defendant had requested and scheduled a bench trial. The bench trial, however, was scheduled 8 days after the 6-month deadline. On the day of the trial, the defendant moved to dismiss the charges because the trial was held beyond the deadline. The Justice's Court denied the motion and ruled that the defendant's failure to appear at his pretrial conference had caused the delay. After his conviction, the defendant appealed to the District Court, which affirmed the denial of the motion to dismiss. The defendant then appealed to the Supreme Court, which agreed that the defendant had been advised beforehand that his absence at the pretrial conference would vacate his jury trial, and therefore good cause existed for the delay in his trial date. St. v. Luke, 2014 MT 22, 373 Mont. 398, 321 P.3d 70.

Trial Delay of 662 Days — No Denial of Speedy Trial Given Balance of Circumstances: When much of the delay attributed to the state was institutional delay and the defendant failed to exhibit the timeliness, sincerity, and persistence indicative of an actual desire for speedy trial, there was no error on the part of the District Court. St. v. Morsette, 2013 MT 270, 372 Mont. 38, 309 P.3d 978.

Original Felony Charge Dismissed By Court and Refiled With Misdemeanor Charge in Justice's Court: The District Court dismissed a felony partner or family member assault (PFMA) charge against the defendant. Based on the same underlying incident, the state filed a new misdemeanor PFMA charge against the defendant in Justice's Court. Because the new filing marked the beginning of a new criminal proceeding, the 6 months allowed for a speedy trial commenced at the time of the new filing. St. v. Case, 2013 MT 192, 371 Mont. 58, 305 P.3d 812, following St. v. Topp, 2003 MT 209, 317 Mont. 59, 75 P.3d 330.

Substantial Pretrial Delay Attributable to State — Lack of Prejudice to Defendant — No Speedy Trial Violation: Although the defendant suffered substantial pretrial delay that was largely attributable to the state under institutional delay, the District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion to dismiss for speedy trial violations because the defendant failed to demonstrate that the delay substantially prejudiced his ability to defend himself or aggravated his anxiety beyond the anxiety level expected of an individual accused of a crime. St. v. Steigelman, 2013 MT 153, 370 Mont. 352, 302 P.3d 396.

Balancing Factors Causing and Caused by Delay — No Speedy Trial Violation: There was a 519-day delay between the accusations against the defendant and the initial trial date. The state failed to make a highly persuasive showing of no prejudice, but the District Court correctly analyzed each period of delay and considered the speedy trial factors set out in St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 Mont. 442, 167 P.3d 815. The Supreme Court balanced the factors finding no speedy trial violation and, like the District Court, determined that the majority of the pretrial delay was the result of the defendant's actions and that this caused at least some of the prejudicial impact on the defendant. St. v. Houghton, 2010 MT 145, 357 Mont. 9, 234 P.3d 904. See also St. v. Maloney, 2015 MT 227, 380 Mont. 244, 354 P.3d 611.

Medical Reasons for Witness Unavailability — Motion for Continuance Properly Granted: Roan moved to dismiss a reckless driving charge based on speedy trial grounds because the city failed to bring the case within 6 months of arraignment. The city moved for a continuance based on the fact that one prosecution witness was unavailable for medical reasons. The City Court granted the motion, the trial was delayed, and Roan was found guilty. Roan sought a trial de novo in District Court and again raised the speedy trial issue. The District Court denied the motion, concluding that the medical unavailability of the witness established good cause to justify the delay, and Roan appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. The fact that one witness was going through a difficult pregnancy and the other was caring for her and their two small children while continuing to work constituted good cause for the delay, and under the totality of circumstances, Roan's dismissal motion was properly denied. Helena v. Roan, 2010 MT 29, 355 Mont. 172, 226 P.3d 601, distinguishing St. v. Ronningen, 213 Mont. 358, 691 P.2d 1348, and St. v. Bertolino, 2003 MT 266, 317 Mont. 453, 77 P.3d 543.

Pretrial Delay of 3,137 Days — No Speedy Trial Violation: Lacey was aware of rumors and allegations that he had engaged in inappropriate sexual behavior in Gallatin County in 1997. About 6 months after Lacey left Montana, Gallatin County began investigating, but he could not be located. Nevertheless, an information and warrant were issued in 1999, and Lacey was located and arrested in 2007, 3,137 days after charges were filed. Lacey moved for dismissal based on lack of a speedy trial, but the District Court denied the motion, so Lacey appealed. The Supreme Court applied the speedy trial factors set out in St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 Mont. 442, 167 P.3d 815, and affirmed. The length of delay was undisputed. Although the District Court failed to consider whether any of the delay should be attributed to the state as required by Ariegwe, the delay was nevertheless properly attributed to Lacey. The District Court also erred in addressing Lacey's acquiescence to and objections to pretrial delays, but the error was not grounds for reversal under the totality of the circumstances because Lacey's actions indicated that he did not want a speedy trial even though his dismissal motion was timely. Lastly, Lacey admitted that he could show no direct prejudice to his defense and focused on the other speedy trial factors, and absent a showing of direct prejudice, Lacey's speedy trial claim failed. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Lacey, 2010 MT 6, 355 Mont. 31, 224 P.3d 1247. See also St. v. Stops, 2013 MT 131, 370 Mont. 226, 301 P.3d 811.

Institutional Delays in Trial Not Chargeable Against Requesting State Absent Notice of Request for Speedy Trial: While in federal custody in Texas, Dodson filed a speedy trial request under the Interstate Agreement on Detainers Act (IAD) with officials in Texas after Montana filed a warrant for Dodson's arrest. However, Texas officials failed to forward the speedy trial request, so Dodson moved to dismiss the Montana charges based on Montana's failure to bring him to trial in Montana within 180 days of filing the charges. The dismissal motion was denied and Dodson was ultimately convicted on the Montana charges. Dodson appealed on grounds that the Montana charges should have been dismissed for lack of a speedy trial pursuant to the IAD. The Supreme Court disagreed. The speedy trial clock provisions are not triggered until the prosecutor and court receive the prisoner's request pursuant to the IAD. In cases where delay is occasioned by the custodial state's failure to forward the request, causing harm or detriment to the prisoner, the institutional delays against the custodial state should not be charged against the requesting state that had no notice of the delay or control over the institution causing the delay. St. v. Dodson, 2009 MT 419, 354 M 28, 221 P3d 687 (2009), following Fex v. Mich., 507 US 43 (1993). See also St. v. Seadin, 181 M 294, 593 P2d 451 (1979), and St. v. Wolfe, 250 M 400, 821 P2d 339 (1991).

Trial Delay of 432 Days Without Showing of Compelling Reason — Case Dismissed: Hardaway was arrested for criminal possession of dangerous drugs with intent to distribute. After more than 200 days without trial, Hardaway moved to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial. The majority of delay was attributed to the state as institutional delay, and because Hardaway was not prejudiced, dismissal was denied. Subsequently, after 432 days had elapsed without trial, Hardaway again moved to dismiss on speedy trial grounds. This time the District Court analyzed the delay pursuant to St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007), and concluded that the state failed to meet its burden to provide compelling justification for the delay, so Hardaway's motion to dismiss was granted. The state appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court weighed the length of delay, the state's failure to provide a compelling reason for the delay, Hardaway's two timely speedy trial complaints, and the presumption of prejudice and correctly concluded that Hardaway was deprived of a speedy trial, and on appeal the state failed to demonstrate that the District Court's conclusions were wrong. St. v. Hardaway, 2009 MT 249, 351 M 488, 213 P3d 776 (2009).

Trial Delay of 1,168 Days — No Denial of Speedy Trial Given Balance of Circumstances: Morrisey suffered a delay of 1,168 days between arrest and trial and asserted that the delay violated the right to a speedy trial, warranting dismissal. The District Court denied Morrisey's dismissal motion and Morrisey appealed. The Supreme Court applied the balancing test provided in St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007), and found that on one hand the pretrial delay was substantial and that Morrisey wanted to proceed to trial as expeditiously as possible, but on the other hand Morrisey requested or waived much of the delay in order to properly prepare a defense, and that there was no evidence of negligence or bad faith delaying tactics on the part of the prosecution. Given these circumstances and the lack of significant prejudice caused by the delay, the court concluded that Morrisey was not denied the right to a speedy trial. St. v. Morrisey, 2009 MT 201, 351 M 144, 214 P3d 708 (2009).

No Grounds Asserted for Speedy Trial Argument — Motion Properly Dismissed: Cybulski filed a pretrial motion to dismiss a DUI case for lack of a speedy trial, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Cybulski's motion consisted of one paragraph and no brief in support of the motion. The statutory requirements for filing pretrial motions are that a motion must state with particularity the grounds for the motion and the order or relief sought. Cybulski's motion consisted of only an assertion that because more than 1 year had elapsed, a speedy trial analysis was required. Without more, the requirements for pretrial motions were not met and the motion was properly dismissed. St. v. Cybulski, 2009 MT 70, 349 M 429, 204 P3d 7 (2009). See also St. v. Yecovenko, 2004 MT 196, 322 M 247, 95 P3d 145 (2004).

Delay of 507 Days From Accusation to Trial — Greater Delay Caused by Defendant — No Speedy Trial Violation: Following a 507-day delay between accusation and trial, Rose contended that his right to a speedy trial was violated. Applying the speedy trial analysis set out in St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007), the Supreme Court examined the well-developed record and found no violation. Of the 507 days, 199 days were attributable to the state, but all of that delay was institutional delay, and it was Rose that caused the greater portion of the delay while the state was concerned with protecting Rose's right to a speedy trial, so the length of delay did not in itself violate the speedy trial right. Although Rose suffered some discomfort while in jail, that discomfort was not oppressive, nor was Rose's ability to defend himself impaired by the delay between arrest and trial. Pursuant to the Ariegwe criteria, the District Court did not abuse its discretion by dismissing Rose's speedy trial argument. St. v. Rose, 2009 MT 4, 348 M 291, 202 P3d 749 (2009). See also St. v. Burns, 2011 MT 167, 361 Mont. 191, 256 P.3d 944, and St. v. MacGregor, 2013 MT 297, 372 Mont. 142, 311 P.3d 428.

Applicability of Speedy Trial Statute to Potential Misdemeanor Partner or Family Member Assault Charge: Martz was convicted of partner or family member assault in 2002. In January 2006, Martz was charged with misdemeanor second offense and felony third offense partner or family member assault, and in May 2006 Martz was charged with felony fourth offense partner or family member assault. The second and third offense charges were dismissed in August 2006 and were subsequently refiled in September 2006. The refiling had the effect of Martz being tried for the felony fourth offense before trial for the misdemeanor second and felony third offenses. Martz contended that the order in which the charges came to trial meant that the fourth offense charge was in fact the second offense tried and that because second offense partner or family member assault is a misdemeanor, the speedy trial provisions of 46-13-401 should apply. The state argued that because Martz was charged with felony partner or family member assault, the speedy trial statute did not apply. The District Court held that if Martz was convicted on the fourth charge but not on the second and third charges, the fourth offense would be treated as a misdemeanor for sentencing purposes, and denied the speedy trial motion. Martz was subsequently convicted on the fourth charge and, the following day, on the second charge. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that although Martz was first found guilty of the fourth offense, he was not convicted of that charge and sentenced until March of the following year, after sentence for the second offense was imposed, which made the charged fourth offense a felony conviction, so the speedy trial provisions did not apply. However, the state's argument that the speedy trial provisions could never apply was clarified by the Supreme Court. The speedy trial statute could have applied because the fourth offense had the potential of being reduced to a misdemeanor depending on the outcome of the trial on the second and third offenses. Because that contingency did not occur, dismissal of the speedy trial motion was affirmed. St. v. Martz, 2008 MT 382, 347 M 47, 196 P3d 1239 (2008).

Length of Speedy Trial Interval When Dismissal Granted: The date that a court grants a speedy trial dismissal motion becomes the date of the case's disposition and the end date of the speedy trial interval for purposes of appeal. St. v. Billman, 2008 MT 326, 346 M 118, 194 P3d 58 (2008).

Prejudice From 278-Day Delay Warranting Speedy Trial Dismissal: Billman was incarcerated 278 days awaiting trial for felony DUI and misdemeanor driving charges. His motion for dismissal on speedy trial grounds was granted and the state appealed. The Supreme Court applied the Ariegwe speedy trial analysis and affirmed on the following grounds: (1) the entire 278-day delay was attributable to the state; (2) Billman never waived the right to a speedy trial and sincerely wanted a speedy trial; (3) lengthy incarceration coupled with relatively simple charges against Billman established prejudice from the pretrial delay; (4) pretrial incarceration unduly prolonged the disruption to Billman's life and aggravated Billman's anxiety and concern; (5) Billman's memory faded during incarceration, impeding his ability to accurately recall past events and to prepare a defense. Because all the speedy trial factors weighed in Billman's favor and the state failed to persuasively show that the pretrial delay did not prejudice Billman, the District Court's conclusion that Billman was denied a speedy trial was correct. St. v. Billman, 2008 MT 326, 346 M 118, 194 P3d 58 (2008).

Speedy Trial Decision Remanded for Ariegwe Analysis: The District Court held that a delay of 894 days, without the state disproving prejudice, violated Madplume's right to a speedy trial. The state appealed, but before Madplume responded to the state's opening appeal brief and the state replied, the Supreme Court announced a new speedy trial analysis in St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007). In Madplume's case, the parties had applied the test in Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), which was partially overruled in Ariegwe. In order to allow the District Court to apply the new Ariegwe test, the case was remanded without prejudice for further speedy trial analysis. St. v. Madplume, 2008 MT 37, 341 M 321, 176 P3d 1071 (2008).

Revised Speedy Trial Balancing Test: Although acknowledging the general approach for analyzing speedy trial claims articulated in Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514 (1972), and the subsequent clarification of the Barker framework in Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), the Supreme Court noted that Bruce does not actually involve a balancing test, but rather that the first three factors, i.e., length of delay, reason for the delay, and defendant's timely assertion of the right to a speedy trial, act to channel the focus of the analysis to the issue of the fourth factor of prejudice, rendering the second and third factors relatively inconsequential. Because an actual balancing test of the four factors is more likely to produce an accurate assessment of a speedy trial claim, the court revisited the process and revised the analytical framework. None of the factors deserves greater consideration in the balancing. Rather, each factor's significance varies from case to case, and because of the case-specific nature of speedy trial claims, a given factor may outweigh all the others in one case but be of little consequence in another. St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007), followed in St. v. Howard, 2008 MT 173, 343 M 378, 184 P3d 344 (2008), St. v. Sartain, 2010 MT 213, 357 Mont. 483, 241 P.3d 1032, St. v. Burns, 2011 MT 167, 361 Mont. 191, 256 P.3d 944, St. v. Stops, 2013 MT 131, 370 Mont. 226, 301 P.3d 811, St. v. Mayes, 2016 MT 305, 385 Mont. 411, 384 P.3d 102, St. v. Snider, 2018 MT 258, 393 Mont. 166, 429 P.3d 268, and St. v. Kurtz, 2019 MT 127, 396 Mont. 80, 443 P.3d 479. See also St. v. MacGregor, 2013 MT 297, 372 Mont. 142, 311 P.3d 428.

Revised Speedy Trial Balancing Test — Factor One: Factor one of a speedy trial analysis is the length of the delay, which requires two inquiries, and until there is some delay that is presumptively prejudicial, there is no necessity for inquiry into the other three factors. The first inquiry, a threshold matter, is whether the interval between accusation and trial is sufficient to trigger a speedy trial analysis, which is measured without regard to the fault for the delay and is necessarily dependent on the particular circumstances of the case. A speedy trial claim lacks merit if the interval is less than 200 days, and the interval runs not to the date on which the accused's motion is considered by the court, but rather to the scheduled trial date or the date on which a guilty plea is entered, whichever date represents the date of the disposition of the case. If the interval is 200 days or more, the second inquiry is the extent to which the delay stretches beyond the trigger date. In Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), the court adopted a bright-line 275-day rule of presumptive prejudice beyond which the state was required to provide evidence that the delay was not prejudicial, and if shown, the accused was then required to show evidence of prejudice. However, the Supreme Court decided not to retain the Bruce 275-day rule and instead concluded that the presumption of prejudice exists as of the 200-day trigger date, at which point prejudice is minimal, and escalates over time. Both parties should come forward with evidence regarding prejudice or the lack thereof, and the trial court must weigh each party's evidence. The state's burden to justify the delay increases with the length of the delay. St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007), following Doggett v. U.S., 505 US 647 (1992), and followed in St. v. Sartain, 2010 MT 213, 357 Mont. 483, 241 P.3d 1032, St. v. Mayes, 2016 MT 305, 385 Mont. 411, 384 P.3d 102, and St. v. Snider, 2018 MT 258, 393 Mont. 166, 429 P.3d 268.

Revised Speedy Trial Balancing Test — Factor Two: Under the second factor of the speedy trial test, the court first identifies each period of delay in bringing the accused to trial, without considering any actions by the accused or the state that did not result in a postponement of the trial date, and then attributes each period of delay to the appropriate party. The state bears the burden of explaining pretrial delays. Any delay not demonstrated to have been caused by the accused or affirmatively waived by the accused is attributed to the state by default. After identifying and attributing each period of delay in bringing the accused to trial, the court assigns weight to each period based on the specific cause and motive for the delay, depending on the party's culpability in causing it. Thus, the function of factor two in the overall balancing is no longer to conclusively establish a burden shift for the determination of prejudice, but rather the significance is in the specific cause and culpability for each delay. Because the primary burden to ensure that cases are brought to trial is on the courts and prosecutors, the further the delay stretches beyond the 200-day trigger date, the more compelling the state's justification for the delay must be. St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007), following McNeely v. Blanas, 336 F3d 822 (9th Cir. 2003), and followed in St. v. Sartain, 2010 MT 213, 357 Mont. 483, 241 P.3d 1032, St. v. Mayes, 2016 MT 305, 385 Mont. 411, 384 P.3d 102, and St. v. Snider, 2018 MT 258, 393 Mont. 166, 429 P.3d 268.

In St. v. Couture, 2010 MT 201, 357 Mont. 398, 240 P.3d 987, the court followed and clarified Ariegwe, holding that: (1) it is essential that a firm trial date be set at arraignment and maintained all the way to trial in order to identify the reasons for and attribute delay under the second factor; and (2) a motion for a continuance must disclose the basis for the requested continuance and demonstrate that a continuance is justified. When a continuance has already been granted for certain tasks, justification must be provided for why additional time is needed for the same tasks, and a District Court should deny a motion for a continuance that is not supported by good cause, which does not include defense counsel's heavy workload.

Revised Speedy Trial Balancing Test — Factor Three: The third factor in the speedy trial balancing test is the accused's assertion of the right to a speedy trial. In Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), the Supreme Court established a bright-line rule that no further analysis of this factor was necessary as long as the accused asserted the right to a speedy trial at any time prior to the commencement of trial. However, the court determined here that the overall accuracy of the balancing test is enhanced when the totality of the accused's responses to pretrial delays is considered, thus departing from the nonweighted Bruce approach and restating the factor as the accused's responses to the delay. Whether the accused actually wanted to be brought to trial promptly is an important consideration in ascertaining whether the right to a speedy trial has been violated. Useful indicators of whether and how the accused asserted the speedy trial right are the frequency and force of the accused's objections to pretrial delays and the reasons for any acquiescence by the accused in pretrial delays. Factor three will no longer be considered a procedural formality, but rather will serve as an indicator of whether the accused actually wanted a speedy trial, which in turn informs the inquiry into whether there has been a deprivation of the right. Therefore, under factor three, a trial court must evaluate an accused's responses to the delay, and the totality of the various responses to delays in trial should then be considered together with the other three balancing factors, including the timeliness and persistence of an accused's objections to pretrial delays in determining whether prejudice occurred. St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007), followed in St. v. Sartain, 2010 MT 213, 357 Mont. 483, 241 P.3d 1032, St. v. Mayes, 2016 MT 305, 385 Mont. 411, 384 P.3d 102, and St. v. Snider, 2018 MT 258, 393 Mont. 166, 429 P.3d 268.

Revised Speedy Trial Test — Factor Four: The fourth factor in a speedy trial analysis is prejudice to the accused, which should be assessed in light of the interests of defendants that the speedy trial right was designed to protect. In Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), the Supreme Court expressed those interests as: (1) to prevent oppressive pretrial incarceration; (2) to minimize anxiety and concern of the accused; and (3) to limit the possibility that the defense will be impaired by dimming memories and loss of exculpatory evidence. Here, the Supreme Court reaffirmed those considerations as pertinent when evaluating prejudicial delay to an accused and reaffirmed that prejudice may be established based on "any or all" of those considerations. In assessing whether pretrial incarceration is oppressive, the court must consider all circumstances of incarceration. The longer the pretrial incarceration, the more likely it is oppressive and prejudicial, but the complexity of the charged offense is also relevant, and the length of pretrial incarceration that is oppressive is less for a relatively simple offense than for a more complex charge. However, there is no bright-line date on which pretrial incarceration becomes oppressive because that determination varies from case to case based on the specific circumstances of the incarceration. Minimizing anxiety and concern is more subjective and difficult to demonstrate but is nevertheless an interest protected by the speedy trial right and is a pertinent consideration under factor four. The crucial question is whether the delay in bringing the accused to trial has unduly prolonged the disruption of the accused's life or aggravated the anxiety and concern inherent in being accused of a crime. Last, impairment of one's defense is the most difficult form of speedy trial prejudice to prove, so in the absence of affirmative proof that a delay has impaired the accused's ability to present an effective defense, impairment must be assessed based on other analytical factors, such as length of delay, the accused's responses to the delay, and the duration of pretrial incarceration. St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007), followed in St. v. Sartain, 2010 MT 213, 357 Mont. 483, 241 P.3d 1032, St. v. Mayes, 2016 MT 305, 385 Mont. 411, 384 P.3d 102, and St. v. Snider, 2018 MT 258, 393 Mont. 166, 429 P.3d 268.

Failure to Demonstrate Prejudice Aggravated by Trial Delay — Speedy Trial Claim Properly Denied: Doyle asserted that he was prejudiced by a trial delay, but failed to establish prejudice aggravated by the delay. Doyle complained of prejudicial pretrial incarceration, but the complaints were only about living conditions at the jail that bore no relationship to the delay. Doyle contended that his level of anxiety and concern was deepened by the jail's failure to provide medical care for his preexisting back injury, yet he testified that he was treated for his ailing back at least six times while in jail. Doyle asserted that his defense was prejudiced because his girlfriend was pressured by state family services to testify against Doyle in order to keep their children at home and because one witness died and two others were unavailable at trial. However, Doyle and his girlfriend were under supervision for months before Doyle's crime, and even if pressure occurred, Doyle could not show that it resulted from the trial delay. Last, the three unavailable witnesses were witnesses for the state and could not have aided Doyle's defense. Doyle's speedy trial claim was properly denied. St. v. Doyle, 2007 MT 125, 337 M 308, 160 P3d 516 (2007).

No Prejudice Shown by 338-Day Delay — Speedy Trial Motion Properly Denied: A 426-day delay triggered review of LaGree's speedy trial claim, even though only 338 days were properly attributed to the state. LaGree properly asserted the right to a speedy trial, and the burden was on the state to demonstrate that LaGree was not prejudiced by the delay. In this case, the state met its burden. LaGree did not demonstrate that his pretrial incarceration was extraordinarily prejudicial, that his anxiety was more than marginal, or that defense was prejudiced by the delay. The District Court's denial of LaGree's motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial was affirmed. St. v. LaGree, 2007 MT 65, 336 M 375, 154 P3d 615 (2007), following Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), and followed in St. v. Sartain, 2010 MT 213, 357 Mont. 483, 241 P.3d 1032.

No Prejudice From Institutional Delay — No Speedy Trial Violation: Spang contended that he did not receive a speedy trial because he was prejudiced by pretrial incarceration, anxiety, and impairment of the defense on a DUI charge. The Supreme Court examined the evidence related to the prejudice considerations in light of the Barker-Bruce tests and disagreed. Spang first asserted that his pretrial incarceration was prejudicial because it prevented employment as an interstate truck driver. However, Spang had been previously declared a habitual traffic offender and could not legally drive during the period of incarceration. Next, the record supported the trial court's finding that there was no evidence that the trial delay had exacerbated the inevitable anxiety and concern connected to the DUI charge. Last, the defense impairment argument failed because Spang's alleged witness problems and car problems were unrelated to the charge. The state successfully carried the burden of demonstrating that Spang was not prejudiced by institutional delay, and the trial court correctly concluded that Spang's right to a speedy trial was not violated. St. v. Spang, 2007 MT 54, 336 M 184, 153 P3d 646 (2007).

No Prejudice From Trial Delay — Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim Properly Dismissed: Adams contended that he received ineffective assistance of counsel because neither original counsel nor subsequent counsel filed to dismiss on grounds that Adams did not receive a speedy trial. The Supreme Court analyzed the four speedy trial factors in Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514 (1972), and concluded that because less than 275 days of the 372-day delay was attributable to the state, the burden was on Adams to demonstrate prejudice from the delay. The only prejudice claim that Adams raised was that he was unable to effectively assist in his defense because he was in jail. However, all the things that Adams claims that he would have done had he not been incarcerated were in fact done by his attorneys in preparation for trial, so Adams could not demonstrate how his inability to do those things impaired his ability to defend himself. Absent a showing of prejudice, the speedy trial claim failed, as did the claim of ineffective assistance for failure to file a speedy trial claim that did not exist. Adams v. St., 2007 MT 35, 336 M 63, 153 P3d 601 (2007).

Absence of Record Prevents Review of Defendant's Claim of Lack of Speedy Trial Under Plain Error Doctrine: The state charged Lewis with certain drug-related crimes on May 19, 2004, and on October 12, 2004, informed the trial court that it intended to charge Lewis with an additional offense, whereupon the trial court vacated the trial date. The state did not amend the charges until March 10, 2005, and Lewis was convicted after a 3-day trial in June of 2005. Lewis did not assert the right to a speedy trial until appeal. The Supreme Court agreed that the right to a speedy trial is not necessarily waived by failure to assert the right at trial and that the Supreme Court could review the issue under the plain error doctrine. However, the Supreme Court held that the review must be based upon the facts of the case, and in the present instance, no record existed upon which to review the matter. St. v. Lewis, 2007 MT 16, 335 M 331, 151 P3d 883 (2007).

Silent Trial Court Record Fails to Rebut Presumption of Effective Assistance of Counsel Regarding Defendant's Right to Speedy Trial: The defendant, Lewis, argued that the 13-month delay in being brought to trial had to be interpreted as ineffective assistance of counsel in that her attorney failed to object to the delay. The Supreme Court stated that the trial court record was silent as to any tactical consideration that Lewis's counsel may have had in not objecting to the delay and because the record was silent, it could not be used to rebut the strong presumption of effective assistance of counsel. St. v. Lewis, 2007 MT 16, 335 M 331, 151 P3d 883 (2007).

Defendant Unable to Show Prejudice by 408-Day Trial Delay — Speedy Trial Claim Denied: The time between Harlson's arrest and the beginning of trial was 408 days, 306 of which were attributable to Harlson, so the burden was on Harlson to show that the delay was prejudicial. The District Court's holding that Harlson's claim that a total of 83 days of pretrial incarceration and anxiety and concern did not rise to the level of prejudice was reviewed for correctness by the Supreme Court and affirmed. St. v. Harlson, 2006 MT 312, 335 M 25, 150 P3d 349 (2006).

Trial Delay Properly Charged to Defendant Because of Contact With Witness: Diaz asserted that the trial court improperly charged 91 days of trial delay to the defense and placed the burden on Diaz to show that the delay was prejudicial. However, the state's inability to locate a witness was attributable to Diaz's communication with the witness and Diaz's attempt to solicit the witness to prevent the witness from testifying. The Supreme Court cited St. v. Tilly, 227 M 138, 737 P2d 484 (1987), in holding that speedy trial delay will not be charged to the state when a material witness with a valid reason is not available because of a defendant's unlawful acts, so the delay was properly charged to Diaz. Because only 249 days of the delay were chargeable to the state, Diaz had the burden of showing prejudice. Diaz's general assertions of anxiety, concern, inability to seek employment, and witnesses' fading memories were insufficient to rise to the level of prejudice, and the speedy trial claim was rejected. St. v. Diaz, 2006 MT 303, 334 M 479, 148 P3d 628 (2006).

Right to Speedy Trial Applicable Through Sentencing — No Speedy Trial Violation Absent Showing of Prejudice: Mooney asserted that he was denied the right to a speedy trial on a DUI charge. Mooney contended that the time applicable to a determination of a speedy trial should include the time from filing an appeal until sentencing. The Supreme Court agreed that because sentencing is part of the trial, the period between trial and sentencing applies to speedy trial calculations when the speedy trial right is asserted prior to sentencing. However, the Supreme Court then applied the revised Barker test set out in Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), to determine whether Mooney was prejudiced by the delay. Mooney was not incarcerated between trial and sentencing, nor was there any indication that the delay impaired Mooney's defense or that he experienced inordinate anxiety because of the delay. Failing to satisfy the prejudice prong of the Barker test, Mooney's speedy trial claim failed. St. v. Mooney, 2006 MT 121, 332 M 249, 137 P3d 532 (2006), overruled in St. v. Betterman, 2015 MT 39, 378 Mont. 182, 342 P.3d 971.

No Impairment of Defense Following Pretrial Delay of 802 Days: Bowser contended that his defense to drug charges was impaired after a pretrial delay of 802 days and moved to dismiss. The District Court denied the motion, and Bowser appealed. In this case, the state preserved all physical evidence, all of Bowser's witnesses were available to testify at trial, and the state memorialized its evidence through written reports, videotape, and photographs. Bowser offered no evidence and cited no instances in which the pretrial delay impaired his defense, other than a general allegation that witness memory is impaired and a claim of increasing paranoia. The Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Bowser, 2005 MT 279, 329 M 218, 123 P3d 230 (2005).

Trial Delay of 273 Days Attributable to State — Speedy Trial Claim Dismissed Absent Showing of Prejudice by Defendant: Blair was arrested on September 10, 2002, and his trial was eventually held August 18 and 19, 2003. Following conviction, Blair argued that more than 275 days of delay between arrest and trial were attributable to the state, requiring the state to prove that Blair was not prejudiced by the delay, and that the state's failure to carry that burden of proof violated Blair's right to a speedy trial. The Supreme Court applied the test in Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514 (1972), to analyze the speedy trial claim. The second Barker factor is the reason for the delay, which attributes delay to either the state or the defendant on a case-by-case basis and determines which party carries the burden to prove prejudice. In this case, the state was responsible for 273 days of delay. The bright line rule established in Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), is 275 days, and although the difference was nominal, the burden to show prejudice nevertheless rested with Blair. Blair was unable to prove that he was prejudiced by the pretrial incarceration, that his anxiety and concern were prejudicial, or that the delay impaired his defense, so his speedy trial claim failed. St. v. Blair, 2004 MT 356, 324 M 444, 103 P3d 538 (2004), followed in St. v. Bowser, 2005 MT 279, 329 M 218, 123 P3d 230 (2005).

No Speedy Trial Violation Absent Showing of Prejudice to Defense: A complaint was filed against Peterson for careless driving and DUI on August 30, 2001, but a trial did not occur until April 1, 2002. Peterson moved to dismiss based on violation of the constitutional right to a speedy trial, focusing on the fact that his defense was prejudiced. The Supreme Court held that Peterson failed to meet the burden of showing prejudice. Peterson's missed work, repeated court appearances, and anxiety were insufficient to constitute the prejudice necessary to establish sufficient prejudice to warrant reversal. Billings v. Peterson, 2004 MT 232, 322 M 444, 97 P3d 532 (2004).

Failure of State to Demonstrate Good Cause for Trial Delay in Misdemeanor Case — Reversible Error: Defendant was charged with misdemeanor DUI and pleaded not guilty. At the omnibus hearing, a trial date was set, and the Justice's Court set a date for production of evidence and a deadline for defendant to file a jury waiver. Defendant filed nothing in response to the deadlines. Ten days before the trial date, the state moved to vacate and reset the trial date because the County Attorney would be out of town. Efforts to contact defense counsel were unsuccessful, so the court sent a letter to counsel advising of the state's motion and extending the deadline for waiver of a jury trial. More than 7 months after defendant was charged, the case came to trial. Defendant gave no opening statement and presented no evidence or testimony in defense, but instead moved for dismissal for failure to prosecute within 6 months as required in 46-13-401. The motion was denied on grounds that any delay was caused by defendant and defense counsel. On appeal to District Court, the motion was again denied. On appeal to the Supreme Court, defendant contended that denial of the dismissal motion was in error because defendant never asked for a trial postponement and because the state did not show good cause for the delay. The state argued that good cause was shown in defendant's lack of compliance with court orders, including the failure to file a waiver of a jury trial and to comply with discovery requests. However, the record revealed no connection between defendant's failure to comply with the court's orders and the failure to prosecute the case within 6 months. The state's request for continuance did not reference defendant's failure to comply with court orders or that the failure to do so necessitated a continuance beyond the 6-month deadline. Thus, because the state failed to show good cause for the delay, the motion to dismiss should have been granted, so the Supreme Court reversed the District Court and dismissed the charge. St. v. Bertolino, 2003 MT 266, 317 M 453, 77 P3d 543 (2003).

Deprivation of Right to Private Counsel Through Denial of Continuance Motion Warranting Reversal: About 18 days before Garcia's criminal trial, Garcia moved for a continuance so that his prospective private counsel could prepare for trial. Here, the District Court denied the continuance because: (1) retention of private counsel 2 weeks prior to trial was not a sufficient reason to grant a continuance; (2) Garcia's court-appointed counsel was competent; (3) if the motion was granted, Garcia would remain in jail for a lengthy period because of the inability to post bail; and (4) a new trial could not be scheduled for several months because of the court's congested docket. The case proceeded, and Garcia was convicted. On appeal, Garcia contended that denial of the continuance motion was error, and the Supreme Court agreed. The right to counsel contemplates the right to effective assistance of counsel, and the right to effective assistance in turn encompasses the right to retain counsel of one's choosing. Regardless of whether a defendant is entitled to appointed counsel, the right to be heard through the defendant's own counsel is unqualified. Pursuant to St. v. Craig, 274 M 140, 906 P2d 683 (1995), a defendant may not insist upon appointment of specific counsel or demand dismissal or substitution of appointed counsel as long as effective assistance is rendered. However, for individuals with the means to secure private representation, the right to decide who can best conduct the case must be respected whenever feasible. A District Court must consider a motion for continuance in a criminal trial in light of the diligence shown by the moving party and may grant the continuance if, in its discretion, the interests of justice so require. Here, Garcia exercised sufficient diligence in acquiring independent representation and in seeking a continuance, and the District Court abused its discretion in denying the continuance motion. Questions of the competency and effective assistance of court-appointed counsel were irrelevant and should not have been considered in addressing the continuance. Although the denial of a continuance motion cannot be reversed absent a showing of resultant prejudice to a defendant, in this case, despite the legitimacy of the subsequent proceedings, a deprivation of this magnitude warranted reversal in the interests of justice. St. v. Garcia, 2003 MT 211, 317 M 73, 75 P3d 313 (2003), distinguished in St. v. Holm, 2013 MT 58, 369 Mont. 227, 304 P.3d 365.

Original Misdemeanor Charges Dismissed and Refiled With Felony Charge — Joinder of Charges Establishing New Case: Following an automobile accident, Topp was charged in Justice's Court with two misdemeanors to which he pleaded not guilty. The charges were subsequently dismissed, and the state filed a new information in District Court recharging Topp with the misdemeanors plus felony criminal endangerment. Topp argued that the misdemeanor charges should be dismissed because they were not prosecuted within 6 months, as required by 46-13-401. The Supreme Court held that 46-13-401 did not apply in this case. When the original misdemeanor charges were dismissed, there were no longer charges pending against Topp, so there was no requirement for prosecution. As set out in St. v. Bullock, 272 M 361, 901 P2d 61 (1995), as long as Justice's Court jurisdiction is exhausted within 6 months by some action that authorizes appeal de novo to the District Court, 46-13-401 is satisfied. Thus, when the charges were joined in District Court, the action became a case de novo, so the District Court did not err in denying Topp's motion to dismiss the misdemeanor charges on speedy trial grounds. St. v.

Topp, 2003 MT 209, 317 M 59, 75 P3d 330 (2003). See also St. v. Case, 2013 MT 192, 371 Mont. 58, 305 P.3d 812.

Burden of Proof Erroneously Applied to Speedy Trial Analysis — Remand: The District Court improperly attributed less than 275 days of trial delay to the state and then erroneously held that the burden was on defendant to prove that the delay was prejudicial. On appeal, both parties conceded that the state was responsible for more than 275 days, thus the burden should have shifted to the state to show that defendant was not prejudiced by the delay. The Supreme Court was unable to conduct a meaningful review of the evidence when the burden was erroneously applied by the trial court, so the case was remanded so that the trial court could reconsider its speedy trial analysis after properly acknowledging that the burden of proof was with the state rather than with defendant. St. v. Ray, 2003 MT 171, 316 M 354, 71 P3d 1247 (2003), following Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514 (1972).

Defendant's Pretrial Incarceration and Hardships Inevitable Given Pending Federal Probation Violation Prosecution — Right to Speedy Trial Not Violated: Jefferson asserted that he had been denied the right to a speedy trial following a pretrial incarceration of 413 days. Supreme Court analysis was triggered by a delay in excess of 200 days, and because the delay exceeded 275 days, the burden of proving that Jefferson was not prejudiced shifted to the prosecution. The court found that Jefferson had asserted the right to a speedy trial in a timely manner because the motion to dismiss was made 203 days after the charges were filed—well before the trial was conducted. The court also noted that the right to a speedy trial is not intended to prevent all pretrial incarceration, but rather is designed to prevent oppressive pretrial incarceration. In this case, the state satisfied its burden of proving that Jefferson's defense was not impaired by the pretrial delay and incarceration when it was shown that Jefferson's incarceration was inevitable. Jefferson would have been incarcerated for that time period regardless of the state's delay because he was subject to a petition by the federal government to revoke his probation, and even though only 7 months remained on Jefferson's federal probation, he would have been resentenced for probation violations pursuant to statute. Thus, any hardships that Jefferson suffered as a result of the pretrial incarceration were also inevitable and were aggravated only in part by the state's delay. St. v. Jefferson, 2003 MT 90, 315 M 146, 69 P3d 641 (2003).

Trial Delay of 342 Days — No Speedy Trial Violation Given Sufficient Rebuttal of Presumption of Prejudice: Following a delay of at least 342 days, Stiffarm moved to dismiss assault charges on grounds that his right to a speedy trial was violated. Applying Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), the Supreme Court analyzed the four factors used in determining whether a defendant is denied the constitutional right to a speedy trial. The first three factors were conceded or undisputed, so the court considered the fourth factor—whether the defense was prejudiced by the delay. Regarding pretrial incarceration, the court agreed that most of any prejudice Stiffarm suffered was due to the natural consequences of Stiffarm's prior and alleged conduct. Stiffarm had to remain in jail because of the inability to meet the $150,000 bail, which was set at that amount because of the severity of the charged offense, because Stiffarm was on probation for a prior felony when the alleged offense occurred, and because of Stiffarm's extensive prior criminal record. Any presumption of prejudice from pretrial anxiety was adequately rebutted by testimony that Stiffarm had been depressed prior to incarceration and that with medication and counseling received in jail, the depression had actually improved. Finally, with respect to impairment of defense based on the alleged unavailability of witnesses, the state presented affidavit testimony of witnesses who indicated that their memories of the alleged incident were intact and that all evidence held by the state was preserved. Thus, the state adequately rebutted the presumption of prejudice, and absent any demonstration of further prejudice by Stiffarm, denial of the motion to dismiss on speedy trial grounds was affirmed. St. v. Stiffarm, 2003 MT 70, 314 M 499, 67 P3d 249 (2003).

Defendant Out of State for Six Years — Speedy Trial Right Preserved by Diligent Good Faith Prosecution: Longhorn was charged with felony sexual assault, and a warrant was issued for his arrest. However, Longhorn was in Oklahoma, and the warrant was not served until 6 years later. At trial, Longhorn moved to dismiss on speedy trial grounds, but the motion was denied, and Longhorn was convicted. On appeal, the Supreme Court applied the test in Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514 (1972), and Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), to determine if Longhorn's speedy trial rights were violated. The court noted that the right to a speedy trial commences when a defendant becomes an accused, and if an accused is out of state, the state must act diligently and in good faith to acquire jurisdiction. The District Court found that the state acted diligently, and the Supreme Court concurred. The prearrest time was properly attributed to Longhorn, and he bore the burden of showing that he was prejudiced by the delay. The Supreme Court applied St. v. Boese, 2001 MT 175, 306 M 169, 30 P3d 1092 (2001), in evaluating the potential prejudice based on the three interests that speedy trials are designed to protect: (1) prevention of oppressive pretrial incarceration; (2) minimization of the defendant's anxiety and concern; and (3) avoidance of impairment of the defense. The court concluded that Longhorn did not prove prejudice, so the speedy trial motion was properly denied. St. v. Longhorn, 2002 MT 135, 310 M 172, 49 P3d 48 (2002).

Delay of 391 Days Attributable to State — Speedy Trial Analysis Triggered — Remand for Determination of Whether State Can Prove Lack of Prejudice: A.G., a juvenile charged with felony vehicle theft, being a runaway, and curfew violation, moved to dismiss the charges for lack of a speedy trial 2 months before a scheduled hearing. The District Court subsequently attributed 229 of 392 days of delay to the state, concluded that the right to a speedy trial was not violated, and placed the burden on A.G. to show that the delay was prejudicial. Applying the criteria in Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), the Supreme Court found that the District Court incorrectly calculated the length of delay, which was actually 455 days. As established in Billings v. Bruce, any delay over 200 days triggers further speedy trial analysis. Because of a miscommunication between the juvenile probation office and the County Attorney, the state neglected to diligently move the case toward prosecution, and A.G. was under no obligation to ensure diligent prosecution of the case or to help the state avoid dismissal for failure to timely prosecute. Further, the District Court mistakenly placed the burden of proving prejudice on A.G., when in actuality, the burden was on the state to prove a lack of prejudice. The Supreme Court remanded for a hearing to determine whether A.G. was prejudiced by the 455-day delay. In re A.G., 2002 MT 111, 309 M 491, 47 P3d 831 (2002).

Sufficient Proof of Lack of Prejudice to Defendant Caused by 362-Day Trial Delay — Claim of Lack of Speedy Trial Properly Denied: Good satisfied three of the four speedy trial factors in Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514 (1972), and Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998): (1) more than 200 days of delay were attributable to the state, triggering speedy trial analysis; (2) the delay was caused by the state's failure to locate Good's motions, trial court institutional delay, and failure of the state to diligently prosecute; and (3) Good properly asserted his speedy trial right 7 days before trial. However, the fourth factor, a showing that Good was prejudiced by the delay, was not met. Good suffered no pretrial incarceration and conceded that the defense was not impaired by the delay. Good's pretrial anxiety and concern stemmed from the nature of the charges, rather than the delay. Thus, the District Court did not err in holding that Good was not denied a speedy trial. St. v. Good, 2002 MT 59, 309 M 113, 43 P3d 948 (2002).

Burden of Showing Lack of Prejudice in Trial Delay Met by State — Dismissal of Speedy Trial Motion Affirmed: Price was convicted in City Court in July 1994 for DUI and resisting arrest and appealed to District Court. The District Court ruled that the notice of appeal was untimely and dismissed the appeal. Price appealed that dismissal to the Supreme Court, which ruled in 1995 that the appeal was timely and remanded to District Court for trial (see St. v. Price, 271 M 409, 897 P2d 1084 (1995)). Following remand, trial was delayed until April 1997. Five days before trial, Price moved to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial. On the day of trial, the District Court considered the motion, denied it, and proceeded to trial, and Price was convicted of DUI. Price subsequently appealed denial of the speedy trial issue. The Supreme Court applied the revised Barker test set out in Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), to determine whether Price was prejudiced by the delay. Because of the length of delay attributable to the state, the burden shifted to the state to show that Price was not prejudiced by the delay. Applying the Bruce standard, the Supreme Court evaluated prejudice based on the presence of oppressive pretrial incarceration, Price's level of anxiety and concern, and impairment of the defense. In this case, the state met its burden of showing that Price was not prejudiced by the delay. Price was not incarcerated prior to trial, so pretrial incarceration was not a factor. Price's original City Court sentence was stayed pending the de novo appeal to District Court, which prevented the DUI conviction from appearing on Price's driving record and adversely affecting Price's driving privileges or ability to obtain insurance. Thus, Price's life affairs were protected from the impact of the pending charge and conviction, so Price did not suffer more than the normal anxiety and concern associated with the charge. Last, the state reinterviewed the witnesses several times over the course of the proceeding, so witness memories were not diminished, and Price conducted much of the case pro se, so it was obvious that his memory was not diminished either. This constituted sufficient evidence that Price's defense was not impaired by the delay, so the District Court did not err in dismissing the speedy trial claim. St. v. Price, 2001 MT 212, 306 M 381, 34 P3d 112 (2001).

Failure to Show Prejudice in Delayed DUI Trial Based on Pretrial Anxiety: Stuart was arrested for DUI, and after a delay of more than 200 days, moved for dismissal on grounds of denial of a speedy trial. The motion was denied, and Stuart ultimately was convicted, but timely asserted the right to a speedy trial on appeal. The Supreme Court applied the analysis set out in Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), to determine if prejudice occurred. No single factor is determinative, and each must be weighed in light of the facts of the case. The only disputed factor was the possible anxiety caused by the pretrial delay that might have placed Stuart's employment as a commercial driver in limbo; however, Stuart conceded that he had received full-time employment as a commercial truck driver about 6 months after the DUI charge. Affidavits from Stuart and his wife addressed the anxiety factor, but did not transcend the generic anxiety inherent in being accused of a crime. Stuart failed to establish prejudice once the state met its burden of showing a lack of prejudice, and the District Court did not err in denying the motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial. St. v. Stuart, 2001 MT 178, 306 M 189, 31 P3d 353 (2001).

Trial Delay of 761 Days on Bad Check Charges — Facts Discharging State's Burden of Disproving Prejudice: Boese's trial for issuing bad checks was delayed 761 days, sufficient to bring about a speedy trial analysis. A total of 176 days was attributable to the state because the arresting officer failed to return the served arrest warrant, and 289 days were institutional delay, also attributable to the state. Boese asserted the right to a speedy trial in a timely manner, so the burden shifted to the state to show that the delay was not prejudicial. Boese contended that the burden was not properly shifted, but the order regarding Boese's motion to dismiss demonstrated otherwise. Thus, the Supreme Court applied the analysis set out in Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), to determine if prejudice occurred, examining pretrial incarceration, anxiety caused by the pretrial delay, and whether Boese's defense was damaged by the delay. Because Boese was incarcerated on other charges for most of the time prior to trial, the pretrial incarceration was not oppressive based on the charges in this case. The likelihood of anxiety from delay was contraindicated by the frequency with which Boese changed his plea, adding to the delay, and any increased anxiety was more likely caused by the other, more serious unrelated charges facing Boese. Finally, the nature of the bad check case was not fact-sensitive and depended primarily on documentary evidence and interpretation of that evidence, which was not evanescent and not likely to change because of the trial delay. These facts were sufficient to discharge the state's burden of disproving prejudice, and the District Court did not err in denying Boese's motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial. St. v. Boese, 2001 MT 175, 306 M 169, 30 P3d 1092 (2001).

555-Day Delay Attributable to State Not Grounds for Dismissal for Lack of Speedy Trial Without Showing of Prejudice to Defendant: Keyes argued that charges against him should have been dismissed by the lower court because of a 555-day delay in bringing his case to trial that was attributable to actions of the state. The Supreme Court pointed out that Keyes had fled Montana's jurisdiction and remained a fugitive for nearly 2 years, thereby demonstrating no interest in obtaining a speedy trial, preserving evidence, or advancing his legal defenses. The Supreme Court also pointed out that Keyes conceded that the state's delay had not prejudiced him but instead argued that the delay by itself was enough to warrant a dismissal of the charges. The Supreme Court held that a delay attributable to the state was not enough to warrant a dismissal for lack of a speedy trial without a showing of prejudice to the defendant resulting from the delay. St. v. Keyes, 2000 MT 337, 303 M 147, 15 P3d 443, 57 St. Rep. 1435 (2000).

Failure to Show That Pretrial Delay Impaired Defense Based on Unavailability or Loss of Exculpatory Evidence — No Prejudice: Ellenburg asserted that his defense was impaired as a result of the delay caused by his incarceration from arrest until trial, which prevented his access to business documents that would have been exculpatory, and that the delay prejudiced him as a result of the state's loss or destruction of the documents seized from his office. However, Ellenburg failed to describe the documents that he could not access or to explain how they could help in his defense, nor did he ask his attorney or anyone else to procure the documents for him, thus also failing to meet the burden of proving that the documents, if they existed, were material and exculpatory. Any delay in bringing the case to trial based on a loss or unavailability of exculpatory evidence was not a prejudicial impairment of the defense. St. v. Ellenburg, 2000 MT 232, 301 M 289, 8 P3d 801, 57 St. Rep. 958 (2000).

Barker Analysis Satisfied:

A pretrial delay of 230 days having triggered a speedy trial analysis, the Supreme Court examined the delay for prejudice to Johnson and found that all 230 days were attributable to the state: 190 days of unintentional delay because of two continuance motions necessary to secure the appearance at trial of prosecution witnesses, and 40 days of institutional delay because of the District Court's sua sponte continuance because of calendar conflicts. Docket delays weigh less heavily against the state than purposeful delays, of which there was no evidence. The delay was not the result of intentional or purposeful foot-dragging on the part of the state, nor was there any indication that the state harbored any motive for delaying Johnson's trial; therefore, the degree of fault of the state was minimal. Johnson was thus not unduly prejudiced by the pretrial delay in and of itself, so the state did not bear the burden of rebutting presumptive prejudice, proof of which fell on Johnson. After weighing the four prongs of the Barker test (407 US 514), the Supreme Court affirmed denial of Johnson's motion to dismiss on speedy trial grounds, holding that Johnson failed to show adequate proof of prejudice because of pretrial incarceration, economic hardships, or impairment of defense. St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 180, 300 M 367, 4 P3d 654, 57 St. Rep. 727 (2000), following Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), and distinguishing St. v. Bailey, 201 M 473, 655 P2d 494 (1982).

Applying the four-factor balancing test of Barker, defendant was not prejudiced in her defense by a 543-day delay between arrest and trial, 265 days of which were attributable to the state and 222 days of which were attributed to defendant because of incarceration in another state, whether the delays were attributable to the state or defendant. Notwithstanding St. v. Robbins, 218 M 107, 708 P2d 227 (1985), regarding the failure of the state to rebut the presumption of prejudice arising from a delay of more than 200 days, the District Court did not err in denying the motion to dismiss on speedy trial grounds. St. v. Williams-Rusch, 279 M 437, 928 P2d 169, 53 St. Rep. 1224 (1996).

Under the four-factor balancing test of Barker, defendant was not denied his right to a speedy trial when: (1) a 269-day delay occurred between arrest and trial; (2) 164 days of the delay were attributable to institutional delay, 36 days were attributable to defendant Weeks because he had waived his right to a speedy trial, and 69 days were attributable to Weeks because although the state moved to reschedule the trial, the rescheduling was made necessary because an evidentiary hearing was required on Weeks's motion to exclude DNA evidence; (3) Weeks moved to dismiss for lack of speedy trial prior to the trial date; and (4) incarceration was necessary to ensure Weeks's presence at trial, his evidence of anxiety was marginal, and Weeks offered no explanation as to how his defense was impaired as a result of the delay. St. v. Weeks, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477, 52 St. Rep. 78 (1995), followed in St. v. Deavila, 285 M 530, 949 P2d 1185, 54 St. Rep. 1300 (1997).

Under the four-factor balancing test of Barker, defendant was not denied his right to a speedy trial when at most 81 days of a 307-day delay were attributable to the state but were not the result of bad faith or oppressive tactics and when the total length of delay did not prejudice the defendant, regardless of how various periods of delay were attributed. St. v. Mooney, 248 M 115, 809 P2d 591, 48 St. Rep. 367 (1991), followed in St. v. Thompson, 263 M 17, 865 P2d 1125, 50 St. Rep. 1683 (1993). Thompson was followed in St. v. Hagberg, 277 M 33, 920 P2d 86, 53 St. Rep. 528 (1996).

Under the four-factor balance test of Barker, defendant was not denied his right to a speedy trial when: (1) a 256-day delay occurred between arrest and trial; (2) defendant was responsible for 117 days of the delay, and the state was responsible for the remaining 139-day delay, which was primarily inherent and institutional in nature; (3) defendant properly moved to dismiss on speedy trial grounds before the case was brought to trial; and (4) there was no evidence of oppressive prejudicial pretrial incarceration, no conclusive proof of anxiety or concern caused to defendant, and no finding that the delay hampered, impaired, or prejudiced the defense. St. v. Heffernan, 248 M 67, 809 P2d 566, 48 St. Rep. 327 (1991), followed in St. v. Jenkins, 262 M 117, 863 P2d 438, 50 St. Rep. 1471 (1993).

Defendant's right to a speedy trial was not denied under the Barker test when: (1) the state produced a reasonable excuse for delay due to absence of a material witness caused in large part by defendant's unlawful acts; (2) 192 days of the 312-day delay could be attributed to defendant's procedural maneuvers; (3) the defendant waived his right to a speedy trial but made a timely assertion of his right by raising the issue about 4 months later; and (4) defendant was not prejudiced by the state's delay since his pretrial incarceration was appropriate, nothing in the record indicated he was unduly anxious or concerned, and the presentation of his defense was not hampered. St. v. Tilly, 227 M 138, 737 P2d 484, 44 St. Rep. 945 (1987), followed in St. v. Reynolds, 243 M 1, 792 P2d 1111, 47 St. Rep. 1143 (1990). Under the four-factor balancing test of Barker, defendant was not denied his right to a speedy trial when: (1) a 269-day delay occurred between arrest and trial; (2) 164 days of the delay were attributable to institutional delay, 36 days were attributable to defendant Weeks because he had waived his right to a speedy trial, and 69 days were attributable to Weeks because although the state moved to reschedule the trial, the rescheduling was made necessary because an evidentiary hearing was required on Weeks's motion to exclude DNA evidence; (3) Weeks moved to dismiss for lack of speedy trial prior to the trial date; and (4) incarceration was necessary to ensure Weeks's presence at trial, his evidence of anxiety was marginal, and Weeks offered no explanation as to how his defense was impaired as a result of the delay. St. v. Weeks, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477, 52 St. Rep. 78 (1995).

Anxiety During Preindictment Period Insufficient to Trigger Prejudice Establishing Due Process or Speedy Trial Violation: In January 1996, Burt's former employer filed suit to recover more than $250,000 that Burt allegedly stole while employed as office manager and bookkeeper for the business. In January 1997, the state filed an information charging Burt with five counts of felony theft. In October 1998, Burt was convicted on all counts and later appealed, alleging that the preindictment delay between the time when the state could have filed charges and the time when the information was actually filed violated her due process rights and that she suffered actual prejudice in the effect of the delay on her health and emotions. Applying the two-step analysis in St. v. Taylor, 1998 MT 121, 289 M 63, 960 P2d 773 (1998), the Supreme Court held that, without more, Burt was not prejudiced by the preindictment delay simply because of her anxiety. Anxiety, no matter how real, does not in itself impair the accused in defending against a charge and thus does not qualify as prejudice in the due process context. The delay did not cause a loss of witnesses or evidence, nor did requiring Burt to stand trial violate the fundamental conceptions of justice that lie at the base of our civil and political institutions and that define the community's sense of fair play and decency. Burt was not incarcerated. Her stress was not excessive. Her economic hardship, the stigma of being charged with a crime for the first time, and her recourse to a psychiatrist could not be considered consequences of the pretrial delay. Although a total of 208 days of institutional delay was chargeable to the state, the remainder was chargeable to Burt. Absent a showing of prejudice, the convictions were affirmed. St. v. Burt, 2000 MT 115, 299 M 412, 3 P3d 597, 57 St. Rep. 482 (2000), following Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998). See also St. v. Mouser, 806 P2d 330 (Alaska Ct. App. 1991).

Reasonable Delay Because of Complex "Eve of Trial" Motion Attributable to Defendant — Court Delay Attributable to State — 433-Day Delay Prejudicial: When a defendant files an "eve of trial" motion that raises a complex legal issue or requires an evidentiary hearing, making the original trial date impracticable, the reasonable period of delay caused thereby is attributable to the defendant. Here, Kipp's motion to quash was heard 19 days before the original trial date. At that time, the District Court vacated the trial date and stated that another date would be set after the motion to quash was considered. The court set a briefing schedule, but no new trial date. When a trial court, for its own reasons, vacates a trial date and does not set a new date, the delay is attributable to the state; therefore, the delay from the motion to quash until the court issued its decision was institutional delay attributable to the state. Further, the 5-month delay between the court's decision and the state's request for a new trial date was also attributable to the state. With a total of 433 days of institutional delay, the burden shifted to the state to prove that Kipp was not prejudiced. The state offered no evidence to rebut Kipp's contention that she was prejudiced by anxiety and concern because: (1) she was the custodial parent of two minor children; (2) she was faced with potential incarceration; (3) she was denied employment because of the charges; and (4) her defense was impaired because of the loss of a main witness as a result of delay attributable to the state. Kipp's right to a speedy trial was thus violated, so the Supreme Court reversed the conviction and dismissed the charges. St. v. Kipp, 1999 MT 197, 295 M 399, 984 P2d 733, 56 St. Rep. 762 (1999), following Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866, 55 St. Rep. 750 (1998). Kipp was distinguished, as to impairment of defense, in St. v. Highpine, 2000 MT 368, 303 M 422, 15 P3d 938, 57 St. Rep. 1573 (2000).

Six-Month Speedy Trial Limit Inapplicable by Its Terms to Trials De Novo in District Court on Appeal: Stanko was convicted in Justice's Court of reckless driving and appealed to the District Court. Before the Supreme Court, Stanko argued that his case should have been dismissed by the District Court because more than 6 months had elapsed between the time that he filed his appeal to District Court and the time of his trial. The Supreme Court pointed out that the limitation in 46-13-401 applies only "after the entry of a plea" and that because there is no plea entered in an appeal to District Court, the statute and its 6-month limit was not intended to be applied to those appeals held as a trial de novo. The Supreme Court also held that Stanko's argument that application of the 6-month limit is outmoded because of the requirement for one jury trial contained in 46-17-201 was not persuasive because the method of disposition of the case in Justice's Court is immaterial to the application of the 6-month speedy trial limitation. (Annotator's note: The requirement contained in 46-17-201 for one jury trial was held unconstitutional in Woirhaye v. District Court, 1998 MT 320, 292 M 185, 972 P2d 800, 55 St. Rep 1298 (1998).) For these reasons, the Supreme Court said that it would continue to adhere to the rule of St. v. Mantz, 269 M 135, 887 P2d 251 (1994), that the 6-month speedy trial limitation does not apply to trials de novo on appeal from Justice's Court to District Court. St. v. Stanko, 1998 MT 323, 292 M 214, 974 P2d 1139, 55 St. Rep. 1313 (1998).

Revised Speedy Trial Analysis — Barker Test Clarified: In an attempt to harmonize numerous disparate rulings on the right to a speedy trial, the Supreme Court held that the general guidelines for review of claims of denial of a speedy trial contained in Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514, 33 L Ed 2d 101, 92 S Ct 2182 (1972), are to be applied on a case-by-case basis to the unique circumstances of each claim. The factors to be considered do not have talismanic qualities, and courts must still engage in a difficult and sensitive balancing process. There is not some magical time for assertion of the right to a speedy trial that should be weighed more favorably to the defendant than some other time. As long as the defendant files a motion to dismiss prior to trial, the right to a speedy trial is properly asserted. To initially calculate the length of delay, the period from the time that charges are filed until the trial date is determined without assignment of fault to either party for the various delays. If the delay is 200 days or more, further speedy trial analysis is triggered. In determining the reasons for the delay, time of delay is assigned to either the state or the defendant. Then the determination is made as to whether the delay attributable to the state is 275 days or more, at which point the burden shifts to the state to demonstrate that the delay has not prejudiced the defendant. The state's proof should take into consideration but need not include the three traditional bases for determining prejudice: (1) pretrial incarceration; (2) anxiety and its attendant considerations; and (3) impairment of the defense. In determining whether the state has met its burden, the court should consider the fact that direct proof of a defendant's state of mind may not always be possible and that the state's ability to anticipate the nature of the defense varies from case to case. The third consideration is whether the right to a speedy trial is properly invoked before trial, either by demand of a speedy trial or by motion to dismiss for failure to provide a speedy trial. Once that motion is made, the District Court must rule on it prior to trial; however, any delay directly attributable to a motion to dismiss that is filed less than 10 days before trial is assignable to the defendant. The fourth consideration, whether the defense was prejudiced, includes the three traditional bases for determining prejudice stated above. In the present case, the city of Billings was responsible for prosecuting the defendant, and a 447-day delay attributable to the state sufficiently prejudiced the defense to warrant reversal of defendant's conviction on speedy trial grounds. The defendant was under no obligation to ensure diligent prosecution of the case against him or to help the city avoid dismissal for failure to timely prosecute. Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866, 55 St. Rep. 750 (1998), followed in St. v. Hardaway, 1998 MT 224, 290 M 516, 966 P2d 125, 55 St. Rep. 936 (1998), in which the Supreme Court clarified the second speedy trial factor set out in Billings v. Bruce in holding that if the state can only show lack of prejudice on one of the three traditional bases of prejudice, it must, at a minimum, address the question of whether there has been an impairment of the defense. If the state satisfies its burden of demonstrating that defendant has not been prejudiced by the delay, the burden shifts to defendant to show prejudice. Billings v. Bruce was also followed in St. v. Olmsted, 1998 MT 301, 292 M 66, 968 P2d 1154, 55 St. Rep. 1235 (1998), St. v. Stanko, 1998 MT 323, 292 M 214, 974 P2d 1139, 55 St. Rep. 1313 (1998), St. v. Maier, 1999 MT 51, 293 M 403, 977 P2d 298, 56 St. Rep. 208 (1999), St. v. Kipp, 1999 MT 197, 295 M 399, 984 P2d 733, 56 St. Rep. 762 (1999), St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 180, 300 M 367, 4 P3d 654, 57 St. Rep. 727 (2000), St. v. Taylor, 2000 MT 202, 300 M 499, 5 P3d 1019, 57 St. Rep. 794 (2000), St. v. Ellenburg, 2000 MT 232, 301 M 289, 8 P3d 801, 57 St. Rep. 958 (2000), St. v. Highpine, 2000 MT 368, 303 M 422, 15 P3d 938, 57 St. Rep. 1573 (2000), St. v. Boese, 2001 MT 175, 306 M 169, 30 P3d 1092 (2001), St. v. Stuart, 2001 MT 178, 306 M 189, 31 P3d 353 (2001), St. v. Price, 2001 MT 212, 306 M 381, 34 P3d 112 (2001), St. v. Good, 2002 MT 59, 309 M 113, 43 P3d 948 (2002), and In re A.G., 2002 MT 111, 309 M 491, 47 P3d 831 (2002). See also St. v. Tweedy, 277 M 313, 922 P2d 1134 (1996). Hardaway was followed in St. v. Highpine, 2000 MT 368, 303 M 422, 15 P3d 938, 57 St. Rep. 1573 (2000). The 10-day rule in Billings v. Bruce, providing that any delay directly attributable to a motion to dismiss based on denial of a speedy trial that is filed less than 10 days prior to trial will be assigned to the defendant, was modified in St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007), to provide that any delay directly attributable to the filing of a speedy trial motion less than 30 days prior to a scheduled trial date is chargeable to the accused. The requirement that a motion to dismiss on speedy trial grounds must be ruled on prior to trial was reaffirmed in Ariegwe, and an additional requirement added that the trial court must enter findings of fact and conclusions of law with respect to each of the four speedy trial balancing factors and how the factors were balanced against each other.

Decision Regarding Preindictment Delay as Constitutional Question: A speedy trial analysis, which focuses on postindictment delay, involves an inquiry similar to that which the Supreme Court engages in when analyzing preindictment delay. Therefore, on appeal, the Supreme Court will review a District Court decision regarding preindictment delay as a question of constitutional law. The District Court's conclusions of law are reviewed to determine whether its interpretation of the law is correct. St. v. Taylor, 1998 MT 121, 289 M 63, 960 P2d 773, 55 St. Rep. 481 (1998). However, see St. v. Goltz, 197 M 361, 642 P2d 1079 (1982), in which the Supreme Court held that speedy trial guarantees do not extend to the period prior to formal accusation or arrest.

Motion for Continuance Denied — No Speedy Trial Violation: The 6-month period for trial of a misdemeanor charge is the general rule. When, as here, a defendant moves for a continuance, the 6-month trial deadline does not apply. St. v. Chesarek, 1998 MT 15, 287 Mont. 215, 953 P.2d 698. See also St. v. Ronningen, 213 Mont. 358, 691 P.2d 1348 (1984), St. v. Crane, 240 Mont. 235, 784 P.2d 901 (1989), and St. v. Christensen, 2014 MT 294, 377 Mont. 7, 338 P.3d 45.

Admissibility of Preliminary Alcohol Screening Test Results for Probable Cause Purposes Only — Clarification and Effect of Orders Suppressing Evidence — Grant of Motion to Exclude Inadmissible Evidence Not Considered Order Suppressing Evidence: The state sought to have the results of a preliminary alcohol screening test admitted into evidence in a DUI case. The City Court denied the motion, and the state immediately appealed to District Court, contending that in denying the motion, the City Court had suppressed evidence and that the statutory 6-month limit on trial of misdemeanors in 46-13-401 was thus exhausted. The Supreme Court noted that the results of a preliminary alcohol screening test pursuant to 61-8-409 are not substantive evidence of the amount of alcohol present in a person's body but instead are an estimate of alcohol concentration only for the purpose of establishing probable cause to believe that a person is under the influence of alcohol prior to making an arrest. An order that suppresses evidence is an order that excludes evidence on the grounds that the evidence was illegally obtained and does not include a pretrial order that excludes evidence based on rules of evidence, such as relevancy, probative value, or statutory inadmissibility. Thus, the City Court order excluding preliminary alcohol screening test results was not an order suppressing evidence but rather an order determining that the results were not substantive evidence at all; therefore, there was no statutory basis under 46-20-103(2)(e) for appeal to District Court. Because City Court jurisdiction was not exhausted by some action authorizing appeal to the District Court, 46-13-401(2) was not satisfied and defendant, who made no move to postpone, was entitled to dismissal of the DUI charge with prejudice pursuant to 46-13-401(2) on grounds that he had not received a timely trial. St. v. Strizich, 286 M 1, 952 P2d 1365, 54 St. Rep. 1241 (1997), following St. v. Carney, 219 M 412, 714 P2d 532 (1986), and St. v. Bullock, 272 M 361, 901 P2d 61 (1995), overruling inconsistent holdings in St. v. T.W., 220 M 280, 715 P2d 428 (1986), and St. v. Yarns, 252 M 45, 826 P2d 543 (1992), and followed, with regard to limited admissibility of preliminary breath test evidence, in St. v. Weldele, 2003 MT 117, 315 M 452, 69 P3d 1162 (2003). See also St. v. Crawford, 2003 MT 118, 315 M 480, 68 P3d 848 (2003).

Failure of Justice's Court Clerk to Timely Transmit Case File to District Court — No Speedy Trial Violation: Sol appealed his DUI conviction in the Justice's Court to the District Court. The Justice's Court Clerk failed to transmit the case file within the time provided by 46-17-311. The District Court Clerk scheduled the trial 110 days after Sol filed his notice of appeal from Justice's Court. Sol argued that the clerk's failure caused a violation of his right to a speedy trial. The Supreme Court noted that the 1-day delay in transmittal of the file probably resulted in the District Court Clerk's scheduling the trial 1 day later, in 110 days rather than in 109 days. Because a delay must be presumptively prejudicial before other speedy trial factors will be analyzed and because a delay of less than 6 months is not presumptively prejudicial, the Supreme Court held that it would not apply the other speedy trial criteria and held that Sol's right to a speedy trial had not been violated. St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307, 54 St. Rep. 246 (1997).

Delay of 363 Days, With 217 Attributable to Defendant Who Suffered Minor Prejudice From Delay: If denial of a speedy trial is claimed in a case appealed by the state from Justice's Court to the District Court, the time for calculating the length of the delay commences on the date on which the state files its notice of appeal. The state filed its appeal on November 30, 1993, trial was scheduled for May 2, 1994, and the motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial was denied on April 25, 1994, 153 days after the state's appeal was filed. Trial was held 363 days after the state's appeal was filed. Defendant was responsible for the last 217 days of the delay because of his motion to dismiss. Moreover, he failed to object to the order vacating the trial date and continuing the evidentiary hearing. However, his motion to dismiss was timely filed. He was not subjected to pretrial incarceration, and the record did not show that he suffered undue anxiety or concern over the delay or that his defense was impaired. The District Court correctly denied the motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial. St. v. Romero, 279 M 58, 926 P2d 717, 53 St. Rep. 1050 (1996).

186-Day Delay Combined With Incarceration Held Presumptively Prejudicial — Barker Analysis Applied — No Prejudice Found: Robert was arrested on forgery charges on April 15, 1994, and was incarcerated until trial on October 18, 1994. The Supreme Court noted that it had previously held in St. v. Stewart, 266 M 525, 881 P2d 629 (1994), citing St. v. Bartnes, 234 M 522, 764 P2d 1271 (1988), that a less than 200-day incarceration could, when combined with other factors, be found presumptively prejudicial, thus triggering analysis of other factors required to be analyzed under the Barker analysis. In this case, the Supreme Court held that Robert's 186-day incarceration was, when combined with the fact that Robert was incarcerated for the entire period, presumptively prejudicial. However, in analyzing the other three Barker factors, the Supreme Court found that the delay was institutional delay, that Robert did not timely assert his right to a speedy trial, and that Robert was not prejudiced by the delay. St. v. Lane, 279 M 128, 927 P2d 989, 53 St. Rep. 1082 (1996).

Failure of State to Finalize Plea Agreement — 511-Day Delay Apportioned to State: On July 25, 1994, the state charged Small with one count of felony assault (now assault with a weapon). Small pleaded not guilty, and a trial was scheduled for November 14, 1994. On that day, the state moved for a continuance on the basis that a plea agreement had been negotiated. On June 27, 1995, the District Court reset the trial for August, and in August, the trial was reset for November, when Small moved to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial. The Supreme Court applied the four Barker test factors and found that the first delay was institutional. However, citing St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P2d 809, 53 St. Rep. 325 (1996), and St. v. Tweedy, 277 M 313, 922 P2d 1134, 53 St. Rep. 656 (1996), the Supreme Court found that although Small had orally agreed in principle to plead guilty to a misdemeanor charge, the responsibility rested with the state to see that the agreement was implemented, that the reduced charge was in fact pleaded to, or that the state proceeded with trial on the felony charge. Small also argued that he suffered anxiety and concern as the result of the pending charge, and the Supreme Court found that the District Court failed to consider all of the Barker factors and failed to apportion the delays between Small and the state. For all of these reasons, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded with orders that the charge be dismissed. St. v. Small, 279 M 113, 926 P2d 1376, 53 St. Rep. 1074 (1996).

Appeal to District Court From Justice's Court — State Under Mistaken Assumption Regarding Burden to Prosecute Appeal — Delay of Over Five Years: Tweedy perfected the appeal of his misdemeanor conviction to the District Court. After Tweedy asked for and received a continuance and was substituted for his counsel, to act pro se, nothing further happened in the case until 5 years later, when the state moved to dismiss Tweedy's appeal because of his lack of diligence in pursuing it. Tweedy then moved to dismiss for lack of speedy trial. The Supreme Court examined the delay, using the traditional four-part Barker analysis, and charged all of the delay against the state. The Supreme Court found that the state had not rebutted the presumption of prejudice to the defendant by its allegation that none of the witnesses had died, and therefore, the Supreme Court dismissed the case. St. v. Tweedy, 277 M 313, 922 P2d 1134, 53 St. Rep. 656 (1996).

Factors to Be Considered: In determining whether a defendant's right to a speedy trial has been violated, a court must adopt a balancing test in which the conduct of both the prosecution and the defendant are weighed. Four factors must be considered: (1) length of the delay; (2) the reason for the delay; (3) the defendant's assertion of his right; and (4) prejudice to the defendant. St. v. Atkins, 277 M 103, 920 P2d 481, 53 St. Rep. 561 (1996); St. v. Weeks, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477, 52 St. Rep. 78 (1995); St. v. Dahms, 252 M 1, 825 P2d 1214, 49 St. Rep. 106 (1992); St. v. Van Voast, 247 M 194, 805 P2d 1380, 48 St. Rep. 160 (1991); St. v. Hall, 244 M 161, 797 P2d 183, 47 St. Rep. 1501 (1990); St. v. Buckingham, 240 M 252, 783 P2d 1331, 46 St. Rep. 2102 (1989); St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979); St. v. Keller, 170 M 372, 553 P2d 1013 (1976).

Half of 280-Day Delay Attributable to Defendant — Inexperienced Counsel — Lack of Proof of Prejudice and Impairment of Defense: Collier was arrested and charged with solicitation of deliberate homicide, which was reduced to criminal endangerment by a plea bargain. After being in jail for approximately 280 days, Collier moved to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's denial of the motion, finding that one-half of the 280-day delay was attributable to Collier. The Supreme Court noted that Collier failed to state exactly what it was that her defense counsel failed to do for her or, even if the delay was attributable to the state for assignment of an inexperienced defense counsel, how the delay prejudiced her case. Even though Collier was jailed throughout the entire period and therefore could not be with her children, the Supreme Court noted that because she was under a restraining order to stay away from her husband, who had custody, she could not have been with her children in any event. The Supreme Court held that Collier's assertions were only that and were unaccompanied by proof of any prejudice. St. v. Collier, 277 M 46, 919 P2d 376, 53 St. Rep. 534 (1996).

Delay of 399 Days Held Not to Be Denial of Speedy Trial — Time Attributable to Defendant for Subsequent Arrest on Separate Charges, Bail Revocation, and Entry Into Chemical Dependency Treatment Program — No Impairment of Defense: Hagberg was jailed after his initial arrest for felony assault (now assault with a weapon) but was released on bail. Thereafter, Hagberg's bail was revoked and he was again jailed after the state discovered that he had violated the terms of an earlier probation. At the time of the bail revocation, Hagberg also voluntarily entered a treatment program for his alcoholism. The trial was delayed twice for these reasons and because the District Court Judge retired. The Supreme Court held that because many of the days of delay were caused by institutional delays and were not caused by impermissible trial tactics of the prosecution, the state had not violated Hagberg's right to a speedy trial. The Supreme Court also noted that the delay had no effect upon Hagberg's ability to prepare his defense because the incident was still fresh in the minds of Officer Mantooth and Hagberg. St. v. Hagberg, 277 M 33, 920 P2d 86, 53 St. Rep. 528 (1996).

Delay of 177 Days by State for Institutional Reasons Inherent in System Found Reasonable: Of the 419-day delay in the trial, defendant was responsible for 242 days and the state was responsible for 177 days. The primary purpose of the speedy trial right is to protect defendant against oppressive, deliberate prosecution tactics. Instead, the delay attributable to the state in this case was institutional delay inherent in the system, which weighs less heavily against the state, and the state showed a reasonable explanation for the delay. Not counting the first 56 days after defendant was charged, the delay was due mainly to continuances granted the state. St. v. Gould, 273 M 207, 902 P2d 532, 52 St. Rep. 930 (1995).

Oppressiveness to and Recall of Defendant Already in Custody for Prior Offense: Incarceration for 419 days while awaiting trial was not oppressive or prejudicial because during that time, defendant was under sentence for a prior, unrelated crime and would have been in the custody of the state in some manner during the 419 days. In addition, 242 of the days were attributable to defendant. Anxiety and concern of defendant during the 419 days were thus not specifically related to the offense charged in this case. A certain amount of anxiety is inherent in being charged with a crime, and defendant put forth no evidence of anxiety and concern beyond that inherent in being charged. As to accurate witness recall of events, defendant was his only witness and his trial testimony showed no problem with recall. St. v. Gould, 273 M 207, 902 P2d 532, 52 St. Rep. 930 (1995), followed in St. v. Bowser, 2005 MT 279, 329 M 218, 123 P3d 230 (2005).

Waiver for Specific Time Period Not Waiver for Time After or Before: Two different waivers of the right to a speedy trial, each for a specific time period, did not constitute a total waiver preventing the Supreme Court from considering, on appeal, a claim of denial of the right to a speedy trial. St. v. Gould, 273 M 207, 902 P2d 532, 52 St. Rep. 930 (1995).

Delay of 214 Days or More Triggers Examination of Denial of Right: It is indisputable that a 214-day delay in a trial is sufficient to trigger a speedy trial examination. St. v. Wombolt, 231 M 400, 753 P2d 330, 45 St. Rep. 714 (1988) (citing four cases in which delays of 214 to 257 days triggered an examination), followed in St. v. Dahms, 252 M 1, 825 P2d 1214, 49 St. Rep. 106 (1992), St. v. Hembd, 254 M 407, 838 P2d 412, 49 St. Rep. 788 (1992), and St. v. Gould, 273 M 207, 902 P2d 532, 52 St. Rep. 930 (1995). See also St. v. Kipp, 1999 MT 197, 295 M 399, 984 P2d 733, 56 St. Rep. 762 (1999).

Criminal Defendant Entitled to Interest Earned on Cash Deposited as Bail Bond — Constitutional Issues: Richland County sought to retain the interest earned on a defendant's $50,000 cash bail bond that had been deposited with the court in an interest-bearing account and to apply the money to the county's general fund. Applying the general rule in Webb's Fabulous Pharmacies, Inc. v. Beckwith, 449 US 155, 66 L Ed 2d 358, 101 S Ct 446 (1980), the Supreme Court held that, absent a statutory provision allowing retention of the interest, the county is no more entitled to retain interest on a cash bail bond than it would be to retain accruing dividends on a deposit of stocks or bonds or the appreciated value on a pledge of real estate under 46-9-401. Retention of interest by the county would also violate several constitutional provisions as well, including: (1) the guarantee in Art. II, sec. 17, Mont. Const., that a citizen cannot be deprived of property without due process of law; (2) the guarantee in Art. II, sec. 29, Mont. Const., that property cannot be taken for public use without just compensation; and (3) a potential thwarting of this section, which guarantees a speedy trial, through the incentive by the county to prolong a criminal prosecution as long as possible in order to earn more interest on a bond deposit. Therefore, if the Clerk of Court deposits bond money in an interest-bearing account, then interest earned on the deposit belongs to the owner of the funds that generated the interest. Siroky v. Richland County, 271 M 67, 894 P2d 309, 52 St. Rep. 343 (1995), distinguishing Fresno Firefighters' Local 753 v. Jernagan, 222 Cal. Rep. 886, 177 Cal. App. 3d 403 (Cal. Ct. App. 5th Dist. 1986).

Right to Speedy Trial Violated — Dismissal Correct: Defendant was charged with alternate counts of forgery or theft. After a 298-day delay, attributable solely to the state, defendant moved to dismiss for lack of speedy trial, and the District Court granted the motion. The state appealed, and the Supreme Court affirmed. When the delay resulted from the court's failure to arraign the defendant, from its failure to rule on the defendant's pretrial motions, and from the prosecution's lack of diligence, the District Court was correct in granting the defendant's speedy trial motion and in dismissing the charges with prejudice. The Barker v. Wingo factors applied. St. v. Matthews, 271 M 24, 894 P2d 285, 52 St. Rep. 305 (1995), followed in St. v. Keating, 285 M 463, 949 P2d 251, 54 St. Rep. 1250 (1997).

District Court Review of Denial of Right to Speedy Trial in Justice's Court — Exception to Trial De Novo: As a general rule, the District Court must try all appeals from Justice's Court de novo and may not sit as a court of review. To ensure a defendant's adequate remedy at law, there is an exception to the general rule if the error complained of is lack of a speedy trial in Justice's Court because that error cannot be cured by trial de novo. Thus, the District Court may rule on a Justice's Court's denial of a motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial in the event that the defendant timely appeals the Justice's Court conviction and sentence to the District Court and raises the speedy trial issue as part of the appeal. State ex rel. Wilson v. District Court, 270 M 449, 893 P2d 318, 52 St. Rep. 264 (1995).

Six-Month Rule Applicable Only to Initial Trial in Justice's Court: Mantz was found guilty of misdemeanor assault in Justice's Court and appealed to the District Court for a trial de novo on January 22, 1993. On December 7, 1993, Mantz filed a motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial, maintaining that under 46-13-401, a defendant cannot be brought to trial on a misdemeanor charge after 6 months. As set out in St. v. Sunford, 244 M 411, 796 P2d 1084 (1990), 46-13-401 is inapplicable to situations in which a case comes from Justice's Court to a trial de novo in District Court. Because the District Court in this case properly applied the Barker v. Wingo test for determining speedy trial in finding that 46-13-401 applies only to the initial trial in Justice's Court, the motion to dismiss was properly denied. St. v. Mantz, 269 M 135, 887 P2d 251, 51 St. Rep. 1527 (1994). Sunford and Mantz were followed in St. v. Stanko, 1998 MT 323, 292 M 214, 974 P2d 1139, 55 St. Rep. 1313 (1998).

Delay of 692 Days With Two Appeals by State — No Damage to Defendant Shown: The delay of 692 days between arrest and trial was presumptively prejudicial to defendant. However, the delays caused by the state's two interlocutory appeals should not weigh heavily against the state because the appeals were meritorious and not in bad faith or for dilatory purposes. Defendant was incarcerated only about 90 of those days and did not show that his anxiety and concern over the deliberate homicide charge were aggravated by the delay or that his defense was prejudiced or impaired. St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457, 51 St. Rep. 1151 (1994).

Speedy Trial — Failure to Petition for Disposal of Charges Properly Considered by District Court in Attributing Delay to Defendant: Stewart was convicted on state theft and forgery charges and appealed his sentence to the Supreme Court, which stayed execution of the state sentence. Conspiracy and mail fraud charges were then filed by the United States, and Stewart was tried, convicted, and incarcerated. After Stewart's state conviction was overturned by the Supreme Court, a warrant was issued for his arrest on other state charges and a detainer was sent to the federal prison. Stewart was informed of his right to request final disposition of the state charges under Article III of the Interstate Agreement on Detainers, but he did not file a petition. Stewart was then released from federal prison and brought to Lincoln County, Montana, to face the state charges. He moved to dismiss the charges for lack of a speedy trial. The District Court denied the motion. The Supreme Court held that the District Court properly analyzed Stewart's speedy trial claim under the four-part test set forth in Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514 (1972). The record shows that 245 days elapsed from the filing of the detainer to Stewart's release to state officials for trial in Montana. Stewart was aware of his right to petition for disposition of the state charges during that time but failed to do so. The Supreme Court held that those days were therefore properly charged to Stewart and were not the fault of the state. The Supreme Court also found that Stewart was not prejudiced by the delay. St. v. Stewart, 266 M 525, 881 P2d 629, 51 St. Rep. 910 (1994).

Delay of 197 Days — Failure to Show Prejudice: When Eklund was arrested for charges of sexual intercourse without consent, he was already incarcerated on an unrelated charge. He was arraigned about 2 months later and had a jury trial 197 days after his arrest, having been incarcerated the entire time. Eklund moved for a mistrial, claiming denial of a speedy trial. The motion was properly denied because although the first three elements of the Barker test were met, Eklund failed to meet the fourth element—evidence that he was prejudiced by pretrial incarceration, anxiety or concern, or impairment of defense. St. v. Eklund, 264 M 420, 872 P2d 323, 51 St. Rep. 335 (1994).

Defendant's Eligibility for Prerelease and Parole Prejudiced by Lack of Speedy Trial: Barker was arrested and charged with felony theft. While awaiting arraignment, he was transferred and incarcerated in the state for an unrelated offense. The trial date was postponed several times by the trial court, and Barker's motion to dismiss on the grounds that he had been denied a speedy trial was denied by the trial court on the basis that the delays were caused by "institutional difficulties". Subsequently, the trial court again delayed the trial. The record was not clear as to the reason for the delay. Barker appealed his conviction on the basis that he had not received a speedy trial and the delay had prejudiced his eligibility for prerelease and parole. The Supreme Court ruled that the state had not satisfied its burden of rebutting the presumption of prejudice due to the delay and that the remedy when a defendant's right to speedy trial is violated is reversal and dismissal of the conviction. St. v. Barker, 261 M 379, 862 P2d 1112, 50 St. Rep. 1368 (1993).

Material Witness Unavailable — No Prejudice to Defendant — Delay Not Unconstitutional: The unavailability of counseling for a child sexual assault victim for 4½ months and the need to obtain such counseling before the victim would be able to testify constitutes a valid excuse for a 256-day delay. When defendant's pretrial incarceration was not oppressive, when there was no record that defendant was unduly anxious or concerned during the delay, and when the defense was not impaired by the state's delay, defendant's constitutional right to a speedy trial was not violated. St. v. Scott, 257 M 454, 850 P2d 286, 50 St. Rep. 353 (1993), followed in St. v. Williams-Rusch, 279 M 437, 928 P2d 169, 53 St. Rep. 1224 (1996).

Defendant Required to Show Prejudice Caused by Trial Delay: The Supreme Court refused to accept the defendant's argument that he had been prejudiced by a delay of 461 days in going to trial because the defendant failed to show that the delay exacerbated his anxiety and concern and failed to show that his defense was impaired by the delay. St. v. Hembd, 254 M 407, 838 P2d 412, 49 St. Rep. 788 (1992), followed in St. v. Foshee, 282 M 326, 938 P2d 601, 54 St. Rep. 370 (1997).

Delay Insufficient to Trigger Speedy Trial Analysis: A delay of 161 days between arrest and trial was held insufficient to trigger a prejudicial presumption requiring a speedy trial analysis. St. v. Dahms, 252 M 1, 825 P2d 1214, 49 St. Rep. 106 (1992).

Client Bound by Attorney's Waiver of Right to Speedy Trial — Purpose of Statute: After defendant's attorney orally waived defendant's rights to a speedy trial in Justice's Court, defendant argued in his trial de novo appeal to District Court that he, the defendant, was not bound by his attorney's waiver. Defendant asserted that 37-61-401 makes the waiver binding only if it was entered with the defendant's knowledge or upon the record in open court. Citing Bush v. Baker, 46 M 535, 129 P 550 (1913), the Supreme Court ruled that 37-61-401 has been applied only as to agreements between attorneys and that the purpose of that section is to relieve the presiding judge of the burden of determining disputes between attorneys concerning their unexecuted agreements. The Supreme Court stated that it would not apply 37-61-401 literally as to agreements between an attorney and the court; to do so would lead to absurd consequences and greatly retard the business of the courts. The Supreme Court held that the defendant was thus bound by his counsel's waiver. St. v. Nelson, 251 M 139, 822 P2d 1086, 48 St. Rep. 1129 (1991).

Speedy Trial Clock to Start With Date of De Novo Appeal From Justice's Court to District Court: After defendant's attorney orally waived defendant's rights to a speedy trial in Justice's Court, defendant argued in his trial de novo appeal to District Court that his right to a speedy trial was violated because the clock should have started with the date of his arrest, not the date of appeal to District Court. Citing St. v. Sanders, 163 M 209, 516 P2d 372 (1973), the Supreme Court noted that it had adopted Standard 12-2.2(c) of the American Bar Association Standards for Criminal Justice. The standard provides that in cases of appeal or an order for a new trial, the time for trial should begin running with the order granting the new trial or, in this case, the date of appeal to District Court. The Supreme Court determined not to abandon that standard and therefore held that defendant's trial was within the 6-month limitation of 46-13-401. St. v. Nelson, 251 M 139, 822 P2d 1086, 48 St. Rep. 1129 (1991).

Speedy Trial Not Denied by Application of Six-Month Speedy Trial Limitation to De Novo Appeal From Justice's Court to District Court: After defendant's attorney orally waived defendant's rights to a speedy trial in Justice's Court, defendant argued in his trial de novo appeal to District Court that his right to a speedy trial was violated because it is prejudicial to apply the speedy trial standards of 46-13-401 to an appeal from Justice's Court to District Court. The Supreme Court held that the argument was without merit because the 6-month limit was met in this case, both in the time for trial in Justice's Court and in the time for trial de novo in District Court. St. v. Nelson, 251 M 139, 822 P2d 1086, 48 St. Rep. 1129 (1991).

Uncertain Testimony of Defense Counsel Insufficient to Disprove Oral Waiver of Right to Speedy Trial: At the time scheduled for defendant's trial in Justice's Court on a DUI charge, the Justice of the Peace called defense counsel into his chambers and informed him that a different date for trial was necessary because of another trial then in progress. The Justice of the Peace then issued a written order reciting the fact that an oral motion for a continuance was made by defense counsel, along with an oral waiver of defendant's right to a speedy trial. Trial was then set for a date beyond the 6-month limitation provided for in 46-13-401. In a de novo appeal to District Court, defendant raised the issue of his right to a speedy trial, and defense counsel testified he could not remember whether he made an oral motion for continuance and a waiver. The Supreme Court found that the Justice's Court's order was presumed correct under 26-1-602(17) and that the testimony of defense counsel did not demonstrate that the order was in error in reciting the waiver. St. v. Nelson, 251 M 139, 822 P2d 1086, 48 St. Rep. 1129 (1991).

Defendant Not Adversely Affected by Counsel's Drug Arrest: Defendant appealed his conviction for possession of drugs and drug paraphernalia, alleging that he was denied effective assistance of counsel arising from a conflict of interest because his attorney was subsequently charged with conspiracy to manufacture and distribute drugs and with tax fraud arising from the sale of drugs. The Supreme Court held that because the performance of defendant's attorney was not adversely affected by an actual conflict of interest, defendant was not denied effective assistance of counsel under the two-pronged standard established by the U.S. Supreme Court in Cuyler v. Sullivan, 446 US 335, 64 L Ed 2d 333, 100 S Ct 1708 (1980). St. v. Christenson, 250 M 351, 820 P2d 1303, 48 St. Rep. 1034 (1991).

Failure to Trigger IAD Speedy Trial Provision: Wolfe argued that he had been denied a speedy trial because the state had failed to try him within 180 days as required by the Interstate Agreement on Detainers (IAD). The Supreme Court held that Wolfe had failed to file with the District Court the papers required by the IAD and therefore had failed to trigger the 180-day provision. St. v. Wolfe, 250 M 400, 821 P2d 339, 48 St. Rep. 1001 (1991).

Speedy Trial — Time to Run From Date Defendant Accused in Youth Court: Daniels argued that he had been denied a speedy trial because the total amount of the delay was 322 days from the date of his appearance in Youth Court. The state contended that the period ran from the date the trial was transferred to the District Court. The Supreme Court held that the time started to run from the date of the appearance in the Youth Court but that the defendant was responsible for a majority of the delay because he resisted transfer of the case to the District Court. St. v. Daniels, 248 M 343, 811 P2d 1286, 48 St. Rep. 464 (1991).

Chargeable Delay of Ninety-Six Days Not Prejudicial: Of 193 days between trial in Justice's Court and trial de novo in District Court, 97 were attributable to defendant and 96 to the state. A delay of 96 days was held not sufficiently prejudicial to defendant to constitute a violation of the right to a speedy trial. St. v. Sunford, 244 M 411, 796 P2d 1084, 47 St. Rep. 1684 (1990), followed in St. v. Jenkins, 262 M 117, 863 P2d 438, 50 St. Rep. 1471 (1993).

Proof of Prejudice Occasioned by Delay Required to Raise Due Process Concern: Delay alone is not adequate to raise a due process concern absent some proof of prejudice occasioned by the delay. In alleging prejudice due to appellate delay, defendant must show that he: (1) is unable to present an adequate appeal because of the delay; or (2) will be unable to defend adequately in the event a retrial is ordered. St. v. Black, 245 M 39, 798 P2d 530, 47 St. Rep. 1677 (1990), following U.S. v. Alston, 412 A2d 351 (D.C. 1980), St. v. Chapple, 660 P2d 1208 (Ariz. 1983), and St. v. Hall, 487 A2d 166 (Vt. 1984), and followed in Bone v. St., 284 M 293, 944 P2d 734, 54 St. Rep. 890 (1997).

Computing Delay When Defendant Tried Twice: The defendant's first trial ended in a mistrial. Prior to the second trial, the defendant moved for dismissal on the grounds that he had been denied a speedy trial. The motion was denied, and he was convicted at the second trial. The Supreme Court acknowledged that in St. v. Sanders, 163 M 209, 516 P2d 372 (1973), it had adopted the rule that the time for trial commences to run following a mistrial. However, the court stated that the present case was distinguishable because the defendant only claimed the delay prior to his first trial to be unreasonable. In examining the reasons for the delay, the court held that although the delay was mostly attributable to the state, it was not purposeful and the defendant did not show that he was prejudiced. St. v. Marquardt, 243 M 133, 793 P2d 799, 47 St. Rep. 1078 (1990).

Delay of 281 Days in Complex Trial Not Prejudicial: A delay of 281 days was sufficient to be presumptively prejudicial and to trigger further analysis of assertions of prejudice. The Supreme Court failed to specify the number of days of delay attributable to each party, noting the state, the defendant, and the court all contributed to the delay. However, this was an extremely complex case, with over 40 witnesses and 94 state exhibits, and included the filing of numerous motions by defendant and a delay of 5 months before he filed the bulk of his pretrial motions. The record showed no dilatoriness on the part of the state, and the defendant failed to demonstrate that he was prejudiced by the delay or that his defense was impaired. The delay of 281 days, viewed against the complexity of the case and relevant factors, did not deny defendant's right to a speedy trial. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990).

Delay Not Prejudicial: The Supreme Court attributed 66 days of the trial date delay to the state. The court held that the delay was long enough to trigger a speedy trial inquiry but that the defendant had not demonstrated that he was prejudiced in any way by the delay. St. v. Sorensen, 243 M 321, 792 P2d 363, 47 St. Rep. 873 (1990).

Delay Raises Presumption of Prejudice: The Supreme Court held that the goal of a speedy trial guaranty is not simply speed but the orderly disposition of criminal proceedings while preventing oppressive tactics by the prosecution. The court stated that a 291-day delay was sufficient to raise a presumption of prejudice requiring further inquiry. In the case before it, the court ruled that 252 days of the delay were chargeable to the state and were incurred as the result of the election of a new judge. The court stated that such institutional delays are weighed against the state but not as heavily as delays resulting from oppressive tactics. St. v. Curtis, 241 M 288, 787 P2d 306, 47 St. Rep. 277 (1990).

Institutional Delays Chargeable to State: The Supreme Court held that the election of a new judge was responsible for 252 days of delay in the commencement of the defendant's trial. The court stated that such institutional delays are weighed against the state but not as heavily as delays resulting from oppressive tactics. St. v. Curtis, 241 M 288, 787 P2d 306, 47 St. Rep. 277 (1990), followed in St. v. Atkins, 277 M 103, 920 P2d 481, 53 St. Rep. 561 (1996).

Prejudice Claim Based on Speculation: The defendant claimed that she had been prejudiced by the delay in obtaining a trial because the victim, who had become incompetent, could have testified on her behalf at an earlier time. The Supreme Court held that the facts of the case indicated that, when competent, the victim may have testified against the defendant rather than for her and therefore the claim of prejudice was based on speculation and was not grounds for dismissal. St. v. Curtis, 241 M 288, 787 P2d 306, 47 St. Rep. 277 (1990).

Six-Month Time Limit for Misdemeanor Trial Not Violated When Defendant Requested Delay: The defendant in a DUI case asked for a continuance to enter a guilty plea so that the 5-year period would run on a prior DUI conviction before his guilty plea on the second violation. Subsequently, the defendant pleaded not guilty and moved for dismissal on the basis that the statutory 6-month period to try a misdemeanor had elapsed. The Supreme Court held that the 6-month period did not run when it was the defendant rather than the state who was responsible for the delay. St. v. Crane, 240 M 235, 784 P2d 901, 46 St. Rep. 2082 (1989).

Delay Resulting From Defendant's Motion to Substitute Judge: The defendant was held responsible for 82 days of a 201-day delay on the basis that his motion to substitute a new judge accounted for that portion of the delay. St. v. Wiman, 236 M 180, 769 P2d 1200, 46 St. Rep. 279 (1989).

Time Necessary to Adjudicate Pretrial Motions — Delay Justified: Defendant contended that a delay caused by the state mandated dismissal because his speedy trial rights were violated. Part of the delays associated with pretrial controversies regarding appointment of counsel, request for transcript, motion to dismiss, and change of venue motion was properly attributable to the state; however, the delay caused by the pretrial motions and appeals was justified by the complexity and need for evidence in the counsel issue and by the lack of a showing that the prosecution acted intentionally to delay. St. v. Forsyth, 233 M 389, 761 P2d 363, 45 St. Rep. 1577 (1988), distinguishing St. v. Bailey, 201 M 473, 655 P2d 494 (1982).

Institutional Delay Chargeable to State: Institutional delay in an arson case was caused by a separate suit brought by a newspaper to test the constitutionality of 46-10-201 (now repealed), which defendant invoked to close the proceedings to the press and public, and by the state's inaction in the face of that suit, resulting in a 214-day delay in prosecution. Although institutional, the delay was chargeable to the state, which had the power to choose the method of prosecution but also had a concomitant duty to bring the accused to trial. The delay was excessive and unjustified, and the information was properly dismissed by the trial court. St. v. Wombolt, 231 M 400, 753 P2d 330, 45 St. Rep. 714 (1988).

Affirmative Attempt by Defendant to Get to Trial Required to Trigger Speedy Trial Protection: The right to a speedy trial does not protect a defendant who makes a transparent assertion of the right or sleeps on his rights during the course of a proceeding only to belatedly claim injustice as the day of reckoning draws near. Defendant could not cry denial of a speedy trial when he never affirmatively attempted to force the issue to a trial on the merits, but rather engaged in a continued course of tactics designed to delay trial. St. v. Wirtala, 231 M 264, 752 P2d 177, 45 St. Rep. 596 (1988).

Anxiety and Concern Not Violative of Right to Speedy Trial: Defendant contended he suffered anxiety and concern sufficient to violate his right to a speedy trial. A defendant's anxiety and concern are not dispositive. It is but a factor to be considered in determining prejudice. The crucial factor in determining prejudice is whether the defense has been impaired. Absent impairment and in light of lack of excessiveness of defendant's anxiety and concern beyond that inherent in being accused of a crime, the District Court properly denied defendant's motion to dismiss for denial of a speedy trial. St. v. Waters, 228 M 490, 743 P2d 617, 44 St. Rep. 1705 (1987), followed in St. v. Van Voast, 247 M 194, 805 P2d 1380, 48 St. Rep. 160 (1991). See also St. v. Kipp, 1999 MT 197, 295 M 399, 984 P2d 733, 56 St. Rep. 762 (1999).

Period of Delay Following Grant of Continuance Chargeable Against Defendant: Where trial would have occurred within 6 months of the filing of the charge had defendant not moved for continuance, the period of delay was chargeable to defendant and the state did not have the burden of explaining the delay or showing absence of prejudice to defendant. St. v. Moehr, 227 M 253, 738 P2d 499, 44 St. Rep. 1058 (1987).

Speedy Trial — Incarceration in Another State — Delays Attributable to Defendant: Eleven days after his arraignment in Montana for burglary, defendant was arrested in Idaho for burglary and felony theft, convicted, and sentenced to the Idaho State Prison for 5 years. On January 22, 1985, Montana filed a detainer in Idaho. Defendant asserted his right to a speedy trial in Montana by requesting final disposition of the charges against him on June 19, 1985. Defendant requested a delay of his trial on September 3, 1985, and trial was held on October 22, 1985. Defendant appealed his conviction in Montana on the grounds that his right to a speedy trial had been violated and the charges against him should have been dismissed. The Supreme Court found that a total of 196 days of the 393-day delay were attributable to defendant. The presumption that defendant did not receive a speedy trial, which was raised by the 393-day delay between defendant's arrest and his trial, was satisfactorily overcome. Defendant's own conduct prevented the state from bringing him to trial within 180 days. He cannot now complain that he was not given a speedy trial. St. v. Grant, 227 M 181, 738 P2d 106, 44 St. Rep. 994 (1987), followed in St. v. Stewart, 266 M 525, 881 P2d 629, 51 St. Rep. 910 (1994), and St. v. Brekke, 2017 MT 81, 387 Mont. 218, 392 P.3d 570.

Defendant Liable for 83 of 189 Days — Motion on Day of Trial — No Unfair Prejudice Shown From Denial: The time between arrest and trial was 189 days, and defendant's two granted motions for continuance accounted for 83 days, making the remaining 106 days well within Montana's acceptable delay limit. Asserting the right to a speedy trial on the day of the trial was not timely. No unfair prejudice was shown to result from denial of the motion. The court properly denied a motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial. St. v. Walker, 225 M 415, 733 P2d 352, 44 St. Rep. 363 (1987).

Denial of Speedy Trial — Failure to Meet Threshold Test: Kerns appealed his forgery conviction, arguing that the District Court's denial of motions to dismiss for lack of speedy trial constituted institutional delay and violated his right to a speedy trial. The Supreme Court ruled that unless there is a period of delay long enough to be presumptively prejudicial, no inquiry is required. Since Kerns failed to meet Montana's four-part threshold test, no presumption of delay attaches. St. v. Kerns, 223 M 172, 725 P2d 1190, 43 St. Rep. 1632 (1986), followed in St. v. Smith, 232 M 156, 755 P2d 569, 45 St. Rep. 955 (1988), and in St. v. Wiman, 236 M 180, 769 P2d 1200, 46 St. Rep. 279 (1989).

Institutional Delay — No Prejudice When Defendant Already Incarcerated: A 256-day delay triggered the four-part Barker test and shifted the burden to the prosecution to give a reasonable excuse for the delay or show why the delay did not prejudice the defendant. Sixty-one days of the delay were attributable to defendants; the remaining 195 days were attributable to institutional delay, which weighs less heavily against the state in the Barker balancing process. Defendant was not prejudiced by the delay because he was already incarcerated on another charge and there was no evidence of additional or unusual anxiety. St. v. Palmer, 223 M 25, 723 P2d 956, 43 St. Rep. 1503 (1986).

Delay Charged to Defendant: No denial of defendant's right to speedy trial occurred where defendant had previously filed multiple waivers of his right to speedy trial, pending a great number of motions and voluminous supporting briefs, and subsequently was granted an extension to allow substitution of counsel, which resulted in an additional 2-month delay. St. v. Harvey, 219 M 402, 713 P2d 517, 43 St. Rep. 46 (1986).

Denial of Right to Speedy Trial — When Presumption of Prejudice Arises: Defendant was not tried on DUI charge for nearly 13 months after being charged. The Supreme Court held that the delay of 13 months was sufficient to shift burden to the prosecution to explain reason for delay and to create a presumption that the delay had prejudiced the defendant. Here the prosecution neither explained the delay nor offered evidence to rebut the presumption of prejudice. Hamilton v. Hayden, 218 M 425, 709 P2d 156, 42 St. Rep. 1708 (1985).

Delay for Transfer to Answer Another County's Charges — No Violation: For speedy trial purposes, a 52-day delay during which defendant was transferred to another county to answer charges filed in that county could not be charged against the state. St. v. Robbins, 218 M 107, 708 P2d 227, 42 St. Rep. 1440 (1985).

General Extradition Delay Rules: For speedy trial purposes, those days during which an accused resists extradition will be included in the period of delay, and only those days will be charged against the accused. Those days during which the prosecution either does not diligently demand extradition or diligently pursue it will be included in the period of delay and charged against the prosecution. Those days during which the prosecution diligently pursues extradition and the accused does not resist it will not be included in the period of delay, and inclusion of those days, as in St. v. Ackley, 201 M 252, 653 P2d 851, 39 St. Rep. 2091 (1982), is no longer the rule. St. v. Robbins, 218 M 107, 708 P2d 227, 42 St. Rep. 1440 (1985).

No Presumption of Prejudice in Acceptable Delay: For speedy trial purposes, a 104-day delay was well within the guidelines for acceptable length of delay and was not presumptively prejudicial. Thus, the other three parts of the Barker test need not be considered. St. v. Robbins, 218 M 107, 708 P2d 227, 42 St. Rep. 1440 (1985).

Right to Speedy Trial Separable From Claim of Double Jeopardy — Speedy Trial Issue to Await Retrial: Following mistrial because of a jury deadlock, defendant petitioned for a Writ of Supervisory Control, claiming double jeopardy and lack of speedy trial. The court refused to take jurisdiction, but proceeded to reject defendant's claim of double jeopardy. The court held, however, that defendant's claim of denial of right to speedy trial was generically different from his claim of double jeopardy. The speedy trial issue could not be considered until the retrial was held and all of the facts presented to the Supreme Court on appeal. At that time, the issue would be ready for decision. State ex rel. Forsyth v. District Court, 216 M 480, 701 P2d 1346, 42 St. Rep. 965 (1985).

Barker Analysis Triggered — Right to Speedy Trial Not Violated: Although defendant's trial was significantly delayed, insufficient valid reason was given for the delay, and defendant asserted his right to a speedy trial in a timely manner, the fourth factor in Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514, 33 L Ed 2d 101, 92 S Ct 2182 (1972), prejudice to the defendant, was not demonstrated when no showing was made of excessive incarceration, significant anxiety, or impairment of defendant's defense. St. v. Sanderson, 214 M 437, 692 P2d 479, 42 St. Rep. 94 (1985).

Defendant Not Prejudiced by Institutional Delay: Defendant was not denied his right to a speedy trial. He was ready for trial, and the State indicated its readiness for trial in a timely fashion. There were no oppressive tactics employed. The cause for the 214-day delay is narrowed to pure institutional delay, and only that may be balanced against the defendant's prejudice. The State carried its burden of showing lack of prejudice, and, when the burden shifted, the defendant failed to present evidence that he was prejudiced by the delay. St. v. Chavez, 213 M 434, 691 P2d 1365, 41 St. Rep. 2219 (1984), followed in St. v. Haskins, 220 M 199, 714 P2d 119, 43 St. Rep. 290 (1986). See also St. v. Bartnes, 234 M 522, 764 P2d 1271, 45 St. Rep. 2101 (1988).

Delay of 396 Days — 360 Days of Institutional Delay: Defendant was tried 396 days after filing the complaint in Justice's Court. The Supreme Court held that 360 to 368 days of that time were caused by state "institutional delays", primarily caused by prosecutorial inaction, and thus, because a defendant has no duty to prosecute himself, the state failed in its duty to speedily try the defendant. In analyzing the four factors adopted in Barker v. Wingo, the court held that the state failed in its burden relating to the length and reason of delay, that the state failed to sufficiently rebut the presumption that the delay resulted in prejudice to the defendant, and that the assertion requirement by the defendant is fulfilled when a defendant asserts his right to a speedy trial at any time before the trial. St. v. Britton, 213 M 155, 689 P2d 1256, 41 St. Rep. 2018 (1984), followed in St. v. Haskins, 220 M 199, 714 P2d 119, 43 St. Rep. 290 (1986), and St. v. Tweedy, 277 M 313, 922 P2d 1134, 53 St. Rep. 656 (1996). See also St. v. Kipp, 1999 MT 197, 295 M 399, 984 P2d 733, 56 St. Rep. 762 (1999).

"Speedy Trial" Tests to Apply Only to Felony Cases: The defendant was charged with a misdemeanor offense. As the State did not prosecute within the 6-month statutory deadline, the charge was dismissed. The State contends that a speedy trial constitutional analysis should be applied in determining whether the State has demonstrated good cause for its failure to meet the 6-month deadline. However, the speedy trial constitutional tests apply only in the case of felonies and will not be applied in misdemeanor cases if, as here, the statutory deadline is more strict than any constitutional analysis would be required to be. The statute contains the sole standard for determining whether good cause for the delay has been shown. St. v. Ronningen, 213 M 358, 691 P2d 1348, 41 St. Rep. 2168 (1984).

Delay Chargeable to Defendant — Barker Analysis Not Triggered: Although there was a 401-day time lapse between the day of the homicide and the start of the trial, the Supreme Court said the delay was largely attributable to the defendant. There was insufficient time elapsed chargeable to the state to trigger the analysis required under Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514, 33 L Ed 2d 101, 92 S Ct 2182 (1972). St. v. Daniels, 210 M 1, 682 P2d 173, 41 St. Rep. 880 (1984).

Delay by Stand-By Counsel — Attributable to Defendant: Defendant was charged with criminal mischief relating to tire-slashing. A complaint was filed on October 27, 1982. Defendant was arrested the next day and remained in custody until the date of his trial, 182 days later. Defendant contended he was denied his right to a speedy trial. A delay of 182 days is sufficient to trigger the inquiry into the right to a speedy trial. Defendant argued that the 56 days consumed by motions to set trial date and for continuance, made by stand-by counsel while defendant was proceeding pro se, are not chargeable to him. The court held defendant could not gain advantage by jockeying between use and nonuse of defense counsel. The counsel's actions were part of the defense. Although the court found the remaining 126-day delay troublesome, it found that the prosecution was reasonably diligent. Defense preparation was not hindered. The delay was within permissible limits. St. v. Brown, 209 M 502, 680 P2d 582, 41 St. Rep. 852 (1984).

Legislative Implementation of Constitution: While this section does not specify the exact period of time that must elapse before the right to a speedy trial has been violated, the Legislature did implement this section by specifying that unless good cause is shown, a misdemeanor must be dismissed if not brought to trial within 6 months. See 46-13-401. St. v. Knox, 207 M 537, 675 P2d 950, 41 St. Rep. 126 (1984).

Delays Resulting From Defendant's Refusal to Waive Extradition — Right to Speedy Trial Not Violated: The defendant was arrested on burglary and other charges on April 21. He decided on May 18 not to waive extradition to Montana. A Governor's warrant was issued on June 15, and defendant waived extradition on June 30. He had his initial appearance on July 6, an information was filed against him on July 22, and he was arraigned on July 29. The trial was begun after several delays, on November 2. The District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion to dismiss the charges because his right to a speedy trial was violated. The delay caused by the extradition proceedings was a delay of the defendant's own making, so the time period of that delay, 60 days, must be subtracted from the time of total delay. Under the rationale of Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514 (1972), and St. v. Fife, 193 M 486, 632 P2d 712, 38 St. Rep. 1334 (1981) (concluding that a delay of 194 days was presumptively prejudicial to the defendant's right to a speedy trial), the court could not say that the remaining delay of 135 days was prejudicial to the defendant, and under those cases, his right was therefore not violated. St. v. Smith, 206 M 99, 670 P2d 96, 40 St. Rep. 1533 (1983).

Prejudice Required to Be Shown: Defendant escaped from prison and was recaptured. There was a 184-day delay from arrest to trial and conviction on the escape charge. Although the delay was significant, the court, relying on St. v. Burtchett, 165 M 280, 530 P2d 471, certiorari denied, 420 US 974 (1974), stated that a case may not be dismissed for a violation of the right to a speedy trial unless prejudice to the defendant is shown. St. v. Allen, 203 M 290, 663 P2d 690, 40 St. Rep. 455 (1983).

Attributable Delay: Defendants escaped from the Montana State Prison on February 15, 1982, and were apprehended February 20, 1982. From the date the defendants were arrested until their trial 207 days elapsed. This delay was sufficient to trigger a speedy trial inquiry and shift the burden of explanation to the state. Of the 207 days, 108 days were attributable to defendants' motions for substitution of judge and change of venue. Although merely asserting their procedural rights, the delay caused by the defendants does not weigh against the state. The 99 days attributable to the state are clearly within the permissible limits set by the Supreme Court. St. v. Kelly, 203 M 159, 661 P2d 26, 40 St. Rep. 364 (1983).

Economic Damage as Prejudice: Defendant quit a job in Indiana to return to Montana to face criminal charges. Economic hardship is recognized as one form of prejudice that can flow from the deprivation of a defendant's speedy trial right. St. v. Bailey, 201 M 473, 655 P2d 494, 39 St. Rep. 2242 (1982), distinguished in St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 180, 300 M 367, 4 P3d 654, 57 St. Rep. 727 (2000).

Length of Delay Between First and Second Information: The defendant was charged with attempted sale of dangerous drugs (now criminal distribution of dangerous drugs). The information was dismissed for failure to follow 46-11-203. Several attempts were made by the State to reinstate the information. A new information was eventually filed. Defendant alleged that he was denied a speedy trial and argued that the time between the first and second information should be included in the length of delay. The Supreme Court agreed. During that time the defendant was an accused, thus the right to a speedy trial attaches. St. v. Bailey, 201 M 473, 655 P2d 494, 39 St. Rep. 2242 (1982), distinguished in St. v. Forsyth, 233 M 389, 761 P2d 363, 45 St. Rep. 1577 (1988).

Speedy Trial — Preindictment Delay: Speedy trial guarantees in criminal cases do not extend to the period prior to the formal accusation or arrest. However, see St. v. Taylor, 1998 MT 121, 289 M 63, 960 P2d 773, 55 St. Rep. 481 (1998), in which the issue is raised to a level of constitutional scrutiny for analysis of preindictment delay. St. v. Goltz, 197 M 361, 642 P2d 1079, 39 St. Rep. 613 (1982), followed in St. v. Bartnes, 234 M 522, 764 P2d 1271, 45 St. Rep. 2101 (1988).

Delay Causing No Prejudice: Creekmore's trial for felony deceptive practices was delayed for 11 months for various reasons. The court focused on the fourth part of the four-part Barker test in addressing the issue of a lack of a speedy trial and held that the defendant was not prejudiced by the delay. The court quoted from the Barker case while discussing the possible prejudice caused by the delay. The three interests to be protected are: (1) to prevent oppressive incarceration; (2) to minimize anxiety; and (3) to limit the possibility that the defense will be impaired. The court found that none of these interests were impaired in this case. St. v. Creekmore, 196 M 187, 640 P2d 439, 39 St. Rep. 22 (1982).

Speedy Trial — Four-Part Test: The defendant was first tried and convicted of robbery on April 17, 1979. His conviction was reversed on appeal and remanded for a new trial. Remittitur was ordered April 10, 1980. The State took no further action until Sept. 11, 1980, when the District Court granted an order authorizing the return of the defendant from prison to the county jail. On Oct. 17, 1980, defendant moved for dismissal based on a deprivation of his right to a speedy trial. The motion was denied, and defendant was again convicted at trial that began on Oct. 21, 1980. The Supreme Court ordered reversal and dismissal of this cause because defendant's guarantee to a speedy trial had been violated. The court applied the four-part standard of review stated in Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514, 92 S Ct 2182, 33 L Ed 2d 101 (1972). St. v. Fife, 193 M 486, 632 P2d 712, 38 St. Rep. 1334 (1981). See also St. v. Kipp, 1999 MT 197, 295 M 399, 984 P2d 733, 56 St. Rep. 762 (1999).

Right to Speedy Trial — When Right Attaches: Appellant claimed unnecessary delay deprived him of his right to a speedy trial, and he blamed the Supreme Court for its delay in the resolution of his first appeal. No new trial had been specifically ordered when the court heard his first appeal and reversed his conviction. The Supreme Court disagreed, saying its supporting opinion made its holding clear. The crucial time frame, accordingly, began at the time of the remittitur. In this case, the elapsed time between the remittitur and the appellant's second trial was 33 days. Speedy trial right was not violated. St. v. Cardwell, 191 M 539, 625 P2d 553, 38 St. Rep. 451 (1981), following St. v. Sanders, 163 M 209, 516 P2d 372 (1973), and followed in St. v. Wiman, 236 M 180, 769 P2d 1200, 46 St. Rep. 279 (1989).

Right to Due Process and Speedy Trial Denied — When Defendant Becomes "Accused" — Insufficient Reason for Delay — Prejudice to Defendant: Where 376 days elapsed between the filing of a complaint in Justice's Court charging the defendant with arson and the filing of an information in District Court and 423 days elapsed between the defendant's arrest and the defendant's scheduled trial, the court did not err in dismissing with prejudice for lack of a speedy trial the information charging the defendant with arson. Because the defendant became an "accused" on the day the complaint was filed against him in Justice's Court, because the State failed without good reason to diligently pursue the charges against the defendant, and because the defendant had asserted the denial of his right to a speedy trial and had shown prejudice in his plausible claims that he was no longer able to recall facts constituting an alibi and was no longer able to discover physical evidence for use in his defense independently of that evidence found by the prosecution, the defendant satisfied the requirements to prove a violation of his constitutional right to a speedy trial. St. v. Larson, 191 M 257, 623 P2d 954, 38 St. Rep. 213 (1981), followed in St. v. Jenkins, 262 M 117, 863 P2d 438, 50 St. Rep. 1471 (1993).

Speedy Trial — Time in Federal Court Not Counted: Armstrong maintained that his right to a speedy public trial was denied. One factor to be considered when addressing this issue is the length of the delay in trial. Armstrong asserts that there was a 3½-year delay. The court, however, did not count over 3 years of that delay because Armstrong's appeal to the federal courts removed the case from the jurisdiction of the District Court. After subtracting the time during which this case was in the appellate courts, the period of delay, 108 days, is not long enough to be considered presumptively prejudicial. St. v. Armstrong, 189 M 407, 616 P2d 341, 37 St. Rep. 1563 (1980).

Long Delay Without Show of Prejudice — Denial of Dismissal: When defendant presented no defense at trial and demonstrated no prejudice whatsoever from delay of robbery trial, there was no error in District Court's denial of motion to dismiss for lack of speedy trial, even though: (1) there had been a delay of 319 days (although the defendant had been incarcerated on other charges elsewhere during this time); (2) most of the delay was the fault of the State unrelated to the complexity of the case; and (3) defendant asserted his right to a speedy trial on six separate occasions. A balance of all factors demonstrated defendant was not prejudiced by a lack of a speedy trial. St. v. Worden, 188 M 94, 611 P2d 185 (1980).

Assertion of the Right: The defendant's assertion of his right to a speedy trial is entitled to strong evidentiary weight in determining whether the defendant is being deprived of the right. However, even though the defendant moved to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial prior to the trial's commencement, the fact that the defendant had previously indicated that he intended to call 120 witnesses, expected the trial to last 2 months, and had at various times asserted to the judge that because of the complexity of the case he could not possibly be prepared to defend himself weighs heavily against any prejudice in the time lapse between filing and trial. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Defendant's Desire for Speed Not Shown: When defendant's speedy trial objections were commingled with periodic claims that he could not be ready for trial up to the day the trial commenced, the court could not find in the record a genuine desire for a speedy trial, making any prejudice minimal. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Length of Delay: In utilizing the balancing test to determine whether a defendant's right to a speedy trial has been violated, the length of the delay is a triggering mechanism; unless there is some delay that is presumptively prejudicial, there is no necessity for inquiry into other factors. The length of delay that will provoke inquiry into other factors is dependent on the particular circumstances of each case. If the case is a complex one, the delay that can be tolerated is considerably more than for an ordinary street crime. Even in a complex case, the passage of 517 days from the filing of the information and defendant's motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial is sufficient under the circumstances to trigger an inquiry into other factors to determine if the defendant's right to a speedy trial has been violated, especially when 205 days must be charged to the State because of its appeal of a change of venue order. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

No Delay in Filing Second Information: The dismissal of a first information and the filing of a second information constituted no delay when three individuals were dropped from the information and six individuals were added, but the basic motions of the defendant against either information remained the same. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Prejudice: Defendant's claim that a delay prejudiced him through economic hardship, death of witnesses, pretrial publicity of a long duration, difficulty of finding and interviewing State's witnesses, and emotional stress and strain was insufficient to show prejudice when the defendant's economic hardship, emotional stress and strain, and the consumption of time were commingled with several other legal proceedings involving the defendant and no credible evidence was ever given as to when witnesses had died and what their testimony would have been. The defendant must make a showing of prejudice, and mere self-serving assertions are insufficient. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Weight of Reasons for Delay: A deliberate attempt to hamper the defense should be weighed heavily against the government. A more neutral reason such as negligence or overcrowded courts should be weighed less heavily but nevertheless should be considered since the ultimate responsibility for such circumstances rests with the government rather than the defendant. A valid reason, such as a missing witness, should serve to justify an appropriate delay. When the most serious delay on the part of the prosecution is 205 days taken up for an appeal of a change of venue order and there is no showing or attempt to show in the record that the delay was a deliberate attempt to delay the trial in order to hamper the defense, even though it appears that the delay may have been the result of crowded courts and some negligence on the part of the State, the time should be weighed less heavily but nevertheless considered. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Retrial Because of Lost Transcript Notes: Defendant did not oppose an order granting him a new trial because the court reporter lost his trial notes but alleged double jeopardy when he failed to get acquitted at the second trial. No valid double jeopardy claim existed because the defendant was not forced to accept retrial. He had available to him procedures under 46-20-304, albeit not totally sufficient, to appeal without benefit of an actual verbatim transcript. Allegations of violation of the right to a speedy trial were unfounded since the initial trial was timely. St. v. Hodgson, 184 M 394, 603 P2d 246 (1979).

Determining Factors — Burden — Unintentional Delay: The length of the delay, the reason for the delay, the defendant's assertion of his speedy trial rights, and prejudice to the defendant are factors all of which must be considered together with other relevant circumstances. The court must engage in a difficult and sensitive balancing process. A delay of 249 days between arrest and trial shifts the burden of explaining the reason for the delay and the absence of prejudice to the State. Unintentional delay, such as the inability of the State to provide a judge to hear the case and the inadvertent scheduling of the trial on a holiday, must be weighed less heavily than intentional delay in determining the validity of a speedy trial claim. Prejudice to the defendant because of delay is ascertained with a consideration of the following interests of a claimant: (1) prevention of oppressive pretrial incarceration; (2) minimization of anxiety or concern of the accused; and (3) limitation of the possibility the defense will be impaired. St. v. Dess, 184 M 116, 602 P2d 142 (1979).

Not Applicable to Parole Revocation Proceeding: Since a speedy trial under the sixth amendment to the United States Constitution and Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., is guaranteed only in "criminal prosecutions", it does not apply in proceeding for revocation of probation. St. v. Oppelt, 184 M 48, 601 P2d 394 (1979), followed, as to suspended sentence revocation proceedings, in St. v. Watts, 221 M 104, 717 P2d 24, 43 St. Rep. 670 (1986).

Accrual of Right: To determine whether a defendant has been denied due process because of a lack of a speedy trial, the time begins to run from the day of arrest and not the day the amended information was filed. He was accused of a crime on the day of his arrest, and his right to a speedy trial accrued as of that date. A pretrial delay of 207 days is sufficiently long to trigger a speedy trial inquiry and shift to the State the burden of explaining the delay and showing absence of prejudice. St. v. Freeman, 183 M 334, 599 P2d 368 (1979).

Lack of Prejudice: A showing that the defendant was incarcerated from the time of his arrest until his trial without a showing that he lost essential witnesses or that his right to a fair trial was impaired is not sufficient evidence of prejudice to him. The delay was due, in large part, to the filing and consideration of numerous defense motions. Since no prejudice has been shown and most of the delay is attributable to the defendant, the court finds that he was not denied due process because of a lack of a speedy trial. St. v. Freeman, 183 M 334, 599 P2d 368 (1979), followed in St. v. Boyer, 208 M 258, 676 P2d 787, 41 St. Rep. 321 (1984).

Factors to Consider — Delay of 317 Days: There are four factors to be considered in determining whether the right to a speedy trial is violated: (1) length of delay; (2) reason for delay; (3) defendant's assertion of the right; and (4) prejudice to the defendant. Length of delay is a triggering mechanism, and a delay of 317 days is sufficient to trigger an inquiry into the other factors. A delay due to the operation of the system is chargeable to the State. An accused must take some affirmative action to obtain a trial to be entitled to a discharge for delay. This burden is satisfied by making an appropriate motion. The incarceration of the defendant for the period of the delay demonstrates affirmative prejudice against him. St. v. Puzio, 182 M 163, 595 P2d 1163 (1979).

Defendant Responsible for Majority of Delay: Defendant was not denied his right to a speedy trial even though a substantial delay of 330 days occurred. The reasons for the delay were the normal initial period to allow the defense to prepare its case and a longer period to allow the defendant to leave the state to work. United States ex rel. Collins v. Crist, 473 F. Supp. 1354 (D.C. Mont. 1979), followed in St. v. Pease, 227 M 424, 740 P2d 659, 44 St. Rep. 1203 (1987).

Adoption of Balancing Test: In determining whether a particular defendant had been deprived of his right to a speedy trial, the court would adopt balancing test to be applied on a case-by-case basis, taking into account the length and reasons for delay, defendant's assertion of his right, and any prejudice resulting from the delay. St. v. Tiedemann, 178 M 394, 584 P2d 1284 (1978);

State ex rel. Sanford v. District Court, 170 M 22, 551 P2d 1005 (1976); St. v. Steward, 168 M 385, 543 P2d 178 (1975), followed in St. v. Jenkins, 262 M 117, 863 P2d 438, 50 St. Rep. 1471 (1993).

Question of Speedy Trial Not Proper Issue in Extradition Proceeding: The issue of lack of speedy trial is not properly cognizable by a court of the asylum state in a habeas corpus proceeding in that court contesting extradition to another state. In re Hart, 178 M 235, 583 P2d 411 (1978).

Failure of Defendant to Meet Burden: Defendant failed to meet the criteria necessary to show he had been denied a speedy trial as set forth in Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514, 92 S Ct 2182 (1972). St. v. Collins, 178 M 36, 582 P2d 1179 (1978).

Motion for Dismissal Granted: The court properly granted defendant's motion to dismiss on the ground defendant had been denied his right to a speedy trial, after weighing conduct of the prosecution and the defendant. As a guide to the application of the balancing test, four factors from Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514 (1972), were utilized: (1) length of delay; (2) reason for delay; (3) assertion of the right by defendant; and (4) prejudice to the defendant. St. v. Cassidy, 176 M 385, 578 P2d 735 (1978).

Dismissal for Excessive Delay: When there has been an excessive delay in prosecution with no viable justification demonstrated and defendants' assertion of the right to a speedy trial was proper and timely, the case must be dismissed because of the resulting prejudice. State ex rel. Briceno v. District Court, 173 M 516, 568 P2d 162 (1977).

Federal Standard Adopted: Montana has adopted and applied the four-factor balancing test applied in Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514, 92 S Ct 2182 (1972), in determining the speedy trial issue: (1) length of delay; (2) reasons for the delay; (3) assertion of the right by defendant; and (4) prejudice to defendant. St. v. Carden, 173 M 77, 566 P2d 780 (1977), distinguished in St. v. Matthews, 271 M 24, 894 P2d 285, 52 St. Rep. 305 (1995). See also St. v. Keating, 285 M 463, 949 P2d 251, 54 St. Rep. 1250 (1997).

Justifiable Delay of 350 Days: Despite delay of 350 days between filing of charges and beginning of trial, defendant was not denied his right to a speedy trial. The State's explanation for the delay, which included defendant's several appearances in court, the defendant's refusal to plead, and the difficulties that arose because this was the first homicide committed under the new Criminal Code and under the new capital punishment scheme, was satisfactory. St. v. McKenzie, 171 M 278, 557 P2d 1023 (1976).

Delay of 326 Days: A delay of 326 days from arrest until trial denied the defendant of his right to a speedy trial. St. v. Keller, 170 M 372, 553 P2d 1013 (1976).

Remedy for Denial of Right: Dismissal of the charges against the defendant is the proper remedy for the denial of the right to a speedy trial. St. v. Keller, 170 M 372, 553 P2d 1013 (1976).

Delay of 299 Days Prima Facie Denial — Demand: A delay of 299 days from the time of a defendant's arraignment establishes a prima facie case of denial of the right to a speedy trial. However, when the defendant made no specific demand that his case be set for trial but did nothing that could be construed as a waiver of his right to a speedy trial, he was entitled to have charges against him dismissed. State ex rel. Sanford v. District Court, 170 M 22, 551 P2d 1005 (1976).

Seven-Month Delay: When accused was held in maximum security without counsel and there was a 7-month delay between his demand for a speedy trial and the trial itself, the rights of the accused were prejudiced and the conviction and sentence were vacated with prejudice. Fitzpatrick v. Crist, 165 M 382, 528 P2d 1322 (1974), followed in St. v. Pease, 227 M 424, 740 P2d 659, 44 St. Rep. 1203 (1987).

IMPARTIAL JURY

Impermissible Preconception Not Relinquished: After the defense exhausted peremptory challenges but before the jury was impaneled, a prospective juror stated a belief in the defendant's guilt to an officer of the court. The prospective juror hedged on his statement after in-chambers questioning, and the District Court ruled against a challenge for cause. The defendant appealed his subsequent conviction. The Supreme Court reviewed for abuse of discretion and reversed and remanded, noting that the prospective juror never relinquished his opinion. St. v. Anderson, 2019 MT 190, 397 Mont. 1, 446 P.3d 1134.

PFMA — Juror Statements That Defendant Should be Punished Even if Partner Element Not Proven — Reversal Warranted for Failure to Grant Challenge for Cause: During voir dire, a member of the jury was questioned about whether she would convict the defendant of partner or family member assault even if the state did not prove he was a partner, which is an element of the offense. The juror responded several times that if the defendant had assaulted the woman, it did not matter if he was her partner or not, and that he needed to be punished. After the prosecution attempted to rehabilitate the juror with leading questions, the District Court denied the defendant's challenge to remove her for cause. Following his conviction, the defendant appealed. The Supreme Court concluded that the District Court had made a structural error in denying the challenge for cause because the totality of the juror's statements raised a serious question of her ability to be impartial. St. v. Johnson, 2019 MT 68, 395 Mont. 169, 437 P.3d 147.

Technical Violation of Alternate Juror Statute — Harmless Error — No Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: The District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion to set aside the jury verdict and grant the defendant a new trial, despite a technical violation of 46-16-118. Following a guilty verdict, the court may grant the defendant a new trial if required in the interest of justice without a motion or if justified by law and by the weight of the evidence deny, grant, or modify the verdict after motion and hearing. While the statutory jury selection procedures, including those regarding alternate jurors contained in 46-16-118, are designed to protect against violations of the defendant's constitutional right to a fair and impartial jury, not every violation of the statutory process must result in reversal. Technical departures from the jury selection statutes and violations that do not threaten the goals of random selection and objective disqualification do not constitute a substantial failure to comply. Similar to St. v. Bearchild, 2004 MT 355, 324 Mont. 435, 103 P.3d 1006, the defendant did not challenge the composition of the jury or even its impartiality but, rather, challenged a particular juror. Although the defendant was entitled to an impartial jury, he had no right to a particular juror. There was no material failure by the District Court to comply with Montana's jury selection statutes, and the technical error was harmless. Because the error was harmless, the District Court correctly concluded that the interests of justice did not require a new trial and, as such, the defendant was unable to establish his ineffective assistance of counsel claims. St. v. Oschmann, 2019 MT 33, 394 Mont. 237, 434 P.3d 280.

Validity of Revised Allen Instruction: A defendant appealed his conviction on the grounds that the revised Allen instruction delivered to the jury, regarding the role of the jury and encouraging collaboration among a deadlocked jury, violated his right to an uncoerced jury verdict. The Supreme Court affirmed, finding that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in giving the instruction. The Supreme Court explained that the revised Allen instruction encourages all jurors to collaborate and states that a juror should not surrender honest convictions. St. v. Santiago, 2018 MT 13, 390 Mont. 154, 415 P.3d 972.

Alleged Extraneous Juror Information — Alleged Juror Statement to Bailiff — New Trial Not Warranted: The District Court did not abuse its discretion when it determined that juror misconduct did not warrant a new trial. Although a juror's exposure to extraneous information creates a rebuttable presumption of prejudice, this presumption is not absolute, and arises only when the information shows a natural tendency to prejudice. Even if a juror was exposed to extraneous information, the District Court was uniquely qualified to appraise whether the extraneous information resulted in prejudice. As to another juror's alleged statement to a bailiff, the defendant presented no evidence that the bailiff expressed his agreement with the comment. Moreover, the bailiff submitted an affidavit disavowing any knowledge of the juror's alleged comment. St. v. Strang, 2017 MT 217, 388 Mont. 428, 401 P.3d 690.

Unanimity Instruction Not Requested — Isolated Comments by Prosecutor During Closing Arguments — Withheld Evidence Not Exculpatory: The defendant was convicted of sexual assault involving the 8-year-old daughter of his former girlfriend. At trial and during closing arguments, the defendant argued that the victim had fabricated the allegations. In the rebuttal argument, the prosecutor suggested that believing the defendant's argument meant the jury believed the victim was lying. On appeal, the defendant argued that the prosecutor's comment violated his right to a fair trial, that the District Court failed to give specific unanimity instruction to the jury on the sexual assault charge, and that the District Court erred in not disclosing to the defense information from the medical and counseling records that it had reviewed in camera. The Supreme Court affirmed the conviction, holding that the prosecutor's isolated comment was made in response to the defendant's arguments, that the defendant failed to object to the court's jury instruction and the parties understood the facts surrounding the charge, and that the evidence withheld from the defendant was favorable but not exculpatory. St. v. Stutzman, 2017 MT 169, 388 Mont. 133, 398 P.3d 265.

Dismissal of Juror for Lack of Candor — No Error: The defendant was charged with sexual abuse of children and sexual assault. During voir dire, jurors were asked whether a family member had ever been sexually abused or accused of sexual abuse. After jury selection, and following opening arguments, the prosecution learned that one of the juror's sons had been convicted of a sexual offense. The District Court dismissed the juror. Following his conviction, the defendant appealed, arguing that the District Court should not have dismissed the juror because the juror stated that he would be fair and unbiased. The Supreme Court affirmed, agreeing with the District Court that the juror's lack of candor during the voir dire questioning was a sufficient basis to justify seating a different juror in his place. St. v. Aguado, 2017 MT 54, 387 Mont. 1, 390 P.3d 628.

Juror Married to Former Police Chief — Juror Affirmed Ability to Be Impartial — No Removal for Cause: The defendant, who was charged with homicide, argued that the District Court had abused its discretion by not removing a juror whose husband had been a former police chief. Although the juror stated that her ability to be impartial was absolute, the defendant used one of his peremptory challenges to remove her after the District Court denied his motion to have her removed for cause. Following his conviction, the defendant appealed and the Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that voir dire had not established that the juror had bias or that she could not be impartial. St. v. Kaarma, 2017 MT 24, 386 Mont. 243, 390 P.3d 609.

Inmate Escapee — Unobtrusive Leg Brace at Trial — No Prejudice: The defendant, who was charged with aggravated kidnapping and escape, was required to wear a leg brace under his clothes at trial after the District Court denied his counsel's motion to have it removed. After his conviction, the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court, claiming that the District Court had undermined the presumption of innocence by making him wear the brace at trial. However, given that the defendant had admitted at trial that he was an inmate and an escapee, the court affirmed the District Court. The court agreed that the brace suggested the defendant's status as an inmate and not a proclivity for violence and that the requirement to wear the unobtrusive leg brace therefore did not prejudice the defendant. St. v. Rickett, 2016 MT 168, 384 Mont. 114, 375 P.3d 368.

Failure of Juror to Disclose Experience of Incest — No Grounds for New Trial: The defendant was convicted of incest. After the trial, the defendant's attorney learned that one of the jurors had been a victim of incest. The District Court held a hearing on the issue and concluded the defendant was not entitled to a new trial because the juror had not been asked if she was an incest victim during voir dire, so her failure to disclose was not intentional concealment. The District Court also concluded that there was no evidence that the juror exhibited ill will or bias toward the defendant. On appeal, the defendant argued that the District Court should have granted his motion for a new trial because the juror's past experience produced an inherent bias. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that the defendant failed to show any evidence beyond his own speculation that the juror had any bias or ill will toward him and that being a victim of a sex crime does not produce inherent bias any more than does having been a victim of burglary or physical assault. St. v. Ring, 2014 MT 49, 374 Mont. 109, 321 P.3d 800, following St. v. Woods, 221 Mont. 17, 716 P.2d 624 (1986), and St. v. Dunfee, 2005 MT 147, 327 Mont. 335, 114 P.3d 217.

Sleeping Jurors Not Observed by District Court — Motion for New Trial Properly Dismissed Without Hearing: After a jury found him guilty of 10 sexual crimes, the defendant moved for a new trial on multiple grounds, including an allegation that several jurors may have been asleep during portions of the trial testimony. The District Court received briefs and denied the motion without conducting a hearing. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed and determined that the defendant's allegations were inconsistent with the District Court's own personal observations. Moreover, it was not an abuse of discretion for the District Court to deny the motion for a new trial based on the briefing of the parties without conducting a hearing. St. v. Geren, 2012 MT 307, 367 Mont. 437, 291 P.3d 1144.

No Presumption of Prejudice From Pretrial Publicity — Motion for Change of Venue Correctly Denied: Defendant was acquitted of attempted deliberate homicide and convicted of aggravated assault related to a bar fight that left the victim with extensive facial fractures requiring reconstructive surgeries. Media coverage following the altercation included the dissemination of portions of a voice message the defendant had left for a friend shortly after the fight, and various fundraising events occurred in Gallatin County on behalf of the victim. Prior to trial, the defendant filed a motion to change venue, alleging he would not receive an impartial trial in Gallatin County due to the "inflammatory nature" of publicity that presumed his guilt. The court held a hearing on the motion and decided to base its ruling, in part, on the results of a questionnaire sent to 150 prospective jurors, which showed that while the majority of the prospective jurors had heard about the case, they retained their ability to serve as impartial jurors. Based on these results, the District Court denied the motion for a change of venue, and the defendant was convicted of aggravated assault. The defendant appealed, contending that the facts demonstrated a presumption of prejudice that required his motion to change venue be granted. The Supreme Court outlined several relevant factors in evaluating whether pretrial publicity warrants a presumption that an impartial jury cannot be drawn, including the size and diversity of the jury pool, community sentiment, the nature of the pretrial publicity, the amount of time between the alleged crime and the trial, and, in a posttrial scenario, whether the jury's decision on guilt is contrary to a presumption of guilt (i.e., whether the defendant was convicted of the original charge or of a lesser offense). The court concluded that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the defendant's motion because he did not demonstrate that the pretrial publicity had displaced the judicial process and because he was acquitted of attempted deliberate homicide. St. v. Kingman, 2011 MT 269, 362 Mont. 330, 264 P.3d 1104.

Repetitive Questioning on Single Word in Element of Crime: It was not error for the District Court to require defense counsel to cease his juror-by-juror inquiry in voir dire as to the interpretations of a readily understandable word. The prohibition did not foreclose questioning on possible bias but instead invoked the District Court's great latitude in controlling voir dire and prevented further questioning that was taking on the elements of argument that could have been made during trial. St. v. Grant, 2011 MT 81, 360 Mont. 127, 252 P.3d 193.

Dismissal for Cause Based on Juror's Work in Law Enforcement Properly Denied: A potential juror stated that she worked in law enforcement as a 9-1-1 dispatcher but could not recall if she was on duty the night of the incident in question. She also had a relationship with a police officer and recalled the case being discussed among her coworkers. For these reasons Dewitz moved that the juror be dismissed for cause, but the motion was denied. Dewitz appealed on grounds that the trial court erred by not dismissing the juror for cause. The Supreme Court disagreed. The juror stated that she could be impartial and had not formed an opinion regarding Dewitz's innocence or guilt. The juror's involvement in law enforcement was not, in itself, sufficient to grant dismissal for cause, nor did discussing the case with coworkers and remembering a brief generalization of what occurred prove that the juror was exposed to information that was inadmissible at trial. The trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying the motion to dismiss for cause and was therefore affirmed on the issue. St. v. Dewitz, 2009 MT 202, 351 M 182, 212 P3d 1040 (2009).

Pretrial Publicity Test for Change of Venue — Inflammatory Publicity Defined: Devlin moved for a change of venue for his bail-jumping trial on grounds of inflammatory publicity. The District Court denied the motion, and on appeal the Supreme Court considered what constitutes inflammatory publicity. The pertinent question is not simply whether media reports contain editorializing, whether the reports were calculated to achieve a sinister purpose, or whether the reports contained factual information. Although those are relevant factors, the focus must be on the publicity's likely effect on the jury pool. Therefore, inflammatory publicity is defined as publicity that, by its nature, has the tendency to stir up in the community pervasive and strong passions of anger, hatred, indignation, revulsion, and upset to such an extent that there are reasonable grounds to believe that jurors chosen from that community could not determine a defendant's guilt or innocence in a fair and unbiased manner based solely on the evidence at trial. This determination must be made based on extant circumstances, including but not limited to the size of the jury pool, the nature of the offense charged, the type and character of the media reports, readership of the publication, the relative size of the radio or television audience, the time lapse between the publicity and the trial, whether the reports contain extrajudicial statements by prosecutors or law enforcement personnel that are prejudicial to the defendant, and whether there is any ostensible adverse community reaction to the publicity. Considering the entire record, the Supreme Court concluded that the pretrial publicity was not inflammatory. Devlin failed to demonstrate, by surveys or affidavits or by individual voir dire, that the publicity actually inflamed the prejudice of the community to such an extent that a reasonable possibility existed that Devlin would not receive a fair and impartial trial. Thus, Devlin failed to meet the standard, and the District Court did not err in denying Devlin's motion for change of venue. St. v. Devlin, 2009 MT 18, 349 M 67, 201 P3d 791 (2009). See also St. v. Link, 194 M 556, 640 P2d 366 (1981), St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457 (1994), St. v. Fuhrmann, 278 M 396, 925 P2d 1162 (1996), and St. v. Kingman, 2011 MT 269, 362 Mont. 330, 264 P.3d 1104.

Defense Counsel's Conduct During Voir Dire Not Considered Ineffective Assistance: Notti asserted that defense counsel's failure to elicit information from or to challenge two jurors for cause during voir dire amounted to ineffective assistance. The District Court found that counsel did not challenge the jurors because counsel believed that there was no basis for a challenge for cause and because counsel believed that the jurors would be fair. On appeal, the Supreme Court examined counsel's conduct toward each juror during voir dire and affirmed. Counsel made informed strategic decisions not to challenge the jurors, and counsel's failure to challenge the jurors did not fall below the range of competence expected of attorneys in criminal cases. Notti's claim of ineffective counsel failed. Notti v. St., 2008 MT 20, 341 M 183, 176 P3d 1040 (2008).

Failure of Defense Counsel to Question Jurors Regarding Ethnic and Racial Bias Not Considered Ineffective Assistance Warranting New Trial: Defendant was convicted of distribution of dangerous drugs and appealed on grounds that because of defendant's ethnicity, defense counsel's failure to question potential jurors regarding ethnic or racial bias constituted ineffective assistance of counsel and deprived defendant of a fair trial. The Supreme Court found no indication that: (1) ethnic or racial issues were intertwined with the drug offense; (2) the offense was racially motivated; (3) an ethnic issue was connected with the trial in any way; and (4) any witness, an attorney, the trial judge, a member of the court staff, or any member of the venire panel was ethnically or racially biased. Thus, defendant was not denied the right to an impartial jury. Defense counsel's performance did not fall below the range of competence required of attorneys in criminal cases simply because jurors were not questioned about ethnic or racial bias, so defendant was not denied effective assistance of counsel. St. v. Ibarra-Salas, 2007 MT 173, 338 M 191, 164 P3d 898 (2007). See also Rosales-Lopez v. U.S., 451 US 182 (1981).

No Abuse of Discretion in Denying Mistrial for Ordering Continued Jury Deliberations: Doyle moved for a mistrial after the trial court ordered the jury to continue deliberating after the jurors notified the court that they were at an impasse. Doyle contended that the trial court improperly pressured the jury to reach a decision and created the impression that the jury could return only a unanimous verdict rather than a hung jury and that the court failed to explain to the jurors that they should never give up their honest opinion concerning Doyle's guilt or innocence. The motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The transcript showed that the jury was in fact instructed that it should not surrender an honest opinion as to the weight or effect of the evidence or the guilt or innocence of the defendant. The court sent the jury home the first day after 10 hours of deliberations when the jury informed the court that it could not reach a decision. At the end of the second day, the jury sent a note to the court informing the judge that the jury was at an impasse. The court asked the jury if it wished to go home or continue deliberations, and the jury opted to go home. The third day, the jury returned a unanimous guilty verdict. Based on the transcript, the trial court never forced deliberations, and the court did not abuse its discretion in denying Doyle's mistrial motion. St. v. Doyle, 2007 MT 125, 337 M 308, 160 P3d 516 (2007).

Constitutionality of Waiver of Jury Trial by Defendant Over State's Objection — Writ of Supervisory Control Granted: Defendant Courville was charged in Justice's Court with speeding, DUI, and possession of an open container. Courville requested a waiver of a jury trial, and the state objected. The Justice's Court granted the waiver, finding that the statute violated this section. The state filed an application for a writ of supervisory control and a motion for stay of proceedings pending the Supreme Court's review of the application. Courville argued that only a defendant, and not the state, has the constitutional right to a jury trial and the corresponding ability to waive the right despite statutory language to the contrary in 46-17-201. The Supreme Court vacated the waiver of a jury trial, holding that Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const., provides a right of a jury trial to the state and that both parties in a criminal trial must consent to waiver. State ex rel. Long v. Justice's Court, 2007 MT 3, 335 M 219, 156 P3d 5 (2007), overruling State ex rel. Nelson v. District Court, 262 M 70, 863 P2d 1027 (1993).

Failure to Dismiss Partial Juror for Cause — Structural Error Warranting New Trial: On voir dire, a juror revealed a belief that defendant would not be on trial unless there was something tying defendant to the crime and that only if there was evidence presented that proved defendant's innocence would the juror be convinced that the defendant was not guilty. The trial court declined to grant defendant's motion to dismiss the juror for cause, and following conviction, defendant appealed. The Supreme Court reversed, reiterating the preference for dismissal for cause when voir dire reveals a serious question about a juror's ability to afford a defendant a presumption of innocence. The trial court's refusal to dismiss the juror was an abuse of discretion that resulted in structural error warranting a new trial. St. v. Hausauer, 2006 MT 336, 335 M 137, 149 P3d 895 (2006).

Elimination of Prospective Jury Members Based on Alphabetized Jury List Not Violative of Random Jury Selection: The Clerk of the District Court was instructed to prepare a jury pool of 80 prospective jurors for Azure's trial. The clerk had three smaller pools available and combined two entire pools plus the first 21 names from the other pool. Because the names had been chosen and alphabetized by computer, only people with names beginning with A through K were chosen from the 21 names in the third pool. Azure contended that eliminating persons from a jury pool based on the first letter of their names did not constitute a random sample of prospective jurors and violated his right to a fair trial. The Supreme Court disagreed. Mere alphabetization of a randomly selected list of names and the elimination of some of those names based exclusively on where they fell in the alphabet did not constitute a systematic exclusion of a distinct identifiable class of the community and did not taint the random jury selection process. Because Azure could not establish that the selection method constituted a substantial failure to comply with jury procurement statutes, the trial court's decision to deny Azure's challenge to the venire was correct, and the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Azure, 2005 MT 328, 329 M 536, 125 P3d 1116 (2005), following St. v. Taylor, 168 M 142, 542 P2d 100 (1975), and distinguishing St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204 (2000).

Denial of Motion to Remove Juror for Cause Not Error Absent Showing of Juror Bias: During voir dire in Marble's trial for sexual intercourse without consent, defense counsel asked the panel whether the act of anal intercourse between two males would be considered so abhorrent as to affect their ability to view and weigh the evidence fairly. One juror responded that his religious convictions made the idea of such an act morally repugnant. Defense counsel moved to remove the juror for cause, but the motion was denied. After further questioning, counsel again moved to remove the juror for cause, but the motion was again denied. Counsel ultimately used a peremptory challenge to remove the juror. On appeal, Marble asserted that the trial court abused its discretion in denying the motions to remove the juror for cause. Analyzing the juror challenges in light of the statutory language and the totality of the circumstances, the Supreme Court held that the juror did not exhibit an actual bias during voir dire that would have prohibited the juror from acting with impartiality and without prejudice. Absent a showing of bias, denial of the motion to remove the juror for cause was not an abuse of discretion, and the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Marble, 2005 MT 208, 328 M 223, 119 P3d 88 (2005), following St. v. Freshment, 2002 MT 61, 309 M 154, 43 P3d 968 (2002).

Error in Excusing Juror for Cause Before Voir Dire — Error Harmless Absent Showing of Prejudice: Prior to voir dire in defendant's trial for sexual intercourse without consent and incest, the prosecutor requested that juror no. 43 be excused. The juror had recently worked in the County Attorney's office and had access to a wide range of information relating to issues that defendant had been involved in, and the prosecutor had recently fired the juror for unsatisfactory performance. The trial judge dismissed the juror because of concerns that the juror might have feelings or predilections for one side or the other and because of the possibility of the juror communicating with other prospective jurors. Following conviction, defendant appealed the decision to excuse the juror for cause prior to voir dire. The Supreme Court concluded that the trial court erred in excusing the juror without an in-court examination to determine actual bias; however, the error was not a material failure to substantially comply with statutes governing procurement of a trial jury, so the dismissal was subject to harmless error review. Defendant could not demonstrate prejudice because even if juror no. 43 had not been dismissed, the juror would not have been on the jury because the last juror empaneled was juror no. 36. The Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Bearchild, 2004 MT 355, 324 M 435, 103 P3d 1006 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204 (2000), and St. v. Blem, 610 NW 2d 803 (S. Dak. 2000).

Shackling of Defendant at Trial to Ensure Security of Courtroom — No Due Process Violation: At Herrick's attempted deliberate homicide trial, the trial court agreed to provide additional security measures, including leg shackles, reasoning that the jury was not likely to see the shackles while Herrick was seated. Following conviction, Herrick appealed on grounds that the use of shackles violated his due process right to a fair trial. The Supreme Court noted that the due process clause of the U.S. Constitution entitles a criminal defendant to appear before a jury free of shackles and other physical restraints and concluded that the Montana Constitution does not provide more protection with regard to shackling than the U.S. Constitution. However, that right is not absolute, and a trial judge's decision to shackle a defendant is not unconstitutional per se (see Morgan v. Bunnell, 24 F3d 49 (9th Cir. 1994)). The Supreme Court adopted the two-part test in Morgan for determining whether a trial court has abused its discretion in restraining a defendant at trial. Under that test, the trial court must be persuaded by compelling circumstances that some measure is needed to maintain the security of the courtroom and must pursue less restrictive alternatives before imposing physical restraints. In this case, the trial court satisfied both parts of the test. The facts presented compelling circumstances to support the court's exercise of its broad discretion in determining that additional security was necessary, and the court took great care to prevent the jury from being aware that Herrick's ankles were shackled. Nothing indicated that the jury saw the leg restraints at any time, so Herrick's rights to individual dignity, a fair trial, and due process were not violated. St. v. Herrick, 2004 MT 323, 324 M 76, 101 P3d 755 (2004), followed in St. v. Merrill, 2008 MT 143, 343 M 130, 183 P3d 56 (2008), to the extent that keeping a defendant shackled during trial without establishing compelling circumstances for security measures constitutes a violation of the defendant's constitutional due process rights, and distinguishing St. v. Finch, 975 P2d 967 (Wash. 1999). See St. v. Hartsoe, 2011 MT 188, 361 Mont. 305, 258 P.3d 428. See also Ill. v. Allen, 397 US 337 (1970).

Bailiff's Instructions to Split Jury to Continue Deliberations Not Reversible Error: Steele was charged with eight offenses and conceded guilt on all but one charge. During deliberations on the remaining charge, the jury became deadlocked and notified the bailiff. Outside the presence of the parties and without the court's approval, the bailiff told the jury that they needed to keep working on it and needed to find common ground. Steele contended that the bailiff's action denied the parties and counsel the opportunity to consult with the court in violation of 46-16-503 and moved for mistrial. The motion was denied, and Steele appealed. It is not the prerogative of any court officer except the trial judge to give instructions to the jury regarding deliberations. However, without condoning the bailiff's actions, the Supreme Court held that the bailiff's instructions did not misadvise the jury but merely asked the jury to continue deliberating, the same instruction that the District Court would have offered, so a mistrial was not warranted on those grounds. Further, the jury did not disagree as to any testimony received or desire any information regarding the law, so 46-16-503 was not triggered. Although not given or condoned by the trial judge, the bailiff's instructions did not attempt to pressure the jurors into reaching a verdict or assert to the minority jurors that their positions should change, as was the case in St. v. Randall, 137 M 534, 353 P2d 1054 (1960), so denial of the mistrial motion was proper. St. v. Steele, 2004 MT 275, 323 M 204, 99 P3d 210 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Herron, 169 M 193, 545 P2d 678 (1976). See also St. v. George, 219 M 377, 711 P2d 1379 (1986).

Failure of Trial Court to Hold Hearing Regarding Juror's Acquaintance With Witness — Waiver Absent Timely Objection — Plain Error Doctrine Inapplicable: During voir dire at Davis's trial, several jurors indicated that they were acquainted with two witnesses but stated that their acquaintance would not affect their ability to sit as jurors. Immediately after the first witness was called, a juror stated to the court that he knew the witness. Without objection from Davis, the court noted the statement and the witness proceeded to testify. Following conviction, Davis appealed on grounds that the court should have held a hearing to determine whether the juror was biased and that failure to do so violated Davis's right to an impartial jury. The Supreme Court disagreed. Davis's failure to object at trial constituted a waiver of appellate review of the issue. Further, Davis did not meet the narrow criteria in St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003), to warrant plain error review. Judgment was affirmed. St. v. Davis, 2003 MT 341, 318 M 459, 81 P3d 484 (2003), followed in St. v. Taylor, 2009 MT 161, 350 M 447, 208 P3d 422 (2009).

Claim of Juror to Be Psychic Not Violative of Due Process Rights: On the second day of jury deliberations, two jurors brought forward concerns that another juror with strong opinions in the case claimed to be a psychic. With counsel present, the trial court questioned the jury foreman as to whether that particular juror would be able to base a decision on the law and the evidence. The court and counsel ultimately determined that no problem existed, and deliberations continued. On appeal, DuBray argued that allowing a psychic juror constituted a due process violation. The Supreme Court noted that DuBray's counsel helped formulate the response to the situation and, finding nothing in the record to indicate that the juror's strong opinions were based on psychic powers or that the juror would not be able to lay aside the opinions and render a fair verdict, held that DuBray's right to a fair and impartial jury was not violated. St. v. DuBray, 2003 MT 255, 317 M 377, 77 P3d 247 (2003). See also St. v. McMahon, 271 M 75, 894 P2d 313 (1995).

Failure to Summon Jurors in Statutory Manner — Lamere Per Se Rule Retroactively Applied — Rule of Law Inapplicable Considering Substantial Change in Law: In St. v. Robbins, 1998 MT 297, 292 M 23, 971 P2d 359 (1998), Robbins moved to quash the jury panel because prospective jurors had been summoned by telephone instead of by mail or personal service, as required in 3-15-505. The motion was denied because Robbins failed to introduce any evidence that he was prejudiced, rendering the error harmless. The Supreme Court subsequently decided St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204 (2000), holding that improper jury summons constituted denial of the fundamental right to a fair trial and thus was per se prejudicial. Robbins then petitioned for postconviction relief on grounds that Lamere should be retroactively applied. The District Court denied the petition, concluding that under the law of the case doctrine, Lamere was not retroactively applicable. The Supreme Court disagreed and reversed. The law of the case doctrine provides that when a decision is rendered by the Supreme Court, the decision is binding and cannot be relitigated in the trial court or on a subsequent appeal. However, a court may reconsider the issue in postconviction proceedings when there has been a substantial change in applicable law. Lamere specifically overruled the opinion in Robbins' 1998 direct appeal to the extent that a violation of 3-15-505 could be harmless error, which constituted a substantial change in the law, so the law of the case doctrine did not preclude the application of Lamere to Robbins' 2002 postconviction proceedings. Robbins was entitled to retroactive application of Lamere because the state's action in procuring the jury denied Robbins of a right that goes to the very integrity of the justice system, and is implicit in the concept of ordered liberty for purposes of coming within the exception to the retroactivity analysis in Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288 (1989). Robbins v. St., 2002 MT 116, 310 M 10, 50 P3d 134 (2002).

Juror Statements of Actual Bias Against Defense That Sex Crime Victim Was Old Enough to Consent — Reversal Warranted for Failure to Grant Challenge for Cause: Freshment's defense to charges of sexual intercourse without consent with a victim under age 16 was that he believed that the victim was old enough to give consent. During voir dire, two prospective jurors gave straightforward, consistent statements of actual bias against Freshment's legal defense. Following trial counsel's attempts to rehabilitate the jurors, the District Court denied Freshment's challenges for cause, so Freshment was required to use peremptory challenges to remove the jurors from the panel, ultimately exhausting all of his peremptory challenges. Under St. v. DeVore, 1998 MT 340, 292 M 325, 972 P2d 816 (1998), abuse of discretion occurs if a court fails to excuse a prospective juror when actual bias is discovered during voir dire, so both jurors should have been dismissed for cause. Under the rule in St. v. Good, 2002 MT 59, 309 M 113, 43 P3d 948 (2002), the District Court's error was conclusively prejudicial and automatic reversal was required. St. v. Freshment, 2002 MT 61, 309 M 154, 43 P3d 968 (2002). See also St. v. Allen, 2010 MT 214, 357 Mont. 495, 241 P.3d 1045, and St. v. Johnson, 2019 MT 68, 395 Mont. 169, 437 P.3d 147.

Improper Denial of Challenge for Cause Based on Debtor-Creditor and Attorney-Client Relationships — Erroneous Ruling on Challenge for Cause Prejudicial as Matter of Law — New Trial Warranted: During voir dire, prospective juror Derrig revealed that he was president of a bank that was represented by plaintiff's trial counsel, that he had worked with plaintiff in the past in his position as bank president, and that the bank was one of plaintiff's creditors. Defendant twice challenged Derrig for cause, based on the debtor-creditor relationship between plaintiff and the bank and because of the potential for bias arising from Derrig's attorney-client relationship with plaintiff's attorney. Both challenges were denied, so defendant ultimately used a peremptory challenge to remove Derrig from the jury panel. Defendant claimed that denial of its challenge for cause was improper. Because defendant was forced to use a peremptory challenge to remove Derrig, and in fact used all its peremptory challenges, defendant maintained that it was denied an equal number of peremptory challenges and was thus entitled to a new trial. The Supreme Court agreed. Pursuant to 25-7-223, there is no substantive difference between the chief executive officer of a creditor who is responsible for the creditor's success and the creditor itself when it comes to impartiality and jury duty. Further, an ongoing attorney-client relationship between a prospective juror and trial counsel represents the strong possibility of bias in favor of the party represented by that attorney. Under the rule in King v. Special Resource Management, Inc., 256 M 367, 846 P2d 1038 (1993), and St. v. Williams, 262 M 530, 866 P2d 1099 (1993), when a District Court erroneously denies a challenge for cause, it is the substantive equivalent of granting more peremptory challenges to one side than to the other, which is prejudicial as a matter of law, warranting reversal and a new trial. Reff-Conlin's, Inc. v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 2002 MT 60, 309 M 142, 45 P3d 863 (2002).

Test for Structural Error During Voir Dire — Automatic Reversal Warranted for Structural Error in Improper Denial of Challenge for Cause to Prospective Juror: Structural error exists when there is a material failure to substantially comply with statutes governing the procurement of a jury trial. Jury selection is critically important in ensuring an accused's right to an impartial jury and a fair trial, and errors involving jury selection indelibly affect the fairness of the trial because the errors precede the trial. After reviewing St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204 (2000), and St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), the Supreme Court held that structural error occurs if: (1) a District Court abuses its discretion by denying a challenge for cause to a prospective juror; (2) the defendant uses one or more peremptory challenges to remove disputed jurors; and (3) the defendant exhausts all peremptory challenges. If the test is met, the error is structural and automatic reversal is required. St. v. Good, 2002 MT 59, 309 M 113, 43 P3d 948 (2002), overruling St. v. Williams, 262 M 530, 866 P2d 1099 (1993), and St. v. DeVore, 1998 MT 340, 292 M 325, 972 P2d 816 (1998), to the extent that Williams and DeVore required a defendant to establish that the District Court error contributed to defendant's conviction by showing that the jury was charged with the determination of a factual issue important to the charges against defendant.

Failure to Summon Entire Panel by Telephonic Juror Summoning — New Trial Warranted: Of the 200-juror panel randomly drawn for Lamere's murder trial, over one-third of the prospective jurors were excluded from possible jury service by virtue of the manner in which a telephone-only notification method skewed the random nature and objectivity of the statutory jury selection procedures. By failing to summon the entire panel or array drawn for the trial, the purpose of juror notification was undermined. Jury duty cannot be lightly shirked, as a telephone summoning system allowed, without doing violence to the democratic nature of the jury system. Because the substantial failure to comply with the statutory requirements materially undermined the jury selection process, Lamere was granted a new trial. St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204, 57 St. Rep. 214 (2000), following Thiel v. S. Pac. Co., 328 US 217, 90 L Ed 1181, 66 S Ct 984 (1946), and applied retroactively in Robbins v. St., 2002 MT 116, 310 M 10, 50 P3d 134 (2002). See also St. v. Groom, 49 M 354, 141 P 858 (1914), and State ex rel. School District v. Carroll, 87 M 45, 284 P 1008 (1930).

Substantial Compliance Standard Clarified With Regard to Statutory Process for Forming Jury: The objective statutory procedures established by the Legislature for the random selection of jurors are intended to protect a defendant's fundamental right to a fair and impartial jury and must be substantially complied with. Under Montana case law, the substantial compliance standard is not an absolute rule inasmuch as it permits minor deviations from statutory procedure. These technical deviations do not constitute a substantial failure to comply and therefore do not give rise to a presumption of prejudice. In clarifying the substantial compliance standard, the Supreme Court took guidance from federal case law developed under the federal Jury Selection and Service Act of 1968, 28 U.S.C. 1861, et seq. In order to establish a violation under the federal Act, a defendant must show that the government substantially failed to comply with the methods set forth by statute for jury selection. Substantial failure has been construed as a violation that contravenes one of two basic principles: (1) random selection of jurors; and (2) determination of juror disqualification, excuses, exemptions, and exclusion on the basis of objective criteria. A successful challenge to the jury panel may be founded only on a material departure from the law, a deviation amounting to more than a technical irregularity. Thus, a substantial or material statutory departure that affects the random nature or objectivity of the jury selection process establishes a violation independently of the departure's consequences in an individual case, while a technical or nonmaterial violation constitutes nonprejudicial error under the substantial compliance standard. St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204, 57 St. Rep. 214 (2000), overruling St. v. Robbins, 1998 MT 297, 292 M 23, 971 P2d 359, 55 St. Rep. 1213 (1998).

Telephone Jury-Summoning Procedure Violative of Statutory Selection Process — Showing of Substantial Compliance, Not Prejudice, Required — Reversible Error: Lamere, charged with killing Brownlee, filed a pretrial motion to strike the jury panel, but the motion was denied. The question on appeal was whether the District Court erred in concluding that Lamere failed to show that the telephone-dependent summoning procedure used in Cascade County prejudiced Lamere's substantial rights to a jury drawn and summoned according to law. The Supreme Court applied St. v. Robbins, 1998 MT 297, 292 M 23, 971 P2d 359, 55 St. Rep. 1213 (1998), in holding that the method of summoning jurors by telephone failed to comply with statutes governing the impaneling of a jury because jurors were neither served by mail nor served personally by the Sheriff. However, to warrant reversal, Robbins also required a showing of actual prejudice in addition to a substantial failure to comply with statutory law in drawing a jury panel. The Supreme Court chose to return to the per se rule of reversal for failure to substantially comply with statutes governing procurement of a trial jury, overruling the Robbins requirement of prejudice. The decision turned on the U.S. Supreme Court's contemporary distinction between trial error, to which harmless error review applies, and structural error, to which harmless error review is inapplicable (see Johnson v. U.S., 520 US 461, 137 L Ed 2d 718, 117 S Ct 1544 (1997), and its predecessors). In Lamere's case, the automatic rule of reversal prevailed because errors in the jury selection process are structural in nature, affecting the very framework within which a trial proceeds—errors that indelibly affect the essential fairness of the trial itself. A material failure to substantially comply with Montana statutes governing procurement of a trial jury may not be treated as harmless error because: (1) it precedes the presentation of evidence to the jury and cannot be analyzed as a mere trial error without resorting to speculation; (2) it precedes the trial process and cannot be quantitatively assessed for its prejudicial impact relative to the evidence introduced at trial; (3) it affects the very framework within which the trial proceeds; and (4) the impartiality of the jury goes to the very integrity of the justice system and because the right to an impartial jury is so essential to the concept of a fair trial that its violation cannot be considered harmless error. The substantial compliance standard vindicates not only the rights of the individual defendant but also the rights of the public in ensuring that the jury system remains inviolate, protecting a defendant's right to an impartial jury by encouraging reasonably strict compliance with statutory procedures intended to implement the fair cross-section guarantee of the sixth amendment of the U.S. Constitution. St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204, 57 St. Rep. 214 (2000), following Chapman v. Calif., 386 US 18, 17 L Ed 2d 705, 87 S Ct 824 (1967), Satterwhite v. Tex., 486 US 249, 100 L Ed 2d 284, 108 S Ct 1792 (1988), and Ariz. v. Fulminante, 499 US 279, 113 L Ed 302, 111 S Ct 1246 (1991), followed in St. v. Lopez, 2001 MT 97, 305 M 218, 26 P3d 745 (2001), and applied retroactively in Robbins v. St., 2002 MT 116, 310 M 10, 50 P3d 134 (2002).

Juror's Fitness to Serve at Discretion of Trial Court: The Supreme Court will not reverse a District Court's decision regarding a juror's fitness to serve absent an abuse of discretion and a showing of prejudice. The trial court has significant latitude when ruling on allegations of juror misconduct because that court is best able to observe jurors and to decide the potential for prejudice, and its determination will be given considerable weight and deference. St. v. Hatten, 1999 MT 298, 297 M 127, 991 P2d 939, 56 St. Rep. 1198 (1999), followed in St. v. Rennaker, 2007 MT 10, 335 M 274, 150 P3d 960 (2007). See also St. v. MacGregor, 2013 MT 297, 372 Mont. 142, 311 P.3d 428.

Transfer of Youth Court Case to District Court Not Violative of Minor's Constitutional Rights: Spina argued that the statute allowing transfer of her Youth Court case to the District Court resulted in violation of her rights under Art. II, sec. 15, Mont. Const., which guarantees to minors the same fundamental rights afforded to adults, and under this section, which guarantees the right to a fair trial. The Supreme Court considered alleged violations of the right against self-incrimination, the right to effective assistance of counsel, the right to a fair trial, and the right to a presumption of innocence, finding that Spina's arguments were without merit. The transfer statute did not violate Spina's constitutional rights. St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

Limitation to One Jury Trial Held Unconstitutional: In 1997, the Legislature enacted the provisions codified at 46-7-102(1)(g), 46-17-201(3), and 46-17-311(1), providing that a person tried for a misdemeanor in Justice's or City Court who appeals to the District Court has the right to only one jury trial. Woirhaye was charged with misdemeanor DUI and requested a jury trial in Missoula County Justice's Court. Upon his conviction by the Justice's Court jury, Woirhaye appealed to the District Court for a trial de novo pursuant to Art. VII, sec. 4(2), Mont. Const., and 46-17-311. Woirhaye asked that the District Court declare 46-17-201(3) unconstitutional, but the District Court denied his motion. Woirhaye then petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control, which was granted on the grounds that Woirhaye would otherwise be denied a fundamental right. The Supreme Court held that Woirhaye's right to a jury trial in both the Justice's Court or City Court and the District Court was a fundamental right guaranteed by Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const., and this section. The Supreme Court pointed out that the right to a jury trial is guaranteed by Art. III, sec. 2, clause 3, of the U.S. Constitution and the sixth amendment to the U.S. Constitution and also that even if that were not the case, Montana may, under the rationale of St. v. Bullock, 272 M 361, 901 P2d 61 (1995), provide rights in excess of those guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution. The Supreme Court noted, in response to the state's argument that this section guarantees "a" jury trial, that the state's argument was not persuasive against the language of Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const. The Supreme Court also distinguished Ludwig v. Mass., 427 US 618 (1976), holding that Art. VII, sec. 4(2), Mont. Const., was not implicated in the case, and stated that any language in N. Cent. Serv., Inc. v. Hafdahl, 191 M 440, 625 P2d 56 (1981), indicating that a requirement for a jury trial applicable to Small Claims Court was satisfied if the right was granted at the District Court level, was dicta and could not be relied upon to support the state's case that only one jury trial was required. Consequently, the Supreme Court held 46-7-102(1)(g), 46-17-201(3), and 46-17-311(1) to be unconstitutional as violating Woirhaye's right to a jury trial. Woirhaye v. District Court, 1998 MT 320, 292 M 185, 972 P2d 800, 55 St. Rep. 1298 (1998), followed in Balyeat Law, P.C. v. Harrison, 1999 MT 144, 295 M 13, 983 P2d 902, 56 St. Rep. 566 (1999), and followed and clarified in St. v. Rensvold, 2006 MT 146, 332 M 392, 139 P3d 154 (2006).

Change of Venue Sought on Allegations of Prejudicial Pretrial Publicity — Elements Required to Be Proved: As established in St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457 (1994), a defendant who seeks a change of venue on the basis of prejudicial pretrial publicity must prove that the news reports were inflammatory and that the news reports actually inflamed the prejudice of the community to an extent that a reasonable possibility existed that the defendant may not receive a fair trial. In the present case, defendant contended that two inflammatory news articles were prejudicial due to the small number of people in the community where the crime occurred and their close-knit relationships. However, the total circulation of the newspapers that contained the inflammatory publicity was about 109 households in a county of 3,626 people, and only 6 of 78 potential jurors knew about the facts of the case from word or mouth, not the media. Affirming the denial of the venue change, the Supreme Court concluded that even if the news articles were inflammatory, they were not widespread enough in the community to generate a general belief of defendant's guilt throughout the jury pool and that the community as a whole could not have been affected to the extent that a reasonable possibility existed that defendant would not get a fair trial. St. v. Abe, 1998 MT 206, 290 M 393, 965 P2d 882, 55 St. Rep. 876 (1998), followed in St. v. Kingman, 2011 MT 269, 362 Mont. 330, 264 P.3d 1104.

Voir Dire Question Unrelated to Defense Properly Disallowed: Sattler contended that his right to voir dire on his defense of self-defense was infringed by the District Court's refusal to allow inquiry as to whether there must be a cause or reason to commit a homicide in jail. Generally, when notice of a defense is given, the refusal to allow defendant's voir dire on the defense constitutes prejudicial error. However, in this instance, Sattler was allowed to ask two questions directly related to jurors' opinions regarding self-defense, but a third question, regarding the cause or reason to commit a homicide in jail, was properly disallowed because it went beyond the self-defense theory in suggesting to prospective jurors that the state was required to prove motive, which was not the case. St. v. Sattler, 1998 MT 57, 288 M 79, 956 P2d 54, 55 St. Rep. 230 (1998), distinguishing St. v. Olson, 156 M 339, 480 P2d 822 (1971), and St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980).

Potential for Emotional Involvement as Juror Bias — Omissions by Counsel During and as Result of Voir Dire as Ineffective Assistance Warranting Reversal: Two prospective jurors expressed reservations about their ability to judge a case fairly, yet counsel failed either to follow up with additional questions about whether the prospective jurors could set aside their feelings and render a fair verdict or to exclude the jurors by challenge for cause or peremptorily. When counsel, for no apparent reason, abandons a client's right to challenge a juror, error is attributed to counsel. The presence on a jury of even one juror who cannot fairly assess the credibility of witnesses is considered prejudicial. Counsel's failure to take steps to prevent the presence on the jury of two such jurors constituted ineffective assistance of counsel and reversible error. St. v. Chastain, 285 M 61, 947 P2d 57, 54 St. Rep. 1044 (1997), following U.S. v. Eubanks, 591 F2d 513 (9th Cir. 1979), overruled in St. v. Herrman, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), to the extent that a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel for failure to challenge prospective jurors in voir dire can be determined from a record that is silent as to counsel's reasoning, and overruled regarding whether claim of ineffective assistance of counsel for failure to challenge prospective jurors in voir dire can be determined from a record that is silent as to the counsel's reasoning in St. v. Vukasin, 2003 MT 230, 317 M 204, 75 P3d 1284 (2003).

Failure to Have Native Americans Personally Served With Jury Summonses — No Error: After a jury had been selected, Bradley's counsel orally moved to have the panel dismissed because no Native Americans had been selected to serve. Bradley asserted that the District Court's failure to have jury summonses personally served on Native Americans, who had been served by mail but failed to appear, violated his constitutional right to a jury drawn from a representative cross-section of the community under Duren v. Mo., 439 US 357, 58 L Ed 2d 579, 99 S Ct 664 (1979), constituting purposeful discrimination based on race under Whitus v. Ga., 385 US 545, 17 L Ed 2d 599, 87 S Ct 643 (1967). To establish a prima facie case under either Duren or Whitus, a defendant must show a statistical discrepancy between the percentage of prospective jurors and persons in the community who are members of the allegedly excluded class. Bradley failed to show that the pool of prospective jurors contained an inadequate representation of Native Americans; thus, failure to serve the Native Americans with jury summonses did not entitle Bradley to a reversal of his conviction. St. v. Bradley, 262 M 194, 864 P2d 787, 50 St. Rep. 1511 (1993).

Constitutionality of Defendant's Waiver of Jury Trial in Criminal Case Over Objection of State: Hill waived his right to a jury trial on charges of felony assault (now assault with a weapon), resisting arrest, and obstructing a peace officer. The state objected and demanded a jury trial on all factual issues, contending that Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const., requires that before a jury trial can be waived, both parties must consent and that therefore a jury trial cannot be waived over the objection of the state. Pursuant to the 1972 change in Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const., a jury trial is no longer required as a matter of constitutional law in all felony criminal cases, and nothing in the intent of the framers of the constitution indicated that approval of the state was required to allow waiver of the right. In fact, the constitutional revision was implemented expressly for the benefit of the accused. The Legislature has provided a statutory procedure for waiver of the right to jury trial through the 1991 amendment to 46-16-110, which provides that a trial by jury in a criminal case may be waived, without approval of the state, upon written consent of the defendant. The procedure is consistent with the constitutional intent and is therefore not violative of Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const. State ex rel. Nelson v. District Court, 262 M 70, 863 P2d 1027, 50 St. Rep. 1447 (1993), distinguishing Patton v. U.S., 281 US 276, 74 L Ed 854, 50 S Ct 253 (1930), and Singer v. U.S., 380 US 24, 13 L Ed 2d 630, 85 S Ct 783 (1965), and overruled in State ex rel. Long v. Justice's Court, 2007 MT 3, 335 M 219, 156 P3d 5 (2007).

Constitutionality of "Death Qualified" Jury — Mention of Possibility of Death Sentence Not Prejudicial Per Se: Prior to voir dire, Gollehon requested the trial court to prohibit the state from asking jury panel members to declare their beliefs concerning the death penalty, arguing that: (1) questioning the members about a possible sentence was inappropriate because Montana juries do not participate in the sentencing portion of a trial; (2) social science evidence proves that when a jury is "death qualified", it is more prone to convict the defendant; and (3) if a jury knows that the death penalty could be imposed upon conviction, the error is prejudicial per se. In analyzing the death qualification of juries under 46-16-115, the Supreme Court cited Witherspoon v. Ill., 391 US 510, 20 L Ed 2d 776, 88 S Ct 1770 (1968), for the holding that excusing jurors simply because they voice general objections to the death penalty is insufficient and that only in instances when that belief prohibits the juror from applying the law that the judge has provided may a juror be excused for cause. Addressing the question of social science evidence seeming to indicate prejudice to a defendant when a jury is death qualified, the Supreme Court rejected the studies, noting that in Lockhart v. McCree, 476 US 162, 90 L Ed 2d 137, 106 S Ct 1758 (1986), the U.S. Supreme Court had seriously questioned the validity of similar studies, ruling that even if the studies were valid, it did not prove that death qualification was unconstitutional. Further, death qualification is a procedure to ensure that a jury is committed to its task and is therefore not per se an unconstitutional due process violation. St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 1, 864 P2d 249, 50 St. Rep. 1250 (1993).

Juror Outburst — Court's Removal of Child Witness From Stand — No Prejudice to Defendant: A juror's request to be dismissed when defense counsel persisted in questioning a 9-year-old witness who repeatedly broke down in tears at a certain point in questioning and the court's removal of the witness from the stand did not warrant a mistrial. There was no showing that the juror's outburst resulted in prejudice to defendant, and removal of the witness did not deprive defendant of the right to confront and cross-examine witnesses when the court gave defense counsel the option to resume questioning at a later time. St. v. McNatt, 257 M 468, 849 P2d 1050, 50 St. Rep. 365 (1993), followed in St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 293, 864 P2d 1257, 50 St. Rep. 1564 (1993), and cited in St. v. Brandon, 264 M 231, 870 P2d 734, 51 St. Rep. 244 (1994).

Fair Trial to Outweigh Free Speech: Noris contended that the presence of women spectators wearing buttons bearing the words "Women Against Rape" at his trial for kidnapping and rape denied him a fair trial. The court determined that the buttons conveyed the message that spectators believed defendant was guilty before it was proved, eroding the presumption of innocence. When balancing the competing rights of the spectators' right to free speech against defendant's right to a fair trial, the right to a fair trial controls. Norris v. Risley, 918 F2d 828 (9th Cir. 1990).

Failure of Prospective Juror to File Affidavit to Be Excused From Particular Trial Not Violative of Right to Impartial Jury: Defendant argued that under 3-15-313, the submitting of affidavits by those jurors who claim an undue hardship is mandatory and that failure to do so created a material deviation in procuring a jury and was therefore a denial of defendant's constitutional right to an impartial jury. However, once a juror is drawn from the pool, he may, without filing an affidavit, attempt to demonstrate an undue hardship so as to be excused on a particular jury panel. Failure to file an affidavit at that stage of the jury selection process does not constitute a deviation in jury selection sufficient to warrant violation of the right to an impartial jury. St. v. Henry, 241 M 524, 788 P2d 316, 47 St. Rep. 476 (1990).

Attempt by Jury Foreman to Convey Information on Defendant's Criminal Record to Jury — Remand for New Trial: The jury foreman heard in a third-party conversation that "defendant had a criminal record as long as your arm" and attempted to convey the information to the rest of the jury. Although the jury declined to hear the offered information, the injury to defendant had already occurred when the foreman heard the prejudicial comments and informed the remaining jurors that he had reliable information from the Sheriff's office. The District Court denied a motion for mistrial after examining three jurors, but the Supreme Court would not assume that the entire panel was safeguarded from contamination. In remanding for a new trial, the Supreme Court held that the presumption of prejudice that was created when uncontroverted evidence established that prejudicial statements reached one or more jurors was not rebutted when no evidence existed to rebut the presumption other than testimony of three of the jurors. St. v. DeGraw, 235 M 53, 764 P2d 1290, 45 St. Rep. 2154 (1988), distinguishing St. v. Murray, 228 M 125, 741 P2d 759, 44 St. Rep. 1394 (1987), St. v. Counts, 209 M 242, 679 P2d 1245 (1984), and St. v. Gillham, 206 M 169, 670 P2d 544 (1983).

Limiting Defense Time and Inquiry Into Preconceived Notions of Guilt: It was improper and inexcusable for judge, at voir dire, to repeatedly admonish defense counsel that a jury would be selected that day and to infer that defense counsel was an obstacle to that end. In a case such as this, which has a great amount of publicity, it is especially essential that voir dire ensures that defendant is adjudged by fair and impartial jurors. The court should strive for that objective, not expeditious selection of the jury. Defense counsel's examination of the potential jurors' preconceived notions of defendant's guilt should not have been repeatedly met with sustained objections. It was erroneous to deny defense counsel permission to ask a potential juror whether, if he were a defendant, he would want someone with that potential juror's frame of mind sitting on the jury. Defense counsel was also repeatedly admonished to limit inquiry to whether the potential juror could set aside his impressions of the case and reach a verdict based solely on the evidence; however, such a question cannot be asked and answered in a vacuum, and the defense must be allowed to fully examine the extent of the juror's pretrial convictions and determine what would be required to eradicate those convictions. One exchange during voir dire resulted in a juror who might have required defendant to prove his own innocence. However, the improperly conducted voir dire resulted in harmless error because given defendant's testimony at trial, any juror would have had to convict him of the charges. St. v. Nichols, 225 M 438, 734 P2d 170, 44 St. Rep. 382 (1987).

Nature of Inflammatory Publicity: A defendant's right to a fair trial by an impartial jury is jeopardized when the publicity surrounding the case is inflammatory. Inflammatory publicity is characterized by editorializing by the media or any calculated attempt to prejudice public opinion against the defendant or to destroy the fairness of the pool from which defendant's prospective jurors would be drawn. St. v. Nichols, 225 M 438, 734 P2d 170, 44 St. Rep. 382 (1987), followed in St. v. Abe, 1998 MT 206, 290 M 393, 965 P2d 882, 55 St. Rep. 876 (1998), and St. v. Kingman, 2011 MT 269, 362 Mont. 330, 264 P.3d 1104.

Publicity From Defendant's Televised Testimony — Not Inflammatory: Defendant could not successfully contend that the charges against him should be dropped because of inflammatory publicity because rather than being inflammatory, much of the publicity was verified, if not generated, by defendant's testimony before television cameras during the trial of his son, who was involved in the incidents for which defendant was tried, and because defendant's testimony at his son's trial mirrored defendant's testimony at his own trial. St. v. Nichols, 225 M 438, 734 P2d 170, 44 St. Rep. 382 (1987).

Voir Dire Closure for Inflammatory Publicity — Discretion Not Abused — No Protection of Defendant Who Created the Publicity: Whether or not voir dire should be closed because of inflammatory publicity is left largely to the discretion of the trial judge. The request is seldom granted. It must first be determined that the publicity is so great and so inflammatory that a presumption exists that the jury panel is prejudiced against defendant. In this case, there was no proof that closure would have protected defendant from the adverse publicity, which was at least in part generated by his testimony in the trial of his son, who was involved in the incidents for which defendant was tried. There was no abuse of discretion. St. v. Nichols, 225 M 438, 734 P2d 170, 44 St. Rep. 382 (1987).

Failure of Juror to Disclose Relationship: Defendant was charged with and convicted of sexual intercourse without consent. During voir dire, members of the jury panel were asked whether any of them knew any of the employees at the Butte-Silver Bow law enforcement agency and whether any of them were related to or knew closely anyone else employed by a law enforcement agency. Defendant contends he was prejudiced when a juror failed to disclose her brother-in-law was a civilian jailer at the jail. On appeal, the Supreme Court said other jurisdictions have held that nondisclosure of information is not grounds for reversal unless the nondisclosure amounts to "intentional concealment". There was nothing in the record to show intentional concealment or any misconduct by the juror. The omission appeared inadvertent and unintentional. There was no error in denying defendant's motion for a new trial. St. v. Bauer, 210 M 298, 683 P2d 946, 41 St. Rep. 1066 (1984), followed in St. v. Woods, 221 M 17, 716 P2d 624, 43 St. Rep. 601 (1986), St. v. Stringer, 271 M 367, 897 P2d 1063, 52 St. Rep. 473 (1995), St. v. Hatten, 1999 MT 298, 297 M 127, 991 P2d 939, 56 St. Rep. 1198 (1999), and St. v. Dunfee, 2005 MT 147, 327 M 335, 114 P3d 217 (2005). Hatten was followed in St. v. Rennaker, 2007 MT 10, 335 M 274, 150 P3d 960 (2007).

Judge's Discussion of Trial Process and Length of Service With Jurors Outside Presence of Prosecution, Defense, or Defendant: Prior to trial, the judge brought the 55 prospective jurors into court, explained the trial process, asked them if they could serve 2 weeks, and discharged two of them after the discussion. The prosecutors, defendant, and defense counsel were not present, and no record was kept of the proceeding. There was no prejudice to defendant, but the Supreme Court stated that a record should have been kept and that it was not suggesting that such an examination should be adopted by other judges or that the method of examination was the best one. St. v. Stroud, 210 M 58, 683 P2d 459, 41 St. Rep. 919 (1984).

Defendant to Show Prejudice From Media Reports: Defendant was tried and convicted of attempted deliberate homicide. After the verdict, defense counsel polled the jury and discovered that a juror had read an entire newspaper article summarizing the case. The juror stated that this had not affected her opinions or deliberations. The District Court denied a motion for a mistrial. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the burden is on the defendant to show that: (1) the juror was specifically exposed to media reports; and (2) the reports were prejudicial to the defendant. Mere proof that a juror was exposed to a factual account of the trial did not meet this burden of proof. St. v. Gillham, 206 M 169, 670 P2d 544, 40 St. Rep. 1576 (1983).

Prejudicial Pretrial Statements by Prosecution — Venue Changed: In a well publicized and controversial case, a defendant charged with rape had bail set at $100,000 by a Justice of the Peace and lowered to $15,000 by the District Court. The County Attorney and a Deputy County Attorney made statements to the press and various groups clearly indicating they believed defendant guilty and praising the description of defendant and his vehicle given by the 11-year-old victim. A disciplinary rule of Canons of Professional Ethics states that prosecutors shall not, in a pending case, make statements that a reasonable person would expect to be disseminated by means of public communication and that relate to the testimony or credibility of a prospective witness or to any opinion as to guilt or innocence of the accused or to the evidence or merits of the case. The failure of the County Attorney and a Deputy County Attorney to strictly adhere to the dictates of that rule jeopardized the impartial administration of justice to defendant by contributing to the establishment of prejudice against him, prejudice that the Supreme Court found to warrant a change of venue. State ex rel. Coburn v. Bennett, 202 M 20, 655 P2d 502, 39 St. Rep. 2300 (1982).

Pre-Voir Dire Determinations: Voir dire is not the solution to every venue case in which it must be determined whether prejudice still exists and whether by reason of it there is a reasonable apprehension that accused cannot receive a fair and impartial trial. Although that issue is usually determined by voir dire, each case must turn on its own merits, and a motion for a change of venue may be decided prior to voir dire if the circumstances of the case indicate inherent prejudice. Judicial economy and effective administration of justice are not served by the use of voir dire to decide the issue when it is apparent that it should be decided before voir dire, and there is the inherent problem of an atmosphere that may exert pressure on the jury selected. State ex rel. Coburn v. Bennett, 202 M 20, 655 P2d 502, 39 St. Rep. 2300 (1982).

Sandstrom Instruction: In 1972, the defendant was convicted of assault and rape. A Sandstrom-type instruction was given at his trial. After conviction, his counsel told him that a notice of appeal had been filed when no notice had been filed. The defendant wrote to a Justice of the Montana Supreme Court seeking a transcript and aid in appealing his conviction. Over the next few years, the defendant made several pro se attempts to get a transcript, which he believed was necessary in order to perfect an appeal. In 1981, a federal court ordered the Montana Supreme Court to review the defendant's conviction and to provide him with counsel. On appeal, the Montana Supreme Court found that use of the Sandstrom-type instruction rendered his trial unfair and his right to counsel was denied by the informal and summary disposition of his appeal. A new trial was ordered. St. v. Swan, 199 M 459, 649 P2d 1297, 39 St. Rep. 1522 (1982).

Prejudice — News Story During Trial: Defendant was tried and convicted of felony theft. Prior to trial several continuances were granted to avoid prejudice from articles about the defendant that were appearing in the local press. On the second day of trial, an article concerning the trial appeared in the local newspaper and defendant moved for a mistrial. The judge denied the motion and admonished the jury to refrain from reading the paper and listening to news broadcasts. Defendant appealed the denial of his motion, contending that the judge should have at least interrogated the jurors. The Supreme Court held that absent any indication on the record of prejudice to appellant so grave as to deny him a fair trial, the District Court properly exercised its discretion in denying the motion. The admonition to the jury was sufficient to correct any damaging influence from the news article. St. v. Weaver, 195 M 481, 637 P2d 23, 38 St. Rep. 2050 (1981), followed in St. v. Henrich, 268 M 258, 886 P2d 402, 51 St. Rep. 1275 (1994).

Impartial Jury — Prejudice Not Presumed: Petitioner alleged that he was denied his right to a trial by a fair and impartial jury in that much publicity surrounded his case, and his first conviction was overturned. The District Judge reviewed the transcript of voir dire and determined that the publicity had no prejudicial effect. The jurors were questioned as a whole, and many individually, as to their attitudes resulting from the trial's publicity. The apparent result of the questioning was that nearly all jurors had heard of the case, but all agreed that they could decide the case on the evidence presented. No specific instance of a prejudiced juror was shown. The court will not presume prejudice. It is incumbent on the petitioner to present specific evidence of prejudice to the court. Judges will not "pierce the veil of jury deliberations" to try to find whether the decision was based on bias and prejudice. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981).

Proof of Intent — Jury Instruction: In defendant's trial on the charge of robbery, the jury was instructed substantially as follows, that "in order to constitute the offense charged, it is necessary to prove the alleged intent. Intent need not be proved by direct and positive testimony but may be inferred from the evidence if there are any facts proved that satisfy the jury of its existence. The law also presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of any voluntary act committed by him. This latter presumption is a disputable presumption and may be controverted by other evidence." The court found that this instruction could not be interpreted by any juror to be mandatory in nature and did not shift the burden of going forward with the evidence or the burden of persuasion. Spurlock v. Risley, 520 F. Supp. 135, 38 St. Rep. 1339 (D.C. Mont. 1981).

Absence During Peremptory Challenges Not Violative of Constitutional Rights: In a prosecution for theft by accountability, the defendant was not denied due process of law by her absence from the courtroom during peremptory challenges of jurors. Although the defendant's presence may be crucial during the voir dire questioning of the jury, the Supreme Court has previously held that a defendant's rights are not violated when the matters handled in his absence are purely legal, and the peremptory challenge of jurors is only a pro forma execution of the decisions formulated during voir dire. Her absence was therefore not injurious to either her right of due process or her right of confrontation. St. v. Hart, 191 M 375, 625 P2d 21, 38 St. Rep. 133 (1981).

Independent Knowledge of Juror — Failure to Object: The fact that a juror had acted as a special prosecutor in a disbarment action against an attorney under a workers' compensation indictment and had used defendant's disbarment, which dealt at length with facts involved in defendant's criminal case, as a model in drafting his pleadings did not require reversal of defendant's conviction when, at the conclusion of the trial, the juror met with the judge and counsel and told them what he knew, and the defendant made no objection. The defense failed to meet its responsibility by its failure to properly object and thereby give the court an opportunity to remedy any alleged defects. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Pretrial and Trial Publicity: In a case that was the subject of extensive pretrial and trial publicity, the defendant was not denied his right to a trial by a fair and impartial jury where the record indicated that the defendant had attempted to use the media for his own advantage and had failed to move for a change of venue on the basis of the publicity. The defendant's argument that the court should have examined the jury as to their contact with the publicity and its prejudicial effect on them was not a proper subject for examination on appeal since no such motion was made during trial. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Alleged Juror Prejudice — Confusion in Voir Dire Record: When defendant contended that the presence of an allegedly prejudiced juror deprived him of his right to trial by a fair and impartial jury, the existence of some confusion in voir dire, as evidenced by the record, was good reason (in conjunction with authorities relating to scope of revision of juror challenge rulings) to rely on the trial court's decision to deny defendant's challenge for cause based on implied bias. St. v. Williams, 185 M 140, 604 P2d 1224 (1979).

Impartial Jury — Use of Voter Lists for Selection — United States Constitution: It is of no importance that Indians may have a tendency not to register to vote in non-Indian elections, for the purpose of determining whether there was a fair cross section of the community in a jury selection plan using voter registration lists. The legislative history of federal acts shows that no economic or social characteristics prevent a person who wants to be considered for jury service from having his name placed in the pool from which jurors are selected. Merely because no Indian was called on three successive jury panels, including the one returning indictments against Indian defendants in Montana, did not establish a substantial deviation from a fair cross section of the community. The defendants' right to an impartial jury guaranteed by the United States Constitution (similar to Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const.) was protected. U.S. v. Brady, 579 F2d 1121 (9th Cir. 1978).

Juror Misconduct — Presumption of Prejudice: The District Court failed to remove any prejudicial effect occasioned by statements by a juror in a public place which disqualified him as a juror. The court did not inquire into an alleged statement by the juror that "half of the jury is Hanson's friends", nor did it act properly in allowing the juror to sit until the end of the day on which the court determined his misconduct before substituting an alternate. The presumption of prejudice remained because the members of the jury were not interrogated to determine if they had been contaminated. St. v. Eagen, 178 M 67, 582 P2d 1195 (1978).

Restricting Voir Dire: The court did not err in sustaining the State's objections to defense counsel's voir dire questioning of prospective jurors on their attitude toward defense of justification in the prosecution of felony charge of escape from prison. St. v. Stuit, 176 M 84, 576 P2d 264 (1978).

Prisoner Handcuffed in Jury Presence: In the absence of an indication of prejudicial consequences, the momentary and inadvertent observation of the defendant in handcuffs by jury members does not warrant the granting of a new trial. St. v. Baugh, 174 M 456, 571 P2d 779 (1977), followed in St. v. Schatz, 194 M 59, 634 P2d 1193, 38 St. Rep. 1687 (1981).

Replacement of Prosecutor's Friend With Alternate Juror: The court did not err when, prior to the jury retiring, it replaced with an alternate a juror who was a personal friend of the prosecutor and had personal knowledge of evidence of the case. St. v. Baugh, 174 M 456, 571 P2d 779 (1977).

Reading of Nonadmitted Police Report to Jury: When jury deliberations were tainted by reading nonadmitted police report to the material prejudice of defendant's right to an impartial jury, to confront witnesses, and to assistance of counsel at every critical stage of trial, a new trial was required. St. v. Davison, 173 M 510, 568 P2d 159 (1977).

System for Juror Qualifications — Constitutional: Argument that since Legislature enacted different system for juror qualifications based on most recent list of registered electors rather than last assessment roll, without providing for jury selection commissions to meet after effective date of statute, and therefore no list of eligible jurors was available, failed because of Supreme Court's interpretation that various county jury selection commissions will meet as soon as possible after effective date of statute, invoking court's rulemaking power, under Art. VII, sec. 2(3), Mont. Const., by supplying a meeting and selection date. State ex rel. Bennick v. District Court, 167 M 389, 538 P2d 1369 (1975).

VENUE

Change of Venue Denied — Pretrial Articles and Statements Not Inflammatory — No Presumed Prejudice to Defendant: The defendant was charged with homicide when he shot and killed a young man who entered his Missoula garage at night. A deputy was quoted as saying that the defendant had "essentially trapped" the young man in his garage, and a former Montana governor stated that the laws of the state "are not going to protect this guy". Other newspaper articles referred to the man killed as the victim, and he was portrayed as a beloved son. The defendant moved to change venue, arguing that the pretrial publicity had denied him the ability to have a fair trial in Missoula County. The District Court denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that the public statements were not inflammatory and no facts demonstrated presumed prejudice against the defendant. St. v. Kaarma, 2017 MT 24, 386 Mont. 243, 390 P.3d 609.

Articles Detailing Alleged Crimes — Safety Information Ceased Upon Capture of Suspect — Change of Venue Properly Denied: The defendant was charged with several counts of committing heinous sexual crimes against several women. Before his apprehension, the local newspaper had printed articles about the crimes. Prior to trial, the defendant unsuccessfully moved to change the venue of the trial, claiming that he could not have an impartial jury in the venue. The District Court found the defendant guilty on all charges. He appealed, claiming that the District Court had erred by not granting his motion to change venue. The Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that the articles provided safety information, they ceased once the defendant was captured, and they did not reflect that the community was actively embroiled in prejudicial sentiments about the defendant. St. v. Griego, 2016 MT 207, 384 Mont. 392, 377 P.3d 1217.

Double-Cashing Paycheck Theft Scheme — Accrual of Theft Elements in County Where Bank Transferred Funds — Venue Proper: The defendant was charged in Ravalli County with felony theft by common scheme for double-cashing seven paychecks issued by an employment agency located in Ravalli County. The defendant cashed the checks through a cell phone application, saved the physical copies, then cashed the paper paychecks in Missoula County. The defendant moved to dismiss the charges, arguing that Missoula County was the proper venue because all the elements of the crime accrued when the defendant cashed the physical copies. The District Court disagreed, holding that the venue was proper because the stolen funds were unlawfully transferred from the employment agency's bank account located in Ravalli County. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the element of theft requiring the exertion of unauthorized control over property of the owner occurred in Ravalli County when the stolen funds were transferred out of the employment agency's Ravalli County bank account. St. v. Deshazer, 2016 MT 8, 382 Mont. 97, 365 P.3d 475.

Testimony Regarding Defendant's Home Address Sufficient to Prove Venue: On appeal, the defendant moved to have two charges against him dismissed for failure to prove venue. The Supreme Court denied the motion, holding that the testimony from the witnesses that the defendant committed the crimes in his home and providing his home address was sufficient to reach the only rational conclusion: that the crimes occurred in the county where the defendant was charged. St. v. Patterson, 2012 MT 282, 367 Mont. 186, 291 P.3d 556.

No Presumption of Prejudice From Pretrial Publicity — Motion for Change of Venue Correctly Denied: Defendant was acquitted of attempted deliberate homicide and convicted of aggravated assault related to a bar fight that left the victim with extensive facial fractures requiring reconstructive surgeries. Media coverage following the altercation included the dissemination of portions of a voice message the defendant had left for a friend shortly after the fight, and various fundraising events occurred in Gallatin County on behalf of the victim. Prior to trial, the defendant filed a motion to change venue, alleging he would not receive an impartial trial in Gallatin County due to the "inflammatory nature" of publicity that presumed his guilt. The court held a hearing on the motion and decided to base its ruling, in part, on the results of a questionnaire sent to 150 prospective jurors, which showed that while the majority of the prospective jurors had heard about the case, they retained their ability to serve as impartial jurors. Based on these results, the District Court denied the motion for a change of venue, and the defendant was convicted of aggravated assault. The defendant appealed, contending that the facts demonstrated a presumption of prejudice that required his motion to change venue be granted. The Supreme Court outlined several relevant factors in evaluating whether pretrial publicity warrants a presumption that an impartial jury cannot be drawn, including the size and diversity of the jury pool, community sentiment, the nature of the pretrial publicity, the amount of time between the alleged crime and the trial, and, in a posttrial scenario, whether the jury's decision on guilt is contrary to a presumption of guilt (i.e., whether the defendant was convicted of the original charge or of a lesser offense). The court concluded that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the defendant's motion because he did not demonstrate that the pretrial publicity had displaced the judicial process and because he was acquitted of attempted deliberate homicide. St. v. Kingman, 2011 MT 269, 362 Mont. 330, 264 P.3d 1104.

No Error in Failure to Grant Change of Venue After Trial Begun: Dean moved for a change of venue at the end of the first day of trial, claiming that a fair trial could not be had because many venire members knew of the case, knew the parties, disapproved of marijuana use, and had been influenced by pretrial publicity and taxpayer bias. The trial court denied the change of venue motion, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. The trial court allowed extensive voir dire, including private questioning of each panel member, and liberally granted motions to excuse jurors for cause. All jurors confirmed that their prior knowledge and opinions about witnesses would not interfere with their impartiality, and Dean made no assertion that the trial court abused its discretion by denying a challenge for cause to any juror. Denial of the belated motion for a venue change was affirmed. Dean v. Sanders County, 2009 MT 88, 350 M 8, 204 P3d 722 (2009).

Proper Venue for Prosecution of Common Scheme to Manufacture Methamphetamine in Several Counties — Possession Charge Dismissed for Improper Venue: Following arrest in Sanders County, Galpin was charged in Ravalli County with possession of methamphetamine in Sanders County, operating a methamphetamine lab in Ravalli County, possessing methamphetamine precursors in Ravalli and Missoula Counties, and criminal endangerment in Ravalli County. Citing venue grounds, Galpin questioned the evidence on the endangerment charge and moved to dismiss the possession charge and the Missoula County precursor charge because there was no evidence that the crimes were committed in Ravalli County where the charges were filed. The Supreme Court agreed that possession has but one requisite act, which is possession of the drug itself, and because neither the state's information nor trial testimony established that Galpin possessed methamphetamine anywhere but Sanders County, Ravalli County was not the proper venue for the possession charge, so it was dismissed. However, in pursuit of the common scheme to manufacture methamphetamine, Galpin kept precursors in storage facilities in both Ravalli and Missoula Counties and knowingly or purposely prepared, processed, or manufactured the drug as he traveled between Ravalli and Missoula Counties, so venue was proper in Ravalli County for the precursor charges. Ravalli County was also a proper venue for the criminal endangerment charges based on witness testimony that Galpin manufactured methamphetamine on at least three occasions at the witness's home in Ravalli County when children were present. St. v. Galpin, 2003 MT 324, 318 M 318, 80 P3d 1207 (2003).

Proper Venue of Custodial Interference Proceeding: Price was charged with custodial interference after failing to return his daughter to her mother. Price moved to dismiss the charge for improper venue, arguing that Lake County, where he had withheld the child, rather than Missoula County, where both parties resided and where dissolution proceedings were taking place, was the proper venue. Venue is a jurisdictional fact that must be proved at trial as any other material element. Deprivation of custodial rights is a requisite element of the offense of custodial interference, so the state must establish that the defendant: (1) knowing that there was no legal right to do so, took, enticed, or withheld a child; and (2) deprived the legal custodian of custody. When establishing the commission of an offense requires proving two or more acts, the charges may be filed in any county in which any of the acts occurred. In this case, at least one of the elements of custodial interference occurred in Missoula, so Missoula County was a proper venue for prosecution of the offense, and the District Court properly denied the motion to dismiss for improper venue. St. v. Price, 2002 MT 229, 311 M 439, 57 P3d 42 (2002), followed in St. v. Young, 2007 MT 323, 340 M 153, 174 P3d 460 (2007).

Travel in and Through County in Private Conveyance Adequate to Establish Venue — Boat as Private Conveyance: Diesen's boat collided with Hallock's boat in Fort Peck Lake, in either Valley County or Garfield County. Diesen was convicted in Valley County Justice's Court of boating under the influence, and he appealed. In District Court, Diesen moved for dismissal, alleging that the venue was improper because the state had failed to prove that any element of the offense had occurred in Valley County. The District Court applied 46-3-114 in concluding that Diesen's boat was a private conveyance and held that because the state proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the boat traveled in and through Valley County on its way to Fort Peck Marina, the Valley County Justice's Court was an appropriate venue. The Supreme Court affirmed denial of Diesen's motion to dismiss. St. v. Diesen, 2000 MT 1, 297 M 459, 992 P2d 1287, 57 St. Rep. 1 (2000).

Charges Filed in Wrong County — Venue Waived Upon Plea of Guilty: Thompson was charged in Powell County for felony escape while in detention in Yellowstone County. As part of a plea agreement, Thompson pleaded guilty and signed a waiver of rights. On appeal, Thompson contended that his constitutional and statutory rights were violated because he was prosecuted in a different county from the county where the alleged offense was committed. However, pursuant to St. v. Feeley, 170 M 227, 552 P2d 66 (1976), and McGuinn v. Risley, 210 M 349, 681 P2d 699 (1984), the statutory right to venue may be waived. Further, 46-3-111 provides that in criminal cases, venue is waived if not raised prior to the first witness being sworn. Thus, despite the fact that charges were filed in the wrong county, any assertion of improper venue was waived by Thompson's failure to object prior to pleading guilty. St. v. Thompson, 1999 MT 108, 294 M 321, 981 P2d 778, 56 St. Rep. 444 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Preite, 172 M 318, 564 P2d 598 (1977), St. v. Jackson, 180 M 195, 589 P2d 1009, 36 St. Rep. 169 (1979), and St. v. Johnson, 257 M 157, 848 P2d 496, 50 St. Rep. 209 (1993), and overruled by Helena v. Frankforter, 2018 MT 193, 392 Mont. 277, 423 P.3d 581, to the extent that it holds that venue is a jurisdictional fact that must be proven at trial beyond a reasonable doubt.

No Prejudicial Atmosphere in County Where State Prison Located: Defendant was charged with possession of a deadly weapon while an inmate at the state prison. He sought change of venue, contending that prejudice in the county where the prison was located was so great that a fair trial could not be had. The formation of a Citizen Protection Association and the fact that a large number of prison employees lived in the county did not constitute a prejudicial atmosphere. Also, upon review of the record of voir dire, the Supreme Court concluded an impartial jury had been empaneled, belying defendant's contention that all juries in the county were unalterably prejudiced. St. v. Palmer, 223 M 25, 723 P2d 956, 43 St. Rep. 1503 (1986).

Test for Change of Venue: A motion for a change of venue is addressed to the discretion of the trial court, and a denial is not error in the absence of an abuse of that discretion. Each case must be determined by the facts presented by it, and all indications of prejudice must be considered. The rule is that the accused is entitled to a change of venue when it appears that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the prejudice alleged actually exists and that by reason of the prejudice there is a reasonable apprehension that the accused cannot receive a fair and impartial trial. State ex rel. Coburn v. Bennett, 202 M 20, 655 P2d 502, 39 St. Rep. 2300 (1982). See also St. v. Kingman, 2011 MT 269, 362 Mont. 330, 264 P.3d 1104.

Venue Change Required in Rape Case: Defendant charged in Helena with rape of 11-year-old girl was entitled to a change of venue, as his exhibits and affidavits supplied reasonable grounds to believe that the prejudice alleged actually existed. After a Justice of the Peace set bail at $100,000, the District Court lowered it to $15,000. Angry citizens marched on the courthouse, public meetings were held, organizations were formed to address the matter, removal of the judge was sought, vandalism occurred, and threats were made against defendant. The only local paper ran numerous front-page stories with photos, went beyond an objective dissemination of information, and inflamed an already angry populace. The Sheriff, County Attorney, and a Deputy County Attorney made comments prejudicial to defendant and indicated they clearly believed him guilty. Law enforcement officials praised the victim's careful, excellent, and thorough description of her assailant and his vehicle. Numerous letters to the editor of the local paper indicating belief in defendant's guilt were printed. Defendant and his wife were forced to move to avoid reprisals and were prevented from moving into a place of their choice by complaints of nearby residents. State ex rel. Coburn v. Bennett, 202 M 20, 655 P2d 502, 39 St. Rep. 2300 (1982).

Proof of Proper Venue Beyond a Reasonable Doubt: Venue in a criminal case must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt. When defendant was charged with preparation of false evidence for submitting fraudulent petitions for workers' compensation settlements, sufficient evidence was presented from which the jury could determine that the State proved venue in Cascade County. Both petitions for settlement contained defendant's signature followed by his Great Falls address, and the settlement checks were sent to the defendant in Great Falls. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Venue Unaffected by Publicity of Murder: Considering the nature of the crime involved, the Supreme Court found the reporting extremely objective and factual and not unreasonably voluminous. Therefore, there was no abuse of discretion in the District Court's refusal to grant defendant's motion for change of venue. St. v. Sandstrom, 176 M 492, 580 P2d 106 (1978), overruled on other grounds in Sandstrom v. St., 442 US 510, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979).

Effect of Amendment of Charge: Court erred in granting motion for change of venue when information was amended to allege witness tampering in a county in which the action was not brought. The charges cannot stand independent of the original charges, and venue remains in the county where the action was brought. St. v. Bretz, 169 M 505, 548 P2d 949 (1976).

Trial in County Where Offense Committed — Statutes: Sections 46-3-102 (renumbered 46-3-112) and 46-3-202 (now repealed), which provide venue for crimes committed in more than one county and for cases when control is exerted over stolen property in various counties, do not violate constitutional provisions guaranteeing the right to be tried in the county where the offense was committed. St. v. Bretz, 166 M 444, 534 P2d 496 (1975).

ADMISSIBILITY OF DEFENDANT'S STATEMENTS

Motion In Limine Properly Denied — No violation of Confrontation Clause: In a Youth Court proceeding, the defendant was adjudicated a serious delinquent youth and committed to the custody of the Department of Corrections until age 18 for various crimes, including the breaking of approximately 75 car windows and firing shots at moving vehicles and at least one pedestrian. During the proceedings, the Youth Court denied the defendant's motion in limine to exclude 10 statements taken from the defendant's interview with police that the defendant alleged constituted inadmissible hearsay because the statements were attributable to witnesses who were not testifying at trial. The Supreme Court affirmed. The Youth Court's admission of the taped interview did not violate the defendant's confrontation rights because the statements constituted adoptive admissions or the witnesses were available for cross-examination. In re T.J.B., 2010 MT 116, 356 Mont. 342, 233 P.3d 341.

No Error in Failure to Suppress Incriminating Statements Made Following Knowing and Voluntary Waiver of Rights: After McCollom pleaded guilty to felony sexual assault against two 9-year-old girls, he argued on appeal that the trial court erred in failing to suppress incriminating statements made to law enforcement officers following his arrest. However, McCollom was fully advised of the right to counsel, signed a waiver of Miranda rights, admitted that he was advised of his rights and understood them, and then consented to the interrogation at which the statements were made. The trial court's conclusion that McCollom knowingly and voluntarily waived his rights was based on substantial evidence and was not clearly erroneous, and the Supreme Court affirmed denial of the suppression motion. St. v. McCollom, 2005 MT 61, 326 M 251, 109 P3d 215 (2005).

Voluntariness of Confession — Totality of Circumstances: When a defendant moves to suppress a confession or admission on grounds that it was given involuntarily, the prosecution must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that it was voluntary. On appeal, the Supreme Court will review denial of a suppression motion to determine whether findings of fact were clearly erroneous and correctly applied as a matter of law. A finding of fact is clearly erroneous if: (1) it is not supported by substantial evidence, which must be more than a scintilla of evidence but may be less than a preponderance of the evidence; (2) the trial court misapprehended the effect of the evidence; or (3) the Supreme Court has a definite or firm conviction that a mistake was made. When a determination of voluntariness depends on the credibility of witnesses, the Supreme Court will defer to the trial court. The emphasis in determining voluntariness is on whether the confession was the product of free choice or compulsion, which must take into account the totality of the circumstances, including the defendant's age and education, whether the defendant was advised of Miranda rights, the defendant's prior experience with the criminal justice system and police interrogation, the defendant's background, experience, demeanor, coherence, articulateness, and capacity to make full use of faculties, the length and method of interrogation, and whether the confession or admission was extracted through force, violence, or improper influence or by direct or implied promises. If the confession or admission was involuntary, its use violates self-incrimination and due process. Here, the Supreme Court considered the totality of the circumstances and found substantial credible evidence that Hoffman's confession was voluntary. St. v. Hoffman, 2003 MT 26, 314 M 155, 64 P3d 1013 (2003). The standard of review of denial of a motion to suppress was also applied in St. v. Munson, 2007 MT 222, 339 M 68, 169 P3d 364 (2007).

Possibility That Statements Made During Custodial Interrogation, After Lawyer Requested, Contributed to Conviction — New Trial Warranted: Spang was charged in connection with a double homicide. He made statements to police after being read his rights at arrest and again 2 days later after requesting a lawyer. Spang moved to suppress the statements, but the motion was denied on grounds that Spang waived the right to counsel after voluntarily answering interrogators' questions on both occasions. Transcripts of the interrogations were made available to the jury, and Spang was subsequently convicted on two counts of intimidation by accountability, but appealed based on insufficiency of evidence. The Supreme Court reviewed the denial of the suppression motion to determine whether the trial court's findings of fact were clearly erroneous and whether they were correctly applied as a matter of law. Here, Spang's request for counsel was neither ambiguous nor equivocal, so cessation of questioning was required until Spang either reinitiated conversation with the officers or was provided an attorney. Because neither event occurred, the trial court erred when it denied Spang's motion to suppress the statements. To determine whether the error was prejudicial, the Supreme Court applied the test in St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), determining in this case that the error was trial error, because it occurred during presentation of the case to the jury and was amenable to qualitative assessment for prejudicial impact relative to other evidence introduced at trial. Under the cumulative evidence test, the state was required to show admissible evidence that proved the same facts as the tainted evidence. Although there was other sufficient evidence tending to prove that Spang committed intimidation by accountability, qualitatively there existed a reasonable possibility that the statements that Spang made during the second interrogation contributed to his conviction because of the strong emphasis placed on those statements during trial. Therefore, the District Court committed reversible error when it admitted the statements during the state's case in chief. The case was remanded for a new trial, and the District Court was directed not to admit the statements made during the second interrogation. Statements from the first interrogation were admissible, however, because Spang had waived the right to counsel. Spang's argument that the first interrogation statements also be suppressed on unnecessary delay grounds failed, absent evidence that the delay between arrest and initial appearance influenced the voluntariness of those statements. St. v. Spang, 2002 MT 120, 310 M 52, 48 P3d 727 (2002), distinguishing St. v. Brubaker, 184 M 294, 602 P2d 974 (1979), and overruled, to the extent that the right to counsel for self-incrimination purposes may be invoked in custodial interrogation, in St. v. Buck, 2006 MT 81, 331 M 517, 134 P3d 53 (2006).

Admission of Murder by Schizophrenic Held Voluntarily Made — No Prejudice to Defense Case: Scarborough, a schizophrenic, was arrested for the murder of Willis and made incriminating statements in the back of a police car. He was taken to the police station where he was read his Miranda rights, waived those rights, and gave a recorded interview with a detective. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's decision not to suppress the statements made in the police car or the tape of the interview with the detective. After reviewing all of the evidence, the Supreme Court held that the single fact that raised doubts about the voluntariness of Scarborough's inculpatory statements is the fact that he is schizophrenic and was therefore subject to the suggestion by the arresting and interviewing officers that he had committed the crime rather than someone else. The Supreme Court reviewed the record of the circumstances of the confessions and held that they were not made because the police had suggested Scarborough's guilt to him. The Supreme Court also held that even if the confessions were involuntary, the admission of those confessions by the District Court did not prejudice Scarborough's defense because, as his defense, Scarborough admitted committing the murder but claimed that the murder was committed during an acute psychotic episode. St. v. Scarborough, 2000 MT 301, 302 M 350, 14 P3d 1202, 57 St. Rep. 1268 (2000).

Response to Friendly Police Statement That Suspect Should Not Do Anything to Himself Because Nothing Was That Bad: A police officer was driving a homicide suspect to his house to pick up a handgun that the suspect had told officers at the police station they could have. The officer told the suspect that he should not do anything to himself because nothing was that bad. The suspect answered that "if I did something to myself then we'd never find Brad". This was not an interrogation of the suspect, who had requested counsel at the police station, because it could not be said that the officer should have known that his statement was likely to elicit an incriminating response from the suspect. The officer had not participated in questioning at the police station, the questioning had not been part of a plan to convince the suspect that he might commit suicide if he did not confess, and the officer had known the suspect for years and made the statement out of concern for his well-being. Thus, the suspect's response was admissible. St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457, 51 St. Rep. 1151 (1994).

Miranda Warning Unnecessary Prior to Compelled Mental Evaluation: Defendant asserted that her Miranda rights were violated because prior to undergoing a compelled psychiatric and psychological evaluation, she was never informed that she had the right to remain silent. The Supreme Court found that the defendant was not entitled to Miranda warnings because: (1) defendant was represented by counsel; (2) counsel was fully informed of the time and place of the evaluation; (3) defendant was not in custody at the time of the evaluation; (4) defendant placed her mental state at issue; and (5) the compelled evaluation was limited to use for rebuttal purposes only. St. v. Hess, 252 M 205, 828 P2d 382, 49 St. Rep. 217 (1992).

Under Martinez Rule, No Duty to Inform Accused of Right to Testify: The defendant argued that his conviction should be overturned on the basis that he had not been advised by the trial court of his right to testify. The Supreme Court adopted the majority position of U.S. v. Martinez, 883 F2d 750 (9th Cir. 1989), that a trial court has no duty to conduct an on-the-record inquiry to determine if the defendant knowingly and intelligently waived his right to testify. St. v. Hamm, 250 M 123, 818 P2d 830, 48 St. Rep. 830 (1991).

Admissibility of Statements Made After Exercise of Right to Cut Off Questioning — Verification of Statements by Independent Source: Following his arrest, defendant was advised of his Miranda rights and signed a waiver. At some point in the subsequent interview, defendant indicated he did not want to give further information because he did not wish to implicate his brother; however, he continued to talk after questioning ceased. Any questions by the officers were only for clarification. Defendant moved to suppress any evidence obtained as a result of statements made after he exercised his right to cut off questioning. The motion was properly denied in light of the voluntariness of the statements and the fact that the state's evidence was obtained independently from many other sources, including searches by search and rescue units and statements of accomplices. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990), citing Nix v. Williams, 467 US 431, 81 L Ed 2d 377, 104 S Ct 2501 (1984).

Motion to Suppress Statements and Related Evidence — Waiver and Voluntariness — Applicability to Custodial Interrogation: The District Court granted a motion to suppress all statements made by defendant and any evidence obtained as a result of the statements, citing Smith v. Ill., 469 US 91, 83 L Ed 2d 488, 105 S Ct 490 (1984), as decisive of the suppression issue and supportive of the conclusion that defendant's request for counsel at his first interview barred further police interrogation. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the Smith rule applied only to instances of custodial interrogation, while in this case defendant was not in custody or under formal arrest at the time he requested counsel. Further, the District Court never addressed the question of whether defendant's confession was voluntarily made; therefore, the case was remanded for hearing on the issues of waiver and voluntariness. St. v. Rorvik, 224 M 104, 728 P2d 419, 43 St. Rep. 2051 (1986).

Suppression of Confession — Drugs and Memory Lapse Allegedly Causing Involuntariness: Counsel's decision to not file a motion to suppress client's confession was not error when there was no evidence in the record to support client's claim that he was under the influence of alcohol or drugs when he made the confession, his claim that he did not remember the confession was rebutted by his reiteration of the sequence of events to the court before he entered his guilty plea, and he signed a memo restating the facts. St. v. Docken, 222 M 58, 720 P2d 679, 43 St. Rep. 1058 (1986).

When Right to Counsel Invoked — Subsequent Incriminating Testimony Inadmissible — Error Held Harmless: Recognizing that it was affording greater protection under the state constitutional right to counsel provision than the U.S. Supreme Court had granted under the identically worded federal constitutional provision, and that this was a departure it had previously declined to make in the area of criminal law, the Montana Supreme Court held that when detained defendant stated he would like to talk to "someone", he invoked his right to counsel. His willing participation in a subsequent recorded conversation, without advice of counsel, did not constitute a waiver of the right to counsel, and admission of the recording into evidence, being testimonial and self-incriminating in nature, was error. However, the error was harmless because defendant during trial testified to a different story than he told on the recording, and the recording was admissible for impeachment purposes. St. v. Johnson, 221 M 503, 719 P2d 1248, 43 St. Rep. 1010 (1986), overruled, to the extent that the right to counsel for self-incrimination purposes may be invoked in custodial interrogation, in St. v. Buck, 2006 MT 81, 331 M 517, 134 P3d 53 (2006).

Miranda Warnings Unnecessary — Lack of Custody: During an investigation for the theft of property from Valley Industrial Park (V.I.P.), the defendant, a former employee of V.I.P., invited Adams, a special investigator, into his residence and discussed the whereabouts of the missing property. The defendant requested an attorney if their conversation was taped. The tape recorder was not used. Adams neither sought a confession nor suggested defendant would be under arrest. Defendant was never in custody, and the court properly admitted Adams' testimony. Miranda warnings were unnecessary. St. v. Holmes, 207 M 176, 674 P2d 1071, 40 St. Rep. 1973 (1983).

Central Question on Motion to Suppress Confession: The central question on a motion to suppress a confession for being involuntary is whether the State has proved by a preponderance of the evidence that the person was advised of his constitutional rights and knowingly and voluntarily waived them. St. v. Blakney, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982).

Suppression of Confession — Voluntariness — Waiver of Right to Counsel After Making Request: To determine whether a confession should have been suppressed it had to be determined whether the confession was voluntary and whether there was an unconstitutional denial of the right to counsel. In so doing, the following questions had to be answered: What was the totality of the circumstances? Was there effective assertion of the right to counsel? And if so, was there an effective waiver at a later time? Since the evidence answered a large number of the requisite questions about the circumstances, the decision of the trial court was held not to have clearly contravened the weight of the evidence, and its holding of voluntariness was upheld. Since any indication by a defendant in any manner that he wishes to consult with an attorney suffices and evidence showed the defendant had met this requirement, the trial court erred in concluding that there was ineffective assertion of the right to counsel. After adopting the rule that a defendant can validly waive the right to counsel after making a request for counsel, the Supreme Court found the trial court had properly found that the State had met its "heavy burden" of showing waiver of counsel. St. v. Blakney, 185 M 470, 605 P2d 1093 (1979), certiorari granted, 101 S Ct 2999 (1981), and judgment vacated and case remanded for further consideration in light of Edwards v. Ariz., 101 S Ct 1880 (1981), affirmed on remand, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982).

Voluntariness of Statements — Miranda Warnings — Tape Recordings: A defendant who said it probably was advisable that he have an attorney but who nonetheless went ahead and fully consented to being interrogated and tape-recorded, was held to have made a voluntary statement, having been advised of his rights. A statement made voluntarily after the speaker has been made fully aware of and understands his rights is not objectionable because the statement is made without the advice or assistance of counsel. Electronically recorded or preserved evidence is subject to the same admissibility tests as direct evidence of eyewitnesses or earwitnesses. With proper advice to a prospective defendant who then voluntarily consents to the tape-recording of his statements, the constitutional defenses of self-incrimination, unlawful search, invasion of privacy, and right to counsel disappear. Then the tape-recorded statement may be regarded as independent direct evidence or as corroborative evidence. In either case, the tests for admissibility are the same. Since the interviewing detective would have testified directly to the recorded statements, the recorded statements are themselves admissible. St. v. Brubaker, 184 M 294, 602 P2d 974 (1979).

Suppression of Defendant's Confession — When Miranda Warning Inadequate — Voluntariness: Appellant's statement was admitted into evidence erroneously for two reasons. First, the State failed to prove the voluntariness of appellant's confession at the suppression hearing by a preponderance of the evidence. When the State fails to show that appellant was advised of his Miranda rights or that appellant made the statement attributed to him or to introduce any evidence other than evidence showing that the appellant had the mental capacity to make a voluntary statement, a finding that the State has carried its burden of proving voluntariness by a preponderance of the evidence is clearly against the weight of the evidence and must be overturned. Second, the Miranda warning allegedly given appellant was inadequate. The language, "we have no way of giving you a lawyer, but one will be appointed for you, if and when you go to court", was held confusing. Because the confession "undoubtedly weighed heavily in the minds of the jurors in finding [the] appellant guilty", conviction was reversed. St. v. Dess, 184 M 116, 602 P2d 142 (1979).

Statements Made While Under Self-Induced Intoxication: When subsequent events confirmed reliability of defendant's statements made while under self-induced intoxication, trial court did not err in admitting statements in evidence because in cases of self-induced intoxication the criterion for admission is trustworthiness, which is testable by the content of the statements by evidence of subsequent events which confirm the reliability of the statements, especially since defendant freely made the statements where police did not question defendant due to his intoxicated condition. St. v. Emerson, 169 M 285, 546 P2d 509 (1976).

MISCELLANEOUS

Probative Value in Partner or Family Member Assault Case: A defendant convicted of assaulting his girlfriend challenged on appeal the admission of evidence regarding his verbal abuse and financial manipulation, and challenged the admission of testimony and text messages in which racial slurs had been used. The Supreme Court affirmed admission of the evidence regarding verbal abuse and financial manipulation, finding that its probative value in establishing the motives of the defendant and in explaining the actions of the victim outweighed the risk of unfair prejudice. Likewise, the Supreme Court affirmed the admission of the testimony and text messages with racial slurs, finding that they had probative value for establishing rising tension between the defendant and the victim and for containing an admission of guilt based on the facts and that they did not result in an unfair trial. St. v. Haithcox, 2019 MT 201, 397 Mont. 103, 447 P.3d 452.

Equal Footing of Direct and Circumstantial Evidence: In a murder trial for an intentional drowning, the state presented extensive circumstantial evidence, including an autopsy report indicating the victim's immediate cause of death was asphyxia by drowning but stating that the manner of death could not be determined. The defendant moved for dismissal for insufficient evidence, arguing that the state had to present expert medical testimony about the victim's cause of death when the cause was not self-evident or could be subject to misinterpretation. The District Court denied the motion and the defendant was convicted. The Supreme Court affirmed the decision of the District Court, stating it refused to require expert medical testimony when the victim's cause of death was not self-evident or could be subject to misinterpretation, and that doing so would elevate direct evidence over circumstantial evidence. St. v. Laird, 2019 MT 198, 397 Mont. 29, 447 P.3d 416.

No Error, Let Alone Cumulative Error — Cumulative Error Doctrine Requires Numerous Errors: When individual errors would be insufficient alone to serve as a basis for reversal, the sum of those errors can nevertheless serve as a basis for reversal under the cumulative error doctrine. The cumulative error doctrine requires reversal when numerous errors, when taken together, have prejudiced a defendant's right to a fair trial. The District Court correctly denied the defendant's motion for directed verdict, properly exercised its discretion in refusing the mere presence jury instruction, and properly ruled his two traveling companions' inconsistent statements about an acquaintance did not constitute hearsay. Consequently, there was no cumulative error by the District Court or resulting prejudice to the defendant's right to a fair trial. St. v. Ellerbee, 2019 MT 37, 394 Mont. 289, 434 P.3d 910, following St. v. Cunningham, 2018 MT 56, 390 Mont. 408, 414 P.3d 289.

Compulsion of Attorney to Testify as to Advice Given to Client Improper — Duty of Undivided Loyalty: In the context of a criminal case advising a client of a hearing date, the disregard of which could result in additional criminal liability, the compelled testimony of an attorney would violate the duty of undivided loyalty to the attorney's client. Furthermore, 26-1-803 prohibits the District Court from compelling the defendant's attorney to testify about communications made without the defendant's consent when the attorney's testimony would prove the elements of a new charge against the defendant. Thus, the District Court erred when it denied a motion to quash a subpoena compelling an attorney to testify regarding whether the attorney had informed the client of a final pretrial conference date, an element central to a new bail-jumping charge. Sweeney v. 3rd Judicial District Court, 2018 MT 95, 391 Mont. 224, 416 P.3d 187.

Numerous Erroneous Rulings Amounting to Cumulative Error — Reversal Required: The defendant appealed his conviction for deliberate homicide, arguing that the District Court had made several erroneous rulings that required a new trial: (1) excluding as hearsay statements the victim had made to the defendant, which the defendant asserted showed his state of mind and the victim's and were relevant to his defense of justifiable use of force, and (2) preventing the defendant from impeaching the state's expert witness with evidence that the expert witness had mishandled other autopsies and testified falsely in other cases. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded for a new trial, concluding that the District Court had erred in excluding the victim's statements and preventing the defendant from impeaching the state's expert witness and that, although the errors might not individually warrant reversal, the cumulative effect prejudiced the defendant's ability to present his justifiable use of force defense and denied him a fair trial. St. v. Cunningham, 2018 MT 56, 390 Mont. 408, 414 P.3d 289.

Assessment of Fines, Surcharges, Prosecution Costs, and Public Defender Fees Upheld: After scrupulously and meticulously examining the defendant's ability to pay, the District Court understood the burden and hardship the defendant would experience when he began making payments. The defendant's right to a jury trial also was not chilled because of the court's careful examination of his financial circumstances. Finally, the imposition fine was mandated by statute and was therefore appropriate. St. v. Reynolds, 2017 MT 317, 390 Mont. 58, 408 P.3d 503.

No Abuse of Discretion in Considering Unwillingness to Accept Responsibility in Underlying Case and Rejecting Reoffered Plea: In the underlying case, a plea agreement was never proffered by defense counsel to the defendant. Because ample evidence supported the conclusion that the defendant would not have accepted at that time and that the District Court did not act arbitrarily, without conscientious judgment, or outside the bounds of reason, the court did not abuse its discretion. St. v. Rose, 2017 MT 289, 389 Mont. 374, 406 P.3d 443.

Constitutional Referendum Void — Separate Vote Requirement — Substantive Changes Not Closely Related: The separate vote requirement for constitutional initiatives prohibits a proposal that makes two or more changes to the Montana Constitution that are substantive and not closely related. Furthermore, if a proposed constitutional amendment adds new matter to the Constitution, that proposition is at least one change in and of itself. Modifying an existing constitutional provision is considered at least one change, whether that effect is express or implicit. Although the text of CI-116, also known as "Marsy's Law", was contained in a new section, the constitutional initiative implicitly modified Art. II, secs. 2(3), 9, 10, 17, 20, 21, and 24. Because these changes were substantive and not closely related, CI-116 violated the separate-vote requirement, and it was void in its entirety. Mont. Ass'n of Counties v. St., 2017 MT 267, 389 Mont. 183, 404 P.3d 733.

Prosecutor's Statement During Closing — Even if Improper, No Effect on Outcome of Trial: The defendant was accused of sexually assaulting children. During the closing argument, the prosecutor stated that in order to find the defendant not guilty, the jurors would have to conclude that the two child victims had lied during their testimony. After his conviction, the defendant appealed, arguing that the prosecutor's statement had prejudiced his right to a fair trial. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's conclusion that the isolated statement, even if improper, had not affected the outcome of the trial. St. v. Stutzman, 2017 MT 169, 388 Mont. 133, 398 P.3d 265.

Prosecutor's Statements During Closing Argument — Potential Effect of Removing Presumption of Innocence — Plain Error Review Approved: A prosecutor's comments to a jury during closing arguments that the "presumption of innocence that you came into this trial with no longer exists at this point" constituted prosecutorial misconduct, and the defendant was entitled to reversal of a felony theft conviction under the plain error doctrine. The Supreme Court concluded the statements could have caused a reasonable juror to question the language of the preliminary jury instruction and therefore had the potential effect of removing the presumption of innocence from the defendant. St. v. Lawrence, 2016 MT 346, 386 Mont. 86, 385 P.3d 968, followed in St. v. Ritesman, 2018 MT 55, 390 Mont. 399, 414 P.3d 261, holding that the defendant's right to a fair trial was implicated by the prosecutor's improper comment during closing argument that the jury's job was to ensure the alleged victim's safety; however, this isolated incident of misconduct did not result in a miscarriage of justice or compromise the integrity of the trial, which would warrant reversal.

Impermissibly Suggestive Identification Still Reliable: The trial court did not err in allowing the victim's in-court identification of the defendant at trial. Considering the totality of circumstances, the Supreme Court held that, although impermissibly suggestive, the in-court identification did not create a substantial likelihood of misidentification. Hence, even though the District Court erred in finding that the in-court identification was not impermissibly suggestive, it correctly determined that the identification was nonetheless reliable, and the decision was affirmed. Billings v. Nolan, 2016 MT 266, 385 Mont. 190, 383 P.3d 219.

Improper Audience Comment During Closing — No Miscarriage of Justice — Request for Plain Error Review Declined: During the defendant's trial on six counts of incest, an audience member interrupted closing argument by stating: "Well, I'd like to say that God is faithful and just to those who confess their sins." The District Court promptly chastised and warned the audience member, and defense counsel did not object. After his conviction, the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing that the court should apply the plain error rule and conclude that the District Court had committed reversible error by failing to directly address the comment. The Supreme Court agreed that the comment was improper but, concluding that the comment did not cause manifest miscarriage of justice, affirmed the District Court. St. v. Griffin, 2016 MT 231, 385 Mont. 1, 386 P.3d 559.

Defendant's Convictions Upheld — Potentially Tainted Police Interview Not Contributing to Convictions: The defendant was questioned by police after he was arrested and charged with deliberate homicide for the death of his ex-wife and tampering with evidence. During the questioning, the defendant was advised of his Miranda rights, he declined to waive his rights, and at times he indicated that he did not need an attorney, while at other times he indicated that he had an attorney. The defendant also said he would not answer questions, but he continued to do so and never told the police to stop. At trial, the defendant filed a motion to suppress, arguing that the interview violated his right to counsel. The District Court denied the motion, and after deliberations the jury convicted the defendant of both charges. On appeal, the defendant argued that his convictions must be reversed based upon the denial of his motion to suppress. The Supreme Court evaluated if the ruling on the motion was prejudicial under 46-20-701. Additionally, the court evaluated whether the state could demonstrate that there was no reasonable possibility that the inadmissible evidence might have contributed to the conviction and whether under the cumulative evidence test, evidence existed that provided the same facts as the tainted evidence. Based on all the other evidence in the case, the court held that there was no reasonable possibility that the admission of the interview contributed to the convictions, and the convictions were affirmed. St. v. Larson, 2015 MT 271, 381 Mont. 94, 356 P.3d 488.

Officer's Statements Concerning Individual's Refusal to Speak Before Charges Filed — No Constitutional Violation: An officer's failure to speak with a suspect before charges had been filed because the suspect's husband told the officer that the family did not want to answer questions did not violate the suspect's constitutional rights to be informed of the nature or cause of the accusation. Furthermore, the statements of a witness were sufficient to establish probable cause for a warrant, regardless of the officer's statements in an initial report concerning the suspect's failure to answer questions. Billings v. Nelson, 2014 MT 98, 374 Mont. 444, 322 P.3d 1039.

Prosecutor's Statements During Closing Argument — Plain Error Review Declined: During closing arguments the prosecutor made remarks regarding three defense witnesses, including statements that the witnesses were liars from a different social stratum, that they were unemployed and collecting unemployment or workers' compensation, and that they played video games all day. On appeal, the defendant claimed reversible error based on prosecutorial misconduct, despite his failure to object in District Court. The Supreme Court reviewed the trial transcripts and considered the comments in the context of the entire argument and held that a failure to review the defendant's claims for plain error review would not result in a manifest miscarriage of justice, leave unsettled the fundamental fairness of his trial, or compromise the integrity of the judicial process. St. v. Aker, 2013 MT 253, 371 Mont. 491, 310 P.3d 506. See also St. v. Lindberg, 2008 MT 389, 347 Mont. 76, 196 P.3d 1252, and St. v. Hayden, 2008 MT 274, 345 Mont. 252, 190 P.3d 1091.

Connection Between Causal Theory and Facts of Case Required — Expert Testimony on Seizures Properly Excluded: After the defendant drove on the wrong side of the interstate, forcing vehicles off of the road before colliding with a vehicle and killing its occupants, the state charged the defendant with negligent homicide and negligent endangerment on the basis that the defendant was under the influence of alcohol at the time of the incident. At trial, the District Court excluded the defendant from presenting expert testimony about the typical symptoms of partial seizures and the difficulty in diagnosing them, without giving the jury an opinion as to whether the defendant actually suffered from a partial seizure while driving. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the defendant failed to establish a connection between partial seizures and his driving and that testimony about a causal theory that was not factually connected to the case was irrelevant and would confuse the jury. The Supreme Court also concluded that excluding the testimony did not abridge the defendant's constitutional right to present a defense because Rule 702, M.R.Ev., is rationally related to the important goal of admitting only expert testimony that is logically related to the central issues of a case. St. v. Jay, 2013 MT 79, 369 Mont. 332, 298 P.3d 396.

Prosecutor's Statements and Questions Regarding Witness Credibility Violative of Right to Fair Trial — Remand: At Hayden's trial, the prosecutor questioned a detective concerning the credibility of two other witnesses who had recanted their prior statements at trial, eliciting the detective's impressions of the credibility of the witness's initial statements following an assault. The detective responded that he thought the initial statements, rather than the trial statements, were true. The prosecutor also offered his own opinion as to the witness's testimony, stated that the jury could rely on the detective's testimony, and improperly testified during closing by vouching for the efficacy of the search of Hayden's residence and stating his opinion that a scale found during the search was used for drugs. The prosecutor's conduct invaded the role of the jury, creating a clear danger that jurors adopted the prosecutor's views instead of exercising their own independent judgment, and unfairly added the probative force of the prosecutor's personal, professional, and official influence to the testimony of the witnesses. The prosecutor's conduct undermined the fundamental fairness of the proceedings and Hayden's constitutional right to a fair trial, and the case was reversed and remanded for a new trial. St. v. Hayden, 2008 MT 274, 345 M 252, 190 P3d 1091 (2008). However, see St. v. McDonald, 2013 MT 97, 369 Mont. 483, 299 P.3d 799, holding that a prosecutor's comments during closing argument regarding the witnesses' credibility were "very brief" deviations and were not egregious, and St. v. Walton, 2014 MT 41, 374 Mont. 38, 318 P.3d 1024, holding that a prosecutor's closing remarks did not rise to the level of plain error because the prosecutor did not directly comment on the truthfulness of a witness, offer his own testimony, or elicit credibility testimony from other witnesses. See also St. v. Lehrkamp, 2017 MT 203, 388 Mont. 295, 400 P.3d 697.

Jury Trial Not Required in Civil Contempt Case: O'Neil was enjoined from and held in civil contempt for the unauthorized practice of law. O'Neil appealed on grounds that due process required that he be granted a jury trial on the charges. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that under federal law, there might be a right to a jury trial in criminal contempt cases that impose serious contempt penalties, but that there is no general federal constitutional right to a jury trial for criminal contempt in federal or state courts. However, O'Neil was charged with civil contempt, not criminal contempt, and the penalty under 3-1-511 does not provide sanctions that rise to the level of a serious penalty. O'Neil was afforded adequate due process under 3-1-518, including a reasonable opportunity to obtain counsel, to prepare a defense or explanation prior to hearing, to testify in his own behalf, and to call witnesses at the hearing. O'Neil was not entitled to a higher standard of due process that might require a jury trial, and the District Court did not err in holding that a jury trial was not required. Mont. Supreme Court Comm'n on Unauthorized Practice of Law v. O'Neil, 2006 MT 284, 334 M 311, 147 P3d 200 (2006), following Kauffman v. District Court, 1998 MT 239, 291 M 122, 966 P2d 715 (1998).

No Implied Presumption of Parole Eligibility — Federal Constitutional Protections Not Violated by Sentence of Life Imprisonment Without Parole — Montana Constitutional Protections Not Addressed: Garrymore was sentenced to life in prison without parole for the deliberate homicide of his adopted infant child. Garrymore appealed the parole restriction and sought to have the sentence vacated on grounds that 45-5-102(2) contains an implicit presumption of parole eligibility. Garrymore contended that under the statute, standing alone and without the operation of 46-18-202, he was entitled to a parole-eligible sentence, subject to 46-23-201, that was taken away by the sentencing judge in violation of due process and a trial by jury. The Supreme Court found nothing in sentencing statutes that creates a presumption in favor of parole eligibility that must be overcome in order for a sentencing judge to impose a parole restriction. Rather, sentencing courts have broad discretion under 46-18-202 to impose parole eligibility restrictions on felony sentences, and the Legislature has placed no limitation on the exercise of that authority. A parole-eligible sentence was not taken away from Garrymore because he was not entitled to such a sentence to begin with. Additionally, although the judge must state the reasons for a parole eligibility restriction when one is imposed, no particular finding of fact need be included among those reasons. Therefore, because the statutory maximum for violating 45-5-102(1)(a) is life in prison without parole, restricting Garrymore's parole eligibility did not violate any federal constitutional rights. The Supreme Court also declined to address Garrymore's undeveloped argument that the parole eligibility restriction violated the Montana Constitution's greater jury trial right absent a compelling reason why Montana's greater jury trial right dictated a different result. St. v. Garrymore, 2006 MT 245, 334 M 1, 145 P3d 946 (2006), followed in St. v. Rosling, 2008 MT 62, 342 M 1, 180 P3d 1102 (2008).

No Prejudice Warranting New Trial on Grounds of Cumulative Error: Larson contended that he was denied a fair trial and was entitled to a new trial because of the cumulative errors argued in his appeal. The doctrine of cumulative error requires reversal of a conviction when a number of errors taken together prejudice a defendant's right to a fair trial. However, in this case, the Supreme Court declined to apply the doctrine after reviewing all the issues on appeal. There was no prejudice shown, there was no abuse of judicial discretion, none of the evidentiary rulings were erroneous, and there was sufficient evidence to support the conviction. Larson's mere allegations of error without proof of prejudice were insufficient to satisfy the doctrine, and Larson's conviction was affirmed. St. v. Larson, 2004 MT 345, 324 M 310, 103 P3d 524 (2004).

No Violation of Defendant's Substantial Rights by Filing Amended Information on Day of Trial to Include Reference to Statutorily Mandated Sentencing Range for Repeat Offender: Gardipee was charged by information with misdemeanor partner abuse. On the morning of trial, the District Court granted the state's request to amend the information to include a reference to the statutorily mandated sentencing range for repeat offenders in 45-5-206(3) because of Gardipee's prior domestic abuse convictions. Following conviction, Gardipee appealed on grounds that allowing the amended information on the day of trial violated his substantial rights. The Supreme Court disagreed. The elements of the charged crime were not changed, and the only difference between the informations was the recognition that pursuant to the statute, a persistent offender was subject to an enhanced sentence for a third or subsequent conviction, so the amendment did not violate Gardipee's substantial rights. St. v. Gardipee, 2004 MT 250, 323 M 59, 98 P3d 305 (2004).

Differences Between Suspects in Photographs — Lineup Not Impermissibly Suggestive: A witness identified Baldwin in a photographic lineup, but Baldwin contended that the lineup was impermissibly suggestive because of numerous differences among the subjects in the photographs. The Supreme Court was not persuaded. Mere variations in appearance among photographs presented to a witness do not automatically invalidate an identification. St. v. Baldwin, 2003 MT 346, 318 M 489, 81 P3d 488 (2003), following U.S. v. Robertson, 606 F2d 853 (9th Cir. 1979).

One-on-One Showup Identification Impermissibly Suggestive — Witness Testimony Permissible Under Totality of Circumstances: Bingman sought to exclude the testimony of witnesses in a felony DUI trial on grounds that the witnesses' observation of Bingman through a two-way window at the police department was impermissibly suggestive, resulting in an unreliable identification. The suggestive nature of one-on-one showup identifications has been previously recognized. In St. v. Clark, 2000 MT 40, 298 M 300, 997 P2d 107 (2000), the Supreme Court set out a two-part test for determining whether evidence gained from such an identification is permissible. The state conceded that the identification procedure was impermissibly suggestive, satisfying the first part of the Clark test. The second part of the test requires a determination of whether, under the totality of the circumstances, the identification gave rise to a substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification. In this case, despite the impermissibly suggestive nature of the showup identification procedure, the certainty with which the witnesses identified Bingman outweighed the likelihood of misidentification, so the District Court did not err in allowing the witnesses' testimony. St. v. Bingman, 2002 MT 350, 313 M 376, 61 P3d 153 (2002).

Clarification of Harmless Error Analysis in Determining Whether Trial Court Error Resulted in Prejudice — Structural Error Versus Trial Error — Cumulative Evidence Test Versus Overwhelming Weight of Evidence Test: When determining whether trial court error has prejudiced a defendant, the Supreme Court has applied slightly different standards in various cases, resulting in some inconsistency and confusion over the proper test to be applied in a harmless error analysis. Over time, the "overwhelming weight of the evidence" test expressed in St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980) (affirmed in In re Petition of Brodniak v. St., 239 M 110, 779 P2d 71 (1989), and St. v. Fuhrmann, 278 M 396, 925 P2d 1162 (1996)), eclipsed the more substantive inquiry of whether erroneously admitted evidence might have contributed to a conviction, resulting in an inclination to simply tally the quantity of the admissible evidence of guilt instead of evaluating the qualitative impact that the inadmissible evidence might have had on the finder of fact—an approach that the court found unacceptable. In order to preserve the substantial rights of the accused and the fundamental fairness of the criminal trial and to provide consistent guidance to practitioners, the Supreme Court found it appropriate to formally adopt an approach to harmless error issues that first defined the type of error in question and that second, depending on the type of error, set a uniform standard against which the error must be analyzed to determine if the error was sufficiently prejudicial to warrant reversal, completing the analysis begun in St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204 (2000). The first step is to analyze whether the claimed error is structural error or trial error. Structural error is the type that affects the framework within which the trial proceeds, such as errors in jury selection, total deprivation of the right to counsel, and lack of an impartial judge, and is automatically reversible without additional analysis or review. Trial error is the type that typically occurs during presentation of the case to a jury. It is not presumptively prejudicial and is thus subject to harmless error review pursuant to 46-20-701. Once a convicted person raises and establishes that evidence was erroneously admitted and has alleged that there is a reasonable possibility that the evidence might have contributed to a conviction, the state must demonstrate that the error was not prejudicial. To determine whether that reasonable possibility exists, the Supreme Court abandoned the "overwhelming weight of the evidence" test in McKenzie, Brodniak, and Fuhrmann in favor of the "cumulative evidence" test set out in Harrington v. Calif., 395 US 250 (1969). In making its proof under the cumulative evidence standard, the state must show admissible evidence that proved the same facts as the tainted evidence and demonstrate that the quality of the tainted evidence was such that there was no possibility that it might have contributed to the conviction. If the only evidence tending to prove an element of the crime is tainted, then reversal will be compelled. If the tainted evidence does not go to the proof of an element of the crime and there is no other evidence that proves the same facts as the tainted evidence, then the tainted evidence will be considered harmless only if there is no possibility that it might have contributed to the conviction. In the present case, the trial court erred in admitting evidence related to Van Kirk's performance on a horizontal gaze nystagmus test; however, there was other admissible cumulative evidence that proved that same fact of Van Kirk's DUI as the tainted evidence, so Van Kirk's right to a fair trial was not prejudiced and the DUI conviction was affirmed. St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), followed in St. v. Peplow, 2001 MT 253, 307 M 172, 36 P3d 922 (2001), St. v. Spang, 2002 MT 120, 310 M 52, 48 P3d 727 (2002), St. v. Weldele, 2003 MT 117, 315 M 452, 69 P3d 1162 (2003), St. v. Crawford, 2003 MT 118, 315 M 480, 68 P3d 848 (2003), St. v. Slavin, 2004 MT 76, 320 M 425, 87 P3d 495 (2004), St. v. Paoni, 2006 MT 26, 331 M 86, 128 P3d 1040 (2006), and St. v. Russette, 2008 MT 413, 347 M 285, 198 P3d 791 (2008). See also Swan v. St., 2006 MT 39, 331 M 188, 130 P3d 606 (2006), and St. v. Chavez-Villa, 2012 MT 250, 366 Mont. 519, 289 P.3d 113.

Failure to Object at Trial to Refusal to Allow Testimony of Additional Witnesses After Trial Commenced — No Interference With Constitutional Right to Present Defense: LaDue contended that failure to allow the testimony of two additional witnesses after the start of his trial on charges of attempted deliberate homicide interfered with his constitutional right to present a defense. However, LaDue did not raise the constitutional question at trial, thus failing to preserve the issue for appeal. Failure to raise the issue at trial constituted waiver of the right to appeal it. St. v. LaDue, 2001 MT 47, 304 M 288, 20 P3d 775 (2001).

Postconviction Relief — Cumulative Error Doctrine Does Not Apply When There is No Error: Although cumulative error may serve as a basis for reversal, the court will not apply the doctrine when no errors have been shown. Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Standard of Review — Not Error to Adopt Party's Proposed Findings and Conclusions: The Supreme Court reviews a District Court's denial of a petition for postconviction relief to determine whether the court's findings of fact are clearly erroneous and whether the court's conclusions of law are correct. There was no reversible error when the District Court essentially adopted the state's proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law. Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

No Prosecutorial Misconduct in Eliciting Facts to Aid Witness Recollection, Disclosing Prior Witness Conversations, or Offering Statements in Rebuttal Based on Testimony: Defendant alleged several instances of prosecutorial misconduct in his trial for sexual intercourse without consent and incest with his daughter. The prosecutor had instructed the daughter that the assault occurred in Montana rather than Idaho, thereby avoiding Duffy's challenge to Montana's jurisdiction. However, the prosecutor was not prohibited from discovering facts to aid the daughter's recollection of where the incident occurred and doing so was not misconduct. Duffy also contended that the prosecutor's questioning of a detective about a telephone call to Duffy was misconduct because the prosecutor did not disclose the conversation, but the trial court cured any potential for violating Duffy's substantial rights by instructing the jury to disregard the testimony and by refusing to give the prosecution's flight instruction that was the basis for that line of inquiry. Lastly, Duffy claimed misconduct when the prosecutor elicited testimony from the daughter regarding her desire to see Duffy convicted and then later reiterated that testimony during rebuttal. However, Duffy's own counsel opened the door for the testimony, and the prosecutor was then free to reexamine the daughter for the purpose of discovering the daughter's motive; therefore, the prosecutor's subsequent comments were not construed as misconduct warranting a mistrial. St. v. Duffy, 2000 MT 186, 300 M 381, 6 P3d 453, 57 St. Rep. 734 (2000), followed in St. v. Hayden, 2008 MT 274, 345 M 252, 190 P3d 1091 (2008). See also St. v. Identification Procedure Impermissibly Suggestive — Motion In Limine to Suppress Witness's In-Court Identification Properly Denied — No Substantial Likelihood of Irreparable Misidentification: The witness stood by defendant's car for several minutes after an accident observing him for injuries and then left to get help when she saw that he appeared drunk and that there was a pistol on the car seat. When the witness and police returned, the defendant and pistol were gone. After many procedural delays and the suppression of evidence of defendant's driver's license taken from the car, the County Attorney's office sent a letter to the witness along with two photographs of defendant in jailhouse attire. The state affirmatively identified the person in the photos as defendant and asked the witness to notify the County Attorney's office if the photos didn't depict the person whom she saw in the car. Defendant's motion in limine to prohibit the witness's identification testimony was denied by the District Court. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that although the identification procedure was impermissibly suggestive, considering the totality of the circumstances, it did not create a substantial likelihood of misidentification and the motion was properly denied. St. v. Clark, 2000 MT 40, 298 M 300, 997 P2d 107, 57 St. Rep. 185 (2000).

No Error in Refusing to Dismiss Charges for Failure to Hold Timely Probable Cause Hearing: Brown was arrested on February 13, but no probable cause hearing was held until February 18. Brown moved for dismissal on due process grounds of failure to hold a probable cause hearing within 48 hours of arrest, citing County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 US 44, 114 L Ed 2d 49, 111 S Ct 1161 (1991), but the dismissal motion was denied. Brown appealed. The Supreme Court pointed out that the question to be decided was not whether Brown was accorded a timely probable cause determination, but rather whether the District Court erred in refusing to dismiss the charges as a remedy for failure to hold a probable cause hearing. Dismissal of charges is not the correct remedy for failure to timely charge a person who was arrested without a warrant. Under St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985), the proper remedy is the exclusion of evidence acquired as a result of the delay. The trial court did not err in refusing the motion to dismiss. St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 339, 297 M 427, 993 P2d 672, 56 St. Rep. 1346 (1999). See also St. v. Dieziger, 200 M 267, 650 P2d 800, 39 St. Rep. 1734 (1982).

Constitutional Right to Present Witnesses to Be Considered in Applying Sanction for Untimely Disclosure of Witnesses: Dezeeuw was charged by information with aggravated assault. His counsel failed to timely disclose witnesses and, as a result, was sanctioned by the District Court when the court refused to allow the testimony of one of Dezeeuw's witnesses who was an eye witness to the assault. The Supreme Court held that in determining whether the District Court abused its discretion in applying the severest of sanctions, Dezeeuw's right under this section to present witnesses in his behalf must be taken into consideration. The Supreme Court held that the District Court abused its discretion in applying the severest sanction, that Dezeeuw was prejudiced by the exclusion of his witness's testimony, and that Dezeeuw should therefore be given a new trial. St. v. Dezeeuw, 1999 MT 331, 297 M 379, 992 P2d 1276, 56 St. Rep. 1323 (1999).

Limitation to One Jury Trial Held Unconstitutional: In 1997, the Legislature enacted the provisions codified at 46-7-102(1)(g), 46-17-201(3), and 46-17-311(1), providing that a person tried for a misdemeanor in Justice's or City Court who appeals to the District Court has the right to only one jury trial. Woirhaye was charged with misdemeanor DUI and requested a jury trial in Missoula County Justice's Court. Upon his conviction by the Justice's Court jury, Woirhaye appealed to the District Court for a trial de novo pursuant to Art. VII, sec. 4(2), Mont. Const., and 46-17-311. Woirhaye asked that the District Court declare 46-17-201(3) unconstitutional, but the District Court denied his motion. Woirhaye then petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control, which was granted on the grounds that Woirhaye would otherwise be denied a fundamental right. The Supreme Court held that Woirhaye's right to a jury trial in both the Justice's Court or City Court and the District Court was a fundamental right guaranteed by Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const., and this section. The Supreme Court pointed out that the right to a jury trial is guaranteed by Art. III, sec. 2, clause 3, of the U.S. Constitution and the sixth amendment to the U.S. Constitution and also that even if that were not the case, Montana may, under the rationale of St. v. Bullock, 272 M 361, 901 P2d 61 (1995), provide rights in excess of those guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution. The Supreme Court noted, in response to the state's argument that this section guarantees "a" jury trial, that the state's argument was not persuasive against the language of Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const. The Supreme Court also distinguished Ludwig v. Mass., 427 US 618 (1976), holding that Art. VII, sec. 4(2), Mont. Const., was not implicated in the case, and stated that any language in N. Cent. Serv., Inc. v. Hafdahl, 191 M 440, 625 P2d 56 (1981), indicating that a requirement for a jury trial applicable to Small Claims Court was satisfied if the right was granted at the District Court level, was dicta and could not be relied upon to support the state's case that only one jury trial was required. Consequently, the Supreme Court held 46-7-102(1)(g), 46-17-201(3), and 46-17-311(1) to be unconstitutional as violating Woirhaye's right to a jury trial. Woirhaye v. District Court, 1998 MT 320, 292 M 185, 972 P2d 800, 55 St. Rep. 1298 (1998), followed in Balyeat Law, P.C. v. Harrison, 1999 MT 144, 295 M 13, 983 P2d 902, 56 St. Rep. 566 (1999), and followed and clarified in St. v. Rensvold, 2006 MT 146, 332 M 392, 139 P3d 154 (2006).

Prosecutor's Comments in Response to Defense Counsel's Opening Statement Not Prejudicial: Defense counsel told the jury in opening statements that a witness had made inconsistent statements, referring to a statement given to the investigator for the public defender's office. The investigator was never called, and the theory was not substantiated. The prosecutor referred to the theory in closing, noting that the defense had failed to present the evidence that defense counsel had referred to in opening. Although it is improper to comment on a criminal defendant's failure to testify, it is proper for a prosecutor to direct the jury's attention to facts in issue that could be controverted by persons other than the defendant. The prosecutor was entitled to comment on the theory suggested by defense counsel because the theory lacked evidentiary support. The District Court did not err in refusing to grant a mistrial on grounds of prosecutorial comments because the comments were plainly in response to defense counsel's opening statements. St. v. Soraich, 1999 MT 87, 294 M 175, 979 P2d 206, 56 St. Rep. 370 (1999).

Evidence of Habit Disallowed — No Denial of Due Process and Right to Defense — Unspecific Objection — No Impairment of Substantial Rights by Comment of District Court on Merits of Defense: Huerta was tried on charges of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) of a juvenile and attempted to present evidence that it was the habit of the juvenile's mother to punish him severely. The District Court prevented the evidence from going to the jury. Huerta claimed that the District Court had prevented Huerta from presenting his only defense and thereby prevented him from obtaining a fair trial, in violation of his right to due process under the fifth amendment to the U.S. Constitution and his right to a defense under the sixth amendment. The Supreme Court noted that the claim of denial of a constitutional right was made for the first time on appeal and, citing St. v. Weeks, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477 (1995), and St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592 (1996), held that Huerta had not made a specific enough objection when he objected at trial to a "miscarriage of justice". The Supreme Court also held that the District Court erred when it commented before the jury that "Brenda . . . is not on trial here". However, the Supreme Court held, as it noted that it had in St. v. Cassill, 71 M 274, 229 P 716 (1924), that under the circumstances, Huerta had received a fair trial and that his substantial rights were not prejudiced by the remark of the District Court. St. v. Huerta, 285 M 245, 947 P2d 283, 54 St. Rep. 1133 (1997).

Alleged Error Part of Defense Strategy — Trial Not Constitutionally Defective — Plain Error and Cumulative Error Doctrines Held Inapplicable: Hanson was charged with sexual assault of and deviate sexual conduct with his former girlfriend's son, Aaron. Hanson alleged that the testimony of his victim and certain witnesses was unreliable, that certain testimony was incorrectly presented on rebuttal, that the state introduced evidence of other acts in violation of both Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), and his constitutional right to due process, that the state's cross-examination of him went too far, that he was improperly impeached by certain state evidence, and that the prosecutor incorrectly commented on the veracity of a witness. For these reasons, Hanson argued that he was deprived of a fair trial in violation of the constitutional guaranty of a fair trial and that the doctrines of plain error and cumulative error applied so as to require a new trial even though he had not objected to the evidence before the District Court. The Supreme Court reviewed the trial record and pointed out that Hanson either failed to object to testimony by Aaron, Aaron's therapist, and a Deputy Sheriff or he actually solicited their testimony himself in an effort to show their lack of credibility. The Supreme Court held, citing St. v. Campbell, 241 M 323, 787 P2d 329 (1990), and St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996), that the alleged errors did not rise to the level of a manifest miscarriage of justice, did not leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of the trial, and did not compromise the integrity of the judicial system. Therefore, the court refused to invoke the plain or cumulative error doctrine to review issues raised for the first time on appeal. St. v. Hanson, 283 M 316, 940 P2d 1166, 54 St. Rep. 678 (1997). See also St. v. Hart, 2000 MT 332, 303 M 71, 15 P3d 917, 57 St. Rep. 1398 (2000), in which the Supreme Court refused to apply the plain error doctrine regarding the prosecutor's comments that defendant's presence in court while prosecution witnesses testified gave defendant an opportunity to fabricate answering testimony prior to taking the stand.

Amendment of Charge by Arguing Different, Similar Violation in Closing Argument: When the state, which charged defendant with violation of an August 4 restraining order, was allowed to argue in its closing argument that a September 18 restraining order was violated, a substantive amendment to the charge occurred. The court committed error because defendant has the due process right to know what to defend against. The charge of violating the August 4 restraining order should have been dismissed. St. v. Asmundson, 283 M 141, 940 P2d 104, 54 St. Rep. 535 (1997).

Lack of Evidentiary Hearing to Determine Whether Dissemination of Trial Information Would Jeopardize Trial Fairness — Media Involvement — "Pretrial Proceeding" Construed: The District Court did not conduct an evidentiary hearing or consider reasonable alternatives before issuing an order barring anyone involved in a criminal case from disseminating evidentiary information to the press or public and sealing evidentiary documents. The Missoulian newspaper sought to reverse the gag order. The Supreme Court, exercising supervisory control, applied the phrase "pretrial proceeding" in 46-11-701 to include all documents filed in conjunction with the pretrial process, regardless of whether the documents constitute records of a specific court hearing. Even though the gag order was entered with the consent of both counsel, that consent did not override the clear intent of 46-11-701 to balance the public's right to know with the defendant's right to a fair trial, a balancing that can only be accomplished by including the media in the decisionmaking process. Evidentiary materials filed with the court also fall within the public's constitutional right to know. Based on the District Court's failure to comply with 46-11-701, the Supreme Court reversed the order sealing court documents and remanded. State ex rel. The Missoulian v. District Court, 281 M 285, 933 P2d 829, 54 St. Rep. 175 (1997).

Participant Gag Order — Indirect Restraint of Media — Conditions for Issuance of Gag Order: A participant gag order is not as intrusive as a prior restraint upon publication or as intrusive as an order restricting news sources through closure of court proceedings or sealing of court documents, but instead constitutes an indirect restraint. A participant gag order does nevertheless impinge on the media's right to access news and the public's right to know. Prior restraints on publication consist of court-imposed restrictions that are directed at the media and interfere with the media's right to publish material already in its possession. Indirect restraints of the media include, without limitation, restraints that are aimed at the media's ability to gather information or to access official proceedings but that do not intrude on the media's prerogative to publish or edit information already in its possession and include restraints that are not directed at the media but at the sources of information. When the rights of the accused to a fair trial are asserted, a gag order may issue only when the following conditions have been met: (1) the press and general public are given an opportunity to be heard on the question before issuance of the order; (2) the court describes what alternatives have been considered and explains why those alternatives cannot adequately protect the defendant's fair trial rights; (3) the order is narrowly tailored to protect the defendant's fair trial rights; and (4) the court has made specific findings that there is a substantial probability that fair trial rights will be prejudiced by publicity that the gag order would otherwise prevent. A participant gag order is subject to a heightened scrutiny analysis. State ex rel. The Missoulian v. District Court, 281 M 285, 933 P2d 829, 54 St. Rep. 175 (1997), following N.Y. Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 US 254, 11 L Ed 2d 686, 84 S Ct 710 (1964), and distinguishing Great Falls Tribune v. District Court, 186 M 433, 608 P2d 116 (1980), and State ex rel. Smith v. District Court, 201 M 376, 654 P2d 982 (1982).

Identification of Defendant as Perpetrator — Necessity of In-Court Identification: It was not reversible error to refuse to dismiss on the ground that there was no in-court identification of defendant as the perpetrator. The method of identifying a defendant as the perpetrator is largely within the discretion of the trial judge. It was sufficient in this case that several police officers referred in their testimony to defendant as being the perpetrator. St. v. Stringer, 263 M 295, 868 P2d 588, 51 St. Rep. 63 (1994).

Dismissal for Failure to Charge Offense of Which Convicted — Reckless Driving Not Lesser Included Offense of DUI: Barker was charged with DUI but was convicted of reckless driving by the Ravalli County Justice of the Peace. Barker appealed to the District Court and filed a motion to dismiss, which the District Court granted. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the reckless driving charge and the DUI charge were inapposite charges and that reckless driving was not a lesser included offense of DUI. The Supreme Court also held that the conviction should be set aside because Barker did not have notice that he was charged with reckless driving, which violated Barker's constitutional right to due process. St. v. Barker, 260 M 85, 858 P2d 360, 50 St. Rep. 970 (1993).

No Prejudice in Prosecutor's Voir Dire Questioning — Failure to Request Cautionary Instruction or Mistrial: Defendant claimed that the prosecutor's questions to prospective jurors during voir dire in regard to the juror's potential discomfort in telling a group of people the details of a first sexual experience denied him a fair trial because he was not allowed to present any possible explanation for an incest victim's motives, biases, and prejudices other than defendant's guilt to the offense charged. The Supreme Court found no prejudice in the questions because the thrust of the comment was not to suggest that the alleged acts were the victim's first sexual experience but rather to elicit a response from the jury panel as to the potential difficulty of the victim to testify about the alleged acts of incest. Although defendant objected to the prosecutor's comment, he did not request the trial court to admonish the panel or give a cautionary instruction, nor did he request a mistrial. Under these circumstances, defendant was not denied a fair trial as a result of prosecutorial misconduct. St. v. Rhyne, 253 M 513, 833 P2d 1112, 49 St. Rep. 577 (1992). See also St. v. Hildreth, 267 M 423, 884 P2d 771, 51 St. Rep. 1086 (1994).

No Absolute Right to Counsel at Placement Hearing — Due Process: A delinquent youth was not denied due process when, pursuant to 41-5-523 (renumbered 41-5-1512), he was placed in a youth incarceration facility without an adversarial hearing to decide his placement. Beyond commitment of the youth by the Youth Court, the delinquent youth has no absolute right to counsel at the placement hearing. However, the youth is not without due process rights at the hearing stage. A youth placement committee created by 41-5-525 (renumbered 41-5-121) makes a recommendation to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services), which can accept or reject the recommendation under 41-5-527 (renumbered 41-5-123 and now repealed). In addition, the Youth Court can modify that decision if placement is not in the best interests of the child. In re Peterson, 235 M 313, 767 P2d 319, 46 St. Rep. 13 (1989).

Waiver of Jury Trial in Justice Court — Right to Jury Trial on Appeal: Defendant waived the right to jury trial in Justice Court and was convicted in a bench trial. It was his right, after making a timely request, to a trial by jury on appeal to the District Court. St. v. Bender, 232 M 424, 756 P2d 1157, 45 St. Rep. 1165 (1988).

Time of Attachment of Right: Under the sixth amendment to the U.S. Constitution, an arrestee incarcerated for traffic violations had no right to counsel or to be informed of the nature of accusations against him during the 30 minutes he was incarcerated while police were in the process of booking him. Strandberg v. City of Helena, 791 F2d 744 (9th Cir. 1986).

Right of Access to Court Not Denied — Access to Legal Library: Appellant, accused of intimidation, proceeded pro se with his defense. Court-appointed counsel assisted him with legal research and allowed appellant use of his own Montana codes. The Sheriff at the county jail accommodated appellant's request to do research at the jail and prepare a brief. After conviction, appellant appealed on several grounds, one of them being that he was denied access to a substantial legal library. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that appellant was provided with more than adequate legal assistance during the short time he was incarcerated and that his right of access to the courts was not denied. The Supreme Court expressed no opinion on whether the constitutionally mandated requirement that prisons provide inmates with adequate legal libraries or some other reasonable alternative extends to persons awaiting trial while in county jails or whether it extends to nonindigents. St. v. Lance, 222 M 92, 721 P2d 1258, 43 St. Rep. 1086 (1986), followed in St. v. Mason, 253 M 419, 833 P2d 1058, 49 St. Rep. 506 (1992).

No Right of Defendant to Attend Pretrial Meeting of Prosecutor and Witnesses at Crime Scene: It was not a violation of due process of law or any other federal or state constitutional provision for the prosecutor to meet with witnesses to a shooting at the place of the shooting for the purpose of going over what the witnesses saw on the night of the shooting. St. v. Sage, 221 M 192, 717 P2d 1096, 43 St. Rep. 738 (1986).

Jury Instruction — Did Not Improperly Lessen State's Burden of Proof: When the jury was instructed separately on the burden of proof in a criminal case, it was not error for the court to give the following instruction: "The jury will always bear in mind that the law never imposes upon a defendant in a criminal case the burden or duty of calling any witnesses or producing any evidence and no adverse inferences may be drawn from his failure to do so." St. v. Elliott, 221 M 174, 717 P2d 572, 43 St. Rep. 723 (1986).

Mere Allegations of Prejudice Insufficient to Satisfy Cumulative Error Doctrine: Defendant contended that the overall demeanor of the prosecution and the District Court, together with other alleged errors, required a reversal of his conviction; however, he articulated no particular comments or remarks and alleged no prejudice to his substantial rights. The Supreme Court has acknowledged the cumulative error doctrine, which is the accumulation of errors which prejudice a defendant's right to a fair trial, but noted that mere allegations of error without proof of prejudice are insufficient to satisfy the doctrine. The resolution of the alleged errors indicated no error meriting reversal of this case, and the court held that defendant failed to carry his burden of showing prejudice and declined to reverse his conviction on grounds of cumulative error. St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986). See also St. v. Hildreth, 267 M 423, 884 P2d 771, 51 St. Rep. 1086 (1994), St. v. Flowers, 2004 MT 37, 320 M 49, 86 P3d 3 (2004), St. v. Kearney, 2005 MT 171, 327 M 485, 115 P3d 214 (2005), and St. v. Hatfield, 2018 MT 229, 392 Mont. 509, 426 P.3d 569.

No Right to Second Psychiatric Examination: Defendant was convicted of aggravated kidnapping and deliberate homicide, pursuant to pleas of guilty, and was sentenced to death. Judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court. Subsequently, defendant filed a motion for an additional psychiatric evaluation based on the case of Ake v. Okla., 470 US 68, 84 L Ed 2d 53, 105 S Ct 1087 (1985), which was decided after arguments in defendant's case. The Supreme Court distinguished the facts of defendant's case from the facts in Ake and denied defendant's motion. The Supreme Court found that defendant had already been afforded his right to access to a competent psychiatrist for the preparation of a defense based on his mental condition and was not entitled to an additional psychiatric examination. The Ake decision lacks direct application to Montana's capital sentencing proceedings and defendant's case. St. v. Smith, 217 M 453, 705 P2d 1110, 42 St. Rep. 1348 (1985).

Delay in Initial Appearance — Exclusion of Confession: The defendant was arrested on a misdemeanor charge in Louisiana and incarcerated for several days before he was taken before a magistrate there for arraignment. Before he was arraigned he was questioned by Louisiana police concerning a murder which had occurred in Montana several years earlier. After being advised of his Miranda rights several times, the defendant confessed to the murder. At trial he moved to suppress evidence of his confession on the basis it was obtained after he was denied his right to be taken before a magistrate or judge to be arraigned on the misdemeanor charge and advised of his rights. The rule in this regard is the "McNabb-Mallory" rule, which has been adopted by the Montana Supreme Court and which requires the exclusion of any confession obtained as a result of unnecessary delay in the initial appearance. The test for determining whether the delay was unnecessary is set forth in St. v. Benbo, 174 M 252, 570 P2d 894, 34 St. Rep. 1140 (1977). Under Benbo, the defendant has the initial burden of showing the delay was unnecessary. If established, the burden shifts to the prosecution to show that evidence obtained during the delay was not unreasonably related to the delay. In the present case the defendant has not established an unnecessary delay in arraignment, and even if it were assumed that there was such a delay, the prosecution has established the voluntariness of the defendant's statements by a preponderance of the evidence. The defendant's burden with regard to establishing an unnecessary delay is not met merely by establishing that the authorities could have presented him earlier. St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985), followed in St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 339, 297 M 427, 993 P2d 672, 56 St. Rep. 1346 (1999).

Guilty Plea Withdrawal Requested on Petition to Revoke Suspension of Sentence — Denied: Order denying motion to withdraw guilty plea was affirmed when: (1) there was no evidence the plea was coerced; (2) the plea was apparently the result of a plea bargain; (3) at the time of the plea the judge interrogated defendant about nearly all the issues involved, such as voluntariness and competency; (4) his attorney at the time stated he was satisfied defendant was acting voluntarily; and (5) defendant did not promptly attempt to withdraw the plea, the attempt coming only when, 3 years after the plea was entered, he was in danger of having his suspended sentence revoked. St. v. Flamm, 215 M 466, 697 P2d 1371, 42 St. Rep. 547 (1985).

Evaluation of Likelihood of Misidentification: D.K. was forcibly raped at knife point in her home in Butte. After the rape, D.K. was shown photographic lineups, one of which contained a 1977 photo of defendant and the other a current picture of defendant. D.K. could not identify her attacker but showed interest in the photos of defendant. Defendant's photos were the only ones bearing the words "Police Dep't. Butte, Montana". At a physical lineup, D.K. immediately identified defendant as her attacker. The trial court granted defendant's motion to exclude the photo identification but denied motions to suppress evidence of the physical lineup or to prevent any in-court identification. On appeal, defendant contends that the photo lineups were impermissibly suggestive and tainted any later identification. The Supreme Court followed the two-pronged test of determining if the identification procedure was impermissibly suggestive and, if so, whether under the totality of the circumstances the procedure had a tendency to give rise to a likelihood of misidentification (St. v. Lara, 179 M 201, 587 P2d 930 (1978)). The court used the five factors set out in Neil v. Biggers, 409 US 188, 34 L Ed 2d 401, 93 S Ct 375 (1970), to evaluate the likelihood of misidentification. Considering the totality of the circumstances, the court did not find that the photo lineups gave rise to an "irreparable misidentification". St. v. Bauer, 210 M 298, 683 P2d 946, 41 St. Rep. 1066 (1984). The five-part Neil test was applied in St. v. Schoffner, 248 M 260, 811 P2d 548, 48 St. Rep. 424 (1991), St. v. Clark, 2000 MT 40, 298 M 300, 997 P2d 107, 57 St. Rep. 185 (2000), and St. v. Baldwin, 2003 MT 346, 318 M 489, 81 P3d 488 (2003).

Fundamental Fairness Required: Defendant was charged with sale of dangerous drugs (now criminal distribution of dangerous drugs). Defendant contended he had been entrapped because a paid informer had used persistent and harassing techniques over a period of a month and a half to induce defendant to obtain drugs for him. Defendant wished to present the testimony of Worley to show the informant's techniques. Worley claimed his fifth amendment right against self-incrimination and refused to answer questions regarding his connection with the informant. The trial court refused to grant Worley immunity and ruled his testimony irrelevant and immaterial. Defendant also attempted to use the testimony of Surman to show that the informant had used similar techniques before. The trial court ruled the testimony immaterial and irrelevant to the defense of entrapment. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the testimony was relevant and admissible. The case was remanded for a new trial because defendant was denied his right to present a full and meaningful defense. The court analogized to Rule 404, Montana Rules of Evidence, which allows the introduction of evidence of other crimes in certain circumstances. The court held that fundamental fairness requires that the principle behind the rule must be equally available to show a plan or method of operation by a state informant. St. v. Chapman, 209 M 57, 679 P2d 1210, 41 St. Rep. 550 (1984).

Allegedly Exculpatory Evidence Not Produced by State — No Error: Defendant was convicted of felony theft and felony criminal mischief for the unauthorized cutting of Christmas trees on a section of land, section 35, owned by a paper company. Defendant did have permission to cut trees on an adjacent section, section 36, owned by the state of Montana. Defendant moved to dismiss the case on the grounds that the State had suppressed material or exculpatory evidence by selling most of the trees shortly after the incident. Defendant claimed that as a result of this sale, he had no evidence with which to prove that he had cut trees not on section 35, but rather on section 36. The District Court denied the dismissal motion, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The Supreme Court reasoned that defendant had not filed a motion to produce the trees until 5 months after the incident, long after the trees had been disposed of, that defendant had not shown that the evidence was exculpatory, and that, in any event, the paper company had had possession and control of the trees, not the State. St. v. Palmer, 207 M 152, 673 P2d 1234, 40 St. Rep. 1957 (1983).

Forfeiture Proceedings — No Violation of Defendant's Due Process Rights: In a proceeding under Title 44, ch. 12, defendant, in his answer to the State's notice of intent to institute forfeiture proceedings, admitted ownership of the vehicle but refused to respond to the allegations that it had been used in criminal activity. Hearing on the forfeiture was held after defendant had been sentenced and forfeiture was ordered. On appeal, defendant asserted that the requirement of Title 44, ch. 12, part 2, that the owner or claimant of seized property file an answer within 20 days of the State's notice was a violation of his right to due process. Defendant reasoned that the statute requires an unconstitutional choice to be made in the forfeiture proceeding, i.e., a defendant must choose either to give evidence that may be used against him in a criminal proceeding or to forfeit his property. The Supreme Court found that Title 44, ch. 12, part 2, does not require that a defendant incriminate himself in the answer and further found that this defendant had not done so. Therefore, the court ruled that the statutes are not facially unconstitutional. Neither was the statutes' application to defendant unconstitutional, since his forfeiture hearing was not held until after his sentencing. St. v. Baker, 205 M 244, 667 P2d 416, 40 St. Rep. 1244 (1983).

Theft — Burden on Defendant to Disprove Unlawful Possession or Prove Lawful Possession — Unconstitutional: Defendant was convicted of felony theft of an air compressor, which he contended he had rented from an unidentified party. On appeal, defendant contended that an instruction couched in the exact language of 45-6-304 (now repealed) was unconstitutional in that it created a rebuttable presumption placing a burden of persuasion on the defendant as to the effect of possession and that it undermined the "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard of proof in that it contained no time constraints nor was it limited to "exclusive possessions". The Supreme Court held 45-6-304 (now repealed) unconstitutional and held any instruction using the language of the statute to be prejudicial to a defendant. The court stated that the burden of proving every essential element of theft must always be on the State. Section 45-6-304 (now repealed) takes away the presumption of innocence and forces a defendant to testify by placing a burden on him to either disprove unlawful possession or prove lawful possession. The court set forth what it considered a proper instruction on the effect a jury may give to the unauthorized possession of stolen property. St. v. Kramp, 200 M 383, 651 P2d 614, 39 St. Rep. 1819 (1982), followed in St. v. Morigeau, 202 M 36, 656 P2d 185, 39 St. Rep. 2311 (1982).

Continuing Series of Offenses — Charge, Trial, and Conviction for Each Violation: Petitioner was charged in Justice's Court with violating 15-57-102 (now repealed) during a "calendar year" and on conviction was sentenced under 15-57-110 (now repealed), which provides that each day of a violation constitutes a separate offense punishable by a fine not to exceed $200. Petitioner was convicted, sentenced to pay a fine of $1,200, and upon refusal to pay the fine was incarcerated for contempt. Petitioner was granted a Writ of Habeas Corpus because the due process guarantee of this section prohibits sentencing a person for each separate offense unless he was charged, tried, and convicted for each such offense. Crane v. St., 200 M 280, 650 P2d 794, 39 St. Rep. 1743 (1982).

Out-of-Court Identification — One-Man Showup — Federal Habeas Corpus: A one-man showup out-of-court identification may be unnecessarily suggestive, thus violating federal due process rights, and through the doctrine of "fruit of the poisonous tree", corrupt subsequent in-court identification. Under the facts presented here, viewed under the standards enumerated in Neil v. Biggers, 409 US 188 (1972), the identification was reliable and as such did not violate defendant's federal due process rights. Jenkins v. Warrington, 530 F. Supp. 121, 39 St. Rep. 174 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Habeas Corpus — Federal Fourth Amendment Collateral Attack: A prisoner's petition for federal habeas corpus predicated on a claim of unconstitutional search and seizure must be barred where a prisoner fails to assert that the state courts had denied him a full and fair opportunity to litigate his fourth amendment claim, and furthermore the petition must be denied where the record of state proceedings clearly indicates that the petitioner was given a full and fair opportunity to litigate the claim in state court. Jenkins v. Warrington, 530 F. Supp. 121, 39 St. Rep. 174 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Jury Not Involved in Sentencing — Different Factors Required: Petitioner claimed he was denied constitutional rights because the jury was not involved in the sentencing determination; he was sentenced to hang. The factor of overriding importance in sentencing schemes is that the trial and sentencing must be bifurcated, with different factors considered at each. The factors considered by a judge in imposing the death penalty are not elements of the crime. There is no constitutional requirement that a jury make the determination to impose the death penalty. Petitioner's claim was properly dismissed. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981).

Death Sentence — Convicted to Show Mitigation — Requirement Constitutional: Petitioner, under a sentence of death, alleged error in that the burden in sentencing rests on him to show mitigation. The mitigating factors regarding the death penalty sentence have no bearing on guilt or innocence. It is permissible to allow facts pertinent only to the question of punishment to be determined by a judge rather than by a jury, and the state need not prove such facts beyond a reasonable doubt. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981).

Preliminary Hearing — Defendant Not to Appear Handcuffed in Prison Clothes: Defendant claimed he was entitled to a new trial because the trial court refused his motion that he be permitted to attend his preliminary hearing without handcuffs and prison clothes. Although the Supreme Court found no prejudice in the case, they reminded trial courts of their duty to avoid potential prejudice caused by the appearance of a defendant. They urged trial courts to stop this practice and order custodial officials to bring defendants into court dressed in their own clothes without handcuffs. This is especially necessary since courts have been opened up to the news media. St. v. Rodriguez, 192 M 411, 628 P2d 280, 38 St. Rep. 578F (1981).

Voluntariness of Waiver of Rights of Accused — Findings and Conclusions Absent: Appeal was made from a conviction for sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault. The defendant contended on appeal that he did not voluntarily and knowingly waive his Miranda rights and it was error for his statement to be used as evidence against him. In determining whether or not a confession should be suppressed, the trial judge must decide if it was voluntary. The Supreme Court said the determination of voluntariness turned solely on the credibility of the witnesses and deferred to the trial judge's finding of voluntariness supported by substantial credible evidence. It declined to substitute its judgment when there was substantial evidence to support the judge's determination. Although the judge did not enter specific facts and findings as is preferable, it was not reversible error in a suppression hearing. It was noted, too, that the defendant never asked that findings and conclusions be entered. St. v. Camitsch, 192 M 124, 626 P2d 1250, 38 St. Rep. 563 (1981).

Discovery Limited by Court — Witness' Bias a Jury Question: The defendant, convicted of theft in a holdup of a truckstop, appealed that the trial court had erred in refusing to allow discovery of the "rap sheet" of a suspected accomplice. Defendant argued on appeal that he was denied due process. The reviewing court disagreed, saying that unlike the defendant in the case this defendant relied upon, who was unable to make a record from which to argue the witness' bias or lack of impartiality because the witness' criminal record could not be presented to the jury, this defendant was permitted to fully present evidence of the criminal character and bias of the suspected accomplice. The jury was aware of the immunity bargain between the witness and the prosecution and of the witness' complicity in the truckstop theft. The trial court's denial of the defendant's motion was well within its discretion to control cross-examination. St. v. Dolan, 190 M 195, 620 P2d 355, 37 St. Rep. 1860 (1980).

Sentencing — Ineligibility for Parole or Furlough — Vagueness: Petitioners contend that 46-18-202(2) is invalid because it is too vague in defining the supposed offense. This section does not define an offense. It does not create a new offense, nor does it forbid or require the doing of an act. Its sole purpose is to permit a District Judge, in the course of ordinary sentencing, to determine that a defendant should serve his full sentence for the protection of society. Cavanaugh v. Crist, 189 M 274, 615 P2d 890, 37 St. Rep. 1461 (1980).

Sentence Enhanced — Defendant Not Sentenced for Crime Not Charged: Defendant was convicted of the crime of aggravated burglary with a weapon, and the charging document, while omitting any mention of additional sentencing under 46-18-221, did mention that he was armed with a knife while committing the crime and was sentenced under 46-18-221 for an additional 5 years for the use of the knife. The defendant was not sentenced for a crime with which he was not charged because 46-18-221 does not create a separate substantive offense but enhances the penalty for an underlying offense. The defendant was not denied due process due to the additional sentencing because the jury was instructed on the crime of aggravated burglary with a weapon and found him guilty of that crime. St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980).

Right to Fair Trial — Claim of Overzealous Prosecution: The record did not support defendant's claim that the cumulative effect of the actions of the prosecution, which according to the defendant included filing multiple counts, participating in pretrial publicity, resisting payment of appointed counsel, dismissing and refiling charges without notice to the defendant, demanding documents from the defense, and withholding the names of witnesses, denied him his right to a fair trial. The issues present, if considered error, are not in any sense prejudicial. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Circumstances Favoring Withdrawal of Guilty Plea: The defendant was not made aware of the differing elements of assault as set forth in 45-5-201 and 45-5-202, and the District Court had before it evidence indicating that defendant was under the influence of a combination of drugs and alcohol and was possibly suffering from mental distress or instability at the time of the alleged assault. Under those circumstances the judge should not have accepted defendant's guilty plea, and defendant should be allowed to withdraw the plea. St. v. Nelson, 184 M 491, 603 P2d 1050 (1979).

Denial of Motion for Continuance: In a prosecution for attempted deliberate homicide, the court did not err in denying defendant's motion for a continuance, in which defendant argued he was deprived of his right to effective counsel, due process, and time to prepare his case. Motions for continuance are directed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and the trial court will not be reversed absent a showing of prejudice to the movant, citing St. v. Paulson, 167 M 310, 538 P2d 339 (1975). As more than 2 months elapsed between the entry of defendant's plea and his motion for continuance and because he failed to show any prejudice, the motion was properly denied. St. v. Kirkland, 184 M 229, 602 P2d 586 (1979).

Recording Closing Arguments Does Not Deny Fair Trial: Defendant's right to a fair trial was not invaded or denied by the court's failure to prohibit the tape-recording by the audience of the State's closing arguments. St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978).

Unfair Trial — Prosecutorial Misconduct: It is not the duty of the prosecuting attorney to make independent determinations concerning the admissibility of evidence once the court rules such evidence is inadmissible. Willful attempts by the prosecutor in this case to place excluded evidence before the jury resulted in a reversal of conviction because of its prejudicial effect. St. v. Bain, 176 M 23, 575 P2d 919 (1978).

Dismissal of Counts — Effect on Trial of Remaining Count: The State's failure to dismiss two of three counts of aggravated assault prior to beginning of trial when it knew the victim would not be present to testify did not constitute denial of a fair trial on the remaining count because evidence admitted was permissible circumstantial evidence easily separated from direct evidence introduced on the first count and the jury was duly admonished to ignore all evidence stricken upon dismissal of two counts. St. v. Bradford, 175 M 545, 575 P2d 83 (1978).

Failure to Call Witnesses Who Would Determine Truth: In an alleged felony theft the search for truth was less than vigorous by counsel, and the judge had a duty to sua sponte demand that a search for the truth be exhausted before the matter be decided. Failure to call witnesses enumerated by defendant who could help determine the truth denied defendant a fair trial and due process. St. v. Mickelson, 172 M 489, 565 P2d 308 (1977).

Hearing Constitutional Claims on Appeal: Although constitutional questions should be interposed as promptly as possible, unless there is substantial evidence of waiver, appeal of constitutional claims will be heard on their merits. Fitzpatrick v. Crist, 164 M 382, 528 P2d 1322 (1974).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

RIGHT TO APPEAR AND DEFEND IN PERSON

Motion for New Trial: Article III, sec. 16, 1889 Mont. Const., and former section requiring the presence of a defendant at trial do not require that the defendant be present at a hearing on a motion for a new trial because such a hearing is held after the verdict has been rendered and is not part of the trial. St. v. Peters, 146 M 188, 405 P2d 642 (1965).

Not Applicable to Matters of Law: A defendant's constitutional and statutory right to be present at trial does not encompass proceedings before the court involving matters of law but only where the jury is hearing his cause or where his presence is essential to a fair and just determination of a substantial issue. St. v. Peters, 146 M 188, 405 P2d 642 (1965).

Right to Be Present Throughout Trial: Under the constitutional and statutory provisions applicable, a defendant charged with crime must be present throughout the entire trial, including the rendition of the verdict, and the fact of his presence must be made to appear from the record. St. v. Reed, 65 M 51, 210 P 756 (1922).

RIGHT TO COUNSEL

Effective Counsel — Representation Adequate: Counsels' efforts were effective and client was adequately represented. Digiallonardo v. Betzer, 163 M 104, 515 P2d 705 (1973); St. v. Perry, 161 M 155, 505 P2d 113 (1973).

Denial of Continuance — Refusal to Cooperate With Appointed Attorney: Denial of continuance based on substitution of counsel was not an abuse of discretion or a denial of defendants' constitutional right to counsel when defendants had refused for 3 months to communicate with court-appointed counsel and first attempted to obtain alternate counsel on the day before trial. St. v. Spurlock, 161 M 388, 506 P2d 842 (1973).

Attempted Discharge of Court-Appointed Attorney Immediately Before Trial: When counsel appointed by court with defendant's approval effectively represented defendant for several weeks before trial, including securing postponements and filing of several motions, then defendant sought to discharge counsel the day before trial and have new counsel appointed, there was no denial of right to counsel in court's refusal to permit counsel to withdraw, thus forcing defendant to proceed to trial with appointed counsel. St. v. Forsness, 159 M 105, 495 P2d 176 (1972).

Effective Counsel — Defendant's Confidence: Effective counsel does not mean one in which the defendant has confidence. Success is not the test of efficient counsel; frequently neither vigor, zeal, nor skill can overcome the truth. St. v. Forsness, 159 M 105, 495 P2d 176 (1972), followed in St. v. Martz, 233 M 136, 760 P2d 65, 45 St. Rep. 1370 (1988).

No Right to Choice of Counsel: Indigent defendant's right to counsel does not encompass right to counsel of his choice. Unless there is good cause shown why the court's appointment should not have been made, indigent defendant must accept attorney selected by court or waive right to be represented by counsel. St. v. Forsness, 159 M 105, 495 P2d 176 (1972).

Conflict of Appointed Counsel: Defendant was charged with first-degree burglary and requested appointed counsel. The District Court appointed as counsel the former County Attorney who had prosecuted defendant for an earlier burglary that was part of the information being defended. Defendant was convicted. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that any error in appointing as counsel the attorney who had prosecuted defendant in the prior conviction charged in the information was corrected by the subsequent granting of a motion to vacate and set aside the conviction. St. v. Butler, 148 M 46, 417 P2d 100 (1966).

Questioning of Counsel's Tactics: The Supreme Court is reluctant to second-guess defense counsel or to speculate on alternative trial tactics, particularly when counsel is vastly experienced and of unquestioned reputation. St. v. Callaghan, 144 M 401, 396 P2d 821 (1964); Tomich v. St., 141 M 487, 379 P2d 114 (1963).

Appointed Counsel — Withdrawal of Plea: Defendant pleaded guilty to burglary and was sentenced by the judge. Defendant then argued that his plea was involuntary and that counsel be appointed for him to pursue his motion to withdraw the plea. The trial court denied the motion. The Supreme Court, relying on Douglas v. Calif., 372 US 353, 9 L Ed 2d 811, 83 S Ct 814 (1963), held that it was not error to refuse to assign an attorney to defendant to urge his written motion subsequent to his sentence. The court held that Douglas did not require appointment of counsel for any postconviction procedure other than the first appeal. St. v. Pelke, 143 M 262, 389 P2d 164 (1964).

Effective Counsel — Court Will Not Second-Guess Attorney: The strategy of counsel will not be second-guessed to determine what could have been done to achieve a possible but highly speculative result. For assistance to be ineffective, it must be so deficient as to render the trial a farce and a mockery. St. v. Noller, 142 M 35, 381 P2d 293 (1963).

Effective Counsel — Failure to Object to Prosecutor's Remarks: Failure of court-appointed counsel to object to certain remarks by the prosecutor was not alone sufficient to deprive defendant of due process under Art. III, sec. 16, 1889 Mont. Const., in the absence of a showing that counsel displayed such a lack of diligence and competence as to reduce the trial to a "farce or a sham". St. v. Noller, 142 M 35, 381 P2d 293 (1963).

Discharge of Appointed Counsel: When defendant charged with burglary was granted the services of court-appointed counsel, he did not have the right to discharge such counsel unless he was able to provide counsel at his own expense or desired to undertake his own defense. However, upon a proper showing, such counsel could be discharged by the court. Peters v. St., 139 M 634, 366 P2d 158 (1961).

Effective Counsel — Failure to Provide Record on Appeal: When court-appointed counsel failed to advise clerk's office as to what would be required for record on appeal from conviction of burglary and there was no record before the Supreme Court, defendant had been denied his right to effective representation by counsel on his appeal. St. v. Bubnash, 139 M 517, 366 P2d 155 (1961).

Failure to File Timely Appeal: Although Supreme Court dismissed appeal because court-appointed counsel was late in filing notice of appeal, the court considered the questions presented on appeal because defendant had no voice in the appointment of counsel. St. v. Frodsham, 139 M 222, 362 P2d 413 (1961).

Appointed Counsel — Time for Preparation: A defendant is guaranteed counsel by appointment of the court if he cannot himself employ an attorney. It is equally the duty of the court to make the appointment of counsel effective, i.e., to give court-appointed counsel a reasonable time for the preparation of his case after he has been appointed. St. v. Blakeslee, 131 M 147, 306 P2d 1103 (1957).

Scope of Right to Counsel: The constitutional provision that one accused of crime shall have the right to appear by counsel, when applied to one imprisoned with reference to his right to consult with his attorney, does not guarantee to him the right of private consultation on matters not connected with a case pending against him; but when the accusation against him has ripened into a judgment of conviction and he becomes a ward of the state, he no longer possesses such constitutional right and is subject to all reasonable rules and regulations of the state prison. St. v. District Court, 85 M 215, 278 P 122 (1929).

RIGHT TO DEMAND NATURE AND CAUSE OF ACCUSATION

Sufficiency of Information: Information which charged defendant with an infamous crime against nature and also described the manner in which the crime was committed, which was an assault, did not leave the defendant in the dark as to the nature and cause of the accusation. In plain and concise language he was accused of the infamous crime against nature, which of necessity, like the crime of rape, involved an assault as a part of the act. St. v. McSloy, 127 M 265, 261 P2d 663 (1953).

Defendant Entitled to Bill of Particulars: Although there is no statute requiring the giving of a bill of particulars in a criminal case, the right to demand such exists, giving accused the right to demand the nature and cause of the accusation when the information fails to furnish the necessary particulars. State ex rel. Wong Sun v. District Court, 112 M 153, 113 P2d 996 (1941).

Declaration of Common Law: The guaranty contained in Art. III, sec. 16, 1889 Mont. Const., is declaratory of the common-law rule that no one shall be held to answer an information or indictment unless the crime be charged with precision and fullness, to the end that the defendant may have ample opportunity to make his defense and avail himself of his conviction or acquittal in a subsequent proceeding for the same offense. St. v. Wolf, 56 M 493, 185 P 556 (1919).

Information Need Not Allege or Describe Manner Offense Was Accomplished: In a prosecution under the statute for the infamous crime against nature, the right of the defendant to "demand the nature and cause of the accusation" has been accorded to him, even though the information fails to allege a description of the manner or means by which the offense was accomplished. St. v. Guerin, 51 M 250, 152 P 747 (1915).

Accusation Against Agent as Principal: The constitutional rights to demand the nature and cause of the accusation are not violated by the statute permitting an accusation against one as principal who is in fact an agent, for the reason that the old distinction between principal and accessory before the fact was merely arbitrary and "without existence in natural reason or the ordinary doctrines of the law". St. v. Geddes, 22 M 68, 55 P 919 (1899).

RIGHT TO CONFRONT WITNESSES

Testimony by Deposition Improper: Allowing testimony of purchasers in drug case to be presented by deposition was error where no subpoena had been issued for purchasers and they had appeared in state to testify at another trial 6 days after conclusion of accused's trial. St. v. LaCario, 163 M 511, 518 P2d 982 (1974).

Introduction of Deposition: Provision allowing for the taking of depositions did not violate Art. III, sec. 16, 1889 Mont. Const., which provided for the right to confrontation, and depositions taken under authority of that provision were admissible at trial upon a showing that the witness was either dead or not within the jurisdiction. Tooker v. St., 147 M 207, 410 P2d 923 (1966).

Right Not Absolute: The right to confrontation is not an absolute one. Tooker v. St., 147 M 207, 410 P2d 923 (1966).

Examination of Witnesses — Presentencing Procedure: When defendant pleaded guilty to grand larceny, the extent of his punishment should have been determined by the exercise of sound discretion on the part of the judge after the circumstances had been "presented by the testimony of witnesses examined in open court". Kuhl v. District Court, 139 M 536, 366 P2d 347 (1961).

Reading Testimony Given at Prior Trial Improper:

On the second trial of a defendant the testimony of a state witness given at the first trial could not be read into evidence at the second trial since to do so would be to deprive the defendant of his right to meet a witness face to face. St. v. Piveral, 127 M 427, 265 P2d 969 (1954), overruled in St. v. Bouldin, 153 M 276, 456 P2d 830 (1969).

It was error for the court to allow the testimony of a witness at the first trial to be read into evidence at the second trial. It was the right of the defendant to have the jury see and observe the witness upon the witness stand. It was his right that the jury see how the witness acted while under direct and cross-examination. It was his right to have the jury judge the credibility of the witness from his appearance and manner while on the witness stand. St. v. Storm, 127 M 414, 265 P2d 971 (1954), overruled in St. v. Bouldin, 153 M 276, 456 P2d 830 (1969).

Concealing Names of Witnesses: Constitutional right to meet witnesses face to face and to demand nature and cause of accusation would be made ineffective if State can conceal names of its witnesses until day of trial. State ex rel. Porter v. District Court, 124 M 249, 220 P2d 1035 (1950).

Previous Knowledge of Witnesses: If, during the presentation of the case, the court accorded the defendant all the rights enumerated in Art. III, sec. 16, 1889 Mont. Const., and further guarded him against surprise by the introduction of evidence against him by the State which he could not meet or the effect of which he could not minimize, so far as this would have been possible by previous knowledge of the witnesses, he could not complain that the County Attorney failed to pursue the statute regarding the endorsing of the names of witnesses upon the information. St. v. McDonald, 51 M 1, 149 P 279 (1915).

Right to Face Witnesses — Not Absolute: That the right secured by Art. III, sec. 16, 1889 Mont. Const., to a person accused of crime to meet the witnesses against him face to face is not an absolute one is determined by Art. III, sec. 17, 1889 Mont. Const., wherein provision is made for taking and using the deposition of a witness in a criminal case. St. v. Vanella, 40 M 326, 106 P 364 (1910).

Admission of General Recollection of Testimony When Witness Unavailable Improper: The accused is entitled to meet the witnesses against him face to face, and it was error, when the prosecuting witness was not within the state, to admit in evidence the committing magistrate's general recollection of the testimony which such witness gave at the preliminary examination. St. v. Lee, 13 M 248, 33 P 690 (1893). See also St. v. Byers, 16 M 565, 41 P 708 (1895).

SPEEDY TRIAL

Only Delay Not Caused by Defendant to Be Counted: In determining whether right to speedy trial had been violated for purposes of Art. III, sec. 16, 1889 Mont. Const., and statute requiring dismissal of action if not brought to trial within 6 months after filing of information, court would count only days of delay which had not been caused by defendants, sum total of which was less than 6 months, notwithstanding that more than 6 months had passed since filing of informations. State ex rel. Thomas v. District Court, 151 M 1, 438 P2d 554 (1968).

Delay While Defendant in Prison: Under Art. III, sec. 16, 1889 Mont. Const., a convicted forger's right to a speedy trial was not violated by delaying the trial until the defendant had been paroled from the state prison. St. v. Miekle, 148 M 320, 420 P2d 155 (1966).

Legislative Implementation: Section providing for the discharge of one accused of crime unless trial is had within a stated time after filing of information or indictment was enacted to enforce the right to a speedy trial provided for by Art. III, sec. 16, 1889 Mont. Const., and constitutes a legislative construction or definition thereof and must be construed fairly to accomplish that end. St. v. McGowan, 113 M 591, 131 P2d 262 (1942).

Effect of Appeal on Right to Speedy Trial: When defendant was tried within a week after the offense was committed, Art. III, sec. 16, 1889 Mont. Const., was complied with, but when he appealed to the District Court for trial de novo, he did not have the benefit of section providing for dismissal of prosecution when not postponed on defendant's application if not brought to trial within 6 months. The section had no application under such facts. St. v. Schnell, 107 M 579, 88 P2d 19 (1939).

When Defendant's Duty to Ask for Speedy Trial: When one convicted in a Justice's Court of a misdemeanor appealed to the District Court and desired a more speedy trial than was accorded him, it was incumbent upon him to apply for it before he could avail himself of Art. III, sec. 16, 1889 Mont. Const. St. v. Schnell, 107 M 579, 88 P2d 19 (1939).

Right May Be Waived: The right to a speedy trial guaranteed by the Constitution to one accused of crime may be waived by him. St. v. Test, 65 M 134, 211 P 217 (1922).

Appeal of Order Granting New Trial: When, under a statute requiring that a defendant be brought to trial before the end of the second term of the court after the indictment was found, a defendant has been twice tried before the expiration of the second term after the filing of the information and the State prosecutes an appeal from an order granting him a new trial after a conviction on the second trial, which appeal was finally held to be unauthorized, and during the pendency of such appeal two terms elapsed without another trial, this is not a denial to the accused of the speedy trial guaranteed him by Art. III, sec. 16, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Northrup v. Conrow, 13 M 552, 35 P 240 (1893).

IMPARTIAL JURY

Increased Sentence for Prior Convictions: Section authorizing judges to consider and to determine validity of prior conviction before imposing sentence under increased sentence law does not unconstitutionally deprive accused of right to jury trial. Newman v. Estelle, 156 M 502, 484 P2d 276 (1971), certiorari denied, 404 US 966, 30 L Ed 2d 285, 92 S Ct 341 (1971).

Interference With Voir Dire and Opening Statement: Refusal of court to permit voir dire examination of prospective jurors on subjects related to defense of insanity, for which defendant had given notice, and denial to defendant of opportunity to make opening statement until after presentation of prosecution's case were improper interference with defendant's right to have jury consider his defense. St. v. Olson, 156 M 339, 480 P2d 822 (1971).

Denial of Motion for Change of Venue — Failure to Show Bias: District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's motion for change of venue with leave to renew after jury was selected, when affidavits and testimony were inconclusive as to existence of countywide bias and prejudice against defendant and motion was not renewed at time jury was selected. St. v. Logan, 156 M 48, 473 P2d 833 (1970).

Effect of Jury Instruction on Presumption of Innocence: Instruction that, while mere unexplained possession of stolen property was not sufficient to justify conviction, one found in possession of property that may have been stolen must explain such possession in order to remove effect of that fact as circumstance to be considered with other evidence pointing to guilt did not deprive defendant of presumption of innocence. St. v. Gray, 152 M 145, 447 P2d 475 (1968).

Pretrial Publicity on Codefendant — Change of Venue Not Required: Defendant was charged with first degree murder and kidnapping. The crime received widespread newspaper coverage. The codefendant entered a guilty plea, and his story was printed in the press. Defendant contended the pretrial publicity of the case prevented him from selecting an impartial jury. The Supreme Court stated that mere publication of a news story concerning a crime is not a deprivation of a constitutional right or ground for a change of venue. Defendant selected a jury without using all his peremptory challenges. Under these circumstances a change of venue was not required. St. v. Corliss, 150 M 40, 430 P2d 632 (1967).

Method of Impaneling Jury — Error: Method used by judge to impanel jury caused a systematic and calculated exclusion of noncity dwellers. St. v. Porter, 125 M 503, 242 P2d 984 (1952).

Injunction Against Criminal Acts: Section (since repealed) requiring the District Court upon conviction of a person for an offense against the prohibition act to enjoin such person perpetually from thereafter violating any of its provisions was void insofar as it authorized the issuance of injunction against the commission of offenses not denominated nuisances in the act. State ex rel. Stewart v. District Court, 77 M 361, 251 P 137 (1926).

Juror — Removed for Cause Absent Statutory Grounds: Although a statute professes to give all the grounds of challenging a juror for cause, the constitutional guaranty of an impartial jury cannot be destroyed by the Legislature's omission of grounds that clearly render the juror incompetent. St. v. Russell, 73 M 240, 235 P 712 (1925).

Effect of Legislative Provisions: The right to trial by an impartial jury is an unqualified one that it is beyond the power of the Legislature to curtail. Any provisions of the statutes that relate to the selection of a jury are to be understood as merely providing the means by which the constitutional guaranty may be exercised to the fullest extent. St. v. Brooks, 57 M 480, 188 P 942 (1920).

No Right to Object to Removal of Juror for Cause: In a criminal action the defendant cannot object that a particular juror was not allowed to sit in his case on a challenge for cause. St. v. Byrd, 41 M 585, 111 P 407 (1910).

Jury to Determine Guilt: When defendant in a prosecution for murder pleads "not guilty", an instruction to the jury to the effect that it could find him guilty of murder in either of its degrees or of voluntary or involuntary manslaughter, but "you cannot find him not guilty," is in contravention of defendant's constitutional right to have the question of his guilt or innocence determined by a jury, of which right he cannot be deprived. St. v. Koch, 33 M 490, 85 P 272 (1905). See also St. v. Sloan, 35 M 367, 89 P 829 (1907); State ex rel. Rowe v. District Court, 44 M 318, 119 P 1103 (1911).

Right to Jury in Misdemeanor Cases: The constitutional guaranty that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall have the right to trial by jury includes misdemeanors as well as felonies. St. v. Koch, 33 M 490, 85 P 272 (1905).

All Jurors to Be Impartial: One accused of crime is guaranteed the right to "a speedy public trial by an impartial jury of the county or district in which the offense is alleged to have been committed". An impartial jury must be composed of 12 impartial men. A number less than that will not suffice. If one of the jurors is incompetent because of actual bias entertained by him against the accused and conceals such incompetency on his voir dire, this vitiates the jury as a whole. St. v. Mott, 29 M 292, 74 P 728 (1903).

VENUE

Error in Denial of Defendant's Change of Venue Motion: Court erred in refusing to grant defendant a change of venue where evidence disclosed that local newspapers had fanned the feeling of the community against the defendant and that county officials themselves felt that the feeling against the defendant was so high that they moved him for safety to the state prison. St. v. Dryman, 127 M 579, 269 P2d 796 (1954), followed in St. v. Kingman, 2011 MT 269, 362 Mont. 330, 264 P.3d 1104.

Indirect Evidence: While indirect methods of establishing venue in criminal cases is not approved, when there was evidence that the offense occurred in Whitefish, it sufficiently established that the offense was committed in Flathead County. St. v. Williams, 122 M 279, 202 P2d 245 (1949).

Publication of Seditious Article: Proof of the charge in the information that defendant published the seditious article mentioned herein, in a certain county, was indispensable to give the court of such county jurisdiction to try the cause. St. v. Smith, 57 M 563, 190 P 107 (1920).

"District" Defined: The word "district", as used in the provision declaring that in criminal prosecutions the accused shall be tried by a jury from the "county or district in which the offense is alleged to have been committed", is not synonymous with the term "township" but means the precise portion of the territory or political division of the state over which a court may exercise power in criminal matters. St. v. O'Brien, 35 M 482, 90 P 514 (1907).

Trial by Peers: The design of Art. III, sec. 16, 1889 Mont. Const., is to guarantee to every person charged with a crime a trial by jury from the vicinage or neighborhood where the crime is supposed to have been committed so that he may have the benefit, on his trial, of his own good character and standing with his neighbors, if these he has preserved, and also of such knowledge as the jury may possess of the witnesses who may give evidence against him. St. v. O'Brien, 35 M 482, 90 P 514 (1907).

Charge to Show Venue: The local jurisdiction of the crime is the county where it is committed, and the charge must show that fact. The defendant is entitled to know the cause of the accusation so that he may prepare his defense. St. v. Beesskove, 34 M 41, 85 P 376 (1906).

County Where Offense Committed: Criminal actions must be tried in the county where the offense was committed. St. v. Tully, 31 M 365, 78 P 760 (1904).

MISCELLANEOUS

Right to Introduce Evidence: In a murder prosecution the court properly refused to permit the defendant to introduce the results of a lie-detector test given 5 ½ months after the crime to which it referred. St. v. Hollywood, 138 M 561, 358 P2d 437 (1960).

"Criminal Prosecutions" Defined: The term "criminal prosecutions", as employed in Art. III, sec. 16, 1889 Mont. Const., refers to prosecutions for offenses which were crimes at common law and doubtless to statutory offenses. State ex rel. Payne v. District Court, 53 M 350, 165 P 294 (1917).

Right to Public Trial: When, in a prosecution for rape, the court made an order that on account of the nature of the case no one should be allowed in the courtroom in addition to those then present, and those present, after once leaving, could not return, court officers, doctors, attorneys, and newspapermen being excluded from the order, the enforcement of such order was a denial of the right to a public trial. St. v. Keeler, 52 M 205, 156 P 1080 (1916).

"Trial" Defined: The word "trial", as used in Art. III, sec. 16, 1889 Mont. Const., embraces all proceedings in the progress of a criminal prosecution after the issues are made up, down to and including the rendition of the verdict. St. v. Koch, 33 M 490, 85 P 272 (1905).

Applicable Only to Criminal Cases: Since a disbarment proceeding is not a criminal prosecution, Art. III, sec. 16, 1889 Mont. Const., is inapplicable, and depositions can be taken on the application of the Attorney General. In re Wellcome, 23 M 259, 58 P 711 (1899).

Attorney General's Opinions

Duty of Mental Health Professional to Inform Involuntarily Committed Patient of Rights: A certified professional person has knowledge of a detainee's rights and the law requiring notice of those rights. Therefore, a mental health professional examining a person under a petition for involuntary commitment must determine whether the person has been informed of his rights and, if not, inform him of those rights. 43 A.G. Op. 64 (1990).

Right to Assistance of Counsel in Misdemeanor Cases: Indigent defendants must be furnished counsel in all misdemeanor cases except those in which the judge has weighed the seriousness and gravity of the offense and precludes any imprisonment upon conviction and informs the defendant of this before the trial. Should counsel be appointed, costs and attorney fees are borne by the appropriate governmental unit or agency pursuant to 46-8-201 (now repealed). 37 A.G. Op. 36 (1977), followed in St. v. Skurdal, 235 M 291, 767 P2d 304, 45 St. Rep. 2394 (1988).

Coroner's Inquest Not a Trial or Criminal Proceeding: A witness at a Coroner's inquest may be accompanied and advised by counsel; however, this counsel does not have the right to participate in the inquest or cross-examine other witnesses or to comment on the Coroner's instructions to the jury, as a Coroner's inquest is not a trial involving the merits but rather a preliminary investigation as no criminal consequences necessarily follow a Coroner's inquest. Any subsequent criminal proceeding is brought independently by the County Attorney. 36 A.G. Op. 49 (1976).

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION
SELF-INCRIMINATION

Strongly Discouraging Testimony by Defendant Likely to Be "Absolutely Terrible" on Stand — Not Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: On an appeal for postconviction relief, the defendant argued that his attorney coerced him into not testifying on his own behalf at trial and asserted that his attorney failed to prepare him for testifying or cross-examination, even though the defendant repeatedly told his attorney he wanted to testify. The Supreme Court noted that the record was clear that the attorney did not forbid the defendant from testifying, but strongly advised the defendant of the concerns while also advising the defendant that the decision to testify ultimately rested with the defendant. The attorney testified that the defendant was an "absolutely terrible" historian who would do terribly on the stand. The attorney included the defendant's lack of memory, substance abuse, infidelity, and persistence in advancing conspiracy theories about the victim as reasons to strongly discourage the defendant from testifying. Additionally, both the attorney and the defendant testified that it was clearly communicated to the defendant that it was ultimately his decision to decide whether to testify or not, rather than coercion by the attorney. The Supreme Court concluded that the defendant failed to show the attorney's performance was deficient and affirmed the District Court's denial of relief. Cheetham v. St., 2019 MT 290, 398 Mont. 131, 454 P.3d 673.

Self-Incrimination Involuntary When Temporary Investigative Stop Ripened Into Custodial Interrogation: Although the defendant's encounter with police initially constituted a valid temporary investigatory stop, it ripened into an interrogation in a secluded, police-dominated environment under circumstances that were highly coercive in their totality when police officers led the defendant to a second location for additional questioning after ordering the defendant's friend away, then took the defendant to a third location, a closed room that was even more secluded and confined, where the defendant was subjected to a third round of questioning alone with two police officers. Because the defendant never received a Miranda advisory or waived her Miranda rights, the Supreme Court held that the defendant's eventual confession was involuntary and should have been suppressed by the Municipal Court. Missoula v. Kroschel, 2018 MT 142, 391 Mont. 457, 419 P.3d 1208.

Sentence Within Statutory Limits — No Constitutional Right Invoked: The defendant pleaded guilty to sexual intercourse without consent. The District Court based the defendant's sentence, in part, on the defendant's refusal to answer a question in the presentence investigative report. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the defendant's sentence was supported by the totality of the District Court's reasoning and that it did not invoke a constitutional right. St. v. Otto, 2017 MT 212, 388 Mont. 391, 401 P.3d 193.

Questioning at Game Check Station Not Custodial Arrest — Miranda Warning Not Required: The defendant was stopped at a game check station with a deer he harvested. After some questioning, the defendant eventually made numerous admissions, including that he had used his daughter's tag on the animal and that he had illegally shot two additional deer. The defendant was charged with several crimes relating to illegal hunting. The defendant moved to suppress the evidence, arguing that he had not been issued a Miranda warning at the game check station. The Justice Court denied the motion, finding that the defendant was not subject to custodial interrogation and thus not required to receive Miranda warnings. The Supreme Court subsequently affirmed, holding that based on the totality of the circumstances, the roadside game inspection was not a custodial interrogation, was temporary in nature, and never exceeded the scope of a wildlife crime investigation. As such, the Supreme Court found the defendant made his admissions voluntarily. St. v. Maile, 2017 MT 154, 388 Mont. 33, 396 P.3d 1270.

Involuntary Confession — Misrepresentations by Police and Extreme Pressure on Defendant to Confess — Conviction Reversed: The defendant called 9-1-1 to report that her 6-month-old baby was unresponsive. A CT scan revealed that the baby's skull was fractured, and the police took the defendant to the police station for questioning. The officers told the defendant, who was clearly distraught and sobbing during parts of her interview, that if she answered their questions she would be reunited with her baby. They also told her that they needed her to answer the questions in order to provide medical care to the child. The police then gave her a doll and told her to show them how she shook her baby and to make the doll's head rock. After hours of questioning and under pressure from the police to admit she had shaken her baby, the defendant shook the doll and confessed to shaking her baby. Following her conviction, the defendant appealed and the Supreme Court reversed her conviction, holding that the confession was involuntary because the police had put her under extreme pressure and had made misrepresentations to her throughout the interview. St. v. Eskew, 2017 MT 36, 386 Mont. 324, 390 P.3d 129.

Motion to Suppress Custodial Statements Denied — Requests to Speak Made 5 Hours Apart — No Violation of Right to Remain Silent: While in police custody, the defendant declined a police officer's invitation to speak. Five hours later, and while still in custody, the officer asked him again if he wanted to talk about the charges against him. As soon as the defendant started to speak very fast about the charges, the officer read him his Miranda rights. Before trial, the defendant filed a motion to suppress the introduction of his custodial statements, arguing that the officer had violated his right to remain silent by asking him to talk the second time. After the District Court denied the motion and he was convicted, the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court. The court affirmed, agreeing that the invitations to speak, which were made 5 hours apart, did not violate the defendant's constitutional rights. St. v. Kasparek, 2016 MT 163, 384 Mont. 56, 375 P.3d 372.

Criminal Defendant's Submission of Affidavit at Evidentiary Hearing — Waiver of Right to Remain Silent: After the defendant was found guilty of DUI per se, fourth offense, which is a felony, the defendant moved to dismiss the felony or, alternatively, to amend the charge to a misdemeanor DUI, arguing that a previous DUI conviction was constitutionally infirm because she was not informed of her right to counsel if she could not afford one. The District Court held an evidentiary hearing on the motion at which the only evidence the defendant presented was her affidavit. The state then called the defendant to testify, which the defendant objected to on the basis that she had a right to remain silent. The District Court overruled the objection, concluding the state had a right to cross-examine the defendant because she had submitted the affidavit in support of her motion, which was effectively testimony. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the defendant's submission of the affidavit waived her right to remain silent.

The defendant could not submit an affidavit without being subject to cross-examination as to the contents of the affidavit. St. v. Johnson, 2015 MT 221, 380 Mont. 198, 356 P.3d 438.

Use of Confidential Treatment Court Information to Charge Felony Drug Offenses — Violation of Right Against Self-Incrimination: While the defendant was a participant in Treatment Court, he had a positive drug test. Subsequently, the defendant provided incriminating information in three interviews with the Treatment Court probation officer, believing that he had to be honest to comply with Treatment Court requirements and fearing that he would receive sanctions if he refused to answer questions. Based on incriminating information obtained in the interviews, the defendant was charged with distribution of dangerous drugs and possession of dangerous drugs. The District Court denied the defendant's motions to suppress and dismiss. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, concluding that the state violated Treatment Court confidentiality by disclosing the incriminating information to law enforcement in order to investigate new drug offenses and that the defendant's right against self-incrimination was violated when he was compelled to provide the incriminating information or face sanctions or discharge from Treatment Court. St. v. Plouffe, 2014 MT 183, 375 Mont. 429, 329 P.3d 1255.

Confession Involuntary — False Direct or Implied Promises of Immunity: While in custody for another crime, the defendant agreed to discuss a murder he witnessed in exchange for the promise of immunity. The county attorney, in a letter to the defendant, declined to agree to immunity for the murder. On several occasions, however, the investigating officer indicated to the defendant that he had immunity and defendant was convicted of felony murder based on statements made while under this belief. Eventually, the Supreme Court held that the confession was involuntary, based on the misleading representations from the investigating officer. St. v. Old-Horn, 2014 MT 161, 375 Mont. 310, 328 P.3d 638. See also St. v. Eskew, 2017 MT 36, 386 Mont. 324, 390 P.3d 129.

Miranda Warning Not Required Before Gathering of Nontestimonial Evidence: The District Court concluded that the officer's failure to give the defendant a Miranda warning immediately after her arrest required the suppression of all evidence subsequently obtained, including results of the HGN test, field sobriety tests, and the Intoxilyzer test and other nontestimonial evidence gathered at the jail. The Supreme Court reversed, concluding that a Miranda warning is required only prior to a custodial interrogation and that the nontestimonial evidence should not have been suppressed because that evidence is real and objective and is not protected by the right against self-incrimination. St. v. Kelm, 2013 MT 115, 370 Mont. 61, 300 P.3d 687.

Invocation of Right to Remain Silent — Standard: The same standards apply for determining when an accused has invoked the Miranda right to remain silent and the Miranda right to counsel. In invoking the right to remain silent, a suspect must articulate the suspect's desire to remain silent sufficiently clearly that a reasonable police officer in the circumstances would understand the statement to be a request to not speak with the police. St. v. Nixon, 2013 MT 81, 369 Mont. 359, 298 P.3d 408.

Fundamental Right to Testify: J.S.W. asked to testify at her involuntary commitment hearing. The District Court stated that it would allow her to testify for 3 minutes but subsequently did not cut her off and encouraged additional questioning. The Supreme Court acknowledged a fundamental right to testify in one's own behalf but declined to apply plain error review in this case, since J.S.W. could show no error to review. In re J.S.W., 2013 MT 34, 369 Mont. 12, 303 P.3d 741, following Rock v. Ark., 483 US 44 (1987).

Defendant's Pre-Miranda Statements Not Suppressed — Defendant Chose to Engage Police Spontaneously — District Court Affirmed: The defendant was convicted of partner or family member assault on his sister. He filed a motion to suppress statements he made to police officers when they arrived at his home shortly after the incident. Although he conceded that his initial statements to the police were spontaneous, he argued that everything he stated after the police officers began asking questions should be suppressed because he had not received a Miranda warning. The District Court denied the motion to suppress, ruling that at the time he made the statements, the defendant was not considered to be "in custody" according to the six factors identified in State v. Lacey, 2009 MT 62, 349 Mont. 371, 204 P.3d 1192. Because the defendant was not "in custody", a Miranda warning was not required. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the recorded conversation with the police demonstrated that the defendant chose to engage the officers and that the police had not used any threatening language. St. v. Labbe, 2012 MT 76, 364 Mont. 415, 276 P.3d 848.

Joinder Affirmed — No Prejudice in Denial of Motion to Sever: Following the defendant's convictions of burglary and criminal possession of dangerous drugs, the defendant appealed, challenging the District Court's denial of his motion to sever three counts of burglary and one count of criminal possession of dangerous drugs for which he was charged on the basis that the denial prejudiced his right to a fair trial; allowed for the introduction of inadmissible evidence; and eliminated his right to testify as to one count while remaining silent to the other. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding the counts were properly joined because the burglary and drug charges were linked by a common motive; the limited evidence admitted did not demonstrate that the defendant was guilty of other crimes and the defendant failed to demonstrate that the evidence would have been inadmissible at separate trials; and the defendant's right against self-incrimination was not exploited because he did not attempt to testify, nor did he specifically inform the District Court that he intended to testify as to one count but not to another. St. v. Kirk, 2011 MT 314, 363 Mont. 102, 266 P.3d 1262.

Sentence Affirmed — No Improper Consideration of Defendant's Refusal to Admit Guilt: The defendant argued that the District Court's imposition of sentence violated the defendant's right against self-incrimination because two witnesses for the state testified during sentencing that the defendant continued to deny molesting the victim. The Supreme Court concluded that the record did not support the defendant's argument that the sentence was improperly based upon the defendant's exercise of the right against self-incrimination and refusal to take responsibility for the crime, noting the state's witnesses did not suggest that the defendant be punished for not admitting to the crime but, instead, testified that the defendant's denial posed risks to the victim and barriers to treatment. St. v. Howard, 2011 MT 246, 362 Mont. 196, 265 P.3d 606.

Miranda Waiver Upheld — Absence of Unequivocal Request for Attorney and Involuntariness: The defendant moved to suppress statements he made in a police interview on the basis that an officer had conducted a custodial interrogation without providing Miranda warnings, during which the defendant had unequivocally requested an attorney, and that the defendant was too intoxicated to voluntarily waive his right to an attorney. The Supreme Court upheld the District Court's denial of the motion. The defendant's request to call his mother to call his attorney was insufficient to constitute an unequivocal request. In addition, while intoxication is one factor to consider in the totality of the circumstances as to whether a waiver was voluntary, it was clear in this case that the defendant's waiver was voluntary. St. v. Main, 2011 MT 123, 360 Mont. 470, 255 P.3d 1240, followed in St. v. Nixon, 2013 MT 81, 369 Mont. 359, 298 P.3d 408.

No Custody or Interrogation — Miranda Warning Not Required for Public Roadside DUI Investigation: A Miranda warning is not required during a roadside DUI investigation if brief public investigative encounters, even if somewhat coercive, do not constitute a custody and if the request for a field sobriety test is done without interrogation. St. v. Larson, 2010 MT 236, 358 Mont. 156, 243 P.3d 1130.

Appeal Raising Unconstitutional Self-Incrimination — Motion to Amend Judgment Subject to Normal Time Limits: Parrish was required to complete Phase II of the sex offender treatment program at Montana State Prison but argued that fulfilling the program requirement for disclosing his past criminal history was a violation of his constitutional right against self-incrimination. He petitioned the District Court for modification of his sentence, but the petition was denied as untimely. The Supreme Court held that the same time limitations for review of a judgment by a District Court applied to Parrish's petition to the District Court notwithstanding that Parrish had raised a constitutional issue concerning his sentence, those time limitations being the ones set forth in 46-18-116, 46-21-102, and Rule 4(5)(b)(i), M.R. App. P. Parrish filed his motion to amend judgment more than a year after the time for appeal to the Supreme Court had expired. St. v. Parrish, 2010 MT 196, 357 Mont. 375, 239 P.3d 957.

Proper Jury Instruction Regarding Defendant's Lack of Right to Attorney During Field Sobriety Tests: During a traffic stop, Stanczak was asked to perform field sobriety tests. The District Court instructed the jury in Stanczak's DUI trial that because there was no custodial interrogation, Stanczak had no right to counsel before completing the tests. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the instruction as a full and fair instruction on the applicable law. St. v. Stanczak, 2010 MT 106, 356 Mont. 263, 232 P.3d 896.

Right to Counsel During Custodial Interrogation Distinguished From Right After Criminal Proceedings Initiated — No Violation of Right to Counsel Absent Unambiguous Request: Scheffer waived his Miranda rights and, after being interviewed, was arrested for sexual intercourse without consent. Scheffer contended that evidence from the interrogation should be suppressed because he requested but did not receive counsel during the interrogation. However, the requests were ambiguous when read in context, and a reasonable officer in light of the circumstances would not have understood Scheffer to be requesting an attorney. The right to counsel under Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., attaches when adversarial criminal proceedings have begun. However, the right to counsel during a custodial interrogation under Art. II, sec. 25, Mont. Const., attaches when the defendant makes an unambiguous request for counsel. Here, Scheffer's motion to suppress was properly denied because formal proceedings had not begun and because the request for counsel was ambiguous. St. v. Scheffer, 2010 MT 73, 355 Mont. 523, 230 P.3d 462.

Prosecutor's Repeated and Deliberate Use of Defendant's Invocation of Right to Silence — New Trial Warranted: During Wagner's trial for attempted deliberate homicide, the prosecutor repeatedly and deliberately used Wagner's invocation of the right to silence as evidence of Wagner's guilt. The prosecutor also referenced Wagner's failure to tell his version of events until trial and raised as further evidence of Wagner's guilt the fact that Wagner had requested to speak with an attorney and, after invoking his Miranda rights, had commented that he didn't want to dig himself a deeper hole. The Supreme Court found that Wagner's request to speak with an attorney and the comment that Wagner didn't want to dig himself a deeper hole were in fact an invocation of Wagner's right to remain silent. The prosecutor's conduct raised questions regarding the fundamental fairness of the trial by violating Wagner's right to due process and privilege against self-incrimination, constituting plain error, and the Supreme Court concluded that the constitutional violations entitled Wagner to a new trial. The case was reversed. St. v. Wagner, 2009 MT 256, 352 M 1, 215 P3d 20 (2009), following Doyle v. Ohio, 426 US 610 (1976). See also St. v. Sullivan, 280 M 25, 927 P2d 1033 (1996).

Evidence That Statements Freely Given, Not Compelled — Defendant's Right to Remain Silent Not Infringed — Mosley Standard: Morrisey was detained when officers served search warrants. The officers read Morrisey his Miranda rights prior to interrogation. When informed that he had the right to remain silent, Morrisey stated, "Yeah, I will." When told that anything he said could and would be used against him, Morrisey replied, "I ain't saying nothing." When informed that he had the right to an attorney and whether he understood that if he chose to answer questions he had the right to stop answering questions at any time, Morrisey answered, "Yes, got it." The officers then conversed with and questioned Morrisey for the next 3 to 4 hours, during which time Morrisey made incriminating statements. At trial for deliberate homicide, Morrisey moved to suppress the statements and evidence recovered as a result of the statements, but the motion was denied. On appeal, Morrisey maintained that his right to remain silent was violated during the interrogation and that the motion to suppress should have been granted. The Supreme Court recognized Morrisey's right against self-incrimination protected by due process and the totality of the circumstances test, as well as the Miranda doctrine. The court noted that under Oregon v. Elstad, 470 US 298 (1985), failure to give the prescribed warnings prior to questioning does not constitute actual coercion, but rather creates a bright-line legal presumption of coercion that is irrebuttable for purposes of the prosecution's case-in-chief. In this case, Morrisey did not contend that he did not receive Miranda warnings prior to questioning, but rather that officers failed to honor his assertion of the right to remain silent. The court, however, cited the standard in Michigan v. Mosley, 423 US 96 (1975), that the admissibility of statements obtained after a person in custody has decided to remain silent depends under Miranda on whether the person's right to cut off questioning was scrupulously honored. Morrisey was clearly in custody and also clearly invoked the right to silence but then willingly engaged in a running conversation with the officers, giving statements freely, voluntarily, and without compulsion, yet without invoking the right to cut off questioning. Therefore, under the Miranda-Mosley theory, Morrisey's right to remain silent was not infringed, and he was not entitled to suppression of the incriminating statements. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Morrisey, 2009 MT 201, 351 M 144, 214 P3d 708 (2009), followed in St. v. Nixon, 2013 MT 81, 369 Mont. 359, 298 P.3d 408, and St. v. Kasparek, 2016 MT 163, 384 Mont. 56, 375 P.3d 372.

Sentencing Court's Consideration of Defendant's Background Information, Including Self-Reported Incidents of Sexual Contact With Children — No Error: While in sexual offender treatment, Hill admitted sexual contact with 12 or 13 other children. The District Court subsequently considered the self-reported acts in a psychosexual evaluation, which Hill maintained was a violation of the right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court disagreed. In a classic penalty situation where an accused cannot elect to exercise the right to remain silent because of the possibility of substantial penalties if the person chooses not to speak, the state is prevented from using the compelled statements in later criminal proceedings. However, Hill was not in a classic penalty situation, but rather in a classic plea bargain situation. By consent decree, the state offered Hill treatment in exchange for an admission of misdemeanor assault and an agreement to undergo treatment. Hill was not faced with penalties by refusing to reveal prior sexual contacts, and the consent decree was never revoked even though Hill violated it. Absent a classic penalty situation, Hill's right against self-incrimination was not violated by the District Court's consideration of Hill's character, history, mental and physical condition, and background, including the self-reported acts in the psychosexual evaluation. St. v. Hill, 2009 MT 134, 350 M 296, 207 P3d 307 (2009). See also St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P2d 809 (1996), and In re R.L.H., 2005 MT 177, 327 M 520, 116 P3d 791 (2005).

Waiver of Rights and Confession Voluntary Despite Defendant's Emotional State — Motion to Suppress Testimonial Evidence Properly Denied When Defendant Advised of Miranda Rights: Lacey was advised of his Miranda rights prior to interrogation and subsequently confessed to felony sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault. Lacey moved to suppress the testimonial evidence on grounds that he was under intense emotional distress when waiving his rights, so the confession was not voluntary, but the trial court denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court examined the totality of the circumstances and affirmed. In this case, the interrogation was clearly custodial in nature, but when a custodial interrogation has occurred and a subject has been properly informed of the Miranda rights, those rights against self-incrimination may be waived by a waiver that is made voluntarily, knowingly, and intelligently. A defendant may move to suppress a confession on grounds that it was involuntary, which focuses on the factual inquiry of whether the confession was the product of free choice or compulsion. Lacey contended that the confession could not be voluntary because of the extreme emotional distress, but there was no indication that officers took advantage of that emotional state to manipulate Lacey and coerce the confession, so the confession was voluntary. Lacey was properly advised of his Miranda rights and knowingly and intelligently waived those rights, so the denial of the motion to suppress the confession was not error. St. v. Lacey, 2009 MT 62, 349 M 371, 204 P3d 1192 (2009).

Failure of Defendant to Admit Incest — Sentence Not Considered More Harsh Given Relevant Sentencing Factors: Bullman consistently maintained that he was not guilty of incest with his stepdaughter because he was never married to her mother. Because Bullman refused to admit guilt and was thus ineligible for community-based treatment, he asserted that he was sentenced more harshly by being sentenced to prison. The Supreme Court examined the record and disagreed. The sentencing court was aware of the prohibition against sentencing a defendant to prison because the defendant does not admit guilt, but the court also considered numerous other relevant factors in sentencing Bullman to prison in addition to the expert opinion that Bullman was not a candidate for community-based treatment, including: (1) the significant impact of the crime on the victim; (2) the need to protect society; (3) Bullman's need for appropriate treatment; (4) Bullman's criminal history; and (5) Bullman's long history of substance abuse. Given these sentencing factors, the Supreme Court could not conclude that Bullman was sentenced to prison for failure to admit guilt, and the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Bullman, 2009 MT 37, 349 M 228, 203 P3d 768 (2009).

Arrested Driver's Refusal of Breath Test Nontestimonial Conduct: Because the refusal of a driver to take a breath test is nontestimonial conduct, the constitutional prohibition against self-incrimination is not implicated. St. v. Slade, 2008 MT 341, 346 M 271, 194 P3d 677, (2008).

Requirement for Annual Polygraph Test as Condition of Suspended Sentence Not Unlawful — Use of Test Results in Punishment Prohibited: As a condition of Hameline's suspended sentence the District Court required Hameline to undergo an annual polygraph test. Hameline objected on grounds that the condition was illegal because polygraph results are not admissible in Montana court proceedings and on grounds that requiring the test violated the constitutional right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court reiterated the complete prohibition against the direct or indirect use of polygraph results in court proceedings, while noting that requiring a person to undergo a polygraph test is not in itself illegal, so requiring a polygraph test for other purposes is not prohibited. The court also held that the right against self-incrimination did not prevent the District Court from compelling Hameline to undergo a polygraph test, but the right did prevent the state from using information gleaned from the test to punish Hameline. St. v. Hameline, 2008 MT 241, 344 M 461, 188 P3d 1052 (2008), followed in St. v. Smart, 2009 MT 1, 348 M 274, 201 P3d 123 (2009). See also St. v. Heddings, 2008 MT 402, 347 M 169, 198 P3d 242 (2008).

Sufficient Proof of Miranda Warning Despite Failure of Recording Equipment — Denial of Motion to Suppress Statements Proper: Following Gittens' arrest, officers attempted to memorialize the reading of Gittens'Miranda rights, but the camera equipment failed to record any audio. At trial, Gittens moved to suppress all statements that he made after the arrest on grounds that, absent recorded proof, he had not been properly informed of his Miranda rights. The trial court denied the motion, and Gittens appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Pursuant to St. v. Grey, 274 M 206, 907 P2d 951 (1995), officers should preserve a tangible record of the giving and waiver of Miranda rights when the means to do so are readily available, but the lack of a tangible record does not mandate suppression of a detainee's statements. Rather, this is simply one factor that weighs against the state in proving its burden. The proper inquiry is whether, based on all available evidence, the state met its burden of proving that the officer read the detainee the Miranda rights and whether those rights were waived. In this case, two officers testified that they had made a good faith effort to preserve a record of the reading and waiver, that one officer read the Miranda rights off of a card while the other officer observed, that Gittens verbally waived the rights and never indicated that he wished to avail himself of those rights, and that if the officers had known that the audio equipment was nonfunctional, they would have had Gittens sign a written acknowledgment and waiver. The trial court weighed the testimony of Gittens and the officers and found the officers more credible. The Supreme Court declined to disturb the trial court's decision that the state met its burden of proving that Gittens was properly advised of his rights despite the lack of a tangible record. St. v. Gittens, 2008 MT 55, 341 M 450, 178 P3d 91 (2008).

Suspect Interrogated in Home Without Miranda Warning — Motion to Suppress Improperly Denied: Following a lead of methamphetamine use at Munson's home, detectives went to the home and, without giving Munson a Miranda warning, questioned Munson for 1¾ hours before Munson confessed to possessing methamphetamine paraphernalia. Munson was arrested for criminal possession of dangerous drugs and paraphernalia, and at trial, Munson moved to suppress the evidence and statements made to the officers, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. The officers created a custodial atmosphere, and Munson's freedom of action was significantly restricted. Under the totality of the circumstances, a reasonable person in Munson's position would not have felt free to terminate the interview and leave or to ask the officers to leave, so for purposes of Miranda, Munson was in custody and subjected to an interrogation. Therefore, failure of the officers to give Munson a Miranda warning rendered Munson's statements inadmissible. Because Munson's consent to a search was not given freely and without duress or coercion, all evidence seized under the guise of consent was also inadmissible. St. v. Munson, 2007 MT 222, 339 M 68, 169 P3d 364 (2007), following St. v. Osteen, 216 M 258, 700 P2d 188 (1985), and St. v. Rushton, 264 M 248, 870 P2d 1355 (1994).

Right Against Self-Incrimination Not Violated When Admitting Guilt Not Requirement of Sexual Offender Course: Osborne's suspended sentence was revoked for failure to complete a sexual offender course following imprisonment for sexual intercourse without consent. Citing St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979 (1991), Osborne asserted that the course violated his right against self-incrimination because the course required him to admit guilt of sexual intercourse without consent. The Supreme Court distinguished Imlay and disagreed. Imlay's sexual offender course required Imlay to admit guilt, while Osborne's course was specifically tailored for offenders who did not admit guilt. In addition, Imlay followed all the other conditions of parole, but Osborne did not. Thus, Osborne's right against self-incrimination was not violated, and revocation of Osborne's suspended sentence for failure to complete the sexual offender course was affirmed. St. v. Osborne, 2007 MT 217, 339 M 45, 167 P3d 405 (2007).

Custodial Interrogation of Youth Without Consent — Miranda Warning Required — Suppression of Confession and Withdrawal of Guilty Plea Required: A 14-year-old boy's mother called his school, reported that he had not returned home the previous night, and requested that he be picked up. The school resource officer notified police and asked that the boy be brought to school if found. An officer later found the boy on the street smelling of alcohol and took the boy to the police station where it was discovered that several town businesses had been burglarized during the night, including a bowling alley where money and liquor had been stolen. Although there was no record that the youth was advised of his Miranda rights, during interrogation both prior to and after arrival of his parents, the youth confessed to robbing the bowling alley and subsequently pleaded guilty to felony burglary. The Youth Court summarily determined that the confessions were voluntary, denied a motion to suppress, found the youth was delinquent, and ordered 2 years' probation. On appeal, the Supreme Court addressed the voluntariness of the confessions and reversed. Given the absence of a tangible record that the officer read Miranda rights to the youth or that the youth or the parents consented in writing to a waiver of Miranda rights or agreed to the interview, the requirement in 41-5-331 that a youth be advised of the right against self-incrimination and the right to counsel was violated. Thus, the confessions could not be considered voluntary and should have been suppressed by the Youth Court. The Supreme Court also ordered that on remand, the youth be allowed to withdraw the guilty plea In re Z.M., 2007 MT 122, 337 M 278, 160 P3d 490 (2007).

Sentence Based Upon Lack of Remorse Inferred From Silence Not Legal Sentence: Rennaker was found guilty of incest after defending against the charge by asserting consent and that the victim was 20 years old at the time of the offense. When Rennaker was found guilty and asked at his sentencing hearing if he had anything to say and he replied that he did not, the District Court found that silence indicated Rennaker's lack of remorse and sentenced Rennaker to a term in the state prison. The Supreme Court, citing St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002), and St. v. Cesnik, 2005 MT 257, 329 M 63, 122 P3d 456 (2005), held that because the District Court did not tie Rennaker's apparent lack of remorse to any evidence or statement by him, but rather inferred it from Rennaker's silence, the District Court violated Rennaker's right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court remanded the case for resentencing. St. v. Rennaker, 2007 MT 10, 335 M 274, 150 P3d 960 (2007). See also St. v. Garcia, 2011 MT 130, 360 Mont. 537, 254 P.3d 589.

No Clear Comment on or Infringement of Defendant's Right to Remain Silent — Plain Error Doctrine Not Invoked: Upshaw claimed that the testimony of a detective at trial regarding Upshaw's decision to exercise the right to remain silent violated the right to due process and the privilege against self-incrimination and that pursuant to Doyle v. Ohio, 426 US 610 (1976), the Supreme Court should invoke the plain error doctrine and reverse the conviction. The state asserted that the prosecutor did not commit a Doyle error by eliciting testimony of Upshaw's post-Miranda silence, but rather that the evidence came from a nonresponsive answer by the detective and that the prosecution did not deliberately seek to put the evidence before the jury or use the evidence to impeach Upshaw. The Supreme Court examined the record and determined that the brief comment on Upshaw's silence was confined to a minor portion of the detective's testimony and that the prosecutor did not pursue the issue, use the testimony to impeach Upshaw, or refer to the testimony in cross-examination or closing. To be plain, an error should firmly convince a person that the prosecutor's comments created an inference for the jury that, by remaining silent, Upshaw must be guilty. However, in this case, there was no such firm conviction. Thus, the court declined to invoke the plain error doctrine because there was no clear comment on or infringement of Upshaw's right to remain silent. St. v. Upshaw, 2006 MT 341, 335 M 162, 153 P3d 579 (2006), following St. v. Godfrey, 2004 MT 197, 322 M 254, 95 P3d 166 (2004).

Alleged Error Must Be Plain to Trigger Plain Error Review: English argued that the Supreme Court should apply plain error review to consider whether certain trial testimony violated English's constitutional right to remain silent. However, English could not point to how the allegedly offensive testimony affected the fairness of the trial or resulted in a miscarriage of justice, especially because part of the testimony was elicited by English's own counsel, who had the opportunity to object to any erroneous testimony but declined to so do. A fundamental aspect of the plain error doctrine is that the alleged error must be plain. In this case, if there was any error, it was not plain, and the Supreme Court declined to invoke the doctrine to address English's constitutional issues. St. v. English, 2006 MT 177, 333 M 23, 140 P3d 454 (2006).

Broad Right to Counsel During Custodial Interrogation — Limited Right to Counsel for Police Procedure Not Involving Verbal Inquiry: When first interviewed, Buck was asked to provide a fingernail scraping, but Buck requested a lawyer, and the interview was concluded. During a subsequent interrogation, Buck confessed to an assault without requesting a lawyer. Buck asserted that the confession should be suppressed because the request for a lawyer made during the first interview was not honored during the subsequent interrogation, but the suppression motion was denied. On appeal, Buck also contended that he was not educated in constitutional law sufficiently to distinguish between the right to counsel as it applied to the two different procedures. The Supreme Court noted that the right to counsel in custodial interrogation is broad enough that it may be invoked in certain circumstances by a vague statement that does not include a reference to a lawyer, but it is not so broad that it may be invoked by a request that is unambiguously linked to another police procedure. A suspect may seek legal assistance for only limited purposes in dealing with law enforcement, and a suspect's request for counsel that is unambiguously limited to a police procedure that does not involve verbal inquiry does not invoke the right to counsel in custodial interrogation. Buck's request for counsel was unambiguously limited to the search incident to the fingernail scraping and did not extend to the subsequent custodial interrogation, nor did Buck establish error related to an inability to understand the request for counsel in two different contexts. Denial of the suppression motion was affirmed. St. v. Buck, 2006 MT 81, 331 M 517, 134 P3d 53 (2006), following Conn. v. Barrett, 479 US 523 (1987), and overruling St. v. Johnson, 221 M 503, 719 P2d 1248 (1986), and St. v. Spang, 2002 MT 120, 310 M 52, 48 P3d 727 (2002), to the extent that those cases held that the right to counsel for self-incrimination purposes may be invoked in custodial interrogation.

Boot Camp Confessions — No Classic Penalty Situation Compelling Self-Incriminating Statements: Woods volunteered for boot camp. A qualification for successful completion of the camp was full disclosure of past crimes in order to receive a sentence reduction. Unsuccessful completion of boot camp required a return to prison. In an anger management class at boot camp and later to several other persons, Woods made self-incriminating statements regarding a prior double homicide, and Woods was subsequently arrested based on the statements. Woods asserted that he received ineffective assistance of counsel because his attorney failed to raise the classic penalty situation to explain that use of his statements were violative of his right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court noted that the classic penalty situation did not apply because Woods volunteered for boot camp and volunteered the statements. However, the statements were uncoerced, so the information upon which the state relied for its homicide investigation was not compelled by any threat of penalty from the state, and because no classic penalty situation existed, Woods could not argue ineffective assistance of counsel for failing to argue that it did. Woods did not invoke self-incrimination protection at boot camp, and the privilege against self-incrimination could not be considered self-executing. Thus, Woods's petition for postconviction relief was properly denied. St. v. Woods, 2005 MT 186, 328 M 54, 117 P3d 152 (2005), following St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P2d 809 (1996), and distinguishing Robbins v. St., 2002 MT 116, 310 M 10, 50 P3d 134 (2002).

Use of Youth's Voluntary Confession of Drug Use in Subsequent Probation Violation Proceedings Not Error: A youth admitted that she had used methamphetamine, as part of an agreement with the County Attorney and in exchange for a recommendation that the youth be placed in a drug treatment program. When the youth violated the terms of her probation, the confession of prior drug use was admitted into evidence. The youth contended that the self-incriminating statement was inadmissible because the youth was not informed that the statement could later be used against her if she violated probation. The Supreme Court declined to reverse the Youth Court's disposition simply because the youth was not advised that the admission could be used later and instead noted that if the confession was voluntary and not coerced, it could properly be used at a later trial for drug possession. Further, under In re C.L., 2004 MT 71, 320 M 369, 87 P3d 462 (2004), the fact that an admission is voluntary is all that is required for a confession to be admissible in a Youth Court proceeding. In this case, the youth was not placed in a position in which she was coerced into waiving the right against self-incrimination by a threat of penalty, but rather voluntarily admitted drug use as a condition of sentencing to a drug treatment program in a manner similar to a plea bargain agreement. Thus, the Youth Court did not err in allowing the youth's admission into evidence and in taking judicial notice of the youth's waiver of the right against self-incrimination. In re R.L.H., 2005 MT 177, 327 M 520, 116 P3d 791 (2005).

Refusal to Admit Guilt During Treatment for Sexual Offense to Which Defendant Pleaded Guilty — No Deprivation of Right Against Self-Incrimination: Van Haele was incarcerated for sex crimes to which he pleaded guilty, and part of the sentence required Van Haele to follow a treatment plan. However, Van Haele refused to participate in sex offender treatment on grounds that to do so would require him to admit guilt in violation of the constitutional right against self-incrimination. However, there was no question either of compelling Van Haele to disclose the commission of sexual offenses for which he was not charged or of using any compelled disclosures against him. Rather, Van Haele persisted in refusing to admit guilt during treatment for offenses to which he previously pleaded guilty, so he was not deprived of the right against self-incrimination. St. v. Van Haele, 2005 MT 153, 327 M 400, 114 P3d 225 (2005), distinguishing St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979 (1991), and St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P2d 809 (1996).

Error for Prosecutor to Comment on Defendant's Post-Miranda Silence Regardless When Warning Given: Following arrest on sexual assault and attempted sexual intercourse without consent charges, Godfrey received an acknowledgment of rights form from his attorney. Godfrey initialed the form and subsequently went over the form with the District Court during his initial appearance. Godfrey later complained that the state prosecutor violated Godfrey's due process rights by commenting at trial on Godfrey's silence, in violation of Doyle v. Ohio, 426 US 610 (1976). The state contended that because Godfrey did not have his Miranda rights read to him by a police officer at the time of arrest, Doyle did not apply. The Supreme Court found the state's argument to be without merit and declined to distinguish between a situation when a defendant is advised of the right to remain silent by an arresting officer and a situation when a defendant is advised of the right by a court, or to distinguish between an oral warning and a written form. However, in this case, Godfrey's counsel did not object to the prosecutor's comments at trial, so the court had to decide whether the trial error was sufficiently prejudicial to trigger plain error review. After reviewing the record, the court concluded that it was not plain that the prosecutor's comments had created an inference for the jury that by remaining silent, Godfrey must have been guilty. Absent a clear comment on or infringement of Godfrey's fundamental right to remain silent and absent a contemporaneous objection by Godfrey's counsel to the prosecutor's comments, the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Godfrey, 2004 MT 197, 322 M 254, 95 P3d 166 (2004). See also St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996), and St. v. Sullivan, 280 M 25, 927 P2d 1033 (1996).

Lack of Remorse Not Sole Sentence Enhancement Factor — Incest Sentence Affirmed: Defendant contended that the sentencing court erred in augmenting a sentence for incest simply because defendant did not show remorse or admit guilt. The Supreme Court noted that St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002), prohibits enhancement of a sentence solely because a defendant is not remorseful or refuses to be accountable for the defendant's conduct. However, in this case, the sentencing court did not rely solely on defendant's attitude in enhancing the incest sentence but also considered defendant's risk of reoffending, risk to society, prospects for rehabilitation, character, background, history, and mental and physical functioning. Thus, Shreves was distinguishable, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. J.C., 2004 MT 75, 320 M 411, 87 P3d 501 (2004).

Lack of Advisement of Right to Counsel and Right Against Self-Incrimination for Youth Taken Into Custody for Questioning Reversible Error — When Waiver of Rights Attaches: A youth was questioned at the Sheriff's office regarding a burglary and criminal mischief and was then taken home, where he agreed to relinquish articles of clothing that were not inconsistent with evidence found at the crime scene. The youth's parents were not notified of any of the Sheriff's actions, and no omnibus hearing was held. The youth's clothing was later introduced at trial over the youth's objection. Following conviction, the youth appealed, contending that the clothing was not legally obtained pursuant to a search warrant, that he was not advised of his rights, and that he did not give an informed waiver of his right to have his parents contacted prior to relinquishment of the clothing. The state maintained that the youth voluntarily consented to relinquish the clothing and thus waived his rights. The Supreme Court reversed. Under the Montana Youth Court Act, a youth taken into custody for questioning on a matter that could result in allegations that the youth is delinquent must be advised of the right to counsel and the right against self-incrimination, and the youth's parents must be immediately notified by the investigating officer. A youth who is 16 years of age or older may make an effective waiver of those rights. In determining whether waiver and consent by juveniles are voluntary, the Supreme Court applies the totality of circumstances test set out in Evans v. District Court, 2000 MT 38, 298 M 279, 995 P2d 455 (2000), which provides that a determination of voluntariness takes into account: (1) the defendant's age and level of education; (2) whether the defendant was advised of the defendant's rights; (3) the defendant's prior experience with the criminal justice system; (4) the defendant's background and experience; and (5) the defendant's demeanor, coherence, articulateness, and capacity to make full use of the defendant's faculties. Here, the District Court failed to take the Evans factors into account, and the requirements of 41-5-331 regarding parental notification were not fulfilled. Failure to follow statutory requirements and to consider the totality of the circumstances was reversible error. In re C.T.P., 2004 MT 63, 320 M 279, 87 P3d 399 (2004).

Plain Error in Allowing Youth's Extrajudicial Statements When Youth Not Advised of Right to Counsel and Right Against Self-Incrimination: A youth asserted for the first time on appeal that the Youth Court improperly admitted extrajudicial statements that the youth made regarding the youth's whereabouts when a burglary and criminal mischief were committed. Despite the state's contention that the arguments should not be considered because they were not raised at trial, the Supreme Court nevertheless considered the argument under the plain error doctrine because the youth was not notified while in custody of the fundamental right to counsel and the right to avoid self-incrimination, nor were the youth's parents notified as required. The youth's rights under the Montana Youth Court Act and the constitution were simply ignored in this case, so in order to avoid a question of the fundamental fairness of the trial by admission of constitutionally infirm extrajudicial statements, the Supreme Court reversed the trial court's decision to admit the statements. In re C.T.P., 2004 MT 63, 320 M 279, 87 P3d 399 (2004).

Noncustodial Statements to Law Enforcement — Motion to Suppress Improperly Granted: The District Court granted Reavley's motion to suppress a statement made to law enforcement at the police station on grounds that the police: (1) gave mere lip service to Miranda warnings; (2) did not respond to Reavley's inquiry about a need for counsel; (3) used psychological coercion by implying that Reavley would receive leniency if he confessed to the crime; (4) made repeated religious references; (5) falsely told Reavley that a hypnotist was on the way; and (6) lied about DNA evidence that did not exist. The Supreme Court's review of the record did not support the findings. In examining whether the statement was voluntary, the Supreme Court applied the factors in St. v. Olson, 2003 MT 61, 314 M 402, 66 P3d 297 (2003), to determine whether Reavley was subjected to a custodial interrogation, and all the factors weighed in favor of the state. Reavley was not in custody when he was questioned by the police, so a Miranda warning was not required when questioning began. Officers did not use threats or violence or otherwise act improperly during the interview. At no time did Reavley make a clear, unambiguous, and unequivocal request for counsel, and he was free to leave the station at any time. Based on these facts, the motion to suppress the statement was improperly granted, and the District Court was reversed. St. v. Reavley, 2003 MT 298, 318 M 150, 79 P3d 270 (2003), distinguishing St. v. Grey, 274 M 206, 907 P2d 951 (1995).

Voluntariness of Statements Made to Officers Responding to Emergency Call — Admissibility of Statements Not Made During Custodial Interrogation: Officers responded to an emergency 9-1-1 domestic violence call at Saxton's home and discovered a marijuana growing operation in the home. Saxton contended that statements made to the officers should be suppressed because the statements were not voluntary and because no Miranda warning was given. The trial court disagreed, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Although the state may not use confessions or admissions obtained through custodial interrogations without proper Miranda warnings, in this case, the officer's conversation with Saxton was not considered a custodial interrogation within the context of Miranda because Saxton was not restrained in any way and was told repeatedly that she was free to leave and because Saxton's statements regarding ownership of the marijuana were offered voluntarily. St. v. Saxton, 2003 MT 105, 315 M 315, 68 P3d 721 (2003).

Confession a Result of Exploitation of Unlawful Arrest — Miranda Warning Insufficient to Negate Cumulative Effect of Circumstances Leading to Confession: Officers had insufficient probable cause to arrest Van Dort, resulting in an unlawful arrest, and the Supreme Court then considered whether Van Dort's subsequent confession was legitimate. The state maintained that because Van Dort was given Miranda warnings, the confession should be admissible. Van Dort averred that the Miranda warnings alone were insufficient to sever the causal connection between the confession and the arrest. The court noted that as set out in St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94 (1985), which adopted the federal rule set out in Brown v. Ill., 422 US 590 (1975), the general principle is that a confession obtained as a result of an unlawful arrest is inadmissible; however, there must be a causal connection between the arrest and the confession. In determining whether a causal connection exists, the court considers: (1) the presence or absence of timely Miranda warnings; (2) whether there was an intervening independent act by the defendant or some third party; (3) the temporal proximity of the arrest and confession; and (4) the degree of the alleged constitutional violation. Miranda warnings will not, in all cases, attenuate the corruptive effect of a prior constitutional violation or remove the taint of a prior constitutional violation. In this case, the Miranda warnings did not sever the chain of causality between Van Dort's unlawful arrest and the confession and were insufficient to negate the cumulative effect of all the relevant circumstances leading to Van Dort's confession. The court distinguished Beach, holding that despite the issuance of Miranda warnings, Van Dort's confession was the result of the exploitation of the unlawful arrest and inadmissible as fruit of the poisonous tree, and the Supreme Court reversed the District Court's denial of Van Dort's motion to suppress. St. v. Van Dort, 2003 MT 104, 315 M 303, 68 P3d 728 (2003).

Traffic Stop Based on Drug Tip Considered Custodial Interrogation — Miranda Warning Required: Officers received a tip from Olson's estranged husband that a methamphetamine lab was being operated in Olson's garage. The officers placed the garage under surveillance and saw equipment being loaded into Olson's car that same day. The officers stopped the car for an investigative stop, and an officer informed Olson that he knew that lab equipment was in the trunk. Olson initially denied it, but when the officer expressed concern for Olson and her son, she made incriminating statements and confessed that the lab was in the car. Olson later sought to suppress the statements because she was not read her Miranda rights before she made the statements. The question was whether Olson was subject to a custodial interrogation that entitled her to receive the Miranda warnings. The District Court held that an interrogation did not occur because Olson was not asked any direct questions. The Supreme Court concluded that although Olson was not under arrest at the time that the statements were made, she was nevertheless subjected to a custodial interrogation. Olson was not free to leave during the conversation, the officer's questions were directed specifically at Olson, no other party was privy to the conversation, and the officer should have known that under the circumstances, his statements were reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response. Because Olson did not receive Miranda warnings before she was interrogated, the statements that she made were in violation of her constitutional right against self-incrimination and should have been suppressed. St. v. Olson, 2003 MT 61, 314 M 402, 66 P3d 297 (2003), followed in St. v. McKee, 2006 MT 5, 330 M 249, 127 P3d 445 (2006). See also St. v. Staat, 251 M 1, 822 P2d 643 (1991), and St. v. Flack, 260 M 181, 860 P2d 89 (1993).

Voluntariness of Confession — Totality of Circumstances: When a defendant moves to suppress a confession or admission on grounds that it was given involuntarily, the prosecution must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that it was voluntary. On appeal, the Supreme Court will review denial of a suppression motion to determine whether findings of fact were clearly erroneous and correctly applied as a matter of law. A finding of fact is clearly erroneous if: (1) it is not supported by substantial evidence, which must be more than a scintilla of evidence but may be less than a preponderance of the evidence; (2) the trial court misapprehended the effect of the evidence; or (3) the Supreme Court has a definite or firm conviction that a mistake was made. When a determination of voluntariness depends on the credibility of witnesses, the Supreme Court will defer to the trial court. The emphasis in determining voluntariness is on whether the confession was the product of free choice or compulsion, which must take into account the totality of the circumstances, including the defendant's age and education, whether the defendant was advised of Miranda rights, the defendant's prior experience with the criminal justice system and police interrogation, the defendant's background, experience, demeanor, coherence, articulateness, and capacity to make full use of faculties, the length and method of interrogation, and whether the confession or admission was extracted through force, violence, or improper influence or by direct or implied promises. If the confession or admission was involuntary, its use violates self-incrimination and due process. Here, the Supreme Court considered the totality of the circumstances and found substantial credible evidence that Hoffman's confession was voluntary. St. v. Hoffman, 2003 MT 26, 314 M 155, 64 P3d 1013 (2003). The standard of review of denial of a motion to suppress was also applied in St. v. Munson, 2007 MT 222, 339 M 68, 169 P3d 364 (2007).

Sentence Based on Refusal to Admit Guilt Violative of Right Against Self-Incrimination: Shreves was convicted of deliberate homicide and sentenced to 100 years in prison, with no parole for 60 years. At trial, Shreves chose to testify on his own behalf and assert his innocence, and at sentencing, Shreves chose not to testify, but his counsel indicated that Shreves maintained his innocence. The District Court imposed the sentence based in significant part on Shreves' failure to show remorse or responsibility. Shreves appealed on grounds that it was improper to hold his refusal to admit to the crime against him in determining the sentence. The state contended that the sentencing court properly considered the lack of remorse as a factor relevant to Shreves' rehabilitation and the danger presented to the community, and argued that the lack of remorse was based on trial testimony and evidence. The Supreme Court considered whether Shreves adequately invoked the right to maintain silence, the scope of the oral sentence that controlled over the subsequent written sentence as it related to the entire sentence, and the District Court's decision to base its sentence in large part on Shreves' refusal to admit to the crime. Although lack of remorse can be considered as a sentencing factor, a sentence that is based on a refusal to admit guilt cannot be upheld. Here, the Supreme Court was unable to find a sentencing distinction between punishing Shreves for remaining silent and the proper consideration of Shreves' failure to show remorse. A sentencing court may not draw a negative inference of lack of remorse from a defendant's silence at sentencing when the defendant has maintained innocence throughout the proceedings. Shreves was improperly penalized for maintaining his innocence pursuant to the constitutional right to remain silent. The sentence was therefore illegal. Shreves' conviction was reversed, and the case was remanded for resentencing. St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002), distinguished in St. v. J.C., 2004 MT 75, 320 M 411, 87 P3d 501 (2004), and St. v. Burkhart, 2004 MT 372, 325 M 27, 103 P3d 1037 (2004). See also St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979 (1991), St. v. Prosecutor's Comment Alleging Uncontradicted Evidence Erroneous When Defendant Who Asserted Right to Remain Silent Was Only Person Who Could Offer Contradictory Evidence — Error Harmless: Harrington was arrested for DUI, was read his Miranda rights, and chose to remain silent. Harrington contended that his due process rights and privilege against self-incrimination were violated by testimony elicited and statements made by the prosecution during trial. Although Harrington failed to preserve the issues in the District Court, the Supreme Court applied the plain error doctrine pursuant to its discretionary power enunciated in St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996), considering the totality of the circumstances and evaluating the nature of the constitutional rights implicated, rather than the sufficiency of the evidence. The court decided that because no comment was made that Harrington at any time refused to give a statement or refused to testify and because the prosecutor did not insinuate that an innocent person would have given a statement or testified, no Doyle error occurred (see Doyle v. Ohio, 426 US 610 (1976)). However, the prosecutor did comment during rebuttal that there was no evidence to contradict the state's case, which was error as an improper reference to Harrington's decision not to testify because Harrington was the only person who could have offered contradictory testimony (see St. v. Hart, 154 M 310, 462 P2d 885 (1969)). To determine whether the error was prejudicial, the court applied the test in St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001). The error was considered a trial error rather than a structural error, and because the error concerned comment rather than evidence, the court went on to determine whether it was harmless and contributed to the conviction. In this case, the single comment that the evidence was uncontradicted was an isolated one, and there was no reasonable possibility that it contributed to Harrington's conviction given the fact that during closing, the prosecutor focused on the driving errors Harrington made before being stopped, the videotape of Harrington's field sobriety tests, the arresting officer's expertise, and the results of the preliminary breath test. Harrington's constitutional rights were not prejudiced by the improper reference to his decision not to testify. Columbus v. Harrington, 2001 MT 258, 307 M 215, 36 P3d 937 (2001).

Appropriateness of Treatment Plan Requirement That Parents Provide Explanation of Child's Injuries: Four treatment plans were developed with the parents, the purpose of all of which was to: (1) return the child to parental custody; (2) enable the parents to provide a safe and nurturing environment for the child; (3) enable the parents to develop an awareness of the child's needs and an ability to meet those needs; (4) help the parents develop minimal parenting skills; and (5) resolve the issues that led to the child's abuse, which included a requirement that the parents provide a reasonable and consistent explanation for the child's injuries. The parents were subsequently convicted of endangering the welfare of the child, and the state petitioned for custody. Prior to the permanent custody hearing, the mother moved to strike the task that required an explanation of the child's injuries, but the state never filed a brief in response to the motion. Nevertheless, the motion was denied. Following the termination of the mother's parental rights, she challenged the appropriateness of that task on grounds that the task placed her in the untenable position of having to choose between incriminating herself and failing to complete the treatment plan, in violation of her right against self-incrimination, relying on In re A.N., 2000 MT 35, 298 M 237, 995 P2d 427 (2000). The Supreme Court found her reliance on In re A.N. misplaced. The mother waived her self-incrimination privileges by voluntarily testifying regarding her knowledge of the child's injuries at both the permanent custody hearing and during the criminal proceeding and could not argue later that the disputed task impinged on her constitutional privilege against self-incrimination. Further, the state's duty to protect children, as set out in 41-3-101, necessitated that the parents come to terms with the reasons why the child was abused, and without demonstrable willingness from the parents to resolve the abuse issues, the District Court had no assurance that the child would not be abused again. Thus, the task was a fair requirement in the treatment plan, and the District Court did not err in concluding that the plan was appropriate or in denying the motion to strike the task from the plan. Denying the motion was within the court's discretion regardless of whether the state filed a brief in response to the motion. In re A.C., 2001 MT 126, 305 M 404, 27 P3d 960 (2001).

Assertion of Error in Alleged Comment on Post-Miranda Silence — No Doyle Violation: Clausell contended that the state violated his right to due process and privilege against self-incrimination by commenting on his silence after he received a Miranda warning, relying on Doyle v. Ohio, 426 US 610 (1976). The Supreme Court found that the issue was reviewable under the common-law plain error doctrine set out in St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996); however, the court found no Doyle violation in this case. Not only did the record fail to support Clausell's assertion that the prosecution commented on his post-Miranda silence, it also did not support his assertion that he was silent after he received Miranda warnings. In fact, between the time that they arrived at the hospital and the time of being arrested and given the warnings, Clausell gave five different accounts of how his girlfriend was injured. He had not received a Miranda warning prior to making any of the statements that the state referred to in arguments at trial. The Doyle rule is limited to instances in which the prosecution seeks to impeach a defendant's testimony based on silence after Miranda warnings are given, and no construction of Doyle could be read to preclude the state from comparing Clausell's voluntary, inconsistent statements. Clausell failed to establish any improper comment on his post-Miranda silence, and thus his constitutional rights were not violated by the state's comments at trial. St. v. Clausell, 2001 MT 62, 305 M 1, 22 P3d 111 (2001), followed in St. v. Tadewaldt, 2010 MT 177, 357 Mont. 208, 237 P.3d 1273.

Use of Testimony From Prior Trial in Retrial Not Precluded: Ingraham was convicted of negligent homicide, criminal endangerment, and criminal trespass to property in relation to an automobile accident. Admission of certain evidence was found to constitute reversible prejudicial error, and the case was remanded for a new trial. On remand, Ingraham moved to preclude the state from using his testimony from the first trial during its case in chief at the second trial, based on 46-16-701 and his constitutional right not to be compelled to testify against himself. The District Court granted Ingraham's motion, based in part on Harrison v. U.S., 392 US 219 (1968), as interpreted in People v. Armentero, 384 NW 2d 98 (Mich. App. 1986), and the state appealed. The Supreme Court examined the legislative history of 46-16-701, noting that prior to amendment in 1967, the statute expressly required that testimony must be produced anew in a new trial—i.e., testimony from an earlier trial could not be used in a new trial of the same case. However, the 1967 amendment deleted that requirement. When the Legislature amends a statute, it is presumed that some change to existing law is intended; thus, the presumption is that since 1967, the use of testimony from a prior trial in a new trial is not precluded by statute. With regard to the alleged constitutional issue of self-incrimination, the Supreme Court noted that under Harrison and subsequent federal cases, in order to preclude the use of prior testimony in a subsequent trial, the testimony must have been compelled by the admission of evidence both illegally obtained and improperly admitted at trial, but when testimony is compelled as a result of evidence that was improperly admitted rather than unconstitutionally obtained, Harrison does not preclude use of the testimony in a later trial. The District Court abused its discretion in granting Ingraham's motion excluding his prior testimony. State ex rel. Mazurek v. District Court, 2000 MT 266, 302 M 39, 22 P3d 166, 57 St. Rep. 1111 (2000).

Order for Psychiatric Evaluation in Child Abuse Case Not Violative of Privilege Against Self-Incrimination: The District Court hearing a child abuse and neglect case ordered the mother to submit to a psychiatric evaluation, participate in counseling, and follow through with the therapist's recommendations. The mother claimed that the order violated her privilege against self-incrimination under the fifth amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The Supreme Court found no suggestion of criminal liability attending the mother's participation in counseling and noted that a child abuse and neglect proceeding is not a criminal case. Further, 41-3-403 specifically authorizes medical and psychological evaluations of and counseling services for the parents in such cases. Thus, a constitutional violation was not established. In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982, 57 St. Rep. 179 (2000).

Inclusion of Self-Incriminating Requirement as One Element of Parenting Plan — Harmless Error: As part of his third parenting treatment plan, the father was required to affirmatively explain the cause of his child's injuries, assume responsibility for any injuries inflicted on the child, and cooperate with law enforcement to resolve the related criminal charges against him. In essence, the state used the treatment plan to make an official inquiry into the child's injuries, leaving the father with the Hobson's choice of either disclosing his involvement in the child's injuries and incriminating himself in the criminal proceeding or facing certain termination of his parental rights. The Supreme Court found the requirement to be inappropriate. However, the requirement impacted only one goal of five that the District Court found were not successfully met and only one task of four that were not completed. Thus, inclusion of the inappropriate requirement did not significantly impact the District Court's decision to terminate the father's parental rights or result in substantial injustice. The error was harmless, and the Supreme Court affirmed. In re A.N. & C.N., 2000 MT 35, 298 M 237, 995 P2d 427, 57 St. Rep. 155 (2000).

Transfer of Youth Court Case to District Court Not Violative of Minor's Constitutional Rights: Spina argued that the statute allowing transfer of her Youth Court case to the District Court resulted in violation of her rights under Art. II, sec. 15, Mont. Const., which guarantees to minors the same fundamental rights afforded to adults, and under Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., which guarantees the right to a fair trial. The Supreme Court considered alleged violations of the right against self-incrimination, the right to effective assistance of counsel, the right to a fair trial, and the right to a presumption of innocence, finding that Spina's arguments were without merit. The transfer statute did not violate Spina's constitutional rights. St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

Nontestimonial Nature of Reciting Alphabet and Counting in DUI Field Test — Constitutional Self-Incrimination Protection Inapplicable: Devlin was arrested for DUI and taken to the Sheriff's office for additional field sobriety tests, which were videotaped. Prior to being advised of his Miranda rights, an officer asked Devlin to recite the alphabet starting at "K" and to count aloud from 46 to 72. Upon prosecution in Justice's Court, Devlin moved for suppression of all statements made prior to the Miranda warning and of testimonial answers in the field sobriety tests, but the motion was denied. Devlin renewed the motion in District Court, which suppressed the results of the alphabet and counting tests. The state appealed. The Supreme Court noted that the constitutional right against self-incrimination was designed to protect against the cruel trilemma of having to choose among answering truthfully, answering falsely, or remaining silent. However, the court declined to expand the holding in Pa. v. Muniz, 496 US 582, 110 L Ed 2d 528, 110 S Ct 2638 (1990), to cover relatively content-free oral declarations, holding that neither reciting the alphabet nor counting involves an express or implied assertion of fact or belief. Therefore, a defendant who is asked to do so conveys no facts specific to the person being questioned, assuming that the defendant is familiar with the alphabet and counting. Neither reciting the alphabet nor counting is testimonial in nature, so the constitutional protection against self-incrimination does not attach when a driver is asked to perform either as part of a DUI field sobriety test. St. v. Devlin, 1999 MT 90, 294 M 215, 980 P2d 1037, 56 St. Rep. 383 (1999), affirming St. v. Thompson, 237 M 384, 773 P2d 722, 46 St. Rep. 887 (1989).

Defense of Mental State for Mitigated Deliberate Homicide — Right of Defendant to Refuse to Answer Questions by State Psychological Expert — Remedy for Unrebuttable Testimony: Park, who was charged with forgery and deliberate homicide, filed notice of his intent to use the affirmative defense that extreme mental and emotional stress caused him to commit the offenses and gave notice of his intent to use expert psychological testimony in the course of his defense. The state requested an examination of Park by its own psychological expert, but Park objected to the oral part of the requested examination on the grounds that his defense was not reliance upon a mental disease or defect and the state therefore had no right to a psychological examination. In its decision granting supervisory control over the proceedings, the Supreme Court held that: (1) Park did not by the use of the defense of mitigated deliberate homicide waive his right to remain silent guaranteed by the U.S. and Montana Constitutions when questioned by the state's psychological expert; (2) by invoking his right against self-incrimination in the interview with the state's psychological expert, Park should not be able to put his version of the facts in the case before the jury through the testimony of his own psychological expert because giving the defendant that right would be similar to allowing Park to testify but not be subject to cross-examination, which the Supreme Court held in St. v. Wilson, 193 M 318, 631 P2d 1273 (1981), a defendant would not be allowed to do; and (3) if Park refuses to talk to the state's psychological expert but takes the witness stand in his own defense, the state's expert may listen to Park's testimony and respond accordingly to that testimony. Park v. District Court, 1998 MT 164, 289 M 367, 961 P2d 1267, 55 St. Rep. 657 (1998).

Examination of Defendant by State Psychiatrist — Supervisory Control Granted to Prevent Denial of Defendant's Fifth Amendment Right Against Self-Incrimination: Park, who was charged with forgery and deliberate homicide, filed notice of his intent to use the affirmative defense that extreme mental and emotional stress caused him to commit the offenses and gave notice of his intent to use expert psychological testimony in the course of his defense. The state requested an examination of Park by its own psychological expert, but Park objected to the oral part of the requested examination on the grounds that, first, his defense was not reliance upon a mental disease or defect and the state therefore had no right to a psychological examination, and, second, he did not want to discuss his offenses with the psychological expert for fear of waiving his constitutional right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court, citing Mapes v. District Court, 250 M 524, 822 P2d 91 (1991), held that the case was appropriate for supervisory control because Park was faced with the loss of a constitutional right as part of the psychological interview and appeal could not prevent the loss of that right. Park v. District Court, 1998 MT 164, 289 M 367, 961 P2d 1267, 55 St. Rep. 657 (1998).

Coercion of Testimony by Lengthy Interrogation, Threats, Bribes, Good Cop/Bad Cop Technique, and Misrepresentations Refuted by Record: Law enforcement officers did not coerce defendant's statements. A 5½-hour interview with a 2-hour break for dinner, a 2-hour interview on the next day, and a 1-hour interview on the third day did not amount to overly long or arduous interrogation. Defendant's move to a jail nearer his family was at his request, refuting his assertion that the officers threatened him with consequences to his family. The record contained similar evidence refuting allegations of use of good cop/bad cop technique, misrepresentations that defendant was not a suspect, offers of cigarettes, and feigned concern about defendant's family. St. v. Lawrence, 285 M 140, 948 P2d 186, 54 St. Rep. 1082 (1997).

Officer Testimony, Tapes, and Notes Showing Advice and Waiver of Rights: The state met its burden of showing by a preponderance of the evidence that defendant was advised of his rights, voluntarily waived them, and talked to the police. The officers who interviewed him testified that he was advised of his rights at the beginning of each of three interviews. The tape that was recorded at the end of each interview started with defendant's stating that he had been advised of his rights and had waived them. The notes of one of the officers referred to advices and waivers of rights. Defendant signed a waiver form. The statements would not be found inadmissible for failure to make a tape recording or other record of the advice and waiver at the time that they were given. Grey, in which the court stated a preference for such a record, does not require such a record. How the officers preserve a record of the advice and waiver is up to them. However, a tangible record should be preserved when the means to do so are readily available, and failure to do so will result in extreme disfavor with the court in later determining the voluntariness of a waiver. St. v. Lawrence, 285 M 140, 948 P2d 186, 54 St. Rep. 1082 (1997).

Prosecutor's Comments on Defendant's Post-Miranda Silence — Violation of Right to Due Process and Privilege Against Self-Incrimination Reviewable Under Plain Error Doctrine: At trial for deliberate homicide, the prosecutor commented on the defendant's post-Miranda silence in the opening statement, introduced testimony regarding the defendant's refusal to make a statement, and commented twice during the closing statement about the defendant's silence. The defense counsel did not comment or object at trial. The defendant did not testify at trial. The Supreme Court held that the defendant's due process rights and the privilege against self-incrimination were violated by the prosecutor's comments and that the issue was reviewable under the common-law plain error doctrine. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded. St. v. Sullivan, 280 M 25, 927 P2d 1033, 53 St. Rep. 1282 (1996), distinguished in St. v. Baker, 2000 MT 307, 302 M 408, 15 P3d 379, 57 St. Rep. 1297 (2000). Baker was followed in St. v. Tadewaldt, 2010 MT 177, 357 Mont. 208, 237 P.3d 1273.

Taxpayer Properly Held in Contempt for Refusal to File Income Tax Returns — Privilege Against Self-Incrimination No Defense: Gillispie failed to file an income tax return for 4 years. The District Court ordered her to file the returns or to show cause why she should not be required to file them. At the hearing, the Department of Revenue introduced Gillispie's W-2 forms, which showed that she had made the minimum income necessary to require her to file returns. The District Court ordered her to file the returns or be found in contempt. When Gillispie failed to file the returns, the District Court held her in contempt, and Gillispie filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus with the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court held that the District Court had jurisdiction to order Gillispie to file the returns and jurisdiction to hold Gillispie in contempt and that the District Court also had sufficient evidence to do so. The Supreme Court also held that Gillispie's privilege against self-incrimination does not justify the outright refusal to file a return and cannot be used as a method of evading payment of lawful taxes. The Supreme Court held that she must demonstrate the specific parts of the returns that would result in self-incrimination. Gillispie v. Sherlock, 279 M 21, 929 P2d 199, 53 St. Rep. 507 (1996).

Privilege Against Self-Incrimination as Self-Executing Under Threat of Penalty: Citing numerous federal cases, the Supreme Court held that a person claiming protection against self-incrimination generally must affirmatively invoke it, even when the government is unquestionably attempting to compel an answer. If a witness under compulsion to answer makes disclosures instead of claiming the privilege, the witness cannot be said to have been compelled to self-incriminate. A defendant's ignorance of the right against self-incrimination generally does not excuse the failure to claim the privilege, and if the defendant fails to assert the privilege, it is considered waived. However, failure to invoke the privilege does not preclude the benefit if the defendant is placed in a situation in which the defendant is not free to admit, deny, or refuse to answer. In that case, the privilege is said to be self-executing. One such case is when the government prevents a voluntary invocation of the privilege by threatening to penalize the individual if the privilege is invoked. A command to speak, under threat of loss of liberty, implicitly forecloses the option of remaining silent. In the present case, Fuller was convicted of rape and sexual assault and was required to enter sexual offender treatment. As part of the treatment, he was required to disclose his offense history and was told that failure to do so would result in revocation of probation and subsequent imprisonment. Fuller complied, admitting prior offenses, which were reported and for which he was then charged and arrested. Fuller was essentially ordered to incriminate himself to avoid punishment, and despite the holding in St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979 (1991), that a sentencing court lacks authority to revoke probation solely on grounds that a defendant refuses to admit guilt, the threat of punishment was credible and Fuller's reliance on the belief that the court could carry out the threat was reasonable. Because the state improperly compelled Fuller to disclose past criminal acts in violation of his right against compelled self-incrimination and his right to remain silent, the state was prohibited from using any of the elicited information as the basis for a later, separate criminal prosecution. St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P2d 809, 53 St. Rep. 325 (1996), followed in St. v. Woods, 2005 MT 186, 328 M 54, 117 P3d 152 (2005), and St. v. Plouffe, 2014 MT 183, 375 Mont. 429, 329 P.3d 1255. See also Minn. v. Murphy, 465 US 420, 79 L Ed 2d 409, 104 S Ct 1136 (1984), and In re A.N. & C.N., 2000 MT 35, 298 M 237, 995 P2d 427, 57 St. Rep. 155 (2000).

Prosecutor's Comments on Defendant's Postarrest Silence — No Constitutional Violation: Finley argued that the prosecutor's cross-examination and closing argument impermissibly commented on Finley's postarrest silence, violating the right to due process of law as set forth in Doyle v. Ohio, 426 US 610, 49 L Ed 2d 91, 96 S Ct 2240 (1976), and the privilege against self-incrimination. However, citing St. v. Furlong, 213 M 251, 690 P2d 986 (1984), the Supreme Court held that Doyle does not apply to postarrest silence when the defendant has not been assured of the right to remain silent and of no subsequent penalty for asserting that right, as in this case when Finley was not given any Miranda warning. Further, Finley's privilege against self-incrimination was not violated because Finley voluntarily chose to take the stand during trial. Thus, his credibility was subject to impeachment just like any other witness. Although the prosecutor's comments were not condoned, Finley's constitutional rights were not violated by the comments, absent the giving of a Miranda warning. St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996), following Jenkins v. Anderson, 447 US 231, 62 L Ed 2d 30, 100 S Ct 45 (1980), and followed in St. v. Sullivan, 280 M 25, 927 P2d 1033, 53 St. Rep. 1282 (1996). See also St. v. Baker, 2000 MT 307, 302 M 408, 15 P3d 379, 57 St. Rep. 1297 (2000) (no demonstration of self-incrimination violation when defendant was impeached regarding conflicting stories provided as part of direct testimony), and St. v. Lackman, 2017 MT 127, 387 Mont. 459, 395 P.3d 477.

Totality of Circumstances — Police Deception and Failure to Give Adequate Miranda Warning — Confession Not Voluntary: The defendant moved to suppress a videotaped statement on the grounds that the statement was obtained involuntarily. The Supreme Court stated that in a custodial interrogation at the station house, the failure of the police to preserve some tangible record of the giving of Miranda warnings and of the knowing, intelligent waiver by the detainee will be viewed with distrust in the judicial assessment of voluntariness under the totality of circumstances surrounding the confession or admission. Based on the totality of the circumstances of police deception and on the failure to give the defendant adequate warning, the confession was not voluntary and the District Court erred in denying the motion to suppress. St. v. Grey, 274 M 206, 907 P2d 951, 52 St. Rep. 1193 (1995), followed in St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592, 53 St. Rep. 226 (1996), and distinguished in St. v. Gittens, 2008 MT 55, 341 M 450, 178 P3d 91 (2008). Loh was followed, as to totality of circumstances, in St. v. Hayworth, 1998 MT 158, 289 M 433, 964 P2d 1, 55 St. Rep. 631 (1998). The rules regarding preservation of a tangible record, set out in Grey, St. v. Siegal, 281 M 250, 934 P2d 176, 54 St. Rep. 158 (1997), and St. v. Weaver, 1998 MT 167, 290 M 58, 964 P2d 713, 55 St. Rep. 668 (1998), were extended to statements of a witness or informant made at the station house or in a similarly controlled environment in St. v. Worrall, 1999 MT 55, 293 M 439, 976 P2d 968, 56 St. Rep. 225 (1999).

Impeachment Questioning on Defendant's Silence — Not Error: In a trial for sexual intercourse without consent, the District Court allowed the defendant to be cross-examined on statements that the defendant had voluntarily made to a police officer prior to arrest and on how the defendant's testimony at trial conflicted with those statements. The District Court did not err in allowing the state to use the defendant's silence regarding consensual sexual intercourse during the initial interrogation by police as evidence against the defendant at trial. St. v. Graves, 272 M 451, 901 P2d 549, 52 St. Rep. 755 (1995).

Alford Plea in Sexual Assault Case — Revocation of Suspended Sentence: In a sexual assault case, the defendant sufficiently raised the issue of the fifth amendment right against self-incrimination to warrant review on appeal. The defendant entered an Alford plea, and sexual offender evaluation and treatment were conditions of the suspended sentence. The District Court did not abuse its discretion when it revoked the defendant's suspended sentence for violations of the conditions of the suspended sentence, including sexual offender evaluation and treatment. St. v. Butler, 272 M 286, 900 P2d 908, 52 St. Rep. 745 (1995).

Prison Sentence in Conformity With Presentence Investigation — No Violation of Imlay and Fifth Amendment Rights: Henrich was sentenced to a term in the state prison after being convicted of sexually assaulting his two daughters. Henrich objected to the presentence investigation report, claiming that he was being sentenced to prison because the counselor completing the report noted that Henrich continued to deny his guilt. Henrich alleged that he was being punished for exercising his fifth amendment rights, in violation of the Supreme Court's opinion in St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979 (1991). The Supreme Court reviewed the record of the sentencing hearing and found that Henrich was being sentenced to prison not because he refused to admit his guilt but because of the severity of his crimes and the slim chance for rehabilitation. St. v. Henrich, 268 M 258, 886 P2d 402, 51 St. Rep. 1275 (1994).

Constitutionality of Disclosure Statutes — Failure to Provide Psychiatric Reports — Defense of Mental Disease or Defect Precluded: Defendant was examined by a psychiatrist, and the trial court ordered submission of the medical report to the court. Following additional examination by three more psychiatrists or psychologists, defendant gave notice of the intention to rely on mental disease or defect as a defense, but the notice did not specify the names and addresses of persons defendant intended to call as witnesses to support his defense. The state moved for discovery of the names, addresses, and any statements or reports required to be disclosed under 46-15-323. Defense counsel refused to provide the information because disclosure could not be done without disclosing privileged or incriminating information. The trial court advised counsel that 46-15-328 provides for protective orders and for excising privileged or incriminating information and ordered disclosure. The trial court ruled that nondisclosure precluded defendant's use of the mental disease or defect defense. Defense counsel appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing that the disclosure requirements were an unconstitutional violation of the right against self-incrimination under the federal and state constitutions. The Supreme Court previously affirmed Montana's reciprocal discovery provisions against attack on the same constitutional grounds in State ex rel. Carkulis v. District Court, 229 M 265, 746 P2d 604 (1987). In this case, the court noted that the discovery provisions allow a defendant to be examined by as many psychiatrists as desired and that only statements of those that are to be called as witnesses at trial need be disclosed. Further, as set out in Smith v. McCormick, 914 F2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990), the attorney-client privilege extends only to the point of testimonial use of that communication. Defendant was advised but refused to avail himself of the protective order provisions of 46-15-328, and in doing so, the refusal to comply with constitutional statutory discovery provisions precluded the use of the mental disease or defect defense. St. v. Davidson, 266 M 404, 880 P2d 1331, 51 St. Rep. 867 (1994).

Sentence Thrown Out Because of Judge's Failure to Observe Defendant's Fifth Amendment Rights: The trial judge stated that he based the sentence he gave Kelly on the evidence presented and on the fact that Kelly had not testified. The Supreme Court upheld the conviction but remanded the case for resentencing, with instructions that the defendant could not be punished for asserting his right against self-incrimination. St. v. Kelly, 265 M 298, 876 P2d 641, 51 St. Rep. 522 (1994).

Defendant's Request for Psychiatric Examination — Waiver of Fifth Amendment Privilege: Smith relied on Estelle v. Smith, 451 US 454, 68 L Ed 2d 359, 101 S Ct 1866 (1981), in claiming that his constitutional right against self-incrimination was violated by the state's use of a psychiatrist's report and testimony to establish aggravating factors and rebut mitigating evidence. However, Estelle is distinguishable because Smith personally initiated the examination, thus waiving the constitutional privilege. Smith had access to advice of counsel prior to the examination and could not claim that statements made during the examination were compelled against his will. St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 1388 (1993) (Smith II). Following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

Dangerous Drug Tax Reporting Procedures as Protection Against Self-Incrimination: The procedures outlined in 15-25-113 (now repealed) regarding the reporting by law enforcement personnel to the Department of Revenue of persons subject to the dangerous drug tax do not relate the tax to a criminal conviction but rather protect the taxpayer's constitutional right against self-incrimination. Sorensen v. Dept. of Revenue, 254 M 61, 836 P2d 29, 49 St. Rep. 624 (1992).

Expert Testimony Beyond Scope Originally Allowed — Waiver of Objection When Witness Called by Defendant: Consistent with the holding in Buchanan v. Ky., 483 US 402, 97 L Ed 2d 336, 107 S Ct 2906 (1987), the District Court stated that it would allow testimony of a counselor for the limited purpose of the state's rebuttal if defendant placed his state of mind in issue through direct testimony or by calling his own psychologist as a witness. However, defendant called the counselor as a witness during presentation of his case, asking about communications between defendant and the counselor. To the extent that the counselor's testimony exceeded the purposes for which it was originally allowed, it was the fault of the defendant, who thereby waived any objection he might have otherwise asserted based on privilege or the constitutional right against self-incrimination. St. v. Goodwin, 249 M 1, 813 P2d 953, 48 St. Rep. 539 (1991), followed, with regard to constitutionality of ordering a compelled evaluation for rebuttal purposes, in St. v. Hess, 252 M 205, 828 P2d 382, 49 St. Rep. 217 (1992). See also Smith v. McCormick, 914 F2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990).

Refusal to Admit Guilt Following Conviction — Augmentation of Sentence Prohibited: Defendant's sentence for sexual assault was suspended on the condition that he complete a sex offender treatment course. Despite attempts to seek enrollment in two separate courses, he was not accepted for treatment because he consistently denied committing a sexual offense. Upon evidence of his failure to complete a course, his suspended sentence was revoked and he was sentenced to 5 years in the state prison. The Supreme Court, following the decision in Thomas v. U.S., 368 F2d 941 (5th Cir. 1966), found that even though defendant had already been convicted of the crime he now denies, the criminal justice system still provides opportunities to challenge that conviction. These legally guaranteed rights would be rendered meaningless if defendant could be compelled to admit guilt as a condition to his continued freedom. While defendant would be foreclosed from invoking the protection of such procedures to establish his innocence, the reliability of an admission of guilt would be highly suspect. Additionally, because defendant testified in his own defense at trial and denied committing a sexual crime, by admitting his guilt, he would have abandoned his right against self-incrimination, not only as to the crime for which he was charged but also as to the crime of perjury. Therefore, absent any grant of immunity, when a defendant has consistently denied guilt, his right against self-incrimination should be protected and augmenting a defendant's sentence because he refuses to confess to a crime or invokes his privilege against self-incrimination is prohibited. St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979, 48 St. Rep. 588 (1991), overruling any holding to the contrary in St. v. Donnelly, 244 M 371, 798 P2d 89, 47 St. Rep. 1600 (1990), and distinguished in St. v. Henrich, 268 M 258, 886 P2d 402, 51 St. Rep. 1275 (1994), St. v. Butler, 272 M 286, 900 P2d 908, 52 St. Rep. 745 (1995), and St. v. Osborne, 2007 MT 217, 339 M 45, 167 P3d 405 (2007).

Prosecutorial Comment on Defendant's Silence — Failure to Object — No Plain Error or Doyle Violation: There is no plain error or Doyle violation (Doyle v. Ohio 426 US 610, 49 L Ed 2d 91, 96 S Ct 2240 (1976)) when the defendant first focuses on the issue of his earlier silence in cross-examination of the state's witnesses, fails to object to the state's reference to the same silence for alleged improper purposes, and then for the first time on appeal, alleges that admission of such evidence constitutes plain reversible error. St. v. Sadowski, 247 M 63, 805 P2d 537, 48 St. Rep. 93 (1991).

Defendant's Choice Between Silence and Presenting a Defense Not Invasion of Right Against Self-Incrimination: The defendant argued that the lower court had refused to admit certain evidence offered by the defense and by so doing had forced the defendant to take the stand in violation of his right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court stated that the mere fact that the defendant's version of the facts would not otherwise have been brought before the jury does not render his decision compelled. The court held that the question to be determined is whether the defendant had been compelled to testify or merely had been required to make tactical decisions regarding the defense of his position. St. v. Van Dyken, 242 M 415, 791 P2d 1350, 47 St. Rep. 835 (1990).

Voluntary Statement of Inmate at Reclassification Hearing: A prison inmate claimed defendant inmate assaulted him. Defendant was placed in temporary lockup in the maximum security unit. A reclassification hearing, which is held to notify the inmate of the reason why he is being moved, was held. When he was told that charges might be filed, he stated, "For what? I only used my fist." The statement was admissible at trial even though there had been no Miranda warning. Officials seldom ask the inmate questions at a reclassification hearing and asked none of defendant. Defendant volunteered the statement, and a freely given voluntary statement is admissible when there was no Miranda warning. St. v. DePue, 237 M 428, 774 P2d 386, 46 St. Rep. 923 (1989). See also St. v. Belgarde, 1998 MT 152, 289 M 287, 962 P2d 571, 55 St. Rep. 590 (1998), for the admissibility of a voluntary statement made after arrest but before a reading of the defendant's rights.

Audio-Video Taping:

Driver was arrested for DUI, and an audio-video tape was made at the Sheriff's office of his actions and speech during field sobriety tests, the reading of his Miranda rights, and his waiver of those rights. The tape was objective evidence, not constitutionally prohibited testimonial compulsion. The court distinguished between the compelling of communications or testimony and real, physical, or objective evidence. The tape was introduced into evidence not for the incriminating content of the words of the defendant, but rather as evidence that helped the jury understand the testimony of the police who observed the defendant's unsteady walk and slurred speech. St. v. Thompson, 237 M 384, 773 P2d 722, 46 St. Rep. 887 (1989), reaffirmed in St. v. Belgarde, 244 M 500, 798 P2d 539, 47 St. Rep. 1762 (1990), St. v. Devlin, 1999 MT 90, 294 M 215, 980 P2d 1037, 56 St. Rep. 383 (1999), and St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001).

An audio-video tape of a DUI defendant at the Sheriff's office was objective evidence and not protected by the fifth amendment; therefore, whether he was, or should have been, given a Miranda warning prior to the taping is not an issue. St. v. Thompson, 237 M 384, 773 P2d 722, 46 St. Rep. 887 (1989).

Audio-video taping of defendant arrested for driving while intoxicated was held to be objective evidence, outside the privilege against self-incrimination, since there was no evidence indicating the recording contained speech or gestures testimonial in nature. St. v. Finley, 173 M 162, 566 P2d 1119 (1977), reaffirmed in St. v. Belgarde, 244 M 500, 798 P2d 539, 47 St. Rep. 1762 (1990).

Prosecutor's Language — Referral to Defendant's Prior Inconsistent Statements: One of the arguments put forth by the defendant's attorney was that the alleged sexual abuse victim had been coached. By reminding the jury that the defendant had not said that the victim had been coached when the defendant had been originally interrogated, the prosecutor was not commenting on the defendant's refusal to take the stand. St. v. Wiman, 236 M 180, 769 P2d 1200, 46 St. Rep. 279 (1989).

Breathalyzer Test — Defendant's Refusal Made Prior to Miranda Warning Admissible: Under the holding of St. v. Jackson, 206 M 338, 672 P2d 255, 40 St. Rep. 1698 (1983), neither the results of the Breathalyzer test nor a defendant's refusal to submit to the test are communications protected by the fifth amendment of the U.S. Constitution or by Montana's constitutional prohibition against self-incrimination. Thus, a refusal to submit to a Breathalyzer test made prior to Miranda warnings is not subject to suppression because the Miranda warning does not apply to such nontestimonial conduct. Missoula v. Forest, 236 M 129, 769 P2d 699, 46 St. Rep. 237 (1989), followed in Helena v. Barrett, 245 M 35, 798 P2d 544, 47 St. Rep. 1865 (1990). See also St. v. Michaud, 2008 MT 88, 342 M 244, 180 P3d 636 (2008), in which a defendant's claim of a constitutional prohibition against self-incrimination by the admission of defendant's refusal to submit to a blood alcohol test was again foreclosed by the decision in S. Dak. v. Neville, 459 US 533 (1983), which defined the refusal as nontestimonial conduct.

Comments on Silence of Accused Objectionable — Harmless Error: The Supreme Court found a prosecutor's comments on a defendant's silence, although apparently unintentional, to be clearly objectionable. The court cautioned the prosecution in criminal cases not to comment, even indirectly, on the silence of the accused. However, in light of overwhelming evidence of guilt, the comments in this case were found to be harmless beyond a reasonable doubt under the rule set out in Chapman v. Calif., 386 US 18, 17 L Ed 2d 705, 87 S Ct 824 (1967). St. v. Johnson, 233 M 473, 760 P2d 760, 45 St. Rep. 1653 (1988), followed in St. v. Mix, 239 M 351, 781 P2d 751, 46 St. Rep. 1740 (1989), and St. v. Whitlow, 285 M 430, 949 P2d 239, 54 St. Rep. 1227 (1997).

Reference to Defendant's Silence Admissible — Response to Defense: A defendant's privilege against self-incrimination was not violated by prosecutor's comments on the failure to testify when the state's reference to defendant's silence was a fair response to a claim made by defendant or defense counsel. St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352, 45 St. Rep. 1542 (1988), following U.S. v. Robinson, 485 US 25, 99 L Ed 2d 23, 108 S Ct 864 (1988).

Comment on Refusal to Testify — Right to Remain Silent Infringed: The District Court, by repeatedly pointing out to defendant his right to testify, emphasized his failure to take the stand and focused the jury's attention on defendant's silence at a late stage of the trial. Citing Griffin v. Calif., 380 US 609, 14 L Ed 2d 106, 85 S Ct 1229 (1965), the Supreme Court noted that "comment on the refusal to testify is a remnant of the 'inquisitorial system of criminal justice' which the [right against self-incrimination] outlaws" and that such comment "cuts down on the privilege by making its assertion costly". What the jury may infer, given no help from the court, is one thing. What it may infer when the court solemnizes the silence of the accused into evidence against him is quite another. Although there was no evidence that the District Court manifestly intended to comment on the defendant's failure to testify, the Supreme Court was unable to find, beyond reasonable doubt, that the remarks were harmless error. Despite curative instructions intended to cure the error, judgment of the District Court was reversed and remanded. St. v. Wilkins, 229 M 78, 746 P2d 588, 44 St. Rep. 1794 (1987).

Attorney's Voluntary Disclosure of Confidential Statements — No Waiver of Attorney-Client Privilege: Defendant's court-appointed attorney called himself to the stand to testify about defendant's inconsistent statements. Based on the District Court's acceptance of the testimony, the Supreme Court found the following factors prejudiced defendant's right to a fair trial: (1) the attorney's testimony of defendant's statements was extremely prejudicial and had limited probative value; (2) the state presented no evidence that defendant intended to waive his right not to divulge this privileged information; and (3) given defendant's unfamiliarity with courtroom procedure, defendant's right against self-incrimination need not be surrendered in order to assert a statutory right. Conviction was reversed. St. v. Statczar, 228 M 446, 743 P2d 606, 44 St. Rep. 1668 (1987).

Prosecutor's Language — No Comment on Defendant's Failure to Testify: The language used by the prosecutor was not manifestly intended or was not of such character that the jury would naturally and necessarily take it as a comment on the defendant's failure to testify on his own behalf at his trial for burglary. A comment stating the defendant has the right to remain silent is not the same as a comment on the accused's failure to exercise that right. St. v. Gonyea, 225 M 56, 730 P2d 424, 44 St. Rep. 39 (1987). See also St. v. Mix, 239 M 351, 781 P2d 751, 46 St. Rep. 1740 (1989).

Motion to Suppress Statements and Related Evidence — Waiver and Voluntariness — Applicability to Custodial Interrogation: The District Court granted a motion to suppress all statements made by defendant and any evidence obtained as a result of the statements, citing Smith v. Ill., 469 US 91, 83 L Ed 2d 488, 105 S Ct 490 (1984), as decisive of the suppression issue and supportive of the conclusion that defendant's request for counsel at his first interview barred further police interrogation. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the Smith rule applied only to instances of custodial interrogation, while in this case defendant was not in custody or under formal arrest at the time he requested counsel. Further, the District Court never addressed the question of whether defendant's confession was voluntarily made; therefore, the case was remanded for hearing on the issues of waiver and voluntariness. St. v. Rorvik, 224 M 104, 728 P2d 419, 43 St. Rep. 2051 (1986).

"Miranda" Warning Unnecessary for Traffic Violation: It was not necessary for a police officer to give the Miranda warning to a person stopped for a speeding violation because a traffic stop does not constitute the "custodial interrogation" element that must be present before the warning need be given. Billings v. Skurdal, 224 M 84, 730 P2d 371, 43 St. Rep. 2036 (1986), citing Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 US 420, 82 L Ed 2d 317, 104 S Ct 3138 (1984), and followed in St. v. Allen, 1998 MT 293, 292 M 1, 970 P2d 81, 55 St. Rep. 1202 (1998). See also St. v. Elison, 2000 MT 288, 302 M 228, 14 P3d 456, 57 St. Rep. 1206 (2000), St. v. Wrzesinski, 2006 MT 263, 334 M 157, 145 P3d 985 (2006), and St. v. Hurlbert, 2009 MT 221, 351 M 316, 211 P3d 869 (2009).

Confession of Juvenile — Voluntariness and Mental Deficiency: A 14-year-old boy with an I.Q. of 86 confessed to the sexual assault of a 6-year-old child. The Supreme Court noted that mental deficiency does not preclude admissibility of a confession if the defendant was capable of understanding the meaning and consequences of his statements, quoting St. v. Phelps, 215 M 217, 696 P2d 447, 42 St. Rep. 305 (1985). Looking to the totality of the circumstances, including the defendant's background, experience, and conduct, the court found substantial credible evidence to support the voluntariness of the confession. In re J.W.K., 223 M 1, 724 P2d 164, 43 St. Rep. 1483 (1986).

When Right to Counsel Invoked — Subsequent Incriminating Testimony Inadmissible — Error Held Harmless: Recognizing that it was affording greater protection under the state constitutional right to counsel provision than the U.S. Supreme Court had granted under the identically worded federal constitutional provision, and that this was a departure it had previously declined to make in the area of criminal law, the Montana Supreme Court held that when detained defendant stated he would like to talk to "someone", he invoked his right to counsel. His willing participation in a subsequent recorded conversation, without advice of counsel, did not constitute a waiver of the right to counsel, and admission of the recording into evidence, being testimonial and self-incriminating in nature, was error. However, the error was harmless because defendant during trial testified to a different story than he told on the recording, and the recording was admissible for impeachment purposes. St. v. Johnson, 221 M 503, 719 P2d 1248, 43 St. Rep. 1010 (1986), overruled, to the extent that the right to counsel for self-incrimination purposes may be invoked in custodial interrogation, in St. v. Buck, 2006 MT 81, 331 M 517, 134 P3d 53 (2006).

Voluntariness of Waiver of Miranda Rights — Totality of Circumstances Test: Defendant Gleed argued on appeal that he did not knowingly and voluntarily waive his Miranda rights before making statements during questioning and therefore his statements should not have been allowed into evidence at trial. In applying the totality of circumstances test of St. v. Grimestad, 183 M 29, 598 P2d 198 (1979), and considering the factors outlined in St. v. Blakney, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045 (1982), the Supreme Court held that Gleed's intelligence, age, and education, as well as his statements and conduct, provided sufficient evidence to support the trial court's determination that he knowingly and voluntarily waived his privilege against self-incrimination. The trial court properly denied Gleed's motion to suppress his statements. St. v. Gleed, 220 M 56, 713 P2d 543, 43 St. Rep. 169 (1986).

Incarceration Unlawful — Subsequent Confession Voluntary: The defendant, while incarcerated illegally in Louisiana on a misdemeanor charge, confessed to a murder committed in Montana several years earlier. At his subsequent trial in Montana on a charge of deliberate homicide, the defendant moved to suppress evidence of his confession on several grounds, including that the State failed to establish the confession was voluntary. When, as in this case, a defendant shows his incarceration was initially illegal, the burden shifts to the State to show that his right against self-incrimination was not violated. The determination of voluntariness depends on the totality of the circumstances, with the burden of proof on the State to prove voluntariness by a preponderance of the evidence. In this case the defendant was issued numerous timely and complete Miranda advisements prior to making the incriminating statement. Also, he confessed in the presence of his attorney after opportunity to confer with him. The totality of the facts indicate the trial court did not err in finding the confession voluntary. St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985), followed in St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592, 53 St. Rep. 226 (1996). Loh was followed in St. v. Hayworth, 1998 MT 158, 289 M 433, 964 P2d 1, 55 St. Rep. 631 (1998).

No Right to Counsel Before Deciding Whether to Submit to Chemical Testing — Blood Alcohol Test Not "Critical Stage" Event, Self-Incriminating Communication, or Denial of Due Process: Defendant was arrested on a charge of driving while under the influence of alcohol. He agreed to a chemical test after being told that he had a right to refuse the test and that he did not have a right to consult an attorney before deciding whether to submit to testing. The District Court granted the defendant's motion to suppress the results of the test on the basis of the 6th and 14th amendments to the U.S. Constitution. The Supreme Court reversed and found that neither the U.S. Constitution nor the Montana Constitution guarantees a defendant the opportunity to seek an attorney's advice before deciding whether to submit to a blood alcohol test, when consent is considered given as a matter of law. A Breathalyzer test is not susceptible to the suggestive manipulation characteristic of the "critical stage" event, the results of the test are not self-incriminating communications, and the statutory procedures for the test meet due process requirements. St. v. Armfield, 214 M 229, 693 P2d 1226, 41 St. Rep. 2430 (1984), followed in St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), and St. v. Michaud, 2008 MT 88, 342 M 244, 180 P3d 636 (2008).

No Impeachment by Fact That Defendant's Exculpatory Story Told for First Time at Trial: The State may not seek to impeach a defendant's exculpatory story, told for the first time at trial, by cross-examining the defendant about his failure to have told the story after receiving Miranda warnings at the time of his arrest. St. v. Furlong, 213 M 251, 690 P2d 986, 41 St. Rep. 2096 (1984).

Tactical Decision on Testifying — No Fifth Amendment Violation: After a hearing on the state's petition for temporary custody of C.L.R., the District Court amended the petition pursuant to 41-3-401 (renumbered 41-3-422) to terminate the father's parental rights. At the time of the hearing, the father was appealing his conviction for deliberate homicide of C.L.R.'s half-brother. The father requested a stay in the termination proceedings pending his criminal appeal, which request the District Court denied. The father contended that in order to testify at the termination hearing, he had to jeopardize his fifth amendment right to remain silent (similar to Art. II, sec. 25, Mont. Const.). The fifth amendment protection against persons testifying against themselves covers not only criminal proceedings but other proceedings where compelled testimony could lead to future prosecution. The test is whether the person is compelled to testify or merely required to make tactical decisions regarding the defense of his position. The Supreme Court held that the father's decision to testify was not compelled. His decision to testify hinged on a tactical decision and not on penalty of certain loss of his parental rights if he failed to testify. In re C.L.R., 211 M 381, 685 P2d 926, 41 St. Rep. 1436 (1984), followed in St. v. Donnelly, 244 M 371, 798 P2d 89, 47 St. Rep. 1600 (1990), and distinguished in In re A.N. & C.N., 2000 MT 35, 298 M 237, 995 P2d 427, 57 St. Rep. 155 (2000). See also St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979, 48 St. Rep. 588 (1991), which overruled Donnelly with regard to augmentation of sentence for failure to admit guilt.

Defendant's Brief — Copy Given Prosecutor by Court Before Trial: It was not error for the District Court to give a copy of the defendant's trial brief to the prosecution prior to the trial. Assuming the brief's contents raised the prospect of self-incrimination, the defendant was under no compulsion to produce the information or argument summarized in the brief, and the self-incrimination guarantee pertains only to compelled self-incrimination. In addition, the defendant waived any privileges with respect to the brief's contents because the brief's subject matter was to be freely offered and elaborated on at trial. There was no substantial prejudice from giving the brief to the prosecution. St. v. Anderson, 211 M 272, 686 P2d 193, 41 St. Rep. 1357 (1984).

Later Voluntary Amplification of Confession — No Second Miranda Warning — Not Error: Approximately a month after his arrest for homicide, followed by a Miranda warning and confession, the defendant asked to see the Sheriff. When the Sheriff arrived at the cell, no Miranda warning was given, but the defendant began clarifying his confession and reenacting transactions that occurred the day of the homicide. The Supreme Court held it was not error for the District Court to admit the Sheriff's testimony regarding the incident because the defendant had been given a Miranda warning at the time of his first confession and he had asked to talk to the Sheriff and voluntarily offered information in an atmosphere free from coercion. The court also held that because there was no direct infringement of the defendant's fourth or fifth amendment rights under the federal constitution, the Sheriff's testimony could not be excluded as the fruit of a suppressed statement. In a further holding, the court provided that the Sheriff's statements were not inadmissible under Rule 701, Montana Rules of Evidence, on the grounds that the Sheriff's testimony was nonexpert opinion testimony and that even if error had occurred, there was no reversible error because no prejudice was demonstrated. St. v. Kutnyak, 211 M 155, 685 P2d 901, 41 St. Rep. 1277 (1984).

Self-Defense — Judge's Refusal to Give Instruction Without Testimony of Defendant — Not Contrary to Right Against Self-Incrimination: Defendant raised the affirmative defense of self-defense in his trial for homicide. There were no witnesses to the killing other than the defendant. The defendant argued that he could introduce evidence tending to show the decedent was the aggressor by showing his reputation and specific acts of turbulence or violence. It was not error for the District Court to require the defendant to testify as to his own fear or apprehension, based upon the deceased's reputation, to lay a foundation for other witnesses to testify as to the deceased's violence or risk being denied an instruction on self-defense. Neither at that point nor during the trial did defense counsel object to the ruling or assert his client could not be compelled to testify against himself, and it was never asserted, even at appellate argument, that defendant would not have testified except for that ruling. St. v. Kutnyak, 211 M 155, 685 P2d 901, 41 St. Rep. 1277 (1984).

Prosecutorial Comment on Failure to Testify After Defense Said Defendant Would: Defendant was convicted of attempt to commit burglary. The state's case was based on circumstantial evidence and was not ironclad. An eyewitness saw a flashlight being used and shadows in the night and reported to the police. When the police arrived, defendant was apprehended in the eyewitness' yard across the alley from the scene of the crime. Defendant did not testify, and neither did either of his codefendants, though in his opening statement the defense attorney stated that defendant would testify. In his closing argument and again in his rebuttal closing argument, the prosecutor emphasized the fact that defendant did not testify even though his attorney had said he would and that the reason for his failure to testify was not known. In effect, the prosecutor solemnized the silence of defendant into evidence against him and error occurred. Against the background of the evidence, the prosecutor's comments loomed larger and pointed to defendant's guilt. The conviction was reversed because the court could not say beyond a reasonable doubt that the comments did not contribute to the verdict and because the error may have played a substantial part in the jury's deliberation and contributed to the verdict. St. v. Gladue, 208 M 174, 677 P2d 1028, 41 St. Rep. 249 (1984). See also St. v. Mix, 239 M 351, 781 P2d 751, 46 St. Rep. 1740 (1989).

Plea Based on Promised Lenience — Inadmissible: Plaintiff pleaded guilty to sexual intercourse without consent. He later withdrew the plea, which was based on plea bargaining, and went to trial. At the trial, plaintiff's confession upon entering the plea was used to impeach him. The Montana Supreme Court upheld plaintiff's conviction in St. v. Hansen, 194 M 197, 633 P2d 1202, 38 St. Rep. 1541 (1981). Plaintiff brought this action, contending that the admission of his confession violated his rights under the fifth amendment to the United States Constitution (similar to Art. II, sec. 25, Mont. Const.). The court held that where a plea is brought about by thoughts of promised lenience, it cannot be admitted into evidence when it has been withdrawn. The court ordered a new trial. Hansen v. Risley, 40 St. Rep. 2100 (D.C. Mont. 1983) (apparently not reported in Federal Supplement).

Miranda Warnings Unnecessary — Lack of Custody: During an investigation for the theft of property from Valley Industrial Park (V.I.P.), the defendant, a former employee of V.I.P., invited Adams, a special investigator, into his residence and discussed the whereabouts of the missing property. The defendant requested an attorney if their conversation was taped. The tape recorder was not used. Adams neither sought a confession nor suggested defendant would be under arrest. Defendant was never in custody, and the court properly admitted Adams' testimony. Miranda warnings were unnecessary. St. v. Holmes, 207 M 176, 674 P2d 1071, 40 St. Rep. 1973 (1983).

Refusal to Submit to Blood Alcohol Test Not Self-Incrimination: Use of evidence of a defendant's refusal to submit to a blood alcohol test in a DUI prosecution does not violate the defendant's fifth amendment right against self-incrimination. The language used in Art. II, sec. 25, Mont. Const., is substantially identical to and affords no basis for interpreting it more broadly than its federal counterpart. Montana's constitutional prohibition against self-incrimination is not offended by the admission of defendant's refusal to submit to a Breathalyzer sobriety test. St. v. Jackson, 206 M 338, 672 P2d 255, 40 St. Rep. 1698 (1983).

Forfeiture Proceedings — No Requirement That Defendant Incriminate Himself: In a proceeding under Title 44, ch. 12, defendant, in his answer to the State's notice of intent to institute forfeiture proceedings, admitted ownership of the vehicle but refused to respond to the allegations that it had been used in criminal activity. Hearing on the forfeiture was held after defendant had been sentenced and forfeiture was ordered. On appeal, defendant asserted that the requirement of Title 44, ch. 12, part 2, that the owner or claimant of seized property file an answer within 20 days of the State's notice was a violation of his right to due process. Defendant reasoned that the statute requires an unconstitutional choice to be made in the forfeiture proceeding, i.e., a defendant must choose either to give evidence that may be used against him in a criminal proceeding or to forfeit his property. The Supreme Court found that Title 44, ch. 12, part 2, does not require that a defendant incriminate himself in the answer and further found that this defendant had not done so. Therefore, the court ruled that the statutes are not facially unconstitutional. Neither was the statutes' application to defendant unconstitutional, since his forfeiture hearing was not held until after his sentencing. St. v. Baker, 205 M 244, 667 P2d 416, 40 St. Rep. 1244 (1983).

Inhospital Interview Not Custodial Interrogation: Defendant and Cunningham were in a car traveling east in the westbound lane of traffic when it collided with another car, killing the driver. Defendant was at the hospital when a patrolman arrived. The patrolman asked the defendant his name, date of birth, and if he had been driving the car at the time of the accident. Defendant stated he was driving and the accident was his fault. Defendant was not placed under arrest or given a Miranda warning. His blood-alcohol content was .225%. Defendant was convicted of negligent homicide. Defendant contended he was "in custody" when questioned at the hospital and should have been given a Miranda warning. The Supreme Court, relying on Oregon v. Mathiason, 429 US 492 (1977), applied the rule that Miranda warnings are required only when there has been such a restriction on a person's freedom as to render him "in custody". Relying on State ex rel. Berger v. District Court, 150 M 128, 432 P2d 93 (1967), the court held that an inhospital nonaccusatory interview, where the defendant was not placed under arrest during or immediately following the interview, was not custodial interrogation. The motion to suppress the questioning was properly denied. St. v. Lapp, 202 M 327, 658 P2d 400, 40 St. Rep. 120 (1983).

Improper Instruction on Effect of Possession of Stolen Property: Instruction taken from 45-6-304 (now repealed) that "you are instructed that possession of stolen property shall not constitute proof of the commission of the offense of theft. Such fact shall place a burden on the possessor to remove the effect of such fact as a circumstance to be considered with all the other evidence pointing to his guilt" was reversible error as it took away defendant's presumption of innocence and forced him to testify, by placing a burden on him to either disprove unlawful possession or prove lawful possession. That section was declared unconstitutional in St. v. Kramp, 200 M 383, 651 P2d 614, 39 St. Rep. 1819 (1982). St. v. Morigeau, 202 M 36, 656 P2d 185, 39 St. Rep. 2311 (1982).

Impeachment by Reference to Remaining Silent: Defendant charged with burglary told his second attorney on the date set for trial that he had an alibi and intended to rely on it. In his direct testimony, defendant testified concerning his alibi and that he said nothing to the police during and after his arrest and never confessed to the crime. The state, on cross-examination, repeatedly asked why he had not raised his alibi defense earlier. Defendant's direct testimony opened the door to the impeachment inquiry, and the prosecutor's questions were proper and did not violate his right against self-incrimination. Defendant could not cloak himself on direct examination with seeming innocence because of his silence following arrest and at the same time be immune from impeachment when, to attack his credibility, the same kind of silence could be shown to speak to his guilt. St. v. White, 200 M 123, 650 P2d 765, 39 St. Rep. 1619 (1982), distinguished in St. v. Furlong, 213 M 251, 690 P2d 986, 41 St. Rep. 2096 (1984).

Defendant Not Required to Incriminate Himself to Preserve Fourth Amendment Rights: Although it has been held that the owner of a car or a container will lose his standing to object to the search of it if he abandons it prior to the time of search, a mere disclaimer of ownership in an effort to avoid making an incriminating statement in response to police questioning should not alone be considered to constitute abandonment. St. v. Isom, 196 M 330, 641 P2d 417, 39 St. Rep. 137 (1982).

Youth Court — Holding Youth Without Arraignment Until Transfer to District Court: Defendant, age 17, was arrested and charged with homicide. Defendant refused to be interviewed by a Youth Court probation officer or a psychologist. The State moved to transfer prosecution to the District Court. Because of lack of an interview, the probation officer could not recommend for or against transfer and so advised the court. The motion was granted and defendant was ordered to be tried as an adult. Defendant contends that the cause of the transfer was his refusal to be interviewed and that the court placed on him the burden to justify continuation in Youth Court. Placing the burden on him, defendant claims, would force him to waive his right against self-incrimination. That is not the case here; the record indicates that the Youth Court considered each factor in 41-5-206. Once the Youth Court was refused the interviews, the only source of information it could rely on was that coming other than from the defendant. In doing so, the Youth Court considered each of the factors set out in 41-5-206. St. v. Rodriguez, 192 M 411, 628 P2d 280, 38 St. Rep. 578F (1981).

Waiver of Right to Counsel by Defendant Claiming Mental Defect — When Confession Suppressed: Defendant, convicted of aggravated assault, appealed based on issues related to his confession. The Supreme Court on review said the real issue is whether the defendant knowingly and voluntarily waived the right to counsel. The question of waiver was inextricably interwoven with the question of the voluntariness of the accused's confession. That was especially true because the defendant alleged incapacity because of mental illness. Whether a confession should have been suppressed depends on its voluntariness, and that depends on the "totality of the circumstances". The Supreme Court found that the evidence showed that Miranda warnings were given before confession, that the defendant was capable of understanding the warnings, that the defendant waived his rights to counsel and against self-incrimination knowingly and voluntarily, and that the defendant was not improperly induced into confession. St. v. Mercer, 191 M 418, 625 P2d 44, 38 St. Rep. 312 (1981).

Seizure of Pubic Hair Not Self-Incrimination: The State obtained a search warrant authorizing the seizure of pubic hairs from Armstrong. Armstrong contends that the seizure violated his right against self-incrimination. The fifth amendment, however, protects an accused only from being compelled to provide evidence of a testimonial or communicative nature. The seizure of pubic hairs is not protected by the right against self-incrimination. St. v. Armstrong, 189 M 407, 616 P2d 341, 37 St. Rep. 1563 (1980).

"Good Cop/Bad Cop" Questioning Technique — Examination of Totality of Circumstances: In determining whether the impermissible "good cop/bad cop" questioning technique was used by police, the totality of the circumstances must be examined. The intent of the officers, whether or not they planned to use the technique, is irrelevant to that inquiry. Where the defendant confessed to a seemingly "nice" police officer after he had been questioned by officers who seemed to him to be angry was not, in this instance, triggered by the use of the technique but rather hinged on the defendant's listening to a codefendant's recorded confession at the end of the questioning session. The trial court's determination that the confession was freely given is supported by the comparatively short questioning period, the number of Miranda warnings given and defendant's understanding of them, and the defendant's age and education. St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980).

Voluntariness of Confession — Totality of Circumstances: Involuntariness in a confession, rendering it unusable against a defendant, may be caused either by physical or mental coercion. To be used against him, the confession must be a product of an essentially free and unconstrained choice by its maker. In determining whether a confession was voluntary once the defendant contends that it is a product of coercion, the burden is placed upon the State to show that the defendant knowingly and intelligently waived his privilege against self-incrimination and right to counsel by a preponderance of the evidence. This issue is addressed to the trial court's discretion and depends upon the totality of the circumstances; if there is substantial evidence to support the trial court's finding, it must be affirmed. St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980).

Neutron Activation Test for Gunpowder Residues: The defendant was arrested at the police station without a warrant, and the police administered a neutron activation test to determine if there were gunpowder residues on the defendant's hands. The defendant sought to suppress the results of the test on the grounds that his fifth amendment right against self-incrimination was violated. The Supreme Court held that the administration of a neutron activation test upon defendant did not violate his rights under the fifth amendment because the fifth amendment only protects against compelling "evidence of a testimonial or communicative nature". The gunpowder residues taken from the defendant's hands do not meet this criterion. St. v. Ulrich, 187 M 347, 609 P2d 1218 (1980).

Fruits of Involuntary Confession: The defendant's confession was obtained involuntarily. Under the "fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine", evidence obtained as a result of an involuntary confession must be suppressed unless: (1) the evidence is sufficiently purged from the constitutional violation so as to remove its primary taint; (2) the evidence is obtained from a source independent of the defendant's confession; or (3) it is inevitable that the evidence would have been discovered apart from the defendant's confession. The Supreme Court found that none of the exceptions applied and that the evidence should have been suppressed. St. v. Allies, 186 M 99, 606 P2d 1043 (1979).

Voluntariness of Confession: The police read the defendant his Miranda rights before they originally interrogated him and again just before he confessed to the homicide. Between the original interrogation and the confession, the police kept the defendant incommunicado in a small room in a hostile police environment. They used the nice cop/mean cop method of interrogation and lied to the defendant while using the guilt assumption technique of interrogation. The defendant eventually confessed to the homicide after a truth serum was administered and he was told that his story was inconsistent and contradictory to his "serum" story. The Supreme Court, after considering the totality of the circumstances, found the confession to be inadmissible on the basis that it was not made voluntarily. St. v. Allies, 186 M 99, 606 P2d 1043 (1979), followed in St. v. Hermes, 273 M 446, 904 P2d 587, 52 St. Rep. 1055 (1995), and St. v. Johnson, 274 M 124, 907 P2d 150, 52 St. Rep. 1186 (1995). Allies was distinguished in St. v. Scarborough, 2000 MT 301, 302 M 350, 14 P3d 1202, 57 St. Rep. 1268 (2000). Hermes was followed, as to totality of circumstances, in St. v. Hayworth, 1998 MT 158, 289 M 433, 964 P2d 1, 55 St. Rep. 631 (1998), and St. v. Hill, 2000 MT 308, 302 M 415, 14 P3d 1237, 57 St. Rep. 1301 (2000).

Voluntariness of Confession — Burdens of Proof — Harmless Error: A trial judge can properly require party moving for suppression of evidence (involuntary confession) to initiate suppression hearing proceedings. The rationale for such a procedure is the requirement that the movant establish a prima facie case that a constitutional infringement has occurred. Once this has been accomplished, the ultimate burden of proving the propriety of the state's action (obtaining a confession) shifts to the State, notwithstanding 46-13-301(4), which is unconstitutional. Thus, the District Court did not err in requiring appellant to present his evidence first at the suppression hearing but did err in putting the ultimate burden on the defendant at the hearing. The Supreme Court, however, upheld the District Court's denial of the motion to suppress because its error was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Blakney, 185 M 470, 605 P2d 1093 (1979), certiorari granted, 101 S Ct 2999 (1981), and judgment vacated and case remanded for further consideration in light of Edwards v. Ariz., 101 S Ct 1880 (1981), affirmed on remand, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982).

Voluntariness of Confession — Effective Request for Counsel and Subsequent Waiver: To determine whether a confession should have been suppressed, it had to be determined whether the confession was voluntary and whether there was an unconstitutional denial of the right to counsel. In so doing, the following questions had to be answered: What was the totality of the circumstances? Was there effective assertion of the right to counsel? And if so, was there a subsequent waiver? Since the evidence answered a large number of the requisite questions about the circumstances, the decision of the trial court was held not to have clearly contravened the weight of the evidence, and its holding of voluntariness was upheld. Since any indication by a defendant in any manner that he wishes to consult with an attorney suffices and evidence showed the defendant had met this requirement, the trial court erred in concluding that there was ineffective assertion of the right to counsel. After adopting the rule that a defendant can validly waive the right to counsel after making a request for counsel, the Supreme Court found the trial court properly found that the State had met its "heavy burden" of showing waiver of counsel. St. v. Blakney, 185 M 470, 605 P2d 1093 (1979), certiorari granted, 101 S Ct 2999 (1981), and judgment vacated and case remanded for further consideration in light of Edwards v. Ariz., 101 S Ct 1880 (1981), affirmed on remand, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982).

Request Addressed to Defense Counsel During Trial: Defendant was not denied his constitutional right to remain silent when the prosecutor, in the course of interviewing a witness, asked defense counsel to check his files for a letter about which he was questioning the witness. Defense counsel made no objection at the time of the incident, and the request was made of counsel and not of the defendant. After reviewing the transcript, it appears the exchange did not prejudice the defendant. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Voluntariness of Statement — Recording Statement: A defendant who said it probably was advisable that he have an attorney but who nonetheless went ahead and fully consented to being interrogated and tape-recorded was held to have made a voluntary statement, having been advised of his rights. A statement made voluntarily after the speaker has been made fully aware of and understands his rights is not objectionable because the statement is made without the advice or assistance of counsel. Electronically recorded or preserved evidence is subject to the same admissibility tests as direct evidence of eyewitnesses or earwitnesses. With proper advice to a prospective defendant who then voluntarily consents to the tape-recording of his statements, the constitutional defenses of self-incrimination, unlawful search, invasion of privacy, and right to counsel disappear. Then the tape-recorded statement may be regarded as independent direct evidence or as corroborative evidence. In either case, the tests for admissibility are the same. Since the interviewing detective would have testified directly to the recorded statements, the recorded statements are themselves admissible. St. v. Brubaker, 184 M 294, 602 P2d 974 (1979).

Admission of Confession — Harmless or Prejudicial Error: When error is federal constitutional error, as with the improper admission of a confession, the error cannot be considered harmless unless the court finds it harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. Admission of a confession taken without adequate Miranda warnings constituted prejudicial error, resulting in overturn of convictions on two charges. Nonetheless, because admission of that portion of the same confession that related to another charge (criminal trespass) against the defendant was held harmless error, conviction on that other charge was sustained. St. v. Dess, 184 M 116, 602 P2d 142 (1979).

Statements Made to Civilians Prior to Police Custody: On two occasions while the defendant and his stepchild were alone, the stepchild received serious injuries. On both occasions the defendant gave explanations of how the injuries occurred to his wife and to several doctors. The defendant was charged with aggravated assault and filed a motion to suppress his statements concerning the cause of the child's injuries. The court properly denied the motion. The statements were voluntarily given. The Miranda warnings do not apply to statements given by a person before he is a criminal suspect in police custody. The statements made here were not made to law enforcement agents or their alter egos. St. v. Hall, 183 M 511, 600 P2d 1180 (1979).

Voluntariness of Signed Statement: Flathead County Sheriff's deputy downplayed the defendant's Miranda rights by telling him that reading him his rights was merely procedural and that he was not being accused of anything. During the questioning, the deputies suggested answers to their questions and impliedly threatened to send him to Warm Springs State Hospital if he did not cooperate. In the signed statement of the defendant they specifically requested that he add a sentence. All of these facts are sufficient to affirm the District Court's findings that the statements made by the defendant were not voluntary and should be suppressed. St. v. Grimestad, 183 M 29, 598 P2d 198 (1979).

Probation Revocation — Lesser Standard Applies — United States Constitution: The necessity of waiving the United States Constitution's privilege against self-incrimination (similar to Art. II, sec. 25, Mont. Const.) in order to testify to matters going to guilt or innocence does not constitute an impermissible imposition on the policy allowing a criminal defendant to be heard in his own defense. The policies behind the United States Constitution's due process right to be heard (similar to Art. II, sec. 17, Mont. Const.) are not significantly impaired by a similar disability at a probation revocation and sentencing hearing, where less procedural protection is generally warranted. Ryan v. St., 580 F2d 988 (9th Cir. 1978).

Incriminating Statements at Prison Disciplinary Hearing: When defendant uttered incriminating statements at a disciplinary hearing involving allegations of possession of a weapon by a prisoner, without benefit of Miranda cautionary statements, subsequent admission of the statements into evidence at defendant's trial was a violation of the privilege against self-incrimination. St. v. Harris, 176 M 70, 576 P2d 257 (1978).

Conversations With Defendant After Charge: Conversations with a defendant following his being charged with gambling offenses that were used to prove bribery charges were admissible because they were used to prove a distinct and separate offense from that for which the defendant was originally charged. St. v. Hensley, 171 M 38, 554 P2d 745 (1976).

Comments on Defense Case by Prosecution: When there was no comment on defendant's failure to testify, a rhetorical question by a prosecutor that there was "no evidence" or "no testimony" to rebut the State's evidence was not violative of the right to remain silent. St. v. Armstrong, 170 M 256, 552 P2d 616 (1976).

Admissibility of Statements Made While Under Self-Induced Intoxication: When subsequent events confirmed reliability of defendant's statements made while under self-induced intoxication, trial court did not err in admitting statements in evidence because in cases of self-induced intoxication the criterion for admission is trustworthiness, which is testable by the content of the statements by evidence of subsequent events that confirm the reliability of the statements, especially since defendant freely made the statements and police did not question defendant due to his intoxicated condition. St. v. Emerson, 169 M 285, 546 P2d 509 (1976).

Probation Revocation Hearing: Hearing on revocation of probation that was held prior to trial for criminal charge on same facts alleged as grounds for revocation was not a violation of defendant's protection against self-incrimination. St. v. Ryan, 166 M 419, 533 P2d 1076 (1975).

Testimony That Defendant Claimed Privilege — Harmless Error: The testimony of police officer that the defendant when accused and warned of his rights claimed his fifth amendment privilege, although irrelevant and improper, was harmless error where the State presented overwhelming evidence of guilt and the defendant himself testified at trial. St. v. Flamm, 165 M 128, 526 P2d 119 (1974).

Voluntariness of Confession — Absence of Coercion: In the absence of evidence of physical or psychological coercion, the defendant's handwritten confession, made about 2 hours after the crime was reported and after the defendant had been informed of his rights, was voluntarily given and admissible at trial. St. v. Smith, 164 M 334, 523 P2d 1395 (1974).

DOUBLE JEOPARDY

DUI Charges Filed Subsequent to Guilty Plea of Careless Driving — Not Same Transaction — No Violation of Double Jeopardy: The defendant pleaded guilty to careless driving after causing an accident. Later, a toxicology report indicated the presence of four medications in her blood at the time of the accident and she was charged with DUI. The defendant filed a motion to dismiss the DUI charge, arguing that it represented multiple prosecutions for the same offense and violated double jeopardy protections. The Municipal Court denied the motion and she was convicted. After the District Court affirmed the ruling, the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court also affirmed, holding that the city did not have probable cause to charge the defendant with a DUI until it received her toxicology report, which was after she had pleaded guilty to careless driving. Helena v. O'Connell, 2019 MT 69, 395 Mont. 179, 438 P.3d 318.

Denial of Directed Verdict on First Trial Proper — Sufficient Evidence to Convict — No Double Jeopardy on New Trial: The District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion for directed verdict during his first jury trial. There was sufficient evidence for the District Court to submit the case to the jury to determine if the elements of criminal possession of dangerous drugs with the intent to distribute were met. The state presented more than sufficient evidence from which a rational trier of fact could have found beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant knew about the methamphetamine under his passenger seat, was in possession of the methamphetamine, and had intended to distribute the methamphetamine. Additionally, since the Supreme Court agreed with the state's argument that the District Court did not err by denying the defendant's motion for directed verdict in the first trial, the Supreme Court declined to address the substance of the defendant's double jeopardy argument. St. v. Ellerbee, 2019 MT 37, 394 Mont. 289, 434 P.3d 910.

Multiple Offenses Involving State and Federal Charges — Double Jeopardy Appeal: The defendant was charged with multiple crimes spanning several years. The District Court denied his motion to dismiss the state charges under 46-11-504 but granted his motion to sever multiple charges related to one incident. The defendant was eventually convicted in state court of the severed charges. The defendant subsequently pleaded guilty to federal crimes. Relating to the remaining state court charges, the District Court denied the defendant's motions to dismiss the charges on statutory multiple prosecution grounds. The defendant appealed before a judgment was entered. The Supreme Court held that the defendant's appeal was proper because it raised a constitutional double jeopardy issue. However, the court held that constitutional double jeopardy rulings by a District Court can be brought to the Supreme Court prior to a final judgment by way of a petition for a writ of supervisory control. The Supreme Court then found that several of the state-charged offenses were not the same transactions involving the defendant's federal conviction. St. v. Burton, 2017 MT 306, 389 Mont. 499, 407 P.3d 280.

Surprise Testimony at Trial — Remedial Action Available — Retrial Barred by Double Jeopardy — Dismissed With Prejudice: A witness for the prosecution surprised both parties in an assault case by stating that an officer serving her a subpoena to appear at trial the next day had attempted to influence her testimony. The Municipal Court abused its discretion in declaring a mistrial sua sponte because the unexpected testimony did not demonstrate manifest necessity sufficient to justify a new trial when remedial action, such as rehabilitation of the witness by subsequent questioning, was available. Furthermore, because the defendant did not waive his right to object to the trial's termination, retrying the defendant would violate his right to be free from double jeopardy, and the case was dismissed with prejudice. Billings ex rel. Huertas v. Billings Municipal Court, 2017 MT 261, 389 Mont. 158, 404 P.3d 709.

Guilty Plea Vacated Prior to Sentencing — No Double Jeopardy: The defendant was charged with and pleaded guilty to felony partner or family member assault. Prior to sentencing and over the defendant's objection, the state successfully moved to vacate the plea agreement and amend the information to include a different charge. The defendant unsuccessfully moved that the court reconsider its decision, claiming that it placed him in double jeopardy, which the court denied. The defendant then pleaded guilty to the amended charge. However, after making his plea, the defendant filed a motion to withdraw it, claiming ineffective assistance of counsel. The District Court also denied this motion, and the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court, claiming that he was twice put in jeopardy for the same offense. The court affirmed, concluding that the first plea agreement did not result in the defendant being put in jeopardy because a sentence was not imposed and that the defendant had no interest in the finality of a guilty plea for a crime that did not occur. St. v. Stone, 2017 MT 189, 388 Mont. 239, 400 P.3d 692.

Federal and State Charges — Double Jeopardy Issues — Decision to Not Seek Supervisory Writ Based on Case Law in Effect — No Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: The defendant pleaded guilty to charges of sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault, and reserved his right to appeal the denial of his motion to suppress evidence, which was later affirmed by the Supreme Court. The defendant then filed a petition for postconviction relief in which he claimed he received ineffective assistance of counsel based, in part, on his counsel's failing to have evidence suppressed and failing to seek a writ of supervisory control based on federal charges against him and double jeopardy. The District Court denied the petition, ruling that the same issues had been addressed and resolved at his trial and on appeal of his conviction and were therefore barred under the theory of res judicata. The District Court also concluded that the defense counsel's decision to not seek a writ was reasonable given the case law in effect at the time of the trial. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Lacey v. St., 2017 MT 18, 386 Mont. 204, 389 P.3d 233.

Continuation of Unfulfilled Sexual Offender Treatment Program — Youth Court Did Not Err in Transferring Jurisdiction to District Court With Program as Condition — No Double Jeopardy: The Youth Court did not err in granting the state's motion to transfer the appellant's Youth Court proceeding to the District Court pursuant to 41-5-208 after he failed to complete his sexual offender treatment program (SOTP). The appellant contended that the Youth Court improperly considered evidence that should have been suppressed, but irrespective of how or why the appellant was removed from SOTP, he undisputedly did not complete that portion of his disposition while under the Youth Court's jurisdiction. The appellant was given the opportunity to comply with the SOTP under the jurisdiction of the District Court, and the Youth Court did not err in granting the state's motion to transfer to ensure continued compliance with the court's disposition. Additionally, the state's effort to ensure that the appellant completed the unfulfilled portion of the disposition did not constitute additional punishment and thus did not constitute double jeopardy. In re J.W., 2016 MT 330, 386 Mont. 1, 387 P.3d 195.

Double Jeopardy Claim Premature — Attachment Upon Conviction: After being charged with aggravated assault and elder abuse, the defendant filed a pretrial motion arguing that the prosecution was required to choose between prosecuting him for either offense rather than prosecuting him for both. The District Court denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the defendant's claim of double jeopardy was premature because he had not yet been tried for or convicted of either offense. St. v. Violette, 2015 MT 67, 378 Mont. 320, 343 P.3d 574.

Double Jeopardy Protection Against Multiple Convictions or Punishments — Charging in the Alternative Specifically Allowed Under Montana Law: The defendant was convicted of criminal endangerment and of assault as a lesser included offense of aggravated assault but was not convicted of the aggravated assault charge. On appeal, the defendant argued the charges were multiplicitous because they addressed one crime with multiple charges, in violation of the federal prohibition against multiplicitous charges under the double jeopardy clause. The Supreme Court held that the defendant's claim was meritless because federal jurisprudence protects a defendant only from conviction on multiplicitous charges and the defendant was never subjected to multiple convictions or punishments. Further, even if the defendant had been convicted on multiplicitous charges, the District Court could have cured the double jeopardy violation by vacating one of the convictions. St. v. Zink, 2014 MT 48, 374 Mont. 102, 319 P.3d 596.

Statutory Prohibition Against Multiple Convictions Not Applicable to Multiple Offenses Charged Against Defendant: The defendant was charged with aggravated assault and criminal endangerment. The District Court instructed the jury on the offenses of criminal endangerment, aggravated assault, and assault as a lesser included offense of aggravated assault. The defendant was convicted of criminal endangerment and the lesser offense of assault. On appeal, the defendant argued that criminal endangerment is a lesser included offense of aggravated assault, and thus he could not be charged with both under 46-11-410. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that even if criminal endangerment is a lesser included offense of aggravated assault, the defendant was not convicted of both charges, so the prohibition under 46-11-410 does not apply. St. v. Zink, 2014 MT 48, 374 Mont. 102, 319 P.3d 596.

Double Jeopardy Not Applicable if Crimes Committed Against Different Victims: Charging both criminal endangerment and aggravated assault did not constitute plain error because different victims were involved. St. v. Torres, 2013 MT 101, 369 Mont. 516, 299 P.3d 804.

Conviction of Incest and Attempted Incest Upheld — Crimes Arising From Separate and Distinct Transactions: After a jury found him guilty of both incest and attempted incest, the defendant moved for a new trial on multiple grounds, including an allegation that he was subjected to double jeopardy. The defendant argued that both offenses occurred on the same day during a hunting trip, but the Supreme Court determined the convictions were based on two separate and distinct transactions. St. v. Geren, 2012 MT 307, 367 Mont. 437, 291 P.3d 1144, citing St. v. Williams, 2010 MT 58, 355 Mont. 354, 228 P.3d 1127.

Conviction Overturned at Postconviction Hearing — Retrial Not Violative of Double Jeopardy: A defendant's right to be free from double jeopardy did not prevent the state from reprosecuting him after his conviction was overturned by the postconviction court for prosecutorial misconduct and ineffective assistance of counsel. St. v. Duncan, 2012 MT 241, 366 Mont. 443, 291 P.3d 106.

Conviction in City Court — Appeal for Trial De Novo in District Court — Dismissal of Case for Insufficient Evidence by District Court — No Appeal for State: The defendant was convicted in city court for obstructing a peace officer, disorderly conduct, and assault with a bodily fluid. She appealed to the District Court for a jury trial de novo. Following the presentation of the prosecutor's case, the District Court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss based on insufficient evidence. The state appealed to the Supreme Court, which concluded that a dismissal based on insufficient evidence is an acquittal and that the state could not appeal the dismissal from District Court because a successful appeal would subject the defendant to retrial in violation of double jeopardy principles. Cut Bank v. Hall, 2012 MT 16, 363 Mont. 380, 270 P.3d 20.

Failure to Object to Prosecution for Conduct Previously Used to Enhance Federal Sentence — No Ineffective Assistance: The defendant argued that the District Court erred in concluding that the defendant's trial counsel provided effective assistance when counsel failed to raise a double jeopardy objection to the state prosecution of the defendant for conduct that was used to enhance his federal sentence. Distinguishing St. v. Neufeld, 2009 MT 235, 351 Mont. 389, 212 P.3d 1063, the Supreme Court concluded that the state and federal charges were distinct and did not arise from the same transaction as defined in 46-1-202, and, in addition, controlling caselaw at the time the District Court considered the motion held that double jeopardy did not bar prosecution of an offense that was used to enhance a sentence in a prior prosecution. Because any objection on double jeopardy grounds to the state charge lacked merit, the District Court did not err in concluding counsel was effective. Heddings v. St., 2011 MT 228, 362 Mont. 90, 265 P.3d 600.

Spatial Proximity Not Sufficient to Establish Same Transaction: After law enforcement discovered a blue bag containing a baggie, spoon, and loaded syringe in the defendant's possession, the defendant was charged with possession of drug paraphernalia and pleaded guilty to the charge the next day. Later, when test results for the substance in the syringe tested positive for methadone, the state charged the defendant with possession of dangerous drugs. The defendant moved to dismiss the charge, which the District Court denied. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding the spatial proximity of the items in the blue bag was insufficient, by itself, to constitute a same transaction under 46-1-202 and 46-11-504. In addition, because the prosecutor did not have knowledge of the substance in the syringe, prosecution was not barred by the former prosecution of the possession of drug paraphernalia charge. St. v. Kopp, 2011 MT 125, 360 Mont. 501, 255 P.3d 160.

Sexual Intercourse Without Consent and Sexual Assault Not Part of Same Transaction — Conviction and Sentence Upheld: Goodenough challenged his conviction for sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault that stemmed from repeated sexual encounters with one of his granddaughters that occurred between 2002 and 2005. Goodenough alleged that his conviction for sexual intercourse without consent precluded his sentence for the lesser included offense of sexual assault because the crimes constituted a single transaction. The Supreme Court disagreed. Even though the conduct underlying the offenses was similar, continued over the course of several years, and was described by prosecutors as a "continuous course of conduct", the facts and evidence established separate offenses from which a jury could find multiple incidents that occurred on different days between 2002 and 2005. St. v. Goodenough, 2010 MT 247, 358 Mont. 219, 245 P.3d 14, distinguishing St. v. Williams, 2010 MT 58, 355 Mont. 354, 228 P.3d 1127.

Sentencing Defendant as Persistent Felony Offender — No Double Jeopardy: Sentence enhancements based on recidivism, and not based on the same prior conviction, do not violate double jeopardy. St. v. Brooks, 2010 MT 226, 358 Mont. 51, 243 P.3d 405.

No Double Jeopardy for Initiation of Revocation Proceeding After a 72-Hour Hold and Release — Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim Denied: Revocation of probation following a 72-hour hold and release for a suspected probation violation did not violate the prohibition on double jeopardy. Revocation of probation does not constitute a punishment for purposes of double jeopardy, and defense counsel did not render ineffective assistance by failing to raise the argument. St. v. Maynard, 2010 MT 115, 356 Mont. 333, 233 P.3d 331.

Revocation of Parole or Probation Not Considered Punishment for Double Jeopardy Purposes: Revocation is a supervisory act involving the enforcement of conditions imposed on a term of parole or probation. Therefore, the same act or acts may form the basis for revoking both an offender's parole and an ensuing suspended sentence without contravening double jeopardy protections. Here, Haagenson was granted conditional release and a suspended sentence subject to certain conditions, including a requirement that he remain law abiding and not consume alcohol. Haagenson subsequently violated these conditions and thus forfeited both the conditional release and the future suspended sentence. St. v. Haagenson, 2010 MT 95, 356 Mont. 177, 232 P.3d 367, distinguishing St. v. Martinez, 2008 MT 233, 344 Mont. 394, 188 P.3d 1034, and St. v. Johnston, 2008 MT 318, 346 Mont. 93, 193 P.3d 925.

Alford Plea to Partner or Family Member Assault Not Precluding Subsequent Prosecution for Assault on Minor: After beating his girlfriend's 2-year-old son, Weatherell was charged with assault on a minor, criminal endangerment, and partner or family member assault. Weatherell entered an Alford plea to the partner or family member assault and endangerment charges and moved to dismiss the remaining charges on double jeopardy grounds, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that under 46-11-410(2)(a) and (2)(d), Weatherell's Alford plea to partner or family member assault did not foreclose a subsequent prosecution for assault on a minor. Denial of the dismissal motion was affirmed. St. v. Weatherell, 2010 MT 37, 355 Mont. 230, 225 P.3d 1256.

Double Jeopardy Not Applicable to Revocation of Parole or Suspended Sentence: LeDeau was released on parole a few months before the unsuspended portion of a sentence for sexual assault was served. Shortly thereafter LeDeau admitted violating the terms of parole, so parole and the suspended sentence were revoked. LeDeau appealed on grounds of double jeopardy, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Parole is a privilege, not a right, and revocation of parole does not constitute punishment for purposes of double jeopardy. When a suspended sentence is imposed, the sentencing court may revoke the suspended sentence upon a showing that any sentencing condition has been violated. A revocation proceeding is not a criminal adjudication, does not require proof of a criminal offense, does not impose punishment for any new offense, and is an act in the performance of the duty of supervision of the offender. Thus, double jeopardy is not applicable to revocation of a suspended sentence. St. v. LeDeau, 2009 MT 276, 352 M 140, 215 P3d 672 (2009).

Defendant's Acquiescence in Termination of Trial — Waiver of Right to Object to Trial Termination — Retrial Not Barred: A mistrial was declared during Cates' trial for sexual intercourse without consent, and the state amended the information, refiled the charges, and sought a second trial. Cates moved to dismiss on double jeopardy grounds, but the motion was denied pursuant to St. v. Carney, 219 M 412, 714 P2d 532 (1986), which holds that a second criminal trial is barred unless there is a manifest necessity to terminate the trial or the defendant acquiesces in the termination. Cates appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. If the totality of the circumstances and the affirmative conduct of the defendant show that the right to object to trial termination has been waived, then a retrial is not barred on double jeopardy grounds. Here, Cates twice expressed willingness to terminate the proceedings by offering two mistrial motions, and Cates never wavered or expressed any misgivings, even when given the opportunity to do so. Thus, Cates waived the right to object to termination of the proceedings, and under 46-11-503(2)(a), retrial under the amended information was not barred and Cates' motion to dismiss was properly denied. St. v. Cates, 2009 MT 94, 350 M 38, 204 P3d 1224 (2009). See also U.S. v. Dinitz, 424 US 600 (1976), Peretz v. U.S., 501 US 923 (1991), and Keating v. Sherlock, 278 M 218, 924 P2d 1297 (1996). However, see Billings ex rel. Huertas v. Billings Municipal Court, 2017 MT 261, 389 Mont. 158, 404 P.3d 709, holding that because the defendant did not request a mistrial, made no affirmative statements waiving his right to object to the termination of the proceedings, and was frustrated in his opportunity to be heard, the defendant did not waive his right to object to termination of the proceedings.

Aggravated Assault as Lesser Included Offense of Felony Homicide — Merger of Offenses — Conviction for Both Offenses Error: Russell was convicted of felony homicide and aggravated assault. Aggravated assault was charged as the predicate offense for charging felony homicide. Russell asserted that because the felony homicide conviction was predicated on the same assault, the conviction for aggravated assault should be dismissed. The District Court declined to dismiss the assault conviction, but on appeal the Supreme Court reversed. A defendant cannot be found guilty of felony homicide without having committed a predicate felony offense. When the offenses are charged in that fashion, the offenses merge and the predicate offense becomes a lesser included offense of felony homicide. Therefore, the District Court erred by not granting Russell's motion to dismiss the lesser included offense of aggravated assault after being convicted of felony murder. St. v. Russell, 2008 MT 417, 347 M 301, 198 P3d 271 (2008), followed in St. v. Williams, 2010 MT 58, 355 Mont. 354, 228 P.3d 1127, regarding vacation of lesser included offense and denial of new trial despite double jeopardy violation.

Bond Forfeiture Not Generally Synonymous With Conviction — No Double Jeopardy for Assault Proceedings: Toth forfeited bond for disorderly conduct that occurred on the same day that he was charged with assault with a weapon. Toth claimed that if the bond forfeiture arose from the same events that led to the assault charge, double jeopardy would bar further conviction for assault. The Supreme Court disagreed. Absent specific legislation to that effect, bond forfeiture is not generally synonymous with a conviction for double jeopardy purposes. Bond forfeiture is essentially a civil action and is not admissible as evidence in any other civil action, but bond forfeiture is included within the definition of conviction for particular statutorily delineated purposes only, not including assault. Thus, even if Toth's felony assault charge bond forfeiture arose out of the same transaction as the disorderly conduct, jeopardy did not attach by the bond forfeiture, so Toth's claim failed. St. v. Toth, 2008 MT 404, 347 M 184, 197 P3d 1013 (2008). See also Scott v. S. Carolina, 513 SE 2d 100 (S.C. 1999).

Revocation of Federal Probation Not Considered Prosecution Under State Law — No Double Jeopardy Violation: In 1991, Maki was convicted in federal court of five offenses. While on supervised probation for the federal offenses in 2006, Maki violated the terms of supervised release by manufacturing and distributing drugs in Montana and his federal probation was revoked. Maki was subsequently charged with felony drug violations in Montana. Maki moved to dismiss the state charges on double jeopardy grounds, asserting that he would face double punishment for the same conduct that formed the basis for the federal revocation if the state prosecution was continued. The District Court reasoned that Maki had not faced new charges in federal court, so double jeopardy did not apply with respect to the federal court's use of the state violation as a basis for revocation. Therefore, the District Court denied the motion, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. Under 46-11-504, when conduct constitutes an offense within the jurisdiction of a state or federal court, a prosecution in any jurisdiction is a bar to subsequent prosecution in Montana if the prosecution resulted in an acquittal or conviction and a subsequent prosecution is based on an offense arising out of the same transaction. However, the federal revocation proceeding was not a prosecution as contemplated in 46-11-504, so the state was not barred from prosecuting Maki for felony drug charges. Additionally, the basis of a revocation proceeding is a violation of a sentencing condition and is not a second punishment for the underlying offense, so Maki's double jeopardy argument failed. St. v. Maki, 2008 MT 379, 347 M 24, 196 P3d 1281 (2008).

Defendant's Double Jeopardy Argument Fails: The City Court's granting of the state's motion to dismiss charges to which the defendant wished to plead guilty had no effect on his pending District Court charges as the defendant had no constitutional right to use a double jeopardy argument to defend against District Court charges. St. v. Milligan, 2008 MT 375, 346 M 491, 197 P3d 956 (2008).

District Court Authority to Revoke Suspended Sentence for Parole Violation for Which Defendant Not Sanctioned or Punished: Martinez was given a 7-year suspended sentence for felony criminal endangerment, subject to 25 conditions, including a requirement that Martinez notify the probation officer upon a change of residence. Following numerous probation violations, three separate intervention hearings were held to address the violations. One of the probation officers subsequently recommended that Martinez be brought before the District Court for revocation of the suspended sentence. The District Court heard testimony from two probation officers regarding the repeated violations and revoked Martinez's suspended sentence. Martinez appealed on grounds that the probation officer lacked the statutory authority to seek sentence revocation for conduct addressed by the revocation hearings and contended that the revocation violated double jeopardy because it amounted to double punishment for violations addressed by the revocation hearings. The Supreme Court agreed that once a probation officer elects to pursue an intervention hearing under 46-23-1012(3), the officer cannot then also pursue a revocation hearing before the District Court for the same violation. However, Martinez's violation of the requirement to notify the probation officer upon a change of residence occurred after the third intervention hearing, and Martinez was not sanctioned or punished for that violation. That violation in itself was sufficient to support revocation of Martinez's suspended sentence, and even if the District Court considered the history of Martinez's violations in reaching its decision, the court did not abuse its discretion or exceed its statutory authority in revoking the sentence based on that violation alone. Additionally, no double jeopardy violation occurred when the sentence was revoked based on a violation for which Martinez was not previously sanctioned or punished. Thus, revocation of Martinez's suspended sentence was affirmed. St. v. Martinez, 2008 MT 233, 344 M 394, 188 P3d 1034 (2008).

Convictions for Possession of Dangerous Drugs Vacated Given Convictions for Possession of Dangerous Drugs With Intent to Distribute Same Drugs — Remand for Resentencing: Wing was convicted of criminal distribution of dangerous drugs, two counts of criminal possession of dangerous drugs, and two counts of criminal possession of dangerous drugs with intent to distribute. On appeal, Wing asserted that because the two counts of possession and two counts of possession of dangerous drugs with intent to distribute involved the same drugs, a conviction under all four counts would unconstitutionally permit multiple punishments for the same offense. The Supreme Court agreed and remanded with instructions to vacate Wing's convictions for criminal possession of dangerous drugs and to resentence Wing in accordance with the remaining convictions. St. v. Wing, 2008 MT 218, 344 M 243, 188 P3d 999 (2008).

Continuation of Trial Not Double Jeopardy Violation: Based on pretrial conversations with both counsel, a Justice's Court Judge anticipated an abbreviated bench trial designed to get Barron's DUI case through Justice's Court as quickly as possible so that Barron could then receive a trial de novo in District Court. However, defense counsel immediately began lodging objections, and the judge realized that the proceedings would not be quickly resolved. After concluding that neither party was ready for a more full-blown proceeding, the judge decided in the interests of justice to continue the trial to another date when the parties could be more fully prepared and more time could be allotted for trial. Defense counsel subsequently objected to the continuance on double jeopardy grounds, and following conviction and appeal to District Court, defense counsel again raised the issue, asserting that the trial following the continuation in Justice's Court constituted double jeopardy and warranted dismissal of the charges. The District Court declined to dismiss the charges, and Barron appealed. The Supreme Court considered whether Barron had been subjected to double jeopardy when the Justice's Court continued the initial bench trial and decided that no double jeopardy violation occurred. The trial following the lawful continuance did not constitute a new trial because the Justice's Court did not issue any findings or reach a verdict following the initial hearing, the state did not use the continuance to encourage the judge to reexamine evidence presented in the initial hearing, and Barron was not subjected to multiple punishments for the same offense. Double jeopardy did not apply because Barron was not subject to a second or successive trial on the underlying charges. St. v. Barron, 2008 MT 69, 342 M 100, 179 P3d 519 (2008).

Interim Appeal, Rather Than Trial De Novo, Appropriate for Consideration of Double Jeopardy Challenge: Barron appealed a Justice's Court decision to the District Court for trial de novo, then moved to dismiss the case on double jeopardy grounds. The motion was denied, and Barron appealed to the Supreme Court. Normally, the Supreme Court will not consider appeals from District Court unless a final judgment of conviction has been rendered. However, as set out in Three Forks v. Schillinger, 2007 MT 331, 340 M 211, 173 P3d 681 (2007), there is no trial de novo if a second trial in District Court would violate the provision against double jeopardy. Thus, notwithstanding the fact that the District Court had not rendered final judgment, the Supreme Court accepted Barron's interim appeal to consider the merits of the double jeopardy claim. St. v. Barron, 2008 MT 69, 342 M 100, 179 P3d 519 (2008).

No Triple Jeopardy in Prosecution of Misdemeanor Absent Prosecutorial Intent to Provoke Mistrial: At Mouat's misdemeanor DUI trial, the city prosecutor presented a videotape of Mouat's arrest, which showed the arresting officer asking Mouat about previous DUI arrests. Mouat moved for and was granted a mistrial. The trial court found that admission of the offending statement was an inadvertent oversight by both parties and ordered the city to redact the statement from the tape. Nevertheless, despite the city's efforts, at the next trial, the statement was still slightly audible, and Mouat again moved for and was granted a mistrial. Mouat then asserted that, based on double jeopardy and fundamental fairness grounds, the prosecution should not be granted a third trial in a misdemeanor case when the cause was negligence on the part of the government. The Supreme Court disagreed, citing St. v. Mallak, 2005 MT 49, 326 M 165, 109 P3d 209 (2005), for the proposition that when a mistrial is declared on a defendant's motion, double jeopardy does not bar a subsequent trial unless the governmental conduct in question was intended to goad defendant into moving for a mistrial. Billings v. Mouat, 2008 MT 66, 342 M 79, 180 P3d 1121 (2008).

Conviction of Possessing Stolen Vehicle in Washington Barring Prosecution for Theft of Same Vehicle in Montana: Cech stole a car in Montana and drove it to Washington where he was arrested and convicted of possession of stolen property. Cech was subsequently charged in Montana for theft of the same vehicle. At the Montana trial, Cech asserted double jeopardy. The trial court determined prosecution was not prohibited because the offenses were not the same and because Cech did not meet the first part of the three-part test in St. v. Tadewaldt, 277 M 261, 922 P2d 463 (1996), which provides that subsequent prosecution is barred if a defendant's conduct constitutes an offense within the jurisdiction of the court in which the first prosecution occurred and within the jurisdiction of the court in which the subsequent prosecution is pursued. On appeal, the Supreme Court disagreed and reversed. The underlying conduct that served as a basis for both prosecutions sought to accomplish the same criminal objective of controlling the stolen vehicle that led to the filing of analogous charges directed at that conduct in both states. Cech could not have been charged with possession of the stolen car in Washington if he had not first stolen the car in Montana and taken it to Washington. Thus, the charges arose out of the same transaction, and the double jeopardy provisions of 46-11-504 barred the subsequent prosecution for theft in Montana. St. v. Cech, 2007 MT 184, 338 M 330, 167 P3d 389 (2007). See also St. v. Sword, 229 M 370, 747 P2d 206 (1987).

Suspension of Sentence Following Probation Violation Not Violative of Double Jeopardy — Credit for Time Served Properly Allowed: DeWitt was convicted of two counts of aggravated burglary, found to be a persistent felony offender, and sentenced to three consecutive 10-year sentences. DeWitt appealed, and the Supreme Court remanded with instructions to dismiss one count. While awaiting resentencing, DeWitt was incarcerated for 1,275 days. The District Court then resentenced DeWitt to one 10-year sentence for aggravated burglary and a consecutive 10-year sentence as a persistent felony offender, suspended all but 1,275 days of the 20-year sentence, and gave DeWitt credit for 1,275 days served. Without prison time to serve, DeWitt was immediately released on probation. DeWitt subsequently violated probation, the suspended sentence was revoked, and DeWitt was sentenced to 10 years with 5 years suspended, with credit for 160 days served while awaiting revocation proceedings. DeWitt appealed on grounds that the sentencing court failed to allow credit for the 1,275 days served when the suspended sentence was revoked and the new 10-year sentence was imposed and asserted that his double jeopardy rights were violated by reinstatement of the original sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed with both arguments. When the sentencing court sentenced DeWitt following the probation violation, the court had a 16.5-year suspended sentence to work with, which was more than sufficient to account for the 10-year sentence with 5 years suspended that was imposed. Although a sentencing court must give credit for time served, revocation of a suspended sentence based on a probation violation and reinstatement of the original sentence does not constitute double jeopardy as long as the sentence is within the parameters of the sentence imposed in the initial suspended sentence and credit is allowed for time served. Further, a persistent felony offender designation is not a separate crime carrying a separate sentence, but rather is a statutorily required sentence enhancement that is part of the initial sentence, so the sentencing court could not have "dropped" the persistent felony offender count and sentenced DeWitt only under the aggravated burglary count, thereby limiting the available time on resentencing to 6.5 years. The sentence was not violative of double jeopardy, was within statutory parameters, and was affirmed. St. v. DeWitt, 2006 MT 302, 334 M 474, 149 P3d 549 (2006).

Facially Invalid Sentence — Statutory Bar Against Appeal Unconstitutional — Habeas Corpus Relief Granted: Lott was sentenced in 1992 for aggravated kidnapping, sexual intercourse without consent, aggravated burglary, and felony assault, and each sentence was enhanced by 10 years for use of a dangerous weapon. The 5-year limit on appealing the sentences that was in effect at sentencing (now a 1-year limit) expired, so Lott was procedurally barred from challenging the sentences. The Supreme Court subsequently decided in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), that application of the weapons enhancement to a felony offense that itself required proving use of a weapon constituted a double jeopardy violation. Guillaume was held to apply retroactively in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002), so Lott's sentence was unconstitutionally enhanced with regard to the aggravated burglary and felony assault convictions. The state asserted that Lott was procedurally barred from raising the issue in a habeas corpus petition because Lott did not raise the issue on direct appeal or in a petition for postconviction relief. After analyzing habeas corpus and postconviction relief in Montana, the Supreme Court noted the constitutional guarantee that the writ of habeas corpus may never be suspended and concluded that as applied to a facially invalid sentence, the procedural bar in 46-22-101 unconstitutionally suspends the writ. Even if Lott had filed a direct appeal or petition for postconviction relief, the double jeopardy argument would have been unavailing because Guillaume and Whitehorn were not decided until well after both filing dates had expired. In order to avoid a grievous wrong and a miscarriage of justice, the Supreme Court granted Lott's petition for habeas corpus and remanded for resentencing pursuant to Guillaume and Whitehorn. Lott v. St., 2006 MT 279, 334 M 270, 150 P3d 337 (2006), followed in St. v. Jackson, 2007 MT 186, 338 M 344, 165 P3d 321 (2007), and in St. v. Andersen-Conway, 2007 MT 281, 339 M 439, 171 P3d 678 (2007).

No Implied Presumption of Parole Eligibility — Federal Constitutional Protections Not Violated by Sentence of Life Imprisonment Without Parole — Montana Constitutional Protections Not Addressed: Garrymore was sentenced to life in prison without parole for the deliberate homicide of his adopted infant child. Garrymore appealed the parole restriction and sought to have the sentence vacated on grounds that 45-5-102(2) contains an implicit presumption of parole eligibility. Garrymore contended that under the statute, standing alone and without the operation of 46-18-202, he was entitled to a parole-eligible sentence, subject to 46-23-201, that was taken away by the sentencing judge in violation of due process and a trial by jury. The Supreme Court found nothing in sentencing statutes that creates a presumption in favor of parole eligibility that must be overcome in order for a sentencing judge to impose a parole restriction. Rather, sentencing courts have broad discretion under 46-18-202 to impose parole eligibility restrictions on felony sentences, and the Legislature has placed no limitation on the exercise of that authority. A parole-eligible sentence was not taken away from Garrymore because he was not entitled to such a sentence to begin with. Additionally, although the judge must state the reasons for a parole eligibility restriction when one is imposed, no particular finding of fact need be included among those reasons. Therefore, because the statutory maximum for violating 45-5-102(1)(a) is life in prison without parole, restricting Garrymore's parole eligibility did not violate any federal constitutional rights. The Supreme Court also declined to address Garrymore's undeveloped argument that the parole eligibility restriction violated the Montana Constitution's greater jury trial right absent a compelling reason why Montana's greater jury trial right dictated a different result. St. v. Garrymore, 2006 MT 245, 334 M 1, 145 P3d 946 (2006), followed in St. v. Rosling, 2008 MT 62, 342 M 1, 180 P3d 1102 (2008).

Constitutionality of Persistent Felony Offender Statutes: Shults contended that the persistent felony offender (PFO) statutes were unconstitutional on their face in violation of double jeopardy, equal protection, and cruel and unusual punishment or as they applied to Shults's case. The Supreme Court disagreed. First, the PFO statutes do not constitute double jeopardy because a sentence as a habitual criminal is not viewed as a new jeopardy (see Gryger v. Burke, 334 US 728 (1948)). Second, Shults was not able to show that the PFO statutes classify two or more similarly situated groups in an unequal manner and thus failed to meet the first threshold of a meritorious equal protection claim. Last, a sentence that is within maximum statutory guidelines and that is not so disproportionate as to shock the conscience or outrage the moral sense of the community is not considered cruel and unusual punishment. Shults's sentence was within statutory parameters, and in light of Shults's 18-year criminal history and repeated failure to conform his behavior to societal norms despite having numerous opportunities to do so, the sentence could not be seen as so disproportionate as to shock the conscience or outrage the moral sense of the community and thus was not considered cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Shults, 2006 MT 100, 332 M 130, 136 P3d 507 (2006).

Persistent Felony Offender Statute Not Violative of Double Jeopardy Protections: Wardell was convicted of felony sexual contact with a child in South Dakota and later was charged with numerous sexual crimes in Montana, including failure to register as a sex offender. The District Court sentenced Wardell to 5 years on the failure to register count and designated Wardell as a persistent felony offender, ultimately adding an additional 20-year consecutive sentence. Wardell appealed on grounds that the conviction for failure to register and the sentence for persistent felony offender constituted double jeopardy because each relied on the same underlying conviction. The Supreme Court disagreed. A sentence as a habitual criminal is not to be viewed as a new jeopardy. The sentence enhancement was related to the second crime—failure to register—and thus did not constituted double jeopardy. Under 46-18-501 (now repealed), the dual use of the prior South Dakota conviction for designating Wardell as a persistent felon was authorized. Further, it is not a crime to be a persistent felony offender, and being designated a persistent felony offender cannot constitute double jeopardy. St. v. Wardell, 2005 MT 252, 329 M 9, 122 P3d 443 (2005).

Failure of Counsel to Argue Included Offenses Under State Law Considered Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Becker was convicted of criminal possession of dangerous drugs, accountability for criminal production or manufacture of dangerous drugs, and criminal possession of precursors to dangerous drugs. On appeal, Becker argued that he should have been convicted only of criminal production or manufacture by accountability because the other two charges were part of the manufacturing process and that failure to include the other charges violated his due process rights. The Supreme Court declined to address the double jeopardy issue under the plain error doctrine because Becker raised it for the first time on appeal. However, the court found it appropriate to address the issue under Becker's ineffective assistance of counsel claim. Becker's counsel's failure to include all the relevant charges in a dismissal motion and to rely on the proper statutory grounds for dismissal constituted deficient performance under the first prong of the Strickland test. The second Strickland prong was also met because Becker was prejudiced by counsel's deficient performance, inasmuch as there was a reasonable probability that the result of the proceeding would have been different but for counsel's errors. The Supreme Court thus vacated the convictions and remanded for resentencing. St. v. Becker, 2005 MT 75, 326 M 364, 110 P3d 1 (2005), distinguished in St. v. Williams, 2010 MT 58, 355 Mont. 354, 228 P.3d 1127. See also St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 M 58, 30 P3d 340 (2001).

Violation of Motion In Limine in First Trial Not Grounds for Double Jeopardy Dismissal in Second Trial: Mallak contended that the state goaded him into moving for a mistrial by purposely violating a motion in limine prohibiting testimony of Mallak's prior violent conduct and that under Oreg. v. Kennedy, 456 US 667 (1982), and St. v. Laster, 223 M 152, 724 P2d 721 (1986), a second trial was a violation of double jeopardy. The Supreme Court disagreed. The part of the testimony that Mallak objected to was a product of the prosecutor's inadvertence, not intention, and did not inevitably lead to a violation of the motion in limine, unlike the inherently violative questioning in Laster. Thus, double jeopardy did not apply, and the trial court did not err in denying Mallak's motion to dismiss the charges. St. v. Mallak, 2005 MT 49, 326 M 165, 109 P3d 209 (2005), followed in Billings v. Mouat, 2008 MT 66, 342 M 79, 180 P3d 1121 (2008), regarding the principle that when a mistrial is declared on a defendant's motion, double jeopardy does not bar a subsequent trial unless the governmental conduct in question was intended to goad defendant into moving for a mistrial, and followed in Helena v. Whittinghill, 2009 MT 343, 353 M 131, 219 P3d 1244 (2009), to the extent that it is insufficient to bar a retrial absent intent on the part of the prosecutor to subvert the protections afforded by the double jeopardy clause, even when the prosecutor's conduct prompting the mistrial motion constitutes harassment or overreaching.

Assault With Weapon Not Lesser Included Offense of Assault of Peace Officer — No Double Jeopardy in Convicting of Both Offenses: Matt was charged with assault with a weapon and with assault on a peace officer. Matt pleaded guilty to assault on a peace officer and moved to dismiss the assault with a weapon charge, contending that it was a lesser included offense of assault on a peace officer and that prosecution for assault with a weapon therefore violated Matt's double jeopardy rights. The Supreme Court noted that each offense requires proof of an element not included in the other offense, so assault with a weapon is not a lesser included offense of assault on a peace officer. Thus, prosecution of both offenses did not violate Matt's constitutional or statutory double jeopardy protections, and both convictions were affirmed. St. v. Matt, 2005 MT 9, 325 M 340, 106 P3d 530 (2005), following St. v. Beavers, 1999 MT 260, 296 M 340, 987 P2d 371 (1999).

Increased Sentence Imposed on Resentencing After Original Sentence Vacated Not Due Process Violation: After Redfern's petition for postconviction relief was granted, Redfern's original sentence was vacated and the District Court resentenced him to a greater period of potential imprisonment and supervision than the original sentence. Redfern appealed the new sentence, contending that the greater sentence on resentencing violated the right to due process. The Supreme Court affirmed. Under N.C. v. Pearce 395 US 711 (1969), neither double jeopardy nor equal protection bars imposition of a more severe sentence upon resentencing after an original conviction is set aside unless a heavier sentence is imposed to punish a defendant for successfully having the original conviction set aside. However, in order to meet due process requirements and allow full appellate review of the constitutional legitimacy of the sentence, a longer sentence on resentencing after a new trial must be based on objective information concerning identifiable conduct of the defendant after the original sentencing and reasons for the longer sentence must affirmatively appear on the record. Both conditions were met here, there was no showing that the more severe sentence was imposed as retaliatory motivation by the sentencing judge, and the new sentence was within statutory sentencing parameters. St. v. Redfern, 2004 MT 277, 323 M 225, 99 P3d 223 (2004), following St. v. Forsyth, 233 M 389, 761 P2d 363 (1988), and St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001), and distinguishing St. v. Ringewold, 2001 MT 185, 306 M 229, 32 P3d 729 (2001). Redfern was followed in St. v. Bullplume, 2011 MT 40, 359 Mont. 289 251 P.3d 114.

Failure to Raise Double Jeopardy Objection at Settling of Jury Instructions or to Object to Verdict Form in Which Offenses Listed as Separate Counts — Appeal Precluded: Minez was convicted of both criminal possession and criminal production of dangerous drugs. On appeal, Minez argued that conviction of both offenses, which arose out of the same transaction, constituted double jeopardy. However, at trial, Minez abandoned a request for jury instructions on double jeopardy and never returned to the issue, failed to raise a double jeopardy objection at the settling of jury instructions, and did not object to the verdict form in which both offenses were listed as independent counts. Having abandoned the constitutional double jeopardy objections at trial, Minez was precluded from raising the issue on appeal, and the convictions were affirmed. St. v. Minez, 2004 MT 115, 321 M 148, 89 P3d 966 (2004).

State Deliberate Homicide Prosecution Not Barred by Federal Conviction for Firearm Possession: Gazda, a felon, was charged in federal court with unlawful possession of a firearm and ammunition. Prior to the federal trial, Gazda was charged in Montana with deliberate homicide. Following the federal conviction, Gazda moved to dismiss the state charge, arguing that he was placed twice in jeopardy because the prosecution had presented evidence in the federal case that he had committed the homicide. To determine if the subsequent prosecution was barred under 46-11-504, the Supreme Court applied the three-part test in St. v. Tadewaldt, 277 M 261, 922 P2d 463 (1996), which sets out that subsequent prosecution is barred if: (1) a defendant's conduct constitutes an offense within the jurisdiction of the court in which the first prosecution occurred and within the jurisdiction of the court in which the subsequent prosecution is pursued; (2) the first prosecution results in acquittal or conviction; and (3) the subsequent prosecution is based on an offense arising out of the same transaction. The District Court found that the first and third factors were not met, and the Supreme Court agreed. The concurrent jurisdiction factor failed because the state and federal courts lacked authority to prosecute equivalent offenses based on the same underlying conduct. The same transaction factor failed because the conduct to support the criminal objective of the state deliberate homicide charge was distinct from the federal weapons charge. Thus, double jeopardy did not bar the subsequent state prosecution. St. v. Gazda, 2003 MT 350, 318 M 516, 82 P3d 20 (2003).

Conviction for Production of Methamphetamine and Possession of Property Used to Produce Methamphetamine Not Double Jeopardy — Separate Elements of Each Offense: Minez contended that the possession of glassware and chemicals used to produce methamphetamine was only a form of preparation to commit the offense of producing methamphetamine and that conviction of two offenses for the same act violated double jeopardy protections. The Supreme Court disagreed. The elements of each offense were different, and each required proof of an additional fact not required by the other. Double jeopardy does not apply to conviction for two separate crimes. St. v. Minez, 2003 MT 344, 318 M 478, 82 P3d 1 (2003).

Reprosecution of Homicide Charges Precluded by Double Jeopardy After Initial Finding of Innocence: Demontiney was charged with deliberate homicide, mitigated deliberate homicide, and negligent homicide. The jury returned a verdict of not guilty on deliberate homicide and guilty on mitigated deliberate homicide. The Supreme Court vacated the conviction because a mitigated deliberate homicide conviction without a deliberate homicide conviction is logically impossible. The state sought a retrial, but the Supreme Court disallowed a retrial on any of the three charges on double jeopardy grounds. Demontiney was found not guilty of deliberate homicide and could not be retried on that charge. The mitigated deliberate homicide conviction was vacated, so that charge could not be retried. Further, under 46-11-503, the state may not prosecute a defendant on the same transaction when two or more offenses are known to the prosecutor, supported by probable cause, and consummated prior to the original charge when the former prosecution resulted in an acquittal. The negligent homicide charge was known, supported, and consummated, and the original prosecution ultimately resulted in an acquittal, so retrial on negligent homicide was also prohibited. Demontiney v. District Court, 2002 MT 161, 310 M 406, 51 P3d 476 (2002).

Retroactivity of Substantive and Procedural Rules Distinguished — Nichols Rule Prohibiting Retroactive Applicability of Guillaume Sentencing Enhancement Restriction Overruled: Whitehorn was convicted in 1995 of felony assault, criminal endangerment, and possession of dangerous drugs, and the sentencing court added an additional 10-year sentence for use of a weapon. In 1999, the Supreme Court decided St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), which held that enhancing a defendant's sentence for use of a weapon when the underlying offense (felony assault in Guillaume's case) required proof of the use of a weapon violated the constitutional double jeopardy provision. Whitehorn moved for resentencing in light of Guillaume, arguing that the enhanced sentence should be stricken because his underlying offense of felony assault also required proof that he used a weapon. The state initially agreed that Guillaume applied and that resentencing was appropriate, but prior to resentencing, the state changed its position in light of St. v. Aguilar, 1999 MT 159, 295 M 133, 983 P2d 345 (1999), and St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093 (1999), which provided that Guillaume would not be retroactively applied to cases not pending on direct appeal or to cases that were final when that opinion was issued. Whitehorn then filed a petition for postconviction relief under 46-21-102, arguing that his case was not final because he had not exhausted the 5-year time period for filing for postconviction relief (revised to 1 year in 1997). The District Court agreed that the petition was timely filed under 46-21-102, but, relying on Nichols, denied the petition and held that Whitehorn's case was final and not pending on direct review, and thus concluded that Guillaume could not be retroactively applied. Whitehorn appealed the denial of his petition for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court found that the District Court erred in not retroactively applying Guillaume and reversed, holding that under the common-law doctrine of plain error, Whitehorn was not procedurally barred from raising the retroactivity argument on appeal. The court distinguished between substantive and procedural rules when considering whether to apply a rule change retroactively. In Nichols, the court adopted the retroactivity analysis in Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288 (1989), which stands for the proposition that on collateral review, a new procedural rule of constitutional law will not be applied retroactively if it puts primary, private individual conduct beyond the power of the criminal law to proscribe or if the procedures used to convict the defendant are so implicit in the concept of ordered liberty as to constitute a watershed rule of criminal procedure. In Nichols, the court concluded that Guillaume announced a new rule, but that neither Teague exception applied. However, here the court decided that Guillaume was by its own terms a substantive rule to which the Teague exceptions should not even have been applied (accord, Chambers v. U.S., 22 F3d 939 (9th Cir. 1994)). Partially overruling Nichols and a similar holding in St. v. Wells, 2001 MT 55, 304 M 329, 21 P3d 610 (2001), the court concluded that it was illogical to refuse to extend constitutional protections to citizens simply because their claims are raised by collateral review rather than direct appeal. However, the court retained the Guillaume analysis, clarifying that sentences on convictions for felony assault with a weapon and aggravated burglary are the only offenses that may not be enhanced under 46-18-221. St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002). See also Desist v. U.S., 394 US 244 (1969), and Mackey v. U.S., 401 US 667 (1971).

Imprisonment for Probation Violation Not Considered Double Jeopardy: Walker was convicted of felony DUI, sentenced to 6 months in prison followed by 2 years of supervised probation, and fined $1,000. Following 6 months' confinement, Walker was released and began serving the probationary sentence but violated the terms of probation about 1 year later. During revocation hearings, Walker contended that additional incarceration pursuant to 61-8-731 for probation violations would constitute double jeopardy because the entirety of the 6 months' prison term had already been served. The District Court disagreed, revoked probation, and committed Walker to the Department of Corrections for the time remaining on the original 2-year probation. Walker appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The court found no distinction between the revocation of a suspended sentence and the revocation of a probationary sentence. In either case, the subsequent conduct, not the original offense, forms the basis for revocation, and the sentencing court retains jurisdiction over the defendant during the period of probation. Walker conceded that 61-8-731 provides by its terms for revocation of probation and for incarceration upon violation of probation. The revocation is not new punishment for the criminal offense of felony DUI, but rather constitutes the consequence of violating probationary conditions. Walker failed to bear the burden of proving 61-8-731 unconstitutional beyond a reasonable doubt on double jeopardy grounds. St. v. Walker, 2001 MT 170, 306 M 159, 30 P3d 1099 (2001), distinguishing St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999).

Application of Weapon Enhancement Statute to Conviction for Mitigated Deliberate Homicide Not Violative of Double Jeopardy Protection: Park was sentenced to 40 years for mitigated deliberate homicide, plus 10 years for use of a weapon. Citing St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), Park contended on appeal that the imposition of the additional weapon enhancement sentence violated the constitutional prohibition against double jeopardy. The Supreme Court distinguished Guillaume because the offense charged in that case was felony assault, which requires the use of a weapon, while mitigated deliberate homicide does not. The double jeopardy question under Guillaume and its progeny is not whether a weapon was used in the offense, but rather whether the statutory definition of the offense includes the use of a weapon, with the result that defendant is punished twice for the same offense. The court also discounted Park's argument that use of a weapon is implied every time that a deliberate or mitigated homicide occurs. The court has limited the definition of weapon in several cases, and case law also provides numerous instances of homicide when no conceivable weapon caused the death. Park's enhanced sentence for use of a weapon was affirmed. St. v. Park, 2001 MT 157, 306 M 98, 30 P3d 1062 (2001), following St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966 (2000), and St. v. Dunnette, 2000 MT 33, 298 M 208, 996 P2d 379 (2000).

Suspending Less of Sentence After Retrial Than After First Trial — Court's Belief Time Needed to Complete Ordered Programs: If a judge imposes a more severe sentence upon a defendant after a new trial than that imposed in the former trial, the reasons for doing so must appear in the record and be based on objective information concerning identifiable conduct of defendant occurring after the time of the original sentencing. Otherwise, there is a presumption that the greater sentence was for a vindictive purpose, and the presumption must be rebutted. It was constitutionally legitimate for the court to reduce, after a second trial resulting in the same incarceration term, the amount of time that the sentence was suspended after the first trial. The court believed that defendant needed the time to complete rehabilitative programs that the court ordered him to complete in each sentence and suspended less time to ensure that there was sufficient time to complete the programs. St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Filed Twelve Years After Conviction Time Barred — Guillaume Inapplicable: Charlo was convicted of aggravated assault in 1986 and sentenced to 20 years plus 10 years for use of a weapon, and the sentence was affirmed in 1987 (see St. v. Charlo, 226 M 213, 735 P2d 278 (1987)). Following the decision in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), Charlo petitioned for postconviction relief in 1999 on grounds that the imposition of the additional 10-year weapon enhancement sentence violated his double jeopardy rights. The District Court concluded that Guillaume did not apply and that no miscarriage of justice would occur if the court applied the 5-year statute of limitations on postconviction relief provided in 46-21-102 (now 1 year). The Supreme Court concurred. A petition filed 12 years after final conviction clearly violated the statute of limitations in 46-21-102. The court relied on St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966, 57 St. Rep. 120 (2000), for the holding that application of the weapon enhancement provision in 46-18-221 to a conviction in which the underlying offense does not require use of a weapon as an element of the crime does not constitute a double jeopardy violation. The offense of aggravated assault does not require use of a weapon, so Guillaume did not apply. The court also declined to apply the fundamental miscarriage of justice exception in St. v. Redcrow, 1999 MT 95, 294 M 252, 980 P2d 622 (1999). Guillaume was the sole basis of Charlo's petition, so Charlo could not show that the Redcrow exception would apply. St. v. Charlo, 2000 MT 192, 300 M 435, 4 P3d 1201, 57 St. Rep. 761 (2000).

Motion to Dismiss on Grounds of Insufficient Evidence Properly Denied: When it was clear from the record that a reasonable juror could have concluded from the evidence taken in a light most favorable to the prosecution that guilt on several counts was proved beyond a reasonable doubt, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's motion for a directed verdict of acquittal, and further prosecution was not barred on double jeopardy grounds. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000). See also St. v. Bromgard, 261 M 291, 862 P2d 1140 (1993), and St. v. Campbell, 278 M 236, 924 P2d 1304 (1996).

Amended Information Not Violative of Double Jeopardy Guarantee: Dixon built a pipe bomb and used it to blow up a traffic sign. Dixon pleaded guilty to criminal endangerment, possession of a destructive device, and criminal mischief. An amended information was filed, dropping the criminal endangerment charge to negligent endangerment and changing the possession of a destructive device to possession of explosives. Dixon pleaded not guilty and moved to dismiss, contending that he was placed in double jeopardy by the amended information. The District Court concluded that under Blockburger v. U.S., 284 US 299, 76 L Ed 306, 52 S Ct 180 (1932), the amended information did not violate Dixon's double jeopardy rights because each offense charged required proof of a fact that the other offenses did not. The Supreme Court affirmed, finding that Dixon was not subjected to multiple prosecutions for the same offense and did not receive multiple punishments for the same offense, nor was his sentence enhanced on the basis of a factor for which he had already received punishment. Dixon's right against double jeopardy was not abridged. St. v. Dixon, 2000 MT 82, 299 M 165, 998 P2d 544, 57 St. Rep. 354 (2000).

No Sentence Enhancement for Use of Weapon in Assault on Police Officer: Because a conviction for assault on a police officer requires proof of use of a weapon, an additional sentence for use of a weapon under 46-18-221 violates the double jeopardy provision of the Montana Constitution. St. v. Smith, 2000 MT 57, 299 M 6, 997 P2d 768, 57 St. Rep. 272 (2000), following St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999).

Application of Weapon Enhancement Statute to Conviction for Criminal Endangerment Not Violative of Double Jeopardy Protection: Keith was sentenced to 10 years in prison plus 10 years for use of a weapon, with 15 years suspended, for criminal endangerment. Keith argued that application of the weapon enhancement statute to the felony conviction for criminal endangerment violated the right to be free from multiple punishments for the same offense, pursuant to St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999). The Supreme Court distinguished Guillaume, noting that unlike the felony assault statute in that case, the definition of criminal endangerment does not require proof of the use of a weapon nor did Keith's use of a weapon raise the crime from a misdemeanor to a felony as in Guillaume. Because the offense of criminal endangerment, by its own terms, does not specifically increase a defendant's punishment for use of a weapon, application of the weapon enhancement statute to a criminal endangerment violation is not a double jeopardy violation. St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966, 57 St. Rep. 120 (2000), followed in St. v. Dunnette, 2000 MT 33, 298 M 208, 996 P2d 379, 57 St. Rep. 141 (2000), and St. v. Charlo, 2000 MT 192, 300 M 435, 4 P3d 1201, 57 St. Rep. 761 (2000).

Arraignment After Jury Empaneled and Sworn — No Double Jeopardy: The trial court arraigned Beavers on an amended charge after the jury was empaneled and sworn, which Beavers claimed was a violation of his constitutional protection against double jeopardy. However, this situation does not constitute a successive prosecution. Beavers was prosecuted only once for the offense, so double jeopardy protections did not apply. St. v. Beavers, 1999 MT 260, 296 M 340, 987 P2d 371, 56 St. Rep. 1035 (1999), distinguishing Crist v. Bretz, 437 US 28, 57 L Ed 2d 24, 98 S Ct 2156 (1978).

Application of Weapon Enhancement Statute to Felony Conviction When Underlying Offense Requires Proof of Weapon Use Unconstitutional Under Montana Double Jeopardy Provision: When presented with the question of whether the weapon enhancement statute, 46-18-221, violates the double jeopardy provisions of this section, the Supreme Court held that the Montana Constitution affords greater protection against multiple punishment than the federal constitution and that application of the weapon enhancement statute to felony convictions when the underlying offense requires proof of the use of a weapon violates Montana's constitutional double jeopardy provision. In the instant case, the only factor raising Guillaume's charge from misdemeanor assault to felony assault (now assault with a weapon) was the use of a weapon. The distinction between the two offenses and the different penalties imposed by each offense is the Legislature's way of punishing a criminal defendant for the use of a weapon in committing an assault. Thus, when the weapon enhancement statute was applied to the felony assault (now assault with a weapon) conviction, Guillaume was subjected to double punishment—once when the charge was elevated from misdemeanor assault to felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and again when the weapon enhancement statute was applied. This is exactly what double jeopardy was intended to prevent. The state's argument, that double jeopardy did not protect against multiple punishments for the same offense because that protection is not explicit in the constitutional language, failed because the fifth amendment to the U.S. Constitution has been held in N.C. v. Pearce, 393 US 711, 23 L Ed 2d 656, 89 S Ct 2072 (1969), to protect against multiple punishments for the same offense, and the Montana Constitution provides at least the same protection or greater. Further, the fact that legislative modification of the felony assault (now assault with a weapon) statute could achieve the same result as the present sentencing scheme did not mean that double jeopardy did not apply in this case. St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980), and St. v. Anderson, 2001 MT 188, 306 M 243, 32 P3d 750 (2001). Guillaume will not be retroactively applied to cases not pending on direct appeal or to cases that were final when that opinion was issued. St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999). Nichols was overruled in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002), to the extent that the Supreme Court refused to retroactively apply Guillaume. Aguilar was followed in St. v. Gustafson, 2000 MT 364, 303 M 386, 15 P3d 944, 57 St. Rep. 1554 (2000).

Supreme Court Power to Review Legislative Act for Constitutional Conformity Not Violative of Separation of Powers Doctrine: Although the Montana Constitution confers upon the Legislature the exclusive power to set appropriate punishments for criminal acts, the Supreme Court is constitutionally vested with the exclusive power to review whether a particular legislative act conforms to the constitution. Thus, the court's holding that the Montana weapon enhancement statute was violative of state constitutional double jeopardy protections was not a violation of the separation of powers doctrine. St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999). See also In re License Revocation of Gildersleeve, 283 M 479, 942 P2d 705, 54 St. Rep. 735 (1997).

DUI and Negligent Homicide Arising From Same Accident Not Part of Same Transaction — No Double Jeopardy: Booth pleaded guilty in Justice's Court to a DUI charge and claimed double jeopardy when he was subsequently charged in District Court with two counts of negligent homicide arising out of the accident that led to the DUI charge and conviction. Neither 46-11-503 nor 46-11-504 barred the District Court charges. Under each section, double jeopardy requires that the offenses arise out of the same transaction. Because Booth's conduct in allegedly causing the two deaths was not motivated by a purpose to accomplish the criminal objective of DUI, the DUI and negligent homicide offenses did not arise out of the same transaction within the meaning of the statutory definition of "same transaction" as conduct consisting of a series of acts that are motivated by a purpose to accomplish a criminal objective and that are necessary or incidental to the accomplishment of that objective. State ex rel. Booth v. District Court, 1998 MT 344, 292 M 371, 972 P2d 325, 55 St. Rep. 1395 (1998), followed in St. v. Condo, 2008 MT 114, 342 M 468, 182 P3d 57 (2008).

Negligent Homicide Charges After DUI Guilty Plea — Supervisory Control to Avoid Double Jeopardy Trial: If the District Court's conclusion that the Justice's Court plea of guilty to DUI did not bar subsequent prosecution of two negligent homicide charges arising out of the same auto accident as the DUI charge is proved, on appeal, to be incorrect, the defendant will have been subjected to prosecution even though double jeopardy entitled him to avoid prosecution altogether. Thus, it is clear that an appeal would not be an adequate remedy, and the defendant's application to the Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control presented legal issues appropriate for the Supreme Court's consideration and would be accepted and decided. State ex rel. Booth v. District Court, 1998 MT 344, 292 M 371, 972 P2d 325, 55 St. Rep. 1395 (1998).

"Offenses Lie in a Single Court" — Does Not Mean They Occur in Same Court: The reference in 46-11-503 to two or more offenses in regard to which "jurisdiction and venue of the offenses lie in a single court" requires that jurisdiction and venue lie in a single court; the phrase does not require that, when double jeopardy is claimed, the former and subsequent prosecutions occur in the same court. State ex rel. Booth v. District Court, 1998 MT 344, 292 M 371, 972 P2d 325, 55 St. Rep. 1395 (1998), followed in St. v. Condo, 2008 MT 114, 342 M 468, 182 P3d 57 (2008).

Consideration of Pending DUI Charge in Prior Offense — No Double Jeopardy Violation: Defendant, convicted of operating a motor vehicle after having been declared a habitual traffic offender appealed, claiming that a pending third DUI charge, which had already been considered for purposes of assessing rehabilitation prospects during sentencing on a prior and separate criminal charge, constituted double jeopardy. In reversing the District Court's decision dismissing the DUI charge, the Supreme Court, based on the United States Supreme Court's decision in Witte v. U.S., 515 US 389 (1995), held that the District Court erred in dismissing the DUI charge, stating that the court may properly sentence a person for criminal conduct after considering such conduct as an aggravating factor in a prior sentencing hearing on unrelated charges without violating the double jeopardy provision. St. v. Anderson, 1998 MT 258, 291 M 242, 967 P2d 413, 55 St. Rep. 1061 (1998), followed in St. v. Anderson, 2001 MT 188, 306 M 243, 32 P3d 750 (2001).

Misdemeanor Traffic Offenses in Tribal Court and Felony DUI in State District Court Not Arising From Same Transaction — No Double Jeopardy: Couture was cited for two misdemeanor traffic offenses in tribal court. A few days later he was moved to state District Court and charged with felony DUI, sixth offense. He pleaded guilty to the tribal court misdemeanors and then sought dismissal of the District Court felony on grounds of double jeopardy. He contended that because the offenses all arose from the same transaction and he had been convicted in tribal court, prosecution in District Court was barred under 46-11-504. The District Court properly held that the misdemeanors—driving without a license and without proof of insurance—were unrelated to the criminal objective of DUI. Because by definition the offenses did not arise out of the same transaction, the District Court felony prosecution did not constitute double jeopardy. St. v. Couture, 1998 MT 137, 289 M 215, 959 P2d 948, 55 St. Rep. 548 (1998), following St. v. Sword, 229 M 370, 747 P2d 206 (1987).

Oral Pronouncement as Legally Effective Sentence — Correction of Error in Written Judgment by Nunc Pro Tunc Order — Due Process and Double Jeopardy Rights Not Violated: The oral pronouncement of sentence is the legally effective sentence. The written judgment and commitment serves as evidence of the sentence orally pronounced. In the event of a conflict between the oral and written sentence, the oral controls. The sentencing court may correct an error in a written judgment and commitment by a nunc pro tunc order, pursuant to 46-18-117 (now repealed), to accurately reflect what was orally pronounced at the sentencing hearing. Absent evidence of a tangible detriment or concrete injury to defendant, a clarifying nunc pro tunc order does not jeopardize a defendant's due process rights or constitute double jeopardy. St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), overruling St. v. Enfinger, 222 M 438, 722 P2d 1170 (1986), St. v. Wirtala, 231 M 264, 752 P2d 177 (1988), St. v. Mason, 253 M 419, 833 P2d 1058 (1992), and St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184 (1996), to the extent that those cases held that the written judgment and commitment, rather than the oral pronouncement of sentence, was to be considered the final, valid order. The Supreme Court amended former Rule 5, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), to reflect the Lane decision in In re Amending Rule 5 of the Mont. Rules of Appellate Procedure, 55 St. Rep. 1267 (1998). Lane was followed in St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), and St. v. Ringewold, 2001 MT 185, 306 M 229, 32 P3d 729 (2001). See also St. v. Cleveland, 2018 MT 199, 392 Mont. 338, 423 P.3d 1074.

Consecutive Sentences Upon Conviction for Multiple Thefts, Common Scheme — Prosecutorial Discretion Correctly Exercised — No Double Jeopardy Found: During a 5-day period in April 1994, Savaria issued bad checks upon the same nonexistent checking account to numerous retail merchants in the Missoula area. He was charged with six counts of theft, common scheme, to which he pleaded guilty. The District Court sentenced Savaria to consecutive 10-year sentences on each of the counts, which Savaria argued constituted multiple punishments for commission of the same offense, in violation of the constitutional prohibition against double jeopardy. The Supreme Court recognized that the U.S. Constitution prohibits both multiple punishments for the same offense and multiple prosecutions for offenses arising out of the same transaction, but, after application of the test announced in Blockburger v. U.S., 284 US 299 (1932), and in reliance upon St. v. Crowder, 248 M 169, 810 P2d 299 (1991), and Stilson v. St., 278 M 20, 924 P2d 238 (1996), held that the prosecutor had the discretion to charge each of the bad check writing incidents as an individual felony theft, common scheme, pointing out that each of the multiple common schemes was supported by separate and distinct evidence. The Supreme Court held that the District Court therefore did not err in imposing consecutive sentences on the separate charges because they were not prohibited by the constitutional prohibition against double jeopardy. St. v. Savaria, 284 M 216, 945 P2d 24, 54 St. Rep. 852 (1997).

Revocation of Game License — Not Violation of Double Jeopardy: Section 87-4-427 serves a remedial purpose and is not a punitive or penal statute. The Department of Fish, Wildlife and Parks' revocation of a game farm (now alternative livestock ranch) license was not punishment and did not violate double jeopardy rights. In re Game Farm License No. 319 of Brogan, 283 M 413, 942 P2d 100, 54 St. Rep. 670 (1997).

Weapons Enhancement Statute Not Double Jeopardy When Legislative Intent Clear Statute Intended to Impose Cumulative Punishments: Zabawa argued that applying the weapons enhancement statute to him constituted double jeopardy because the use of a weapon was an element of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) to which he had pleaded guilty. The Supreme Court held that applying the weapons enhancement statute did not constitute double jeopardy because the language of the statute clearly showed the Legislature's intent to impose cumulative punishments and that the United States Supreme Court in Mo. v. Hunter, 459 US 359 (1983), had ruled that cumulative punishments imposed in a single trial do not violate the double jeopardy clause of the fifth amendment of the U.S. Constitution. St. v. Zabawa, 279 M 307, 928 P2d 151, 53 St. Rep. 1162 (1996), distinguished in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999). See also St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966, 57 St. Rep. 120 (2000).

Punishment for Refusal to Take Breathalyzer Test and for Driving Under the Influence Not Double Jeopardy: Danichek argued that he could not be convicted of driving under the influence because he had already been punished when his driver's license was suspended for refusing to take the Breathalyzer test and that to punish him for driving under the influence would constitute multiple punishments for the same offense. The Supreme Court held that Danichek's license was suspended for refusing the test and that it was the refusal that was a violation. That conviction had nothing to do with whether or not the person actually was driving under the influence, and therefore, he was being punished for two separate infractions and was not being placed in double jeopardy. Helena v. Danichek, 277 M 461, 922 P2d 1170, 53 St. Rep. 767 (1996).

No Double Jeopardy — Initial Single Count Misdemeanor Charge Converted to Felony Bad Check Common Scheme: Vargas was charged with a single count of misdemeanor issuing a bad check despite the fact that the complaint alleged that he had written 10 bad checks over a 3-week period. He pleaded guilty and was given a 6-month suspended jail sentence. Several months later, the County Attorney was notified that Vargas had written an additional 18 bad checks during the same 3-week period. In light of the new information, Vargas was charged with a felony for issuing all 28 bad checks, common scheme. Vargas moved to dismiss this information, claiming that under double jeopardy protections, his prior misdemeanor conviction prevented additional punishment for the same conduct for which he had been convicted. The District Court denied the motion to dismiss. Vargas changed his plea to guilty but reserved the right to appeal on double jeopardy grounds and, in doing so, maintained that the state violated his right to be free from a second prosecution for the same offense when it charged him with felony common scheme based in part on a check that had formed the basis for a prior misdemeanor conviction. Pursuant to Brown v. Ohio, 432 US 161, 53 L Ed 2d 187, 97 S Ct 2221 (1977), the general rule is that the double jeopardy clause prohibits the state or federal government from trying a defendant for a greater offense after it has convicted that defendant of a lesser included offense. Although Vargas's argument was consistent with Brown, it did not take into account the significant exceptions to the general rule that were set out in Jeffers v. U.S., 432 US 137, 53 L Ed 2d 168, 97 S Ct 2207 (1977). Under Jeffers, a subsequent prosecution for a greater crime is allowed if: (1) all the elements necessary to the greater crime had not taken place at the time prosecution for the lesser crime had begun; or (2) the facts necessary to show the greater crime had not been discovered by the state before the first trial, despite the exercise of due diligence. Pursuant to U.S. v. Stricklin, 591 F2d 1112 (5th Cir. 1979), once the defendant makes a prima facie case of double jeopardy, it is the state's responsibility to demonstrate by a preponderance of the evidence that it exercised due diligence in discovering all relevant facts before the first trial or, as in this case, before the guilty plea. The case was remanded for further proceedings on the question of whether the state exercised due diligence. St. v. Vargas, 279 M 357, 928 P2d 165, 53 St. Rep. 1184 (1996).

Stay of Second Trial Required Until Double Jeopardy Claim Addressed: Defendant, charged with assault and drug possession, proceeded to trial before a jury, which was empaneled without alternate members by stipulation. After opening statements, a juror informed the court that she would not be able to continue as a juror because of illness. A mistrial was declared without objection from the defendant, and a second trial date was scheduled. The defendant filed a motion to dismiss all charges on the basis of the prohibition against double jeopardy and argued that the double jeopardy motion must be addressed prior to the beginning of the second trial. The state argued that the second trial should proceed, citing the Supreme Court's rulings in Forsyth and LaFlesch, which held that a defendant's double jeopardy claim could be reviewed adequately on appeal following a retrial. The Supreme Court disagreed and overruled its previous decisions in Forsyth and LaFlesch, ruling that to have any significance, the guarantee against double jeopardy must be given effect prior to, not after, the second trial. Once a defendant endures a second trial, the defendant has incurred the risk of being put in jeopardy, which cannot be remedied or expunged after the fact. Keating v. Sherlock, 278 M 218, 924 P2d 1297, 53 St. Rep. 855 (1996).

Incest Not Included Offense of Sexual Intercourse Without Consent: McQuiston contended that his conviction for both incest and sexual intercourse without consent violated double jeopardy protections because under 46-11-410, a defendant may not be convicted of more than one offense if one offense is an included offense in another, as defined in 46-1-202. The Supreme Court held that incest is not an included offense of sexual intercourse without consent but rather is a distinct and wholly separate offense, each crime requiring proof of distinct elements that the other does not. McQuiston's conviction for both crimes was not a double jeopardy violation. St. v. McQuiston, 277 M 397, 922 P2d 519, 53 St. Rep. 729 (1996), following St. v. Sor-Lokken, 247 M 343, 805 P2d 1367 (1991).

Double Jeopardy Protection Against Three Distinct Abuses — Civil Sanction Following Criminal Prosecution: The U.S. Supreme Court has held that the double jeopardy clause protects against three distinct abuses: (1) a second prosecution for the same offense; (2) a second prosecution for the same offense after conviction; and (3) multiple punishments for the same offense. A defendant who has been punished in a criminal prosecution may not be subjected to an additional civil sanction to the extent that the second sanction may not fairly be categorized as remedial, but only as a deterrent or retribution. In identifying a double jeopardy violation, a court should assess the character of the sanctions imposed by the state. Whether a sanction constitutes punishment is not determined from the defendant's perspective, but rather by the purposes actually served by the sanction. A civil sanction that serves only retributive or deterrent purposes constitutes punishment. St. v. Schnittgen, 277 M 291, 922 P2d 500, 53 St. Rep. 710 (1996), citing U.S. v. Halper, 490 US 435, 104 L Ed 2d 487, 109 S Ct 1892 (1989), and followed in In re Game Farm License No. 319 of Brogan, 283 M 413, 942 P2d 100, 54 St. Rep. 670 (1997). See also N.C. v. Pearce, 395 US 711, 23 L Ed 2d 656, 89 S Ct 2072 (1969), and Witte v. U.S., 515 US 389, 132 L Ed 2d 351, 115 S Ct 2199 (1995). However, see St. v. Anderson, 1998 MT 258, 291 M 242, 967 P2d 413, 55 St. Rep. 1061 (1998), distinguishing Pearce and Witte with regard to use of criminal conduct in a prior sentencing hearing on unrelated charges without violating the double jeopardy provision.

Termination of Employment of Public Employee and Criminal Prosecution on Same Facts — No Double Jeopardy Violation: Relying on U.S. v. Reed, 937 F2d 575 (11th Cir. 1991), U.S. v. Payne, 2 F3d 706 (6th Cir. 1993), Loui v. Bd. of Medical Examiners, 889 P2d 705 (Hawaii 1995), and U.S. v. Ursery, 518 US 267, 135 L Ed 2d 549, 116 S Ct 2135, (1996), and distinguishing U.S. v. Halper, 490 US 435, 104 L Ed 2d 487, 109 S Ct 1892 (1989), the Supreme Court held that a public employee may be both terminated from employment and prosecuted criminally on the same facts without creating a double jeopardy violation. In the present case, Deputy Sheriff Schnittgen was charged with criminal mischief as the result of an incident at a bar when he was off duty and was subsequently terminated from his position based on his behavior the same evening. The employment termination in this case did not serve the purpose of punishment, but instead served the remedial purpose of protecting public safety and property and of promoting public confidence and trust in law enforcement and thus was not violative of double jeopardy protections. St. v. Schnittgen, 277 M 291, 922 P2d 500, 53 St. Rep. 710 (1996).

Multiple Common Schemes — Conviction in Multiple Counties Not Violative of Double Jeopardy: Stilson was convicted of issuing a bad check, common scheme, in Lewis and Clark County. In April of 1991, he was convicted of the same type of felony in Missoula County. Two months later, he was convicted of the same type of felony in Cascade County. He also wrote bad checks in Yellowstone and Butte-Silver Bow Counties and although he was not prosecuted for those offenses, the Missoula County judgment required him to make restitution for those bad checks as well. Stilson appealed for postconviction relief, alleging that his convictions were for the same common scheme and that the multiple convictions violated his right preventing double jeopardy. He contended that state law does not provide a basis to divide a single common scheme of issuing bad checks into multiple common schemes. Although the Legislature did not provide for multiple common schemes, neither was that possibility foreclosed. Under the circumstances of this case, Stilson was charged in each county for only the checks written in that particular county and the bad checks written in each county were separate and distinct common scheme offenses. The evidence required for proof of the offense in each county was different and specific to each county, and the series of acts or transactions in each county were different from those in other jurisdictions, both individually and as a group. Thus, under appropriate facts and circumstances, double jeopardy protections do not necessarily prevent a defendant who has been convicted of a common scheme in one county from being convicted of a common scheme in a different county. Stilson v. St., 278 M 20, 924 P2d 238, 53 St. Rep. 572 (1996).

Prison Disciplinary Proceedings as Remedial — No Impediment to Criminal Proceedings Involving Same Conduct: The prohibition against double jeopardy does not bar criminal prosecution for conduct that has been the subject of prior remedial administrative prison disciplinary proceedings, such as the forfeiture of good time for escape. Even if administrative sanctions are considered punishment, they are integral parts of and distinct from an inmate's single punishment of incarceration for the prior conviction. The withholding of the contingent reward of good time is not considered punishment for double jeopardy purposes because the withholding is a consequence of the underlying prior conviction that resulted in the incarceration and not a result of the rule violation or escape attempt that led to the disciplinary action itself. St. v. Nelson, 275 M 86, 910 P2d 247, 53 St. Rep. 50 (1996). See also U.S. v. Halper, 490 US 435, 104 L Ed 2d 487, 109 S Ct 1892 (1989), and U.S. v. Soto-Olivas, 44 F3d 788 (9th Cir. 1995).

Judgment as Including Sentence — Sentence Not Strictly Premised on Punishment: A defendant has 60 days under former Rule 5(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), to appeal a final judgment. Although prior to the 1991 enactment of 46-1-202, "sentence" was interpreted as being the same as "punishment", 46-1-202 now defines a sentence as any judicial disposition of a criminal proceeding upon a plea, verdict, or finding of guilt. The judicial disposition is itself a sentence regardless of whether actual punishment is deferred or imposed immediately. This broader definition applies to deferment cases, but in double jeopardy cases, the narrower meaning premised on the punishment factor still applies. Therefore, a judgment that includes a deferred sentence is final for purposes of appeal, and an appeal filed more that 60 days after sentencing was dismissed as untimely. St. v. Rice, 275 M 81, 910 P2d 245, 53 St. Rep. 48 (1996), followed in Davis v. St., 2004 MT 112, 321 M 118, 88 P3d 1285 (2004).

Double Jeopardy — Vacating Trial When Defendant Requested Attorney After First Witness Was Sworn: After the first witness was sworn and testified in a prosecution for two misdemeanors, the judge asked defendant about a letter in the court file indicating that defendant had a public defender. Defendant said that he had not been in touch with the public defender and that he wanted a lawyer. The court vacated the trial to allow defendant a chance to obtain counsel. At a trial held 11 months later, a motion to dismiss because jeopardy attached after the first witness was sworn in the first trial was properly denied. Defendant's request for counsel prompted the vacation of the first trial, and the vacation worked to his advantage because he secured the public defender's representation. Found to be without merit was defendant's claim that the legal defect at the first trial, which the court feared might arise from lack of counsel, would not have occurred because the consequence of failure to appoint counsel would only prohibit the judge, under 46-8-101, from including jail time in the sentence. St. v. Stringer, 263 M 295, 868 P2d 588, 51 St. Rep. 63 (1994).

Reinstatement of Charge Following Withdrawal of Plea — Not Double Jeopardy: The parties agreed that the state would recommend a 30-year sentence with 25 years suspended if Losson would plead guilty to mitigated deliberate homicide and that they would argue any additional sentence for weapon enhancement at the sentencing hearing, with the state arguing for the maximum 10-year sentence. After Losson pleaded guilty, the state informed her that it would introduce recently discovered evidence to prove that her motive was to gain $106,000 in life insurance and that it would use the evidence in support of its argument for weapon enhancement. Losson then withdrew her plea, and the state recharged her with deliberate homicide. Losson was ultimately convicted of mitigated deliberate homicide, but on appeal, she contended that the state breached the plea agreement and violated her double jeopardy protection by reinstating the deliberate homicide charge. The Supreme Court affirmed, noting that the state did not breach the plea agreement, but rather Losson chose to withdraw her plea. Double jeopardy protection does not relieve a defendant from the consequences of the voluntary choice of plea withdrawal. Further, Losson's double jeopardy argument was moot because she was only convicted on mitigated deliberate homicide and thus could not challenge the deliberate homicide charge. St. v. Losson, 262 M 342, 865 P2d 255, 50 St. Rep. 1588 (1993).

Double Jeopardy — Civil Penalty: The Montana marijuana tax was unconstitutional as a violation of double jeopardy even though it was a civil rather than a criminal sanction. A civil sanction that serves as punishment is protected under double jeopardy. There must be an approximation between the amount of taxes and the damages and costs sustained by the state in order for the provision not to be considered punishment. In re Kurth Ranch, 986 F2d 1308 (9th Cir. 1993), affirmed in Dept. of Revenue v. Kurth Ranch, 511 US 767, 128 L Ed 2d 767, 114 S Ct 1937 (1994), and distinguished in In re Game Farm License No. 319 of Brogan, 283 M 413, 942 P2d 100, 54 St. Rep. 670 (1997).

Retrial of Unconvicted Offense Prohibited — Dismissal of Conviction for Uncharged Offense Affirmed: Barker was charged with DUI but was convicted of reckless driving by the Ravalli County Justice of the Peace. Barker appealed to the District Court and filed a motion to dismiss, which the District Court granted. On appeal by the state, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the reckless driving charge and the DUI charge were inapposite charges and that reckless driving was not a lesser included offense of DUI. The Supreme Court also held that while a defendant's statutory remedy for appealing a Justice's Court decision is a trial de novo in the District Court, it would be a violation of the prohibition against double jeopardy to try Barker again on the DUI charge because Barker was originally charged with that offense and jeopardy had attached when the first witness was sworn. When Barker appealed from the erroneous conviction of an uncharged offense, he did not waive his constitutional protection against double jeopardy for charges of which he was acquitted. St. v. Barker, 260 M 85, 858 P2d 360, 50 St. Rep. 970 (1993).

Denial of Accrued Benefits Not Unconstitutional: State employees, dismissed because of criminal and sexual misconduct investigations, appealed a summary judgment, alleging that the refusal by the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) to pay accrued vacation benefits violated the double jeopardy and equal protection clauses of the federal constitution. The Supreme Court held that the employees' failure to meet the statutory prerequisite to receive the accrued vacation benefits does not equate to violating a law and facing double jeopardy. Similarly, the terminated employees failed to establish any grounds to support an equal protection discrimination violation. Stuart v. Dept. of Social and Rehabilitation Services, 256 M 231, 846 P2d 965, 50 St. Rep. 48 (1993).

Dangerous Drug Tax Not Double Jeopardy — Civil Remedy Versus Criminal Penalty — Constitutionality of Dangerous Drug Tax: The Department of Revenue assessed a dangerous drug tax on two men who were convicted of possession of dangerous drugs, sentenced, and fined under the criminal code. Two District Courts found that the tax was excessive and punitive rather than remedial and that it constituted a second criminal penalty imposed for the same crime in violation of the constitutional prohibition against double jeopardy. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that the dangerous drug tax is an excise tax based on the quantity of drugs in the taxpayer's possession and does not impose any affirmative disability or restraint of liberty or privileges upon the taxpayer. Under Helvering v. Mitchell, 303 US 391, 82 L Ed 917, 58 S Ct 630 (1938), both a civil and criminal penalty are allowed for the same act or omission. Although the conduct of possessing dangerous drugs subjects a taxpayer to both a criminal penalty and a tax, the tax is not so punitive in purpose or effect that it negates the legislative intent to create a civil sanction. Rather, the tax is remedial and is collected through a separate administrative procedure. In distinction to U.S. v. Halper, 490 US 735, 104 L Ed 2d 487, 109 S Ct 1892 (1989), the tax does not serve the goal of punishment rather than its remedial purpose of compensating the government for its loss and needs no proof of remedial costs on the part of the state. The method of reporting the tax due and the method of collecting the tax do not transform it into a criminal penalty. After applying the factors in Kennedy v. Mendosa, 372 US 144, 9 L Ed 2d 644, 83 S Ct 554 (1963), the court held that the dangerous drug tax is not a criminal penalty and does not rest on a criminal conviction but constitutes a separate civil remedy and as such is not a multiple punishment that violates double jeopardy. The Dangerous Drug Tax Act is constitutional on its face. Sorensen v. Dept. of Revenue, 254 M 61, 836 P2d 29, 49 St. Rep. 624 (1992).

Possession of Explosives and Criminal Mischief — Neither an Inchoate Crime: Wolfe argued that he had been subjected to double jeopardy in being convicted of both possession of explosives and criminal mischief. The Supreme Court held that the statute prohibiting double jeopardy applied only to inchoate crimes and that neither of the two crimes Wolfe was convicted of was inchoate. The Supreme Court also held that under the test used in Blockburger v. U.S., 284 US 299, 76 L Ed 306, 52 S Ct 180 (1932), Wolfe had not been subjected to double jeopardy. St. v. Wolfe, 250 M 400, 821 P2d 339, 48 St. Rep. 1001 (1991).

Possession of Drugs on Person and on Property as Separate Acts of Possession: Defendant was charged and convicted of one count of criminal possession of methamphetamine on his person and one count of criminal possession of methamphetamine on his premises—charges he contended should have been merged into one charge of possession arising from the same transaction. The Supreme Court, while recognizing that the prohibition against double jeopardy protects a defendant both from multiple punishments imposed at a single prosecution for the same offense and from multiple prosecutions for offenses arising from the same transaction, nevertheless found that the Legislature intended to punish both "actual" possession of drugs on the person and "constructive" possession on the premises. Each count required proof of a fact that the other did not. Under the rationale of Blockburger v. U.S., 284 US 299, 76 L Ed 2d 306, 52 S Ct 180 (1932), conviction on both counts was affirmed. St. v. Crowder, 248 M 169, 810 P2d 299, 48 St. Rep. 376 (1991), followed, with regard to multiple offenses of issuing a bad check, common scheme, in Stilson v. St., 278 M 20, 924 P2d 238, 53 St. Rep. 572 (1996), and followed, with regard to issuing bad checks in several thefts, common scheme, in St. v. Savaria, 284 M 216, 945 P2d 24, 54 St. Rep. 852 (1997). However, see U.S. v. Johnson, 909 F2d 1517 (D.C. Cir. 1990), in which it was held that when a defendant possesses the same controlled substance in the same place at the same time, he commits only one act of possession.

Conviction of Sexual Assault and Incest — No Violation of Double Jeopardy Protections: Because the victim was 15 years old, the state had to prove lack of consent for a sexual assault charge. The incest statute does not require proof of lack of consent if the victim is under 18 years of age. The jury could have found defendant guilty of incest and not guilty of sexual assault. Based on the facts of this case, the convictions and sentencing of defendant for sexual assault and incest did not violate double jeopardy protections. St. v. Sor-Lokken, 247 M 343, 805 P2d 1367, 48 St. Rep. 142 (1991), followed in St. v. McQuiston, 277 M 397, 922 P2d 519, 53 St. Rep. 729 (1996).

Trial for Witness Tampering and Underlying Crime Not Constituting Double Jeopardy: The defendant argued that the information charging him was ambiguous and therefore he was unsure as to whether he was being tried twice for the same crime. The Supreme Court found that he was tried for successive crimes arising from separate incidents at separate trials so that double jeopardy did not exist. St. v. Matt, 245 M 208, 799 P2d 1085, 47 St. Rep. 1988 (1990).

Failure to Poll Jury in First Trial: The Supreme Court held that it was not improper for the lower court to order a mistrial without polling the deadlocked jury in the first trial. The Supreme Court also held that there was no presumption that the jury's inability to reach a decision indicated a reasonable doubt as to the defendant's guilt. Therefore, a second trial did not constitute double jeopardy. St. v. Van Dyken, 242 M 415, 791 P2d 1350, 47 St. Rep. 835 (1990), followed in Keating v. Sherlock, 278 M 218, 924 P2d 1297, 53 St. Rep. 855 (1996).

Prosecution Presenting New Evidence at Second Trial: The defendant argued that the prosecution's introduction of new evidence at the second trial constituted double jeopardy. The Supreme Court ruled that a mistrial placed the parties in the same position as if there had been no trial in the first instance and that therefore the introduction of new evidence was proper. St. v. Van Dyken, 242 M 415, 791 P2d 1350, 47 St. Rep. 835 (1990).

Trying Defendant Twice in Five-Year Period for Second Offense DUI Not Double Jeopardy: The defendant was convicted of DUI at 17 years of age. Several months later when he was 18, the defendant was arrested for a second incident and tried and convicted for DUI, second offense. Two years later, the defendant was arrested for a third time, initially with a third offense DUI. The prosecution amended the charge to a second offense DUI upon learning that the defendant had been a juvenile when convicted the first time. The defendant argued that charging him twice within a 5-year period under Montana's DUI scheme for second offense DUI constituted double jeopardy. The Supreme Court held that it was not double jeopardy because the defendant was not being tried twice for the same occurrence. Each charge arose from a separate set of facts. The court further stated that although the first conviction for second offense DUI might not have been correct since the first DUI conviction had occurred when the defendant was a minor, the second charge for a second offense DUI was proper. St. v. Chasse, 240 M 341, 783 P2d 1370, 46 St. Rep. 2178 (1989).

Persistent Felony Offender Statute Not Violative of Double Jeopardy Protection: As set out in St. v. Maldonado, 176 M 322, 578 P2d 296 (1978), the persistent felony offender statute authorizing enhanced sentences for recidivists does not constitute double jeopardy. St. v. Farnsworth, 240 M 328, 783 P2d 1365, 46 St. Rep. 2165 (1989).

Revocation of Suspended Sentence:

Because the revocation proceeding is not a criminal adjudication, does not require proof of a criminal offense, does not impose punishment for any new offense, and is an act in the performance of the duty of judicial supervision of probationary liberty, the double jeopardy clause is inapplicable. St. v. Lange, 237 M 486, 775 P2d 213, 46 St. Rep. 991 (1989), citing St. v. Eckley, 579 P2d 291, 34 Oreg. App. 563 (1978), and followed in St. v. Brister, 2002 MT 13, 308 M 154, 41 P3d 314 (2002).

The court rejected defendant's contention that revocation of a suspended sentence enhanced his punishment and thus subjected him to double jeopardy. Even though a defendant must live with the conditions of probation throughout the period of suspension and even though he must serve the entire sentence if the suspension is revoked, there is no double jeopardy. The prohibitions against double jeopardy do not preclude the State from filing a second petition for revocation of suspended sentence that alleges the same facts. St. v. Oppelt, 184 M 48, 601 P2d 394 (1979), followed in St. v. Johnston, 2008 MT 318, 346 M 93, 193 P3d 925 (2008). Johnston was overruled in part in St. v. Maynard, 2010 MT 115, 356 Mont. 333, 233 P.3d 331.

Offenses Revealed in Treatment as Part of Plea Bargain — Further Prosecution Barred: As a prerequisite to a plea bargain, defendant was required to participate in a treatment program. In order to be accepted for treatment, he had to undergo an evaluation of his amenability to treatment. An indication of his amenability was his willingness to admit his past behavior. Unless the evaluator believed defendant had admitted all offenses, defendant would not be accepted into the program. If not accepted, plea negotiations would cease and defendant would face a prison sentence or fine. Hence, in order to ensure the continuance of negotiations, defendant waived his right to silence and underwent evaluation. When defendant admitted further crimes during evaluation, the state sought a sentence in excess of that agreed upon in the plea bargain. The Supreme Court held that fundamental fairness forbade the state from prosecuting the defendant for offenses for which he had essentially already been punished. St. v. Thiel, 236 M 63, 768 P2d 343, 46 St. Rep. 182 (1989).

Original Sentence Not Reduced to Writing — Second Sentencing Not Double Jeopardy: At a sentencing hearing, defendant was sentenced to 80 years plus 5 years as a persistent felony offender. The sentence was not reduced to writing. Nine days later at a second sentencing hearing, the sentence was amended to provide ineligibility for parole during the first 40 years of imprisonment. The second sentence was reduced to writing. Defendant claimed the subsequent amendment constituted double jeopardy. However, the imposition of a more severe sentence is not equivalent to being twice placed in jeopardy. The appeal of a sentence imposed upon conviction does not expose a defendant to successive prosecutions or multiple punishments for the same crime. A defendant remains subject to a single determination of guilt or innocence and a single, albeit potentially more severe, punishment. St. v. Wirtala, 231 M 264, 752 P2d 177, 45 St. Rep. 596 (1988), overruled, to the extent that the written judgment and commitment, rather than the oral pronouncement of sentence, is considered the final, valid order, in St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998).

Manifest Necessity for Mistrial and Retrial — Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — No Basis for Reversal by Subsequent Trial Judge: After 1 day of trial, a trial court on its own motion exercised sound discretion in finding manifest necessity for a mistrial based on the conclusion that counsel was too inexperienced to defend a major felony charge involving conspiracy and accountability theories. The court also properly found that manifest necessity dictated the matter be retried and that the bar of double jeopardy did not prevent a retrial. On appeal, the Supreme Court distinguished Strickland v. Washington, 466 US 668, 80 L Ed 2d 674, 104 S Ct 2052 (1984), in noting that the second prong of the Strickland test was established for the consideration of action taken in the course of a complete trial. Because there was no way of showing whether counsel's conduct deprived defendant of a fair trial unless the trial had been allowed to go to a conclusion, Strickland was inapplicable. There was no basis for reversal of the mistrial decision by a subsequent trial judge. St. v. Moran, 231 M 387, 753 P2d 333, 45 St. Rep. 79 (1988). Opinion withdrawn, but issue affirmed in St. v. Moran, 231 M 387, 753 P2d 333, 45 St. Rep. 703 (1988).

Bear Killed Unlawfully — State Prosecution Barred: Defendant was charged in state District Court for subscribing to a materially false statement on an application for a grizzly bear trophy license and was charged and convicted in federal District Court for violating the Endangered Species Act for taking the same trophy. The federal court and the state court have concurrent jurisdiction, and the state prosecution is barred as it is based on an offense arising out of the same transaction as the federal charge. St. v. Sword, 229 M 370, 747 P2d 206, 44 St. Rep. 2053 (1987).

Dual Sovereignty Exception: Section 46-11-504 eliminates the "dual-sovereignty" exception to the prohibition against double jeopardy. It bars state prosecution following federal prosecution for the same conduct. It cannot bar a subsequent federal prosecution. U.S. v. Engesser, 788 F2d 1401 (9th Cir. 1986). See also St. v. Zimmerman, 175 M 179, 573 P2d 174 (1977).

Incest Conviction Reversed — Retrial for Sexual Assault Not Barred by Double Jeopardy: The prosecution's proof of sexual contact is the same in both the incest statute and the sexual assault statute. The prosecution in the original trial on a charge of incest, reversed on appeal, barred retrial on a charge of sexual assault. A defendant whose conviction was reversed because the evidence was insufficient as a matter of law could not be retried. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed, holding the constitution permits a retrial after a conviction is reversed because of a defect in the charging instrument. St. v. Hall, 224 M 187, 728 P2d 1339, 43 St. Rep. 2120 (1986), reversed, 481 US 400, 95 L Ed 2d 354, 107 S Ct 1825 (1987).

Attempt by Prosecutor to Provoke Defense Motion for Mistrial — Double Jeopardy: When a defendant moves for a mistrial and the motion is granted, the "manifest necessity" standard allowing a court to lift the double jeopardy bar to a second trial does not apply (U.S. v. Tateo, 377 US 463, 12 L Ed 2d 448, 84 S Ct 1587 (1964)). The Montana Supreme Court recognized a narrow exception to this rule, as outlined in Oreg. v. Kennedy, 456 US 667, 72 L Ed 2d 416, 102 S Ct 2083 (1982), holding that the circumstances under which a defendant may invoke the bar of double jeopardy are limited to cases "in which the conduct giving rise to the successful motion for a mistrial was intended to provoke the defendant into moving for a mistrial". In the case at bar, the District Court held and the Supreme Court affirmed that the prosecutor attempted, through a series of overreaching questions, to shift the focus of the trial from a charge of criminal sale of drugs for which there was only weak evidence to sexual crimes initially reported but later denied on cross-examination. The court found that the questions were so prejudicial that the defendant had little choice but to move for a mistrial to avoid a conviction for crimes with which he had not been charged. St. v. Laster, 223 M 152, 724 P2d 721, 43 St. Rep. 1614 (1986), followed in Keating v. Sherlock, 278 M 218, 924 P2d 1297, 53 St. Rep. 855 (1996).

Dangerous Offender Designation Added After Initial Oral Sentencing — No Double Jeopardy: Appellant contended District Court unconstitutionally subjected him to double jeopardy by designating him a dangerous offender after the court had already sentenced him for mitigated deliberate homicide, committing the offense with a weapon, and as a persistent felony offender in a previous hearing that same day. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that the first sentence, which omitted the dangerous offender designation, was not reduced to writing, signed by the judge, or filed with the court; therefore, there was no former jeopardy under the first oral sentence because it was not a final valid judgment. St. v. Enfinger, 222 M 438, 722 P2d 1170, 43 St. Rep. 1403 (1986), followed in St. v. Mason, 253 M 419, 833 P2d 1058, 49 St. Rep. 506 (1992), and overruled, to the extent that the written judgment and commitment, rather than the oral pronouncement of sentence, is considered the final, valid order, in St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998).

No New Trial When Prosecutor Failed to Prove Essential Element of Crime Charged: Defendant was convicted under 45-5-503 of sexual intercourse without consent. On appeal, he claimed that penetration had not been proved at trial. The Supreme Court agreed and reversed the conviction. The victim had testified indirectly on the issue, but her testimony was ambiguous, and she was not asked to explain her statements. The Supreme Court stated that the fact that this is a delicate subject does not eliminate the requirement that the state prove each element of its case beyond a reasonable doubt. The court further ruled that it would be a violation of the constitutional protection against double jeopardy to remand for a new trial. The state had its opportunity to prove its case and failed to do so. Under its authority set forth in 46-20-703 to reduce the offense of which a defendant has been convicted to a lesser included offense because the record contains evidence establishing all of the elements of sexual assault, the Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court for entry of judgment finding the defendant guilty of the crime of sexual assault. St. v. Lundblade, 221 M 185, 717 P2d 575, 43 St. Rep. 732 (1986).

Midtrial Dismissal of Jury Upon Appeal by State of Adverse Evidentiary Ruling — Second Trial as Double Jeopardy: After a DUI negligent homicide trial began, the state decided to appeal the trial court's order sustaining objection to the admissibility of blood analyses based on improper chain of custody of the blood samples. The trial court dismissed the jury upon the state's decision to initiate the interlocutory appeal. The Supreme Court held that these circumstances do not show a manifest necessity to terminate the trial, in accordance with Wade v. Hunter, 336 US 684 (1949), and therefore a second trial would constitute double jeopardy. The court further stated that, as a general rule, a ruling on the admission of evidence which is adverse to the state does not constitute an urgent circumstance or a plain and obvious case constituting manifest necessity to discontinue the trial and allow an interlocutory appeal. St. v. Carney, 219 M 412, 714 P2d 532, 43 St. Rep. 54 (1986), distinguished in St. v. Yarns, 252 M 45, 826 P2d 543, 49 St. Rep. 132 (1992).

Conviction for Aggravated Assault, Escape, and Obstructing a Peace Officer — No Double Jeopardy: There was no double jeopardy when defendant was convicted of aggravated assault, escape, and obstructing a peace officer, all of which arose out of the same event, as each offense contains an element not common to the other offenses. St. v. Thornton, 218 M 317, 708 P2d 273, 42 St. Rep. 1614 (1985), followed in St. v. Hawkins, 239 M 404, 781 P2d 259, 46 St. Rep. 1786 (1989).

Mistrial Following Hung Jury — Bailiff Misconduct — Original Jeopardy Not Terminated: Following mistrial because of a jury deadlock, defendant petitioned for a Writ of Supervisory Control, claiming double jeopardy. He contended that misconduct on the part of the bailiff was chargeable to the State in the same manner as misconduct committed by a prosecutor or judge. The Supreme Court refused the petition, but proceeded to declare that in Montana a mistrial following a hung jury does not terminate the original jeopardy. If governmental conduct giving rise to a motion for mistrial was intended to provoke defendant into moving for mistrial, then retrial might properly be prohibited. However, the court held that comments by the bailiff were not intended to provoke defendant into moving for mistrial. State ex rel. Forsyth v. District Court, 216 M 480, 701 P2d 1346, 42 St. Rep. 965 (1985), overruled in Keating v. Sherlock, 278 M 218, 924 P2d 1297, 53 St. Rep. 855 (1996).

Right to Speedy Trial Separable From Claim of Double Jeopardy — Speedy Trial Issue to Await Retrial: Following mistrial because of a jury deadlock, defendant petitioned for a Writ of Supervisory Control, claiming double jeopardy and lack of speedy trial. The court refused to take jurisdiction, but proceeded to reject defendant's claim of double jeopardy. The court held, however, that defendant's claim of denial of right to speedy trial was generically different from his claim of double jeopardy. The speedy trial issue could not be considered until the retrial was held and all of the facts presented to the Supreme Court on appeal. At that time, the issue would be ready for decision. State ex rel. Forsyth v. District Court, 216 M 480, 701 P2d 1346, 42 St. Rep. 965 (1985).

Reasonably Specific Date in Information — Double Jeopardy Protected: Information charging incest indicated a 10-month period during which the crime was committed. The court found the information sufficiently specific since victim resided with defendant father during entire period and defendant could not establish deprivation of alibi defense. The court applied the test set forth in St. v. Clark, 209 M 473, 682 P2d 1339, 41 St. Rep. 833 (1984), and held that the two-part test was satisfied. Defendant contended that the broad time frame alleged in the information subjected him to double jeopardy. The court rejected the argument, noting that the State is barred by Art. II, sec. 25, Mont. Const., from retrying defendant for the offense to this particular victim during the time in question. St. v. D.B.S., 216 M 234, 700 P2d 630, 42 St. Rep. 770 (1985).

Retrial on Same Charge — Double Jeopardy: The state's failure to present sufficient evidence to support a charge of felony theft precludes a retrial on the same charge. St. v. Furlong, 213 M 251, 690 P2d 986, 41 St. Rep. 2096 (1984).

Theft and Receiving Stolen Property — Conviction From Same Act — Double Jeopardy: Defendant pleaded guilty to burglary and theft of coins from a residence. Based on a plea agreement, other charges against him were dismissed and he was placed on probation. Restitution was not ordered. While on probation, defendant sold some of the coins for which he had previously been convicted of theft. Criminal charges were filed against defendant under 45-6-301, receiving stolen property. The Supreme Court reversed defendant's second conviction because since both convictions arose from the same transaction, the second conviction was a violation of the prohibition against double jeopardy. St. v. Hernandez, 213 M 221, 689 P2d 1261, 41 St. Rep. 2063 (1984).

Theft and Criminal Mischief — Conviction From Same Act — No Error: Conviction of a defendant of both the crime of felony theft and the crime of felony criminal mischief as a result of the defendant's involvement in one criminal incident is permissible under 46-11-502 (renumbered 46-11-410) and is not a violation of the constitutional prohibition against double jeopardy. St. v. Palmer, 207 M 152, 673 P2d 1274, 40 St. Rep. 1957 (1983).

Multiple Counts Arising From Same Incident — No Double Jeopardy: Defendant was charged in Justice's Court with four counts of misdemeanor assault arising from a fight outside a bar. The jury acquitted him of two counts and found him guilty of two counts. After sentence was imposed, defendant appealed to District Court. Defendant moved to dismiss the charges prior to the trial. The District Court dismissed the charges based on double jeopardy. On appeal, the Supreme Court vacated and remanded, saying the right to a trial de novo in District Court is merely a continuing jeopardy arising from the Justice's Court proceedings. In dicta, the court said the double jeopardy clause protects against: (1) a second prosecution for the same offense after acquittal; (2) a second prosecution for the same offense after conviction; and (3) multiple punishments for the same offense. St. v. Lindseth, 203 M 115, 659 P2d 844, 40 St. Rep. 333 (1983).

Pretrial Dismissal of Case Following Conviction in Similar Case — Use of Evidence Seized Upon Arrest on Dismissed Charge: After tribal court ordered defendant to stay away from a certain residence, he broke into it and was convicted in tribal court of criminal contempt of the court. He was then charged in the Justice's Court with criminal mischief and criminal trespass, arrested, searched, and charged in the District Court with illegal possession of dangerous drugs found during the search. The Justice's Court action was then dismissed. Defendant argued the arrest and search were illegal as the arrest was for a crime growing out of an action that was the subject of a prior conviction and that double jeopardy attached and the evidence obtained during the search was illegal. A second jeopardy did not attach because the Justice's Court action was dismissed before either a jury was empaneled and sworn or the court began to hear evidence. Thus there was no double jeopardy requiring suppression of the evidence. St. v. Caye, 203 M 6, 659 P2d 841, 40 St. Rep. 258 (1983).

Double Jeopardy — Legislative Intent of Multiple Punishment: Defendant contended that his guarantees against double jeopardy were violated when he was convicted of both aggravated burglary and aggravated assault. In determining whether multiple punishments should be allowed for offenses arising out of the same transaction, the dispositive question is whether the Legislature intended to provide for multiple punishments. The court found several bases for concluding that the Legislature intended to permit punishment for both offenses, including the fact that one could commit either offense without committing the other. St. v. Wells, 202 M 337, 658 P2d 381, 40 St. Rep. 127 (1983), followed in St. v. Evans, 247 M 218, 806 P2d 512, 48 St. Rep. 170 (1991).

Double Jeopardy — Assault Conviction in District Court — Driving Under the Influence Conviction in Justice's Court: The defendant's involvement in a vehicular accident resulted in his conviction in Justice's Court of driving under the influence of alcohol and his conviction in District Court of aggravated assault. The defendant's constitutional right against being placed in double jeopardy was not violated as each offense requires proof of a fact the other does not. Driving under the influence requires proof of intoxication, while assault does not. Assault requires proof of bodily injury, while driving under the influence does not. St. v. Pierce, 199 M 57, 647 P2d 847, 39 St. Rep. 1205 (1982).

Conviction of Nonexistent Crime: Hembd was convicted of a nonexistent crime, attempted negligent arson. The jury was given instruction on several crimes, some of which existed. In this case, the jury's verdict is an implicit acquittal of the other charges. It would be a violation of the guarantee against being twice put in jeopardy for the same offense if Hembd were tried. The conviction was therefore reversed with instructions to dismiss the action. St. v. Hembd, 197 M 438, 643 P2d 567, 39 St. Rep. 653 (1982).

Double Jeopardy — Remand Order Not Required to Specify New Trial: A defendant was convicted of aiding and abetting another in witness tampering and aggravated assault. The conviction was reversed and the defendant was rearraigned on the original charges. The defendant was convicted of lesser included offenses. On appeal, the defendant alleged double jeopardy. He argued that the failure to order specifically and expressly a new trial precluded further action. A remand order need not order a new trial for one to occur. The remand order in this case was supported by the opinion of the Supreme Court. On review, the Supreme Court said it was clear its intention was to leave the door open to retrial and accordingly a new trial was granted. Therefore, the defendant's double jeopardy rights were not violated by his second trial. St. v. Cardwell, 191 M 539, 625 P2d 553, 38 St. Rep. 451 (1981).

Additional Penalty for Use of Weapon in Committing Crime — Not Double Jeopardy: A defendant convicted of an offense committed with a weapon and given an additional sentence under 46-18-221 is not subjected to multiple punishments for the same offense in violation of the Double Jeopardy Clauses of the federal and state Constitutions because 46-18-221 does not constitute a separate offense or penalize the defendant for a separate offense; his sentence for an underlying offense is enhanced based upon the existence of an additional factor, the use of a weapon. St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980), distinguished in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999).

Collateral Estoppel: Collateral estoppel applies only when an issue of ultimate fact has been previously determined by a valid and final judgment and only if the applicability inquiry is set in a practical frame and viewed with an eye to all the circumstances of the proceedings. The court examined the record of the prior proceedings, took into account the pleadings, evidence, charge, and other relevant matters, and concluded that the first jury could have grounded its verdict of guilty of robbery on issues other than those required for deliberate homicide. The retrial was ordered because the jury had been erroneously instructed that the defendant could be acquitted of deliberate homicide even though he was guilty of the underlying felony robbery. Collateral estoppel did not apply. St. v. Bad Horse 185 M 507, 605 P2d 1113 (1980).

Retrial After Reversal of Conviction: A defendant is not subjected to double jeopardy by virtue of his retrial after reversal of his judgment of conviction. The original conviction of robbery could have been sustained except for errors. The court did not believe that because the defendant was not guilty of deliberate homicide that he was likewise guiltless of the underlying charge of robbery. The remand was founded on the right of receiving a trial with a properly instructed jury. Double jeopardy did not apply. St. v. Bad Horse 185 M 507, 605 P2d 1113 (1980).

Conviction for Deliberate Homicide and Aggravated Kidnapping: The offenses of deliberate homicide and aggravated kidnapping are separate and distinct offenses in our Codes, and each requires proof of elements the other does not. Therefore, a defendant may be convicted and sentenced for both deliberate homicide and aggravated kidnapping without violating the double jeopardy prohibition even though the counts arose from the same conduct or episode. Because each offense requires proof of elements which the other does not, aggravated kidnapping is not a lesser included offense and defendant's double jeopardy claim must fail on this point as well. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000 (1979), affirmed in St. v. Coleman, 249 M 128, 814 P2d 48, 48 St. Rep. 610 (1991).

Double Jeopardy — Collateral Estoppel: Prosecution of the defendant was not barred by the double jeopardy provision of the United States Constitution and the accompanying doctrine of collateral estoppel even though the defendant had been tried on a similar charge in another county. The instant case involved no issue of ultimate fact that was twice litigated. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Proper Time for Objection: Prosecution of defendant was not barred by the double jeopardy provision of the United States Constitution or by the Montana "same transaction" statutes even though defendant had been tried in another county on a similar charge. The information filed in the other county named different defendants and was filed after the information in the present case. If a valid objection did exist in this area, it would have been proper to make the objection upon the filing of the second information in the other county. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

New Trial Granted Because of Lost Transcript Notes: Defendant did not oppose an order granting him a new trial because the court reporter lost his trial notes but alleged double jeopardy when he failed to get acquitted at the second trial. No valid double jeopardy claim existed because the defendant was not forced to accept retrial. He had available to him procedures under 46-20-304, albeit not totally sufficient, to appeal without benefit of an actual verbatim transcript. Allegations of violation of the right to a speedy trial were unfounded since the initial trial was timely. St. v. Hodgson, 184 M 394, 603 P2d 246 (1979).

Vacating of Prior Acquittal: Olson was found not guilty of rape in 1971 by reason of insanity and committed to the state hospital. He was promptly "released" as a conditional, albeit self-determined, releasee and avoided contact with the police for 5 years. He was arrested in 1977 while assaulting a woman, and it was determined at that time that his release 5 years earlier was unauthorized. Upon being returned to the state hospital he petitioned for release, and in St. v. Olson, 181 M 323, 593 P2d 724 (1979), the Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court with instructions to make specific findings. On remand the District Court vacated the 1971 acquittal on the basis that it was procured by Olson's fraud upon the court. This action by the District Court is invalid because it exposes Olson to double jeopardy. St. v. District Court, 184 M 346, 602 P2d 1002 (1979).

Defendant Not Subjected to Double Jeopardy When Single Act an Offense Against Two Statutes: Charging defendant with practicing medicine without a license and practicing chiropractic without a license for the same acts did not subject the defendant to double jeopardy. The statutes set forth separate offenses. A single act may be an offense against two statutes, and if each statute requires proof of an additional fact which the other does not, acquittal or conviction under either statute does not exempt the defendant from prosecution and punishment under the other. St. v. Blinzler, 183 M 300, 599 P2d 349 (1979).

Conviction of Lesser Included Offense as Bar to Subsequent Prosecution: A subsequent prosecution is barred by a prior conviction if the subsequent prosecution: (1) is based upon the same acts as was the prior conviction; (2) is for an offense of which the offense in the prior conviction is a lesser included offense; and (3) is in a court which is part of the same sovereign as the court involved in the prior conviction. Because the offense of disturbing the peace essentially requires no proof beyond that required for conviction of first-degree assault, it is a lesser included offense of the greater offense of assault. Yother v. St., 182 M 351, 597 P2d 79 (1979).

Jeopardy — When Attaches in Jury Trial — United States Constitution: The Montana statute (46-11-503) providing that jeopardy does not attach until the first witness is sworn cannot constitutionally be applied in a jury trial. The federal rule that jeopardy attaches in a jury trial when the jury is empaneled and sworn is an integral part of the United States Constitution's guaranty against double jeopardy (similar to Art. II, sec. 25, Mont. Const.) and is binding on the states. Crist v. Bretz, 437 US 28, 98 S Ct 2156 (1978), followed in St. v. Carney, 219 M 412, 714 P2d 532, 43 St. Rep. 54 (1986).

Separate Offenses — Lack of Common Elements: The court did not err in permitting the trial and conviction of defendants on two separate offenses, nor did it violate the constitutional guarantee against double jeopardy since the statutes defining the offenses have, in the ordinary situation, no common elements. St. v. Davis & Close, 176 M 196, 577 P2d 375 (1978).

Double Jeopardy — Insufficiency of Filed Information — United States Constitution: The U.S. government's appeal from the dismissal of an information charging a nontribal member with trespassing on Indian land was barred by the Double Jeopardy Clause of the United States Constitution (similar to Art. II, sec. 25, Mont. Const.) since the dismissal, which was based on the grounds that the information failed to state an offense, was granted prior to any declaration of guilt or innocence. A successful government appeal would not justify reversal with instructions to reinstate a general finding of guilt. Finch v. U.S., 434 US 927, 97 S Ct 2909 (1977).

Pretrial Evidentiary Hearing: In a pretrial evidentiary hearing on the defense of mental defect excluding responsibility, defendant was never once placed in jeopardy because he was never subjected to the possibility of conviction of the crime charged. St. v. Hagerud, 174 M 361, 570 P2d 1131 (1977).

Retrial: Double jeopardy provision prohibits one from being twice placed on trial, as well as being twice punished for the same offense; however, it does not prohibit retrial for the same offense if the first trial results in a hung jury. But, where the jury during its deliberations reached a unanimous verdict of acquittal on three charges which were not returned to the court due to confusion over jury instructions, it would be a violation of the double jeopardy provision to retry the accused on those particular three charges. St. v. Herron, 169 M 193, 545 P2d 678 (1976), distinguished in St. v. White Clay, 1998 MT 244, 291 M 147, 967 P2d 370, 55 St. Rep. 1014 (1998).

Legislative Determination of When Jeopardy Attaches: Article II, sec. 25, Mont. Const., does not define when jeopardy attaches, and Legislature is free to make that determination. A statutory provision providing that jeopardy attaches upon the swearing of the first witness did not violate this provision. St. v. Cunningham, 166 M 530, 535 P2d 186 (1975); Cunningham v. District Court, 406 F. Supp. 430 (D.C. Mont. 1975). See Crist v. Bretz, 437 US 28, 98 S Ct 2156 (1978), as to jury trial.

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION
SELF-INCRIMINATION

Evidence Discovered by Lawful Search: Admission of evidence of crime discovered by lawful search incident to arrest for which there was probable cause did not compel defendant to be a witness against himself. St. v. Harris, 159 M 425, 498 P2d 1222 (1972).

Voluntariness of Confession — Pre-Miranda Criteria: Involuntary nature of defendant's confession was not established under pre-Miranda criteria by findings that defendant was 16 at the time, the confession was made during in-custody interrogation, and defendant was advised, before making any admissions, that he could have a lawyer and did not have to say anything. St. v. White, 158 M 238, 490 P2d 720 (1971).

Comment by Prosecutor — Voir Dire: Prosecutor's statement to jury on voir dire that rape case has only two witnesses, the people involved, and that jury must weigh their respective testimony if defendant chooses to testify did not prejudice defendant's case by compelling him to testify. St. v. Anderson, 156 M 122, 476 P2d 780 (1970).

Instruction as to Duty to Explain Possession of Stolen Property:

Portion of court's instruction to jury which stated that failure of defendant to explain his possession of stolen property pointed to his guilt did not amount to forbidden comment on defendant's failure to testify since explanation could have been given by defendant, by having another person testify, or by introducing real evidence. St. v. Branch, 155 M 22, 465 P2d 821 (1970).

Instruction that mere unexplained possession of stolen property was not sufficient to justify conviction but that one found in possession of property that may have been stolen must explain such possession in order to remove effect of that fact as circumstance to be considered with other evidence pointing to guilt did not deprive defendant of his right to remain silent. St. v. Gray, 152 M 145, 447 P2d 475 (1968).

Comment by Prosecutor — Final Argument: Conviction was reversed and new trial granted where prosecutor in final argument to jury made comment to jury which could only have been construed as reflecting prejudicially on defendant's failure to take stand and testify. St. v. Hart, 154 M 310, 462 P2d 885 (1969), followed in Columbus v. Harrington, 2001 MT 258, 307 M 215, 36 P3d 937 (2001), to the extent that a prosecutor's comment was error (although harmless) as an improper reference to defendant's decision not to testify when defendant was the only person who could have offered contradictory evidence.

Instruction on Defendant's Credibility:

In prosecution for second-degree assault, court did not err in giving general instruction that prescribed standard by which jury might judge defendant's credibility as authorized by former section. St. v. Manning, 149 M 517, 429 P2d 625 (1967).

While it is the general rule that a court ought not in its instructions single out a particular witness and direct the attention of the jury to his testimony, former section 2442, 1895 Penal Code (now repealed), made an exception to the rule, and the court could properly instruct that the jury, in judging the credibility of one on trial for a crime and the weight to be given to his testimony, could take into consideration the fact that he was the defendant and the nature and enormity of the crime of which he stood charged. St. v. De Lea, 36 M 531, 93 P 814 (1907).

Instruction Placing Burden on Defendant to Explain Possession of Stolen Property: An instruction which has the effect of placing the burden on defendant to explain his possession of stolen property was erroneous. St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959); explained in St. v. Branch, 155 M 22, 465 P2d 821 (1970); overruling St. v. Sparks, 40 M 82, 105 P 87 (1909), and St. v. Willette, 46 M 326, 127 P 1013 (1912).

Applicability to Civil Cases: The protection afforded by Art. III, sec. 18, 1889 Mont. Const., was accorded a person although the proceeding in which he was to testify was a civil one. State ex rel. Neilson v. District Court, 128 M 445, 277 P2d 536 (1954).

Compelling Deposition: When petition for deposition alleges facts which show that the person whose testimony is desired could be charged with a felony, to compel the person to testify would violate Art. III, sec. 18, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Neilson v. District Court, 128 M 445, 227 P2d 536 (1954).

Introduction of Testimony at Inquest — Defendant Unaware of Right to Remain Silent: When one charged with homicide without being informed of his right to counsel, that he could refuse to testify, and that his statements might be used against him was required to answer questions at the inquest put to him by the County Attorney under the belief that he had to obey his orders, and at trial the State introduced his entire testimony, admission was in violation of defendant's constitutional rights. St. v. Allison, 116 M 352, 153 P2d 141 (1944).

Protection Applies to All Testimony of Defendant: The constitutional guaranty against self-incrimination in a criminal proceeding applies to any testimony given by defendant, regardless of whether a confession, admission, or simply a statement of facts pertinent to the issues and tending to prove other facts of guilt. St. v. Allison, 116 M 352, 153 P2d 141 (1944).

Waiver to Be Informed and Intelligent: While the constitutional rights guaranteed to one accused of crime may be waived, waiver must be informed and intelligent. There can be no waiver by one who does not know his rights or what he is waiving, and courts indulge every reasonable presumption against waiver of such rights. St. v. Allison, 116 M 352, 153 P2d 141 (1944).

Articles Owned by Defendant: When defendant on trial for attempting to maim horses by shooting them with a shotgun was found in bed when arrested, the officer, who testified that he had a search warrant, properly seized a pair of shoes standing near the bed and a box of shells in plain sight, as well as a shotgun, and the articles were properly admitted in evidence over objection that by their use defendant was being compelled to become a witness against himself. St. v. Benson, 91 M 21, 5 P2d 223 (1931).

Instruction on Defendant's Credibility When Defendant Did Not Testify: When defendant did not testify in his own behalf, an instruction in the words of former section that if defendant did testify, the jury, in judging of the credibility and weight of his testimony, could take into consideration the fact that he was the defendant and the nature and enormity of the crime, though unnecessary, was harmless. St. v. Kessler, 74 M 166, 239 P 1000 (1925); St. v. Stevens, 60 M 390, 199 P 256 (1921).

Testimony of Defendant — Scope of Cross-Examination: When a witness waives his constitutional privilege by testifying in his own behalf, he renders himself liable to be cross-examined upon all facts relevant and material to the issue raised by his denial of the commission of the offense imputed to him. St. v. Smith, 57 M 349, 188 P 644 (1920).

Testimony of Defendant Subject to Cross-Examination: Although no compulsion may be exercised upon a person charged with crime to make him testify against himself, if the accused goes upon the witness stand in his own behalf, he is subject to cross-examination, although in doing so he may be compelled to incriminate himself. St. v. Vanella, 40 M 326, 106 P 364 (1910).

Instruction That Comment on Defendant's Failure to Testify Prohibited: An instruction, submitted to the jury in a criminal case, embodying the provisions of former section which prohibited comment on defendant's failure to testify, was not open to the objection that it deprived accused of the presumption of innocence. St. v. Farnham, 35 M 375, 89 P 728 (1907).

Defendant — May Waive Privilege: The privilege that "no person shall be compelled to testify against himself in a criminal proceeding" may be waived by consent, either expressly or by implication. St. v. Fuller, 34 M 12, 85 P 369 (1906).

Evidence Obtained by Use of Defendant's Shoes: Evidence obtained by taking the shoes of defendant against his consent and comparing them with footprints leading from the place of the crime is admissible, and its use does not deprive him of this constitutional guaranty. St. v. Fuller, 34 M 12, 85 P 369 (1906).

Application to Disbarment Proceeding: A disbarment proceeding is not a criminal prosecution. The court is not therefore precluded under former section from taking into consideration the accused's failure to be sworn in his own behalf. In re Wellcome, 23 M 450, 59 P 445 (1899).

DOUBLE JEOPARDY

Sentence Increase: Increase of sentence did not constitute double jeopardy. St. v. Henrich, 162 M 114, 509 P2d 288 (1973).

Prosecution in Different Jurisdiction: Defendant who had been acquitted on directed verdict in federal court of charge of assaulting FBI agent could not subsequently be prosecuted in state court for assault arising out of same transaction, even though basis for federal acquittal was failure to prove that victim was acting in performance of duties. St. v. LeCoure, 158 M 340, 491 P2d 1228 (1971).

Defective Information: Information charging a drug offense was insufficient where it failed to contain the identity of informer, specific facts concerning the offense, and identity of time and place so as to protect accused from double jeopardy. State ex rel. Offerdahl v. District Court, 156 M 432, 481 P2d 338 (1971).

Excess Weight Penalty: Statute providing for a penalty for any excess freight weight is a penalty in addition to other penalties provided by statute and violates neither double jeopardy provision nor statute providing that when action is punishable under different provisions of Code, punishment may be had under only one of them. State ex rel. Olson v. District Court, 151 M 12, 438 P2d 560 (1968).

Separate Counts Stating Separate Offenses: Information in five counts, three of which alleged larceny of more than one cow, did not violate former jeopardy provision in that each count stated separate offense under grand larceny statute, making theft of each animal separate and distinct offense, and in view of further statute permitting information to charge more than one offense in separate counts. St. v. Johnson, 149 M 173, 424 P2d 728 (1967).

Not Applicable to Probationary Rules: Jeopardy, as applied to double punishment in the constitutional sense, requires punishment imposed as such and for that purpose and has no application to probationary rules placing reasonable restraints on a person's actions and conduct for the purpose of his rehabilitation. In re Williams, 145 M 45, 399 P2d 732 (1965), distinguished in Maldonado v. Crist, 162 M 240, 510 P2d 887 (1973).

Conviction on One Count — Not Bar to Prosecution for Other Offenses: When the defendant was charged with 22 counts of statutory rape, conviction on one or more of those counts could not be imposed as a bar to a prosecution for any of the other offenses charged, and when they were set forth separately in the information, there was no violation of constitutional prohibitions. St. v. Boe, 143 M 141, 388 P2d 372 (1963), followed in St. v. Hamilton, 2007 MT 223, 339 M 92, 167 P3d 906 (2007).

Dismissal of Complaint on Demurrer: Defendant charged with sale of intoxicating liquor to a minor was not placed in former jeopardy by a dismissal of the complaint upon his demurrer without any further proceedings. St. v. Moore, 138 M 379, 357 P2d 346 (1960).

Test for Multiple Counts: The test to be applied in determining whether conviction on any one of the counts, all arising out of the same act, will bar conviction of any of the others, is whether the same evidence would sustain a conviction under each count; hence where each count required proof of a fact which the others did not, the constitutional guaranty is not violated. St. v. Marchindo, 65 M 431, 211 P 1093 (1922).

"Jeopardy" Defined as of Adoption of Constitution: The right to immunity from a second prosecution is constitutional, and that right is to be measured by the meaning of the term "jeopardy" as employed in the constitutional provision. This is to be ascertained from the state of the law when the Constitution was adopted, not from subsequent legislation; and as so ascertained, the term was not intended to apply merely to those cases where a verdict has been rendered but it applies as well to every case where the defendant has been brought to trial. St. v. Gaimos, 53 M 118, 162 P 596 (1916).

Discharge of Jury at Former Trial: Defendant was charged with murder, was tried three times, and at the third trial found guilty of manslaughter. The jury disagreed upon the second trial and was discharged. At the third trial the plea of once in jeopardy was interposed on the ground that the jury had been discharged at the second trial without necessity, which defense was overruled by the District Court. Under these circumstances, the disagreement of the jury and their consequent discharge did not operate to bring the defendant within the provision of Art. III, sec. 18, 1889 Mont. Const. St. v. Keerl, 33 M 501, 85 P 862 (1905).

Protection Limited to Prohibition of Second Trial After Conviction or Acquittal: The constitutional security a person has against being twice put in jeopardy for the same offense prevents only a second prosecution after the first has resulted in a conviction or acquittal. Intermediate steps, such as the dismissal of an indictment on technicalities, give him no such security. St. v. Vinn, 50 M 27, 144 P 773 (1902).

Not Applicable to New Trial on Defendant's Motion: The plea of former jeopardy cannot be maintained on a second trial which a defendant has obtained upon his own motion. St. v. Thompson, 10 M 549, 27 P 349 (1891); Territory v. Hart, 7 M 489, 17 P 718 (1888), followed in St. v. Biehle, 251 M 257, 824 P2d 268, 49 St. Rep. 47 (1992).

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

Typographical Error on Verdict Form Regarding Lesser Included Offenses — Plain Error Review Not Invoked: The defendant was charged with aggravated burglary and the lesser included offense of burglary, as well as accountability for both charges. Although the District Court properly instructed jurors that they must decide each count separately, a typographical error on the verdict form instructed the jury that the defendant "may not be found 'not guilty' of both alternative or lesser included offenses". Following his conviction, the defendant appealed, asking the Supreme Court to invoke plain error review due to the error on the verdict form. The Supreme Court declined to exercise plain error review and affirmed, noting that the jury did not reach the alternative or lesser included offenses on the form and that the defendant had not convinced the Court that the error called into question the fundamental fairness of his trial. St. v. Daniels, 2019 MT 214, 397 Mont. 204, 448 P.3d 511.

Jury Trial for Serious Offense — Finding of Waiver by Conduct for Failure to Attend Hearing Reversible Error: Prior to trial, the Municipal Court denied the defendant's motion for a jury trial, deeming the matter waived by the defendant's failure to attend a hearing. The District Court affirmed the denial. The Supreme Court reversed, finding that because the charged offense carried a maximum sentence of 1 year in jail, it qualified as a serious offense implicating the 6th and 14th amendments of the U.S. Constitution. As such, the defendant could only have waived his right to a jury trial through a knowing, intelligent, and voluntary waiver. The Supreme Court held that "waiver by conduct" or "forfeiture with knowledge" was insufficient to meet that burden, and given that the defendant's counsel requested a jury trial, objected at the beginning of the bench trial, and never made a statement suggesting that he wished to waive a jury trial, the defendant had not knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily waived his right to a jury trial. Kalispell v. Salsgiver, 2019 MT 126, 396 Mont. 57, 443 P.3d 504.

Possession of Dangerous Drugs — Mere Presence Jury Instruction Not Required for Passenger — District Court Discretion — Substantial Rights Not Affected: The jury was correctly instructed on the charge of criminal possession of dangerous drugs during the defendant's second jury trial. The defendant argued that, since he was only a passenger in the vehicle and the state failed to prove he had possession over the drugs, a "mere presence" instruction be given. The District Court denied the defendant's request for the instruction, determining that it was only appropriate in accountability cases. The Supreme Court determined that the District Court fully and fairly instructed the jury on the applicable law on criminal possession of dangerous drugs and had the authority to instruct in this way, rather than give the defendant's "mere presence" instruction, because it had broad discretion in formulating and approving jury instructions. Based on the evidence presented at trial, and the instructions provided, the defendant could not demonstrate that the District Court's refusal to give his instruction affected his substantial rights and constituted reversible error. St. v. Ellerbee, 2019 MT 37, 394 Mont. 289, 434 P.3d 910.

Technical Violation of Alternate Juror Statute — Harmless Error — No Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: The District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion to set aside the jury verdict and grant the defendant a new trial, despite a technical violation of 46-16-118. Following a guilty verdict, the court may grant the defendant a new trial if required in the interest of justice without a motion or if justified by law and by the weight of the evidence deny, grant, or modify the verdict after motion and hearing. While the statutory jury selection procedures, including those regarding alternate jurors contained in 46-16-118, are designed to protect against violations of the defendant's constitutional right to a fair and impartial jury, not every violation of the statutory process must result in reversal. Technical departures from the jury selection statutes and violations that do not threaten the goals of random selection and objective disqualification do not constitute a substantial failure to comply. Similar to St. v. Bearchild, 2004 MT 355, 324 Mont. 435, 103 P.3d 1006, the defendant did not challenge the composition of the jury or even its impartiality but, rather, challenged a particular juror. Although the defendant was entitled to an impartial jury, he had no right to a particular juror. There was no material failure by the District Court to comply with Montana's jury selection statutes, and the technical error was harmless. Because the error was harmless, the District Court correctly concluded that the interests of justice did not require a new trial and, as such, the defendant was unable to establish his ineffective assistance of counsel claims. St. v. Oschmann, 2019 MT 33, 394 Mont. 237, 434 P.3d 280.

Norquay Instruction Given to Jury — No Coercion: After deliberating for 2 ½ hours, the jury in a DUI case submitted a note stating that it could not reach a unanimous decision as to the verdict. The District Court gave a Norquay instruction based on St. v. Norquay, 2011 MT 34, 359 Mont. 257, 248 P.3d 817. After an additional hour of deliberation, the jury returned a unanimous guilty verdict. The Supreme Court found that neither the substance nor the timing of the Norquay instruction constituted abuse of discretion. St. v. Sweet, 2018 MT 263, 393 Mont. 202, 429 P.3d 912.

Agreement Containing Clear and Unambiguous Arbitration Provision Signed by Plaintiffs — Arbitration Properly Enforced: The plaintiffs, who were investors, sued the defendants, two investing and financial businesses, after sustaining substantial losses. The plaintiffs' claims included misrepresentation, fraud, and self-dealing, among others. The defendants filed a motion to stay the legal proceedings and to compel the plaintiffs to arbitrate their claims pursuant to an arbitration agreement. At the hearing on the motion, the plaintiffs each testified that they did not recall reading or receiving the arbitration agreement. The defendants provided evidence that each plaintiff had signed a customer agreement form that contained a clear and unambiguous arbitration clause. The District Court concluded that the fact that none of the plaintiffs recalled reading or receiving the arbitration agreement did not overcome the presumption that they knowingly and without duress signed the agreement. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the stay, agreeing that the plaintiffs, which included a lawyer and an accountant, had validly waived their right to a jury trial. Lenz v. FSC Sec. Corp., 2018 MT 67, 391 Mont. 84, 414 P.3d 1262.

Two Alleged Sexual Assaults — General Unanimity Instruction — Denial of Plain Error Review: The defendant was accused of sexually assaulting a child on two occasions. After his conviction, the defendant contended that although the jury unanimously found him guilty of sexual assault against the victim, they might not have unanimously concluded that the state had proved at least one of the two particular acts. He contended that the District Court's failure to give a specific unanimity instruction instead of a general unanimity instruction, the latter of which it did give, was plain error. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, noting that the record reflected that the jury had unanimously found the defendant guilty of the second act. St. v. Stutzman, 2017 MT 169, 388 Mont. 133, 398 P.3d 265.

Forfeiture Statutes Operate as Penalty — Right to Jury Trial: Where title and possession to real property are at issue, the action is legal and entitles a party to a jury trial under Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const. The Supreme Court noted that forfeiture statutes operate to transfer property rights to the state, as a penalty against the owners for misuse of the property, and it is too narrow of an interpretation to characterize a forfeiture proceeding as only one of determining title. St. v. Chilinski, 2016 MT 280, 385 Mont. 249, 383 P.3d 236.

Right to Jury Trial Required for In rem Forfeiture Action: After consideration of both American and English common law, federal jurisprudence, and decisions from sister states, the Supreme Court joined the majority of states and federal courts and concluded there is a right to trial by jury guaranteed by Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const., in an in rem forfeiture proceeding under 44-12-201, et seq. (now repealed). St. v. Chilinski, 2016 MT 280, 385 Mont. 249, 383 P.3d 236.

Enforceability of Arbitration Absent Clear and Unmistakable Delegation Provision: In an arbitration agreement between a debt relief organization and a debt-ridden consumer, there was no clear and unmistakable delegation provision that would preempt the rule that the enforceability of an arbitration provision is for a court to decide. Therefore, the District Court did not err in reserving to itself the determination of arbitrability. Global Client Solutions, LLC v. Ossello, 2016 MT 50, 382 Mont. 345, 367 P.3d 361.

Waiver of Right to Jury Trial — Defense Counsel's Motion Satisfies Signature Requirement: The defendant was charged with felony aggravated assault and initially did not waive his right to a jury trial. His counsel, however, later filed a motion to vacate the jury trial and proceed with a bench trial. On the first day of the bench trial and with both the defendant and his counsel present in the courtroom, the judge stated that the defendant had waived his right to a jury trial and neither objected. Following his conviction, the defendant claimed that he had not waived his right to a jury trial because he had not personally signed a waiver as required under 46-16-110(3). The Supreme Court disagreed, ruling that the defense counsel's signature on the motion to vacate satisfied the statute. Also, by not objecting to the District Court's statement regarding his waiver on the first day of trial, the defendant had ratified the statement. St. v. Reim, 2014 MT 108, 374 Mont. 487, 323 P.3d 880.

Evidence of Prior Rape Conviction Introduced at Trial — Violation of Right to Fair Trial: During his trial on charges of sexual intercourse without consent, the defendant gave notice that he intended to establish that the victim, with whom he had been in a long-term relationship, had a violent character. The defendant was advised that were he to discuss her character, his own full criminal history could be discussed at trial. During the trial, the prosecutor mentioned the defendant's prior rape conviction. After his conviction, the defendant appealed, arguing that the discussion of his prior rape conviction violated his right to a fair trial. The Supreme Court agreed, noting that there was a reasonable possibility that the evidence of his prior rape conviction had influenced the defendant's conviction, and remanded the matter for a new trial. St. v. Rogers, 2013 MT 221, 371 Mont. 239, 306 P.3d 348.

Sleeping Jurors Not Observed by District Court — Motion for New Trial Properly Dismissed Without Hearing: After a jury found him guilty of 10 sexual crimes, the defendant moved for a new trial on multiple grounds, including an allegation that several jurors may have been asleep during portions of the trial testimony. The District Court received briefs and denied the motion without conducting a hearing. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed and determined that the defendant's allegations were inconsistent with the District Court's own personal observations. Moreover, it was not an abuse of discretion for the District Court to deny the motion for a new trial based on the briefing of the parties without conducting a hearing. St. v. Geren, 2012 MT 307, 367 Mont. 437, 291 P.3d 1144.

Allen Instruction Given to Potentially Hung Jury — Insufficient Evidence to Trigger Plain Error Review: The Supreme Court declined to review under the plain error doctrine the defendant's mere assertions that the Municipal Court's supplemental Allen instruction dynamited the jury and resulted in a conviction when there would otherwise have been a hung jury, holding that the record lacked sufficient evidence to support the assertions. Billings v. Edward, 2012 MT 186, 366 Mont. 107, 285 P.3d 523.

Award of Restitution When Causation Not Element of Offense — No Constitutional Violation: The defendant was involved in a collision between her vehicle and the victim's bicycle, but because she apparently was unaware of the collision, she drove away from the scene of the accident. After the jury found the defendant guilty of failure to remain at the scene of an accident in violation of 61-7-103 and failure to notify authorities of an accident in violation of 61-7-108, the defendant's sentence included an order to pay the victim $4,148.60 in restitution. The defendant argued that her constitutional rights to procedural and substantive due process were violated because the jury did not determine causation as an element of either offense and the restitution was not adjusted to account for the victim's comparative negligence. The Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed, concluding that the jury was not required to determine causation or comparative negligence, but only to decide whether the victim's losses resulted from the defendant's commission of the offenses. Additionally, the court found that the defendant had failed to properly preserve a comparative negligence defense because she raised it for the first time on appeal. Billings v. Edward, 2012 MT 186, 366 Mont. 107, 285 P.3d 523.

Failure to Appear at Final Pretrial Conference — Mistake by Counsel — Waiver of Right to Jury Trial: The defendant requested a jury trial for driving with a blood alcohol concentration of 0.08% or greater. Due to a mistake in his counsel's scheduling, neither the defendant nor his counsel attended the final pretrial conference, and the Justice's Court set the matter for a nonjury trial. After the Justice's Court found the defendant guilty, the defendant appealed to the District Court, which affirmed. On appeal to the Supreme Court, the defendant argued that the Justice's Court had erred when it concluded that the defendant had waived his right to a jury trial by not attending the final pretrial conference. The Supreme Court also affirmed, concluding that although the right to a jury trial is inviolate, it may be waived by a defendant's failure to appear, even if that failure is due to a mistake by counsel. St. v. Trier, 2012 MT 99, 365 Mont. 46, 277 P.3d 1230.

Claim of Enhanced Right to Jury Trial Unsupported: The defendant appealed his sentence of life imprisonment, arguing that the right to a jury trial requires that the existence of facts, including a prior conviction, used to enhance a prison sentence beyond a statutory maximum must be submitted to a jury. The Montana Supreme Court, noting that the United States Supreme Court decided in Almendarez-Torres v. U.S., 523 US 224 (1998), that a court may determine that a prior conviction exists to enhance a sentence without infringing on a defendant's right to a jury trial, concluded that the defendant failed to meet his burden of establishing that the Montana Constitution affords an enhanced right to a jury trial when the defendant cited no background supporting his claim. St. v. Covington, 2012 MT 31, 364 Mont. 118, 272 P.3d 43.

Allen-Instruction Language Modified: The Supreme Court, after an examination of an Allen instruction encouraging a jury to reach a verdict in a criminal case, modified Montana Criminal Jury Instruction 1-121 to eliminate the "final test" language. St. v. Norquay, 2011 MT 34, 359 Mont. 257, 248 P.3d 817, cited in Billings v. Edward, 2012 MT 186, 366 Mont. 107, 285 P.3d 523, and St. v. Sweet, 2018 MT 263, 393 Mont. 202, 429 P.3d 912.

Change in Credit Agreement Via "Bill Stuffer" Insufficient Notice on Which Unilateral Change to Contract Acceptable — Enforcement of Arbitration Clause: Defendant issued plaintiff a credit card and subsequently sent a "bill stuffer" with plaintiff's monthly statement that significantly changed the terms of the credit agreement. The change provided for arbitration of all credit disputes and prohibited jury trials and class actions. When plaintiff later filed a claim against defendant for multiple fair debt collections, defendant attempted to compel arbitration, asserting that plaintiff agreed to the credit agreement change through plaintiff's continued use of the credit card. The District Court agreed with defendant, issued an order compelling arbitration, and dismissed plaintiff's action. Plaintiff appealed and the Supreme Court reversed. Making a change in the credit agreement through use of a "bill stuffer" did not provide sufficient consumer notice on which acceptance of a unilateral change to a contract of adhesion could expressly or implicitly be found, including plaintiff's waiver of the fundamental constitutional right to a jury trial. The case was reversed for further proceedings. Kortum-Managhan v. Herbergers NBGL, 2009 MT 79, 349 M 475, 204 P3d 693 (2009), following Keesun Partners v. Ferdig Oil Co., Inc., 249 M 331, 816 P2d 417 (1991), and followed in Riehl v. Cambridge Ct. GF, LLC, 2010 MT 28, 355 Mont. 161, 226 P.3d 581. See also Kloss v. Edward D. Jones & Co., 2002 MT 129, 310 M 123, 54 P3d 1 (2002).

No-Show Constitutes Waiver: Cox was charged in Missoula Municipal Court with driving while under the influence of alcohol and striking an unattended vehicle and failing to leave information at the scene. He entered a plea of not guilty. A jury trial was set for August 30, 2006, and the court issued a corresponding notice of jury confirmation hearing, set for August 25, 2006. The notice stated that the defendant and counsel must appear and that failure to appear by defendant and counsel would be considered a waiver of jury. Because Cox did not appear with his defense counsel at the hearing, the court concluded that he had waived his right to a jury trial, and issued a notice of a judge trial set for November 9, 2006. The judge trial was twice continued on Cox's motion and was finally set for January 12, 2007. Two days before his scheduled trial, Cox filed an objection to the Municipal Court holding a nonjury trial. Cox did not appear for his trial. After hearing argument on Cox's objection from defense counsel, the court overruled the objection and proceeded with the judge trial in Cox's absence, finding him guilty of both charges. Cox appealed his conviction to the District Court on the grounds that he was denied his constitutional right to a jury trial in the Municipal Court. The District Court affirmed the Municipal Court conviction, concluding that pursuant to Article II, section 26, of the Montana Constitution, Cox's failure to appear at the jury confirmation hearing resulted in a waiver of his right to a jury trial. Cox appealed. The Supreme Court found that this section is plain on its face and that Cox waived his right to a jury trial by failing to appear at the jury confirmation hearing. City of Missoula v. Cox, 2008 MT 364, 346 M 422, 196 P3d 452 (2008), distinguished in Missoula v. Girard, 2013 MT 168, 370 Mont. 443, 303 P.3d 1283, holding that the defendant had valid medical reasons for not appearing at a pretrial hearing and that the failure to appear does not automatically constitute a waiver of the right to a jury trial, and in Kalispell v. Salsgiver, 2019 MT 126, 396 Mont. 57, 443 P.3d 504, in which the defendant was charged with a serious crime and the sixth amendment of the U.S. Constitution was implicated. See also St. v. Trier, 2012 MT 99, 365 Mont. 46, 277 P.3d 1230, and St. v. Sherlock, 2018 MT 92, 391 Mont. 197, 415 P.3d 997.

Defendant's Right to Counsel and Right to Trial Not Violated During Four Prior DUI Prosecutions — Enhancement of New DUI Charge to Felony Proper: Walker's 2005 DUI arrest was enhanced to a felony charge when driving records indicated that Walker had six prior DUI convictions. Walker alleged that four of the prior convictions were constitutionally infirm because Walker had not been advised of the right to counsel, the right to compel attendance of witnesses, the right to a trial by a jury, and penalty enhancement provisions. The District Court concluded that the four convictions did not violate Walker's constitutional rights and held that the prior convictions could be used to enhance the 2005 DUI to a felony. Walker appealed, and the Supreme Court considered each assertion in turn to determine whether Walker's waiver of the right to counsel and right to trial during the prior prosecutions was made knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily. The initial appearance arraignment documents that Walker signed after being charged with the prior DUI offenses adequately informed Walker of the right to counsel, and Walker indicated an understanding of that right and that an attorney was not desired. A waiver of rights form and a waiver of counsel form that Walker signed evidenced that understanding. It was also sufficient that Walker was informed of the right to call witnesses to attend the proceedings, even though the Constitution does not confer a right to compel witnesses to testify. Walker was also adequately informed of the right to a trial by jury and to a unanimous verdict, but it was unnecessary for the District Court to explain all the nuances or effects of waiving the right to a trial by jury. Lastly, the documents informed Walker that there might be indirect consequences of a guilty plea, including the possible loss of driving privileges and the use of the conviction in the event Walker was convicted of a crime in the future, but the District Court was not required to specifically inform Walker of the indirect consequence that a fourth or subsequent DUI might result in a felony charge, because whether Walker committed a fourth or subsequent DUI was clearly within Walker's sole control and was an indirect consequence of guilty pleas to the prior DUI offenses. Thus, Walker's prior guilty pleas were entered knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily, and the District Court did not err in allowing the use of the prior convictions to elevate Walker's 2005 DUI to a felony. St. v. Walker, 2008 MT 244, 344 M 477, 188 P3d 1069 (2008).

Failure of Defense Counsel to Question Jurors Regarding Ethnic and Racial Bias Not Considered Ineffective Assistance Warranting New Trial: Defendant was convicted of distribution of dangerous drugs and appealed on grounds that because of defendant's ethnicity, defense counsel's failure to question potential jurors regarding ethnic or racial bias constituted ineffective assistance of counsel and deprived defendant of a fair trial. The Supreme Court found no indication that: (1) ethnic or racial issues were intertwined with the drug offense; (2) the offense was racially motivated; (3) an ethnic issue was connected with the trial in any way; and (4) any witness, an attorney, the trial judge, a member of the court staff, or any member of the venire panel was ethnically or racially biased. Thus, defendant was not denied the right to an impartial jury. Defense counsel's performance did not fall below the range of competence required of attorneys in criminal cases simply because jurors were not questioned about ethnic or racial bias, so defendant was not denied effective assistance of counsel. St. v. Ibarra-Salas, 2007 MT 173, 338 M 191, 164 P3d 898 (2007). See also Rosales-Lopez v. U.S., 451 US 182 (1981).

Consideration of Sentencing Factors in Sentencing Persistent Felony Offender Not Violative of Right to Trial by Jury: Following conviction for an eighth DUI, Vaughn was sentenced as a persistent felony offender to a 50-year term in the state prison. Relying on the proposition in Blakely v. Wash., 542 US 296 (2004), that factual findings that serve to enhance a sentence beyond the statutory maximum must be determined by a jury beyond a reasonable doubt, Vaughn appealed the felony sentence, asserting that the 50-year sentence imposed under 46-18-502 served to enhance the sentence beyond the maximum 13-month commitment to the Department of Corrections followed by a suspended sentence of up to 5 years authorized for felony DUI in 61-8-731 and that therefore the persistent felony offender sentence should have been determined by a jury on the facts. The Supreme Court first noted that the Blakely proposition applies to a fact other than the fact of a prior conviction and that it is the fact of a defendant's prior felony conviction that authorizes an enhanced sentence under 46-18-501 (now repealed) and 46-18-502. Here, Vaughn's enhanced felony DUI sentence was based on the sentencing court's finding that Vaughn had a prior felony DUI conviction. That factual determination may properly be made by the sentencing court rather than by a jury. The prior DUI was a sentencing factor that was an aggravating or mitigating circumstance supporting the imposition of a sentence within the range authorized for a persistent felony offender. Thus, Vaughn's right to a trial by jury was not violated by the sentencing court's findings of fact in support of a sentence as a persistent felony offender. The sentence was affirmed. St. v. Vaughn, 2007 MT 164, 338 M 97, 164 P3d 873 (2007). See also Apprendi v. N.J., 530 US 466 (2000).

Constitutionality of Waiver of Jury Trial by Defendant Over State's Objection — Writ of Supervisory Control Granted: Defendant Courville was charged in Justice's Court with speeding, DUI, and possession of an open container. Courville requested a waiver of a jury trial, and the state objected. The Justice's Court granted the waiver, finding that the statute violated Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const. The state filed an application for a writ of supervisory control and a motion for stay of proceedings pending the Supreme Court's review of the application. Courville argued that only a defendant, and not the state, has the constitutional right to a jury trial and the corresponding ability to waive the right despite statutory language to the contrary in 46-17-201. The Supreme Court vacated the waiver of a jury trial, holding that this section provides a right of a jury trial to the state and that both parties in a criminal trial must consent to waiver. State ex rel. Long v. Justice's Court, 2007 MT 3, 335 M 219, 156 P3d 5 (2007), overruling State ex rel. Nelson v. District Court, 262 M 70, 863 P2d 1027 (1993).

Unanimity Instruction Required Regarding Criminal Acts Corresponding to Elements of Crime: At Hausauer's trial for operating a drug lab, the District Court instructed the jury that all jurors must agree in order to reach a verdict of guilt or innocence. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed on other grounds, but noted that because the right to a unanimous jury verdict is a constitutional right, unanimity instructions should fully and fairly instruct the jury on the applicable law, including substantial agreement as to the principal factual elements underlying a specific offense. St. v. Hausauer, 2006 MT 336, 335 M 137, 149 P3d 895 (2006).

No Implied Presumption of Parole Eligibility — Federal Constitutional Protections Not Violated by Sentence of Life Imprisonment Without Parole — Montana Constitutional Protections Not Addressed: Garrymore was sentenced to life in prison without parole for the deliberate homicide of his adopted infant child. Garrymore appealed the parole restriction and sought to have the sentence vacated on grounds that 45-5-102(2) contains an implicit presumption of parole eligibility. Garrymore contended that under the statute, standing alone and without the operation of 46-18-202, he was entitled to a parole-eligible sentence, subject to 46-23-201, that was taken away by the sentencing judge in violation of due process and a trial by jury. The Supreme Court found nothing in sentencing statutes that creates a presumption in favor of parole eligibility that must be overcome in order for a sentencing judge to impose a parole restriction. Rather, sentencing courts have broad discretion under 46-18-202 to impose parole eligibility restrictions on felony sentences, and the Legislature has placed no limitation on the exercise of that authority. A parole-eligible sentence was not taken away from Garrymore because he was not entitled to such a sentence to begin with. Additionally, although the judge must state the reasons for a parole eligibility restriction when one is imposed, no particular finding of fact need be included among those reasons. Therefore, because the statutory maximum for violating 45-5-102(1)(a) is life in prison without parole, restricting Garrymore's parole eligibility did not violate any federal constitutional rights. The Supreme Court also declined to address Garrymore's undeveloped argument that the parole eligibility restriction violated the Montana Constitution's greater jury trial right absent a compelling reason why Montana's greater jury trial right dictated a different result. St. v. Garrymore, 2006 MT 245, 334 M 1, 145 P3d 946 (2006), followed in St. v. Rosling, 2008 MT 62, 342 M 1, 180 P3d 1102 (2008).

Statute Providing No Right to Jury Trial in Parental Rights Termination Cases Not Unconstitutional: The father argued that the language in 41-3-607 providing that there is no right to a jury trial in a proceeding to terminate parental rights violates the guarantee of a jury trial contained in Montana's Constitution. The Supreme Court, citing previous cases and decisions of other jurisdictions, held that the right to a jury trial exists only if that right existed at the time that the 1889 Montana Constitution was adopted and noted that parental termination proceedings did not exist at that time. The Supreme Court also noted that in 1972, the delegates to the constitutional convention considered whether the right to jury trials should be extended to all cases but did not expand the right to a jury trial. In re M.H. & G.H., 2006 MT 208, 333 M 286, 143 P3d 103 (2006).

Clarification of When Two Jury Trials Available: Although Woirhaye v. District Court, 1998 MT 320, 292 M 185, 972 P2d 800 (1998), requires a jury trial in a Justice's Court and in a District Court de novo on appeal as a general rule in misdemeanor cases, there are instances when the accused is entitled to only one jury trial. It is the Legislature's prerogative to provide for subject matter jurisdiction, whether original, exclusive, or concurrent jurisdiction. When the Legislature has provided for concurrent jurisdiction of an offense in Justice's Court and in District Court, the accused is entitled to only one jury trial if the case is filed in the first instance in the District Court. In addition, 3-10-115 provides for Justices' Courts of record and provides that the appellate role of the District Court vis-a-vis these courts is limited to reviewing the record and questions of law. See Art. VII, sec. 4(2), Mont. Const., providing that the District Court "shall hear appeals from inferior courts as trials anew unless otherwise provided by law". Accordingly, although the accused is entitled to a jury trial in the Justice's Court of record, the accused is not entitled to a second bite of the jury trial apple in the District Court because, by statute, the latter court serves only to review the record from the Justice's Court of record and questions of law. St. v. Rensvold, 2006 MT 146, 332 M 392, 139 P3d 154 (2006).

Charge of Single Criminal Act — No Unanimity Instruction Required Absent Possibility of Jury Confusion: In Vernes' attempted deliberate homicide and attempted deliberate homicide by accountability trial, Vernes asserted that a unanimity instruction should have been given to the jury to prevent a conviction occurring as a result of different jurors concluding that Vernes committed different unlawful acts when a single count alleged more than one unlawful act, so that the jury would be required to agree unanimously on specific facts that constituted the elements of each offense. The trial court declined to give a unanimity instruction, and Vernes appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. In St. v. Weaver, 1998 MT 167, 290 M 58, 964 P2d 713 (1998), the Supreme Court held that a specific unanimity instruction to the jury was required when different criminal acts were charged in one count. Although different jurors may generally be persuaded by different pieces of evidence, even when they agree on the bottom line, in this case, the state did not charge Vernes in the alternative, but rather brought two charges stemming from a single attack. Thus, jurors were free to determine that different pieces of evidence supported proof of a material step taken by Vernes to carry out the attacks, as long as the jurors unanimously agreed on the same set of facts, so a unanimity instruction was not required. St. v. Vernes, 2006 MT 32, 331 M 129, 130 P3d 169 (2006), followed in St. v. Russell, 2008 MT 417, 347 M 301, 198 P3d 271 (2008).

Failure of Counsel to Request Unanimity Instructions on Two Counts of Criminal Endangerment Not Considered Ineffective Assistance: Gallagher was convicted of two counts of criminal endangerment and asserted on appeal that failure of defense counsel to request specific unanimity instructions on the two charges constituted ineffective assistance and denied Gallagher the right to a fair trial. Based on the record, the Supreme Court disagreed. Both defense and prosecution counsel argued each count to the jury in closing arguments, linking appropriate facts and specific victims to each count, so juror confusion was extremely unlikely, nor could the court conclude that the trial outcome was prejudiced by the lack of a specific unanimity instruction on the endangerment charges that denied Gallagher a fair trial. Gallagher's convictions were affirmed. St. v. Gallagher, 2005 MT 336, 330 M 65, 125 P3d 1141 (2005).

Error in Excusing Juror for Cause Before Voir Dire — Error Harmless Absent Showing of Prejudice: Prior to voir dire in defendant's trial for sexual intercourse without consent and incest, the prosecutor requested that juror no. 43 be excused. The juror had recently worked in the County Attorney's office and had access to a wide range of information relating to issues that defendant had been involved in, and the prosecutor had recently fired the juror for unsatisfactory performance. The trial judge dismissed the juror because of concerns that the juror might have feelings or predilections for one side or the other and because of the possibility of the juror communicating with other prospective jurors. Following conviction, defendant appealed the decision to excuse the juror for cause prior to voir dire. The Supreme Court concluded that the trial court erred in excusing the juror without an in-court examination to determine actual bias; however, the error was not a material failure to substantially comply with statutes governing procurement of a trial jury, so the dismissal was subject to harmless error review. Defendant could not demonstrate prejudice because even if juror no. 43 had not been dismissed, the juror would not have been on the jury because the last juror empaneled was juror no. 36. The Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Bearchild, 2004 MT 355, 324 M 435, 103 P3d 1006 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204 (2000), and St. v. Blem, 610 NW 2d 803 (S. Dak. 2000).

Presumption of Punishment for Going to Trial Based on Difference Between Pretrial Offer and Actual Sentence — Remand: As set out in St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222 (1981), when a District Court becomes involved in plea negotiations and an offer is made, any difference in the sentencing after trial must point out the factors justifying an increased sentence, and failure to enumerate the factors leads to the presumption that a greater sentence has been imposed for a vindictive purpose. Here, when the District Court failed to justify having an 11-year sentence run consecutively rather than concurrently with another sentence, the Baldwin standard requiring an explanation for imposing a harsher sentence than that offered in plea negotiations was not met, constituting reversible error. The case was remanded for resentencing. St. v. Hall, 2003 MT 253, 317 M 356, 77 P3d 239 (2003).

Preclusion of Wrongful Discharge Suit by Collective Bargaining Agreement Not Unconstitutional Impediment to Access to Courts: When plaintiff filed a wrongful discharge claim, defendant pointed out that the employment was covered by a union collective bargaining agreement (CBA) and that 39-2-912(2) precludes an employee covered by a CBA from seeking relief under the Wrongful Discharge From Employment Act. Plaintiff argued that if she was precluded from bring a wrongful discharge claim solely because her employment was covered by a CBA, then 39-2-912 unconstitutionally violated her access to courts, full redress, and a jury trial. However, constitutionality of a statute is presumed unless the person challenging it proves unconstitutionality beyond a reasonable doubt. Here, plaintiff presented nothing to overcome the presumption of constitutionality. Plaintiff's argument concerning lack of legal redress also failed because a possible action against the union was still available. LaFournaise v. Mont. Developmental Center, 2003 MT 240, 317 M 283, 77 P3d 202 (2003).

Appeal to District Court Allowed Only After Trial in Lower Court, Not After Forfeiture of Bond — Exclusive Statutory Remedy for Appeals From Courts of Limited Jurisdiction: Kempin was charged in Justice's Court with seven fish and game violations but failed to appear for trial, so the appearance bonds that Kempin had posted were forfeited and Kempin's hunting, fishing, and trapping privileges were suspended for 10 years. Kempin appealed to the District Court within 10 days of the Justice's Court judgment, but the appeal was dismissed for lack of jurisdiction and because Kempin had no statutory right to appeal the forfeitures as a matter of law, so Kempin appealed to the Supreme Court. Under Art. VII, sec. 4, Mont. Const., District Courts must hear appeals from inferior courts as trials de novo unless otherwise provided by law, and appeal of a criminal conviction from a court of limited jurisdiction is governed exclusively by 46-17-311, which provides three circumstances under which a criminal defendant may appeal to District Court for a trial de novo: (1) when a defendant pleads guilty or nolo contendere but preserves legal issues raised by pretrial motion for appeal; (2) when a defendant files written notice of intention to appeal within 10 days after a judgment is rendered following a trial; and (3) when a defendant appeals revocation of a suspended sentence. Here, Kempin claimed that denial of a District Court trial by jury following forfeiture in Justice's Court violated his due process rights. However, Kempin raised no appealable pretrial issues, nor was the case an appeal of a suspended sentence, so the first and third circumstances did not apply. Kempin did appeal the judgment within 10 days, but there was no trial, so Kempin was not constitutionally entitled to a trial de novo when there had been no trial initially, nor is 46-17-311 unconstitutionally vague for not explicitly proscribing an appeal following a forfeiture. The Supreme Court agreed with the District Court's explanation in declining jurisdiction—that if a defendant was automatically entitled to a trial de novo on appeal without first having a trial in Justice's Court, a defendant could avoid Justice's Court altogether by not appearing and forfeiting the Justice's Court bonds and then pursuing a trial in District Court, which would render the Justice's Court system meaningless. Kempin's other due process arguments were also not compelling because Kempin waived his trial rights by failing to appear in Justice's Court to assert any constitutional rights and in light of his stated intention to forfeit the bonds and the advance notice of the suspension of the hunting, fishing, and trapping privileges. Absent any statutory basis for an appeal, dismissal of the appeal by the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Kempin, 2001 MT 313, 308 M 17, 38 P3d 859 (2001). See also St. v. Feight, 2001 MT 205, 306 M 312, 33 P3d 623 (2001), and St. v. Schulke, 2005 MT 77, 326 M 390, 109 P3d 744 (2005).

Failure to Instruct Jury Regarding Need for Unanimous Verdict on Alternative Charges — Reversible Error: Hardaway was initially charged with burglary, and the information was amended to charge that Hardaway knowingly entered or remained unlawfully in an unoccupied structure with intent to commit theft or a sexual crime. Hardaway contended that the jury instructions were improperly given in the alternative, allowing the jury to convict even though some members believed that he intended theft, while others believed that he intended a sexual crime. The Supreme Court agreed. This section requires a unanimous verdict in all criminal actions. Unanimity requires more than a conclusory agreement that the accused is guilty of some charged offense. The jury must agree as to the principal factual elements underlying a specified offense, so when an accused is charged in the alternative, the jury must be clearly instructed that it is required to reach a unanimous verdict as to each individual alternative. Absent such an instruction, Hardaway was denied his right to a unanimous verdict, constituting reversible error. St. v. Hardaway, 2001 MT 252, 307 M 139, 36 P3d 900 (2001).

Punitive Damages Case Considered Civil Action — Requirement That Punitive Damages Award Be Unanimous Unconstitutional: Under this section, in all civil actions, two-thirds of the jury may render a verdict that has the same force and effect as if the entire jury had concurred in the decision. A civil action is prosecuted for the enforcement or protection of a right or the redress or prevention of a wrong. Here, Finstad was injured by asbestos in defendant's mine and sued for redress and to prevent defendant from committing similar wrongful conduct. Thus, Finstad's suit, including the claim for punitive damages, constituted a civil action. Punitive damages are merely a component of recovery of the underlying civil cause of action, imposed as enlarged damages for a civil wrong, not a substitute for criminal punishment. Because punitive damages are civil actions, the portion of 27-1-221(6) that requires that an award of punitive damages be unanimous as to liability and amount directly conflicts with this section and is unconstitutional. Finstad v. W.R. Grace & Co., 2000 MT 228, 301 M 240, 8 P3d 778, 57 St. Rep. 934 (2000).

Jury Poll Indicating Lack of Unanimity of Verdict in Criminal Case — Error in Failing to Direct Further Deliberation or Discharge Jury: Following Pyatt's jury trial for felony stalking, the jury was polled in open court as to whether each juror agreed with the verdict. One juror said no, stating that he went along with the verdict because he was outnumbered. Recognizing that a unanimous verdict was required, the court then inquired whether the juror had voted yes in the jury room, and the juror said that he voted in favor of the majority in the end, so his vote was yes. The remainder of the jury also voted yes, so the court ruled that the verdict was unanimous, and Pyatt was convicted and sentenced to the Department of Corrections for 5 years. In polling a jury, the court is to inquire into the jurors' present states of mind as of the time of the poll. To fulfill the jury poll's purpose of safeguarding a defendant's right to a unanimous verdict, the jury poll must afford a juror an opportunity to make an unambiguous reply as to that juror's present state of mind. Here, the juror's response indicated disagreement with the verdict, and the court's further conversation was inappropriate. No juror should surrender an honest opinion as to the weight or effect of evidence or the innocence or guilt of a defendant because the majority of the jury feels otherwise or to return a unanimous verdict or prevent a mistrial. Once the juror indicated disagreement with the verdict, the court should have either directed the jury to deliberate further or discharged the jury, and failure to do so constituted reversible error. St. v. Pyatt, 2000 MT 136, 300 M 25, 1 P3d 953, 57 St. Rep. 555 (2000), following St. v. Holloway, 740 P2d 711 (N. Mex. App. 1987).

Failure to Summon Entire Panel by Telephonic Juror Summoning — New Trial Warranted: Of the 200-juror panel randomly drawn for Lamere's murder trial, over one-third of the prospective jurors were excluded from possible jury service by virtue of the manner in which a telephone-only notification method skewed the random nature and objectivity of the statutory jury selection procedures. By failing to summon the entire panel or array drawn for the trial, the purpose of juror notification was undermined. Jury duty cannot be lightly shirked, as a telephone summoning system allowed, without doing violence to the democratic nature of the jury system. Because the substantial failure to comply with the statutory requirements materially undermined the jury selection process, Lamere was granted a new trial. St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204, 57 St. Rep. 214 (2000), following Thiel v. S. Pac. Co., 328 US 217, 90 L Ed 1181, 66 S Ct 984 (1946), and applied retroactively in Robbins v. St., 2002 MT 116, 310 M 10, 50 P3d 134 (2002). See also St. v. Groom, 49 M 354, 141 P 858 (1914), and State ex rel. School District v. Carroll, 87 M 45, 284 P 1008 (1930).

Substantial Compliance Standard Clarified With Regard to Statutory Process for Forming Jury: The objective statutory procedures established by the Legislature for the random selection of jurors are intended to protect a defendant's fundamental right to a fair and impartial jury and must be substantially complied with. Under Montana case law, the substantial compliance standard is not an absolute rule inasmuch as it permits minor deviations from statutory procedure. These technical deviations do not constitute a substantial failure to comply and therefore do not give rise to a presumption of prejudice. In clarifying the substantial compliance standard, the Supreme Court took guidance from federal case law developed under the federal Jury Selection and Service Act of 1968, 28 U.S.C. 1861, et seq. In order to establish a violation under the federal Act, a defendant must show that the government substantially failed to comply with the methods set forth by statute for jury selection. Substantial failure has been construed as a violation that contravenes one of two basic principles: (1) random selection of jurors; and (2) determination of juror disqualification, excuses, exemptions, and exclusion on the basis of objective criteria. A successful challenge to the jury panel may be founded only on a material departure from the law, a deviation amounting to more than a technical irregularity. Thus, a substantial or material statutory departure that affects the random nature or objectivity of the jury selection process establishes a violation independently of the departure's consequences in an individual case, while a technical or nonmaterial violation constitutes nonprejudicial error under the substantial compliance standard. St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204, 57 St. Rep. 214 (2000), overruling St. v. Robbins, 1998 MT 297, 292 M 23, 971 P2d 359, 55 St. Rep. 1213 (1998).

Telephone Jury-Summoning Procedure Violative of Statutory Selection Process — Showing of Substantial Compliance, Not Prejudice, Required — Reversible Error: Lamere, charged with killing Brownlee, filed a pretrial motion to strike the jury panel, but the motion was denied. The question on appeal was whether the District Court erred in concluding that Lamere failed to show that the telephone-dependent summoning procedure used in Cascade County prejudiced Lamere's substantial rights to a jury drawn and summoned according to law. The Supreme Court applied St. v. Robbins, 1998 MT 297, 292 M 23, 971 P2d 359, 55 St. Rep. 1213 (1998), in holding that the method of summoning jurors by telephone failed to comply with statutes governing the impaneling of a jury because jurors were neither served by mail nor served personally by the Sheriff. However, to warrant reversal, Robbins also required a showing of actual prejudice in addition to a substantial failure to comply with statutory law in drawing a jury panel. The Supreme Court chose to return to the per se rule of reversal for failure to substantially comply with statutes governing procurement of a trial jury, overruling the Robbins requirement of prejudice. The decision turned on the U.S. Supreme Court's contemporary distinction between trial error, to which harmless error review applies, and structural error, to which harmless error review is inapplicable (see Johnson v. U.S., 520 US 461, 137 L Ed 2d 718, 117 S Ct 1544 (1997), and its predecessors). In Lamere's case, the automatic rule of reversal prevailed because errors in the jury selection process are structural in nature, affecting the very framework within which a trial proceeds—errors that indelibly affect the essential fairness of the trial itself. A material failure to substantially comply with Montana statutes governing procurement of a trial jury may not be treated as harmless error because: (1) it precedes the presentation of evidence to the jury and cannot be analyzed as a mere trial error without resorting to speculation; (2) it precedes the trial process and cannot be quantitatively assessed for its prejudicial impact relative to the evidence introduced at trial; (3) it affects the very framework within which the trial proceeds; and (4) the impartiality of the jury goes to the very integrity of the justice system and because the right to an impartial jury is so essential to the concept of a fair trial that its violation cannot be considered harmless error. The substantial compliance standard vindicates not only the rights of the individual defendant but also the rights of the public in ensuring that the jury system remains inviolate, protecting a defendant's right to an impartial jury by encouraging reasonably strict compliance with statutory procedures intended to implement the fair cross-section guarantee of the sixth amendment of the U.S. Constitution. St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204, 57 St. Rep. 214 (2000), following Chapman v. Calif., 386 US 18, 17 L Ed 2d 705, 87 S Ct 824 (1967), Satterwhite v. Tex., 486 US 249, 100 L Ed 2d 284, 108 S Ct 1792 (1988), and Ariz. v. Fulminante, 499 US 279, 113 L Ed 302, 111 S Ct 1246 (1991), followed in St. v. Lopez, 2001 MT 97, 305 M 218, 26 P3d 745 (2001), and applied retroactively in Robbins v. St., 2002 MT 116, 310 M 10, 50 P3d 134 (2002).

Limitation to One Jury Trial Held Unconstitutional: In 1997, the Legislature enacted the provisions codified at 46-7-102(1)(g), 46-17-201(3), and 46-17-311(1), providing that a person tried for a misdemeanor in Justice's or City Court who appeals to the District Court has the right to only one jury trial. Woirhaye was charged with misdemeanor DUI and requested a jury trial in Missoula County Justice's Court. Upon his conviction by the Justice's Court jury, Woirhaye appealed to the District Court for a trial de novo pursuant to Art. VII, sec. 4(2), Mont. Const., and 46-17-311. Woirhaye asked that the District Court declare 46-17-201(3) unconstitutional, but the District Court denied his motion. Woirhaye then petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control, which was granted on the grounds that Woirhaye would otherwise be denied a fundamental right. The Supreme Court held that Woirhaye's right to a jury trial in both the Justice's Court or City Court and the District Court was a fundamental right guaranteed by Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., and this section. The Supreme Court pointed out that the right to a jury trial is guaranteed by Art. III, sec. 2, clause 3, of the U.S. Constitution and the sixth amendment to the U.S. Constitution and also that even if that were not the case, Montana may, under the rationale of St. v. Bullock, 272 M 361, 901 P2d 61 (1995), provide rights in excess of those guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution. The Supreme Court noted, in response to the state's argument that Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., guarantees "a" jury trial, that the state's argument was not persuasive against the language of this section. The Supreme Court also distinguished Ludwig v. Mass., 427 US 618 (1976), holding that Art. VII, sec. 4(2), Mont. Const., was not implicated in the case, and stated that any language in N. Cent. Serv., Inc. v. Hafdahl, 191 M 440, 625 P2d 56 (1981), indicating that a requirement for a jury trial applicable to Small Claims Court was satisfied if the right was granted at the District Court level, was dicta and could not be relied upon to support the state's case that only one jury trial was required. Consequently, the Supreme Court held 46-7-102(1)(g), 46-17-201(3), and 46-17-311(1) to be unconstitutional as violating Woirhaye's right to a jury trial. Woirhaye v. District Court, 1998 MT 320, 292 M 185, 972 P2d 800, 55 St. Rep. 1298 (1998), followed in In re Young, 1999 MT 195, 295 M 394, 983 P2d 985, 56 St. Rep. 759 (1999), and followed and clarified in St. v. Rensvold, 2006 MT 146, 332 M 392, 139 P3d 154 (2006).

Reversal of Conviction for Accepting Oral, Rather Than Written, Waiver of Right to Jury Trial: The constitutional right to a jury trial was violated, requiring reversal, when defendant did not file the statutorily required written consent to waive a jury trial and his attorney stated to the court at the beginning of the trial that defendant waived his right to a jury trial. The court would not examine the totality of the circumstances to determine whether the waiver was knowing and voluntary. St. v. Dahlin, 1998 MT 113, 289 M 182, 961 P2d 1247, 55 St. Rep. 446 (1998), overruling St. v. McCartney 179 M 49, 585 P2d 1321 (1978). However, see St. v. Reim, 2014 MT 108, 374 Mont. 487, 323 P.3d 880, holding that the signature of defense counsel on a motion to vacate satisfies the requirement of 46-16-110(3) for the defendant.

Juror's Affidavit of Juror Misconduct — Inadmissible Under Ahmann Exception — No Evidence of External Influence — Right to Fair and Impartial Jury Not Violated: Berg argued that he was entitled to a new trial because of jury misconduct and attached to his motion the affidavit of juror Flinders stating that juror Carroll said at one point during the trial, in regard to witness testimony: "That's it; that's all I need to hear; it's all over." The affidavit also stated that juror Carroll pointed to another juror and said in regard to the juror, "That's one we'll have to convince." The Supreme Court noted that although affidavits are usually used to prove juror misconduct under 25-11-102(2), they may also, under the exception rationale used in Ahmann v. Am. Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n, 235 M 184, 766 P2d 853 (1988), be used pursuant to 25-11-102(1) when the only two people with knowledge of the infraction are a juror and another person. However, the Supreme Court found that the Ahmann exception did not apply when the communication was between jurors. The Supreme Court also discussed the applicability of Rule 606(b), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), and determined that the comments made by juror Carroll were not an external influence upon the jury and therefore did not fall within the exception to the general prohibition against use of juror affidavits to impeach a jury contained in Rule 606(b). Regarding Berg's final argument that the jury misconduct violated the District Court's instructions and Berg's right to a fair and impartial jury, the Supreme Court reviewed California case law raised by Berg and concluded that it was inapplicable in Montana. State ex rel. St. Comp. Mut. Ins. Fund v. Berg, 279 M 161, 927 P2d 975, 53 St. Rep. 1098 (1996).

Jury Trial Not Statutorily Mandated in Driver's License Suspension Case — Not Violative of Right to Trial by Jury: Section 61-8-403 dictates that the court examine the facts and determine the merits of a petition challenging the suspension or revocation of a license but does not contemplate the role of a jury in the hearing, presuming instead that a jury will not be present, through assignment of tasks to the court. The inviolate right to a trial by jury is not a prospective right that is automatically granted in every new proceeding that may arise. Rather, the right that is constitutionally preserved is that right to a jury trial that existed at the time that the constitution was enacted. There is not and has never been a right to a jury trial in purely equitable actions in Montana. Suspension or revocation of a driver's license pursuant to the implied consent law is a civil administrative sanction, not a criminal penalty, and is intended to protect the public rather than punish the driver. The hearing to determine the propriety of a driver's license suspension is an action in equity because compensatory or punitive damages are not allowed. Further, the reinstatement fee does not constitute a punishment that converts the equitable action into a criminal action because the fee is dedicated to the public purpose of funding county drinking and driving prevention programs. Therefore, a driver is not entitled to a trial by jury in a proceeding to determine the propriety of a driver's license suspension. Supola v. Dept. of Justice, 278 M 421, 925 P2d 480, 53 St. Rep. 984 (1996).

City Court Error to Refuse Waiver of Jury Trial — Error Waived by De Novo Appeal: McCarvel was charged with DUI within the city limits of Billings and scheduled for trial in the City Court. The city demanded a jury trial, but McCarvel waived his right to trial by jury. The City Court refused to accept the waiver, and the jury convicted McCarvel. On appeal to the District Court, McCarvel moved to dismiss on the grounds that the City Court committed error. The District Court refused to dismiss, and McCarvel changed his plea to guilty. Citing St. v. O'Brien, 35 M 482, 90 P 514 (1907), the Supreme Court held that because the trial in District Court is a trial de novo, in which a defendant has an opportunity for a trial without a jury, the opportunity for a District Court trial cured whatever prejudice resulted from the City Court's refusal to grant the right to a waiver provided under the provisions of 46-17-201. Billings v. McCarvel, 262 M 96, 863 P2d 441, 50 St. Rep. 1460 (1993).

Constitutionality of Defendant's Waiver of Jury Trial in Criminal Case Over Objection of State: Hill waived his right to a jury trial on charges of felony assault (now assault with a weapon), resisting arrest, and obstructing a peace officer. The state objected and demanded a jury trial on all factual issues, contending that this section requires that before a jury trial can be waived, both parties must consent and that therefore a jury trial cannot be waived over the objection of the state. Pursuant to the 1972 change in this section, a jury trial is no longer required as a matter of constitutional law in all felony criminal cases, and nothing in the intent of the framers of the constitution indicated that approval of the state was required to allow waiver of the right. In fact, the constitutional revision was implemented expressly for the benefit of the accused. The Legislature has provided a statutory procedure for waiver of the right to jury trial through the 1991 amendment to 46-16-110, which provides that a trial by jury in a criminal case may be waived, without approval of the state, upon written consent of the defendant. The procedure is consistent with the constitutional intent and is therefore not violative of this section. State ex rel. Nelson v. District Court, 262 M 70, 863 P2d 1027, 50 St. Rep. 1447 (1993), distinguishing Patton v. U.S., 281 US 276, 74 L Ed 854, 50 S Ct 253 (1930), and Singer v. U.S., 380 US 24, 13 L Ed 2d 630, 85 S Ct 783 (1965).

Corrective and Preventive Orders Not in Violation of Right to Jury Trial: The right to a jury trial is not violated by the provision contained in 49-2-506, which states that upon finding that a person or entity is engaged in discrimination, the Human Rights Commission must order an end to the conduct and may require any reasonable measure to correct the conduct and rectify any harm to the person discriminated against. Vainio v. Brookshire, 258 M 273, 852 P2d 596, 50 St. Rep. 529 (1993).

Juror Outburst — Court's Removal of Child Witness From Stand — No Prejudice to Defendant: A juror's request to be dismissed when defense counsel persisted in questioning a 9-year-old witness who repeatedly broke down in tears at a certain point in questioning and the court's removal of the witness from the stand did not warrant a mistrial. There was no showing that the juror's outburst resulted in prejudice to defendant, and removal of the witness did not deprive defendant of the right to confront and cross-examine witnesses when the court gave defense counsel the option to resume questioning at a later time. St. v. McNatt, 257 M 468, 849 P2d 1050, 50 St. Rep. 365 (1993), followed in St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 293, 864 P2d 1257, 50 St. Rep. 1564 (1993), and cited in St. v. Brandon, 264 M 231, 870 P2d 734, 51 St. Rep. 244 (1994).

Jury Trial — ERISA Action: A jury trial is appropriate when suit is brought in state court based on a breach of contract claim under ERISA to recover benefits under a group health insurance plan when issues of fact are controverted. Head v. Cent. Reserve Life of N. America Ins. Co., 256 M 188, 845 P2d 735, 50 St. Rep. 20 (1993).

Lack of Standing to Raise Constitutional Issues Absent Wrongful Discharge: A jury found that plaintiffs were not discharged wrongfully. On appeal, plaintiffs raised numerous issues regarding the constitutionality of the Wrongful Discharge From Employment Act, contending that the Act violated the right of trial by jury and the Montana Constitution's privileges and immunities clause, equal protection clause, impairment of contracts clause, and due process clause. The Supreme Court, citing Jones & Harriot v. Judge, 176 M 251, 577 P2d 846 (1978), and Stelling v. Rivercrest Ranches, Inc., 224 M 313, 730 P2d 388 (1986), found that plaintiffs lacked standing to challenge the constitutionality of the Act because consideration of the issues was rendered moot by the jury verdict, resulting in no adverse effect on plaintiffs by the challenged statutes. Allmaras v. Yellowstone Basin Properties, 248 M 477, 812 P2d 770, 48 St. Rep. 519 (1991), followed in Lutey Constr. v. St., 257 M 387, 851 P2d 1037, 50 St. Rep. 321 (1993).

Whether Question of Fact Exists Not Question of Fact — No Right to Jury Trial Absent Evidence of Fact Question: Defendants asserted error in the District Court's denial of their request for a trial by jury, claiming that their affirmative defense constituted a breach of contract claim. However, before there was an entitlement to a jury trial, there had to be issues of fact for a jury to decide. Whether or not there is sufficient evidence to raise an issue of fact is a question of law for the court and not an issue of fact. The right of jury trial on any issue of fact presented by the pleadings is provisional, and if the evidence fails to form an issue of fact, the right of jury trial disappears. The Supreme Court cited numerous cases in holding that when, as in this case, insufficient evidence is presented to have the issue raised by an affirmative defense submitted to a jury, denial of a request for a jury trial is not prejudicial. Fed. Land Bank of Spokane v. Snider, 247 M 508, 808 P2d 475, 48 St. Rep. 285 (1991).

No Constitutional Right to Jury Trial in Racial Discrimination Suit: In a racial discrimination suit, the plaintiff argued that a statute requiring him to file his complaint with the Commission for Human Rights denied him his constitutional right to a jury trial. The Supreme Court ruled that when the Legislature creates a new "public right", it can assign the adjudication of that right to an administrative agency without violating the constitutional mandate of preserving the jury trial in suits at common law. Romero v. J&J Tire, 238 M 146, 777 P2d 292, 46 St. Rep. 1159 (1989), followed in Vainio v. Brookshire, 258 M 273, 852 P2d 596, 50 St. Rep. 529 (1993).

Manifest Error in Failing to Remove Jurors for Cause: It was manifest error for the District Court to fail to remove one juror who had a fixed scruple against punitive damages and had followed his scruple in a previous trial, and to remove a second juror who not only stated he preferred the management side but appeared to have difficulty in hearing and speaking. Plaintiff's counsel was therefore forced to waste peremptory challenges to remove the jurors when he might have used the challenges elsewhere on the panel. Mahan v. Farmers Union Cent. Exch., Inc., 235 M 410, 768 P2d 850, 46 St. Rep. 96 (1989).

Attempt by Jury Foreman to Convey Information on Defendant's Criminal Record to Jury — Remand for New Trial: The jury foreman heard in a third-party conversation that "defendant had a criminal record as long as your arm" and attempted to convey the information to the rest of the jury. Although the jury declined to hear the offered information, the injury to defendant had already occurred when the foreman heard the prejudicial comments and informed the remaining jurors that he had reliable information from the Sheriff's office. The District Court denied a motion for mistrial after examining three jurors, but the Supreme Court would not assume that the entire panel was safeguarded from contamination. In remanding for a new trial, the Supreme Court held that the presumption of prejudice that was created when uncontroverted evidence established that prejudicial statements reached one or more jurors was not rebutted when no evidence existed to rebut the presumption other than testimony of three of the jurors. St. v. DeGraw, 235 M 53, 764 P2d 1290, 45 St. Rep. 2154 (1988), distinguishing St. v. Murray, 228 M 125, 741 P2d 759, 44 St. Rep. 1394 (1987), St. v. Counts, 209 M 242, 679 P2d 1245 (1984), and St. v. Gillham, 206 M 169, 670 P2d 544 (1983).

Aggravating Circumstances Related to Sentencing — Jury Determination Not Required: Defendant argued that the aggravating circumstances with which the trial court justified the death penalty were equivalent to a finding of malice and that he was therefore entitled to have a jury determine facts constituting the aggravating circumstances. The Supreme Court held that defendant was not entitled to a jury determination because the aggravating circumstances were related to sentencing only and were not elements of the crime charged. Capital sentencing procedures do not require jury participation. St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352, 45 St. Rep. 1542 (1988).

Mistrial Denied Despite Juror Misconduct — No Error: A juror disregarded trial court instructions by talking with a County Attorney, who assisted in the prosecution, about the propriety of allowing evidence of child abuse in open court. Another juror was seen entering Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) offices after evidence was allowed showing the agency was peripherally involved in the case, and there was evidence the juror discussed the defendant and her children during a conversation at a restaurant. Arguably, the jury misconduct tended to injure the defendant, and therefore prejudice should be presumed; however, the trial judge could determine that there was sufficient evidence to rebut the presumption. Since there was not clear and convincing evidence of error in denying a motion for mistrial, the ruling was affirmed. St. v. Murray, 228 M 125, 741 P2d 759, 44 St. Rep. 1394 (1987).

Declaratory Judgment on Requiring Prepayment of Jury Fees by Party Demanding Jury: The Supreme Court took original jurisdiction of, and heard, a petition for a declaratory judgment that it was unconstitutional to require prepayment, by a party requesting a civil jury trial, of each day's jury fees at or before the end of the prior day. The requirement was contained in Rule 14F, M.J.C.R.Civ.P. (Title 25, ch. 22, superseded 1990). There was a justiciable controversy of statewide impact in that the rule applied to all justice courts; delay could abridge vital constitutional rights of litigants; the purpose of the declaratory judgment would serve the office of a writ, and the court has jurisdiction to issue, hear, and determine writs; and it would promote judicial economy to accept jurisdiction rather than force piecemeal litigation on the constitutionality of the rule. The court said that the prepayment requirement was contained in the rule and 3-15-203, which provided that "In civil actions, the jurors' fees must be paid by the party demanding the jury and taxed as costs against the losing party", and declared both the statute and rule unconstitutional. Hammer v. Justice Court, 222 M 35, 720 P2d 281, 43 St. Rep. 1040 (1986).

Prepayment of Juror Fees Invalid: In a challenge to 3-15-203, requiring the prepayment of juror's fees for trial by jury in Justice Court, the court found the statute invalid as a violation of Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const. The court said the statute restricted the inviolate right to jury trial. The court found that the statute conflicted with the plain meaning of the constitution. The court said that the statutory scheme whereby the prepaid jury fees were taxed as costs against the losing party suggested that the statute was not a true mechanism for recovery of costs but rather a device to discourage the exercise of the right to jury trial. Hammer v. Justice Court, 222 M 35, 720 P2d 281, 43 St. Rep. 1040 (1986).

Right to Jury Trial — Not Applicable to Suspended Sentence Revocation Proceedings: Since a trial by jury under the seventh amendment to the U.S. Constitution and Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const., is guaranteed only in "criminal prosecutions", it does not apply in proceedings for revocation of a suspended sentence. St. v. Watts, 221 M 104, 717 P2d 24, 43 St. Rep. 670 (1986).

Remedy in Contract or in Tort — Motion for Separate Trials: An insurer requested a separate trial on the affirmative defenses raised by cross-claim and requested that the trial of the remaining issues raised by the insured be postponed until after the final determination of the affirmative defenses. The Supreme Court noted that the insured, having a choice of two remedies, one in contract and one in tort, elected to pursue his claim in tort. Recovery by him on his claim in tort would have the effect of barring his claim for breach of contract. If the motion for separate trials had been granted, it would have converted insured's claim for tort to one for breach of contract. Insured would then have been precluded from presenting any evidence as to consequential damages for the tort, let alone any evidence relating to punitive damages. His right to trial by jury of his tort claim, guaranteed by the seventh amendment to the U.S. Constitution and Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const., would have been prejudiced. Denial of the motion to bifurcate was proper. Britton v. Farmers Ins. Group, 221 M 67, 721 P2d 303, 43 St. Rep. 641 (1986).

Initial Verdict Not Unanimous — No Mistrial: In considering the criminal charge against the defendant, the jury returned to the courtroom and disclosed its vote of 10 to 2 in favor of conviction. The judge did not make a prohibited inquiry of the jury as to its numerical division, nor was it reversible error for the judge to ask the jury to return to the jury room for a reasonable time to attempt to reach a unanimous decision when he emphasized that no juror should think any pressure was being placed on him to reach a unanimous decision. Given the manner in which the jury disclosed its initial vote, the trial court was correct in refusing to grant a mistrial because of the initial verdict. St. v. George, 219 M 377, 711 P2d 1379, 43 St. Rep. 26 (1986).

Jury Passed for Cause — Partiality Issues Waived: Defendant could not successfully argue that the jury was not fair and impartial when defendant passed the jury for cause. Tribby v. NW. Bank of Great Falls, 217 M 196, 704 P2d 409, 42 St. Rep. 1133 (1985).

All Parties in Equity Court Entitled to Have Their Legal Claims and Counterclaims Tried by Jury: Although, in the past, the court has purported to permit a court of equity to rule on all questions in a case, the court has never held that a court sitting in equity may try those issues of fact raised by plaintiff in a legal cause of action. The modern merger of law and equity courts and the liberal joinder provisions of the Rules of Civil Procedure force reevaluation of the traditional justification for permitting an equity court to decide legal issues. Upon timely demand, all parties are entitled to have their legal claims and counterclaims tried by jury. Gray v. Billings, 213 M 6, 689 P2d 268, 41 St. Rep. 1910 (1984). (To the extent that Butler Bros. Dev. Co. v. Butler, 111 M 329, 108 P2d 1041 (1941), and its progeny have been interpreted to deny plaintiff a right to jury trial of his legal claims, the cases are overruled.)

Termination of Parental Rights — No Right to Jury Trial: The State began termination of parental rights proceedings in the District Court. The parents filed a jury demand. The court denied the motion, citing 41-3-607. The court consolidated the adjudicatory and dispositional hearings, found the youths to be "in need of care", found that the parents had not complied with the approved treatment plan, found them to be beyond rehabilitation, and terminated their parental rights. The parents appealed the denial of the jury trial, alleging that 41-3-607(4) was unconstitutional pursuant to Art. II, sec. 24, of the 1972 Montana Constitution. The Supreme Court held that in Montana the state constitution guarantees the right to a jury trial only in the class of cases in which the right was enjoyed when the constitution was adopted. When the constitution was first adopted in 1889, there was no right to a jury trial in parental rights termination proceedings because such proceedings did not exist. Because there was no right to a jury trial for civil proceedings to terminate parental rights when the Montana Constitution was adopted in 1889 and recodified in 1972, such right could not be brought within the protection of Art. II, sec. 26, of the 1972 Montana Constitution. Because the adjudicatory and dispositional hearings may be consolidated, as was the case here, the court held it was unlikely the Legislature intended to provide for a jury trial at the adjudicatory hearing but not at the dispositional hearing. In re C.L.A. & J.A., 211 M 393, 685 P2d 931, 41 St. Rep. 1444 (1984).

Denial of Demand for Jury Trial — Interlocutory Order Not Appealable: Defendants, sued to recover money due on promissory notes, did not demand a jury trial in their original answer, but after several delays and withdrawal of counsel, defendants acting pro se filed an amended answer with a request for jury trial. Upon objection by plaintiffs and examination of the pleadings, the District Court denied the demand for jury trial. The Supreme Court dismissed the defendants' appeal of the denial as premature, holding that the denial of a request for a jury trial, whether the request was timely or belated, was not a final judgment appealable under former Rule 1, M.R.App. Civ.P (now Montana Rules of Appellate Procedure, now superseded). Such an interlocutory order may be appealable only if specifically provided for in a rule or statute. Heidema v. First Bank, 211 M 178, 682 P2d 1374, 41 St. Rep. 1291 (1984).

Jury Assessment of Damages Against Party in Default: A party in default has no statutory or constitutional right to have a jury assess the damages against him. Johnson v. Murray, 201 M 495, 656 P2d 170, 39 St. Rep. 2257 (1982).

Consent of Both Parties Required to Withdraw Demand for Jury Trial: The insurance agent made several misrepresentations concerning the insured when filling out an application for Safeco insurance. Safeco paid a $300,000 claim and then brought suit against the insurance agency and its agent. The insurance agency initially demanded a jury trial but then over the objection of Safeco was allowed to withdraw its demand for a jury trial. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the District Court erred in ordering a trial by judge. When one party has made a demand for a jury trial, the other party may rely on it. If at a later date the demanding party waives the demand, the opposing party has the right to determine whether to consent to a trial before a judge or to insist upon a jury trial. On appeal, the Supreme Court directed that judgment be entered in favor of Safeco on the issue of liability but held that the insurance agency was not entitled to a new trial because it had already had its trial. Safeco Ins. Co. v. Lovely Agency, 200 M 447, 652 P2d 1160, 39 St. Rep. 1861 (1982). See also Holm-Sutherland Co., Inc. v. Shelby, 1999 MT 150, 295 M 65, 982 P2d 1053, 56 St. Rep. 595 (1999).

Right to Jury Trial — Not Applicable to Equity Cases: A June 1976 agreement between the parties provided that plaintiff would advance money for the downpayment in the purchase of real property in Billings and would receive certain benefits, including a 50% interest in the property, in return. Plaintiff was to control any contractual arrangements until defendant had contributed, by payment of the monthly installments, a sum equal to the downpayment. In 1977, prior to the equalization of contributions, plaintiff entered negotiations to sell the property. No agreement between plaintiff and defendant was reached regarding the sale, and plaintiff filed suit seeking specific performance of the agreement. Defendant's demand for a jury trial was denied, and plaintiff was granted summary judgment allowing him exclusive control of contractual negotiations concerning the land for 1 year. Defendant contended he was denied his constitutional right to a jury trial. The Supreme Court, relying on decisions under the 1889 Montana Constitution and the transcripts of the 1972 Constitutional Convention, held that the power to enforce specific performance is vested solely in courts having equitable jurisdiction. The right of trial by jury does not extend to equitable actions, and the judge is not bound by any jury's findings. The District Court's denial of a jury trial was upheld. Downs v. Smyk, 200 M 334, 651 P2d 1238, 39 St. Rep. 1786 (1982).

Jury Trial — Right in Federal Court: The defendant has maintained three cabins on the C.M. Russell Game Range since 1947. The United States brought an action to enjoin defendant from trespassing on the range and to collect damages for the unauthorized use of the land. The U.S.

Court of Appeals held that the defendant had a right to a jury trial under the seventh amendment to the United States Constitution (similar to Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const.). The court held that there is a right to a jury trial when the issue presented would have been heard at common law and where the defendant made timely demand for a jury trial. The District Judge's statements, made without objection, that the parties had agreed to submit the case to the court on the record were sufficient to constitute an oral stipulation to a nonjury trial, however. U.S. v. Missouri R. Breaks Hunt Club, 641 F2d 689 (9th Cir. 1981).

Unanimous Verdict: The defendant argued that a jury must be instructed that it must make unanimous findings of specific acts constituting a specific offense before a verdict of guilty could be rendered. The court concluded that failure to require the jury to specify the theory on which it convicted did not deprive the defendant of his right to a unanimous verdict. McKenzie v. Osborne, 195 M 26, 640 P2d 368, 38 St. Rep. 1745 (1981), distinguished in St. v. Weldy, 273 M 68, 902 P2d 1, 52 St. Rep. 729 (1995).

Unanimous Verdict Requirement — Instruction in Disjunctive: Petitioner alleged that he was denied his constitutionally required unanimous verdict because the jury was instructed on the crimes of robbery, kidnapping, and homicide in the disjunctive. He alleged that the jury might not have agreed on which crimes were committed. In this case the jury was instructed as to the requirement of a unanimous verdict. The court also determined that there was substantial evidence to support all of the alternatives set forth in the instructions. The requirement of unanimity was met. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981), followed in St. v. Warnick, 202 M 120, 656 P2d 190, 39 St. Rep. 2369 (1982). See also St. v. Canon, 212 M 157, 687 P2d 705, 41 St. Rep. 1659 (1984); St. v. Madera, 206 M 140, 670 P2d 552, 40 St. Rep. 1558 (1983). However, see St. v. Weldy, 273 M 68, 902 P2d 1, 52 St. Rep. 729 (1995), and St. v. Weaver, 1998 MT 167, 290 M 58, 964 P2d 713, 55 St. Rep. 668 (1998), holding the jury instruction inadequate.

Mandatory Submission of Claims to Panel — Jury Trial: Mandatory submission of claims to the panel does not unconstitutionally interfere with the right to trial by jury. A claimant is free to continue to jury trial no matter what the decision of the panel, and the jury remains the final determiner of fact. Further, the panel decision is not binding, nor is it admissible at trial. Submission to the panel is merely a permissible delay in the path to the ultimate jury verdict. Linder v. Smith, 193 M 20, 629 P2d 1187, 38 St. Rep. 912 (1981).

Increase of Sentence in Retaliation for Insistence on Jury Trial: To protect a criminal defendant's constitutional rights in plea bargaining situations and to help preserve public confidence in the judicial process, the Supreme Court adopted ABA Standard 14-sec. 1.8(b). To implement that standard and to facilitate judicial review, a sentencing court that becomes involved in the plea bargaining process and imposes a harsher sentence after trial than was offered in exchange for a guilty plea must specifically point out the factors that justify the increased sentence. In this case, the court could not tell from the record why the trial court offered a very lenient sentence (45 days' jail time) in exchange for a plea of guilty. Nor could the Supreme Court tell why the court found imposition of a harsher sentence appropriate after jury trial (10 years' jail time). Increased sentencing for exercising a constitutional right is a basic due process violation. Because the Supreme Court was without assurance from the record that the trial court did not increase the sentence in retaliation for defendant's insistence on a jury trial, it remanded the case for resentencing. St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222, 38 St. Rep. 882 (1981), distinguished in St. v. Smith, 276 M 434, 916 P2d 773, 53 St. Rep. 459 (1996), St. v. Brown, 2003 MT 166, 316 M 310, 71 P3d 1215 (2003), and St. v. English, 2006 MT 177, 333 M 23, 140 P3d 454 (2006).

Defendant's Challenge of Jurors — Discretion of Judge in Ruling on Challenges: The defendant in a deliberate homicide case appealed his conviction in part on the basis that the trial court erred in denying his challenge to the jury panel as a whole and to one juror in particular. While noting that the right to a trial by an impartial jury is an unqualified one, the Supreme Court said that the pertinent inquiry was whether or not the jury empaneled was able to render an impartial judgment based solely upon the evidence presented at trial. Considering that each juror gave an assurance of impartiality and that the trial judge made cautionary remarks to the jury that they had a duty to lay aside their opinions and impressions, the Supreme Court held that under the circumstances the trial judge did not abuse his discretion by denying the defendant's challenge to the jury panel. With respect to the individual juror, the reviewing court noted that the judge had questioned the juror and that she had made it clear that she could put her emotions aside and judge the defendant fairly and solely upon the evidence presented at trial. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980).

Circumstances Favoring Withdrawal of Guilty Plea: The defendant was not made aware of the different elements of assault as set forth in 45-5-201 and 45-5-202, and the District Court had before it evidence indicating that defendant was under the influence of a combination of drugs and alcohol and was possibly suffering from mental distress or instability at the time of the alleged assault. Under those circumstances the judge should not have accepted defendant's guilty plea, and defendant should be allowed to withdraw the plea. St. v. Nelson, 184 M 491, 603 P2d 1050 (1979).

Waiver of Jury Trial: Section 46-16-102(2) (renumbered 46-16-110) is not such a mandate that failure to comply with its provisions rendered the trial a nullity since, by examining the totality of the circumstances, the Supreme Court determined that the defendant did make a voluntary and intelligent waiver, which is the primary objective of the statute, and was not deprived of his right to trial by jury. St. v. McCartney, 179 M 49, 585 P2d 1321 (1978). See, however, St. v. Dahlin, 1998 MT 113, 289 M 182, 961 P2d 1247, 55 St. Rep. 446 (1998).

GENERAL

Deliberations by Jury — Juror Misconduct: Court did not err in denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial on the ground of misconduct of the jury during its deliberations, supported by affidavits of four jurors indicating that the irregularity was not on a material matter in dispute, where plaintiff was properly not prejudiced by juror's misconduct in improperly referring to prior litigation in which plaintiff had been involved, the poll of the jury showing an 8-to-4 verdict for the plaintiff. When the jury retires to the jury room it should be concerned only with the evidence and the law. The verdict is the result of a fair expression of opinion by all the jurors. Schmoyer v. Bourdeau, 148 M 340, 420 P2d 316 (1966).

Pretrial Conference:

Provisions granting the court permission to require a pretrial conference do not violate the constitutional guarantee of a jury trial. State ex rel. Kennedy v. District Court, 121 M 320, 194 P2d 256 (1948).

The effect of the pretrial practice act (now repealed, but see former Rule 16, M.R.Civ.P., now superseded) was not such as to deprive a litigant, in a case involving questions of fact, of the right to have controverted fact questions disposed of by a jury as prescribed by the Constitution. State ex rel. Carlin v. District Court, 118 M 127, 164 P2d 155 (1945).

Right as of Time Constitution Adopted Preserved:

The guaranty of a right to trial by jury does not grant or enlarge the right of a jury trial but merely preserves it as it existed at the time the Constitution was adopted. Moore v. Capitol Gas Corp., 117 M 148, 158 P2d 302 (1945).

The right of trial by jury is the right as it existed at the time the Constitution was adopted. Bull v. Butte Elec. Ry., 69 M 529, 223 P 514 (1924). See also In re McLure, 68 M 556, 220 P 527 (1923).

The Constitution must be construed in view of the conditions existing at the time of its adoption, and the right of trial by jury guaranteed under this broad declaration is the right as it then existed and not one created or extended, except by express terms, by the instrument itself. This rule extends to both civil and criminal trials. Mont. Ore Purchasing Co. v. Boston & Mont. Consol. Copper & Silver Min. Co., 27 M 288, 70 P 1114 (1902); State ex rel. Jackson v. Kennie, 24 M 45, 60 P 589 (1901).

WHEN RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL EXISTS

Declaratory Judgment: A party has a right to a jury trial on demand where the suit is for a declaratory judgment and there are triable issues of fact. State ex rel. Indus. Indem. Co. v. District Court, 169 M 10, 544 P2d 438 (1975); Mehan v. Hardland, 147 M 78, 410 P2d 156 (1966).

Recovery on Foreign Judgment: An action to recover a money judgment on a foreign judgment and to recover specific personal property with damages is clearly an action at law and is an action in which a party cannot be denied a jury trial. Little v. Little, 127 M 152, 259 P2d 343 (1953).

Directed Verdict in Criminal Case: It was error for the court to instruct and direct the jury to return a verdict of guilty when the evidence was in conflict. St. v. Baillargeron, 126 M 310, 249 P2d 799 (1952).

Inconvenience to Jurors Irrelevant: Inconvenience or loss to prospective jurors or lack of adequate travel, hotel, or eating facilities for them constitutes no excuse for depriving a litigant of his constitutional right to prompt disposition of his litigation, and when case is to be tried by a jury, Supreme Court will direct court, by mandamus, to call a jury and try the case. State ex rel. Carlin v. District Court, 118 M 127, 164 P2d 155 (1945).

Action on Lease: An action to compel the release of an oil and gas lease of record on the ground that the lessee had failed to commence drilling operations within the time fixed in the lease and for the recovery of the statutory penalty, damages, and attorney's fees is one at law, entitling plaintiff to a jury trial. Solberg v. Sunburst Oil & Gas Co., 70 M 177, 225 P 612 (1924).

Action at Law: When the primary purposes of an action against a corporation were to recover on promissory notes, to enforce liability of its directors as comakers and guarantors, and to penalize for failure to file the annual statements required by statute, and the only equitable relief prayed for was the foreclosure of a mortgage given by one of the directors on lots as security for the notes, and answers of defendants contending the defendants were entitled to a trial by jury of the strictly legal issues presented by the pleadings, denial of a jury trial was error. Benson-Stabeck Co. v. Farmers Elevator Co., 66 M 395, 214 P 600 (1923).

Applicable to Civil and Criminal Cases: The provision of Art. III, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., that the right of trial by jury shall be secured to all and remain inviolate, applied only to cases where right of trial by jury existed at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. It referred in terms to "civil cases" and "criminal cases". Cunningham v. NW. Improvement Co., 44 M 180, 119 P 554 (1911).

Same as Federal Right: The right guaranteed by Art. III, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., is the same as that guaranteed by the seventh amendment to the federal Constitution, because the federal Constitution was the fundamental law of the territory at the time of its admission as a state, and the right as it then existed was preserved in the state Constitution. Consol. Gold & Sapphire Min. Co. v. Struthers, 41 M 565, 111 P 152 (1910); Chessman v. Hale, 31 M 577, 79 P 254 (1905).

Action for Damages and Injunction: Plaintiff is entitled, without request, to a trial by jury of his right to damages, although he also asks for the equitable relief of injunction to restrain the continuance of acts complained of. Chessman v. Hale, 31 M 577, 79 P 254 (1905).

Right Cannot Be Abridged by Legislature: The right of trial by jury, as it existed at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, still exists and cannot be taken away by legislative enactment. Chessman v. Hale, 31 M 577, 79 P 254 (1905).

WHEN JURY TRIAL NOT REQUIRED

Equitable Actions: In action to foreclose mortgage securing promissory notes, defendant was not entitled to jury trial as matter of right on his cross-complaint and counterclaim for damages, since actions for mortgage foreclosures are equitable and triable by court without jury and cannot be transformed into actions at law merely by raising an issue of law in answer. Citizens St. Bank v. Duus, 154 M 18, 459 P2d 696 (1969).

Not Applicable to Equity Actions:

Action by corporation against one of its directors to decree and enforce a trust of mining claims located by director and necessary to development and operation of plaintiff's property was one in equity, and defendant did not have right to demand jury trial since such right did not exist at time of adoption of the Constitution. Golden Rod Min. Co. v. Bukvich, 108 M 569, 92 P2d 316 (1939).

The right of trial by jury guaranteed by Art. III, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., is the right as it existed at the time the Constitution was adopted. Since the right to a jury trial in an equity case did not exist at that time, it does not exist now. Merchants Fire Assurance Corp. v. Watson, 104 M 1, 64 P2d 617 (1937).

In a proceeding under 11067, R.C.M. 1921 (now repealed), to abate as a common nuisance a roominghouse where intoxicating liquor was being illegally kept and sold, providing that "the action shall be brought and tried as an action in equity", the defendant is not entitled to a jury trial. St. v. Mercier, 70 M 333, 225 P 802 (1924).

Action Involving Drain District: The proceeding by which a drain district is created and managed is not an ordinary civil action but a special statutory proceeding in which the trial by jury did not exist at the time the state Constitution was adopted, and hence the constitutional right of trial by jury is not denied by failure of the statute to make the question of benefits received or damages suffered by a landowner determinable by a jury. In re Drain District, 64 M 545, 211 P 218 (1922).

Contested Divorce: The right of trial by jury is preserved as it existed at the time the Constitution was adopted, and since the right to a trial of a contested divorce suit did not exist at that time, a party to such a suit may not now demand, as a matter of right, a jury trial of the issues raised by the pleadings. Davidson v. Davidson, 52 M 441, 158 P 680 (1916).

Mandamus Proceeding: If the relator, in a mandamus proceeding, must litigate any private right to damages which he may have against the respondent arising out of the wrong to which the mandate is directed, the adversary must submit. Thus, a cause of action at law becomes summarily justifiable without a jury, notwithstanding the fact that both parties are entitled to a jury and cannot be compelled to submit to a summary adjudication. Bailey v. Edwards, 47 M 363, 133 P 1095 (1913).

Special Proceedings: Article III, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., did not confer the right to trial by jury in a special proceeding. Cunningham v. NW. Improvement Co., 44 M 180, 119 P 554 (1911).

Action to Determine Adverse Claim to Real Property: Since parties in an action to determine an adverse claim to real property or an interest therein were not entitled to a jury trial prior to the adoption of the Constitution, a defendant in an action to try an adverse claim to a lode mining claim under the statute authorizing such an action, as reenacted subsequent to the Constitution, is not entitled to have the issues submitted to a jury. Mont. Ore Purchasing Co. v. Boston & Mont. Consol. Copper & Silver Min. Co., 27 M 288, 70 P 1114 (1902).

Creditors' Suit for Fraudulent Sale: The direction of a verdict in a creditors' suit to set aside a sale as fraudulent was not an infringement on the defendant's right to a trial by jury, though the testimony in the case was conflicting, since such cases were within the exclusive jurisdiction of chancery at the time the Constitution was adopted, and the Constitution did not enlarge the right of trial by jury. Finch v. Kent, 24 M 268, 61 P 653 (1900).

Security to Keep the Peace: Under Art. III, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., the party complained of, in a proceeding in a Justice's Court to compel him to give security to keep the peace, is not entitled to a jury trial. No such right existed when the Constitution was adopted, and there is nothing in the Constitution extending the right to any case in which it did not exist at the date of its adoption. State ex rel. Jackson v. Kennie, 24 M 45, 60 P 589 (1900).

WAIVER OF RIGHT

Waiver in Felony Case: If a defendant is charged with a felony and desires a trial, he shall have one before a jury. He may not waive a jury trial in favor of one by the court. However, he may waive trial entirely by entering a plea of guilty; in such event he admits the issue of fact and presents nothing to go before a jury. St. v. Scalise, 131 M 238, 309 P2d 1010 (1957).

Procedure for Waiver: The modes prescribed by statute for waiving right to a trial by jury are exclusive. Moore v. Capitol Gas Corp., 117 M 148, 158 P2d 302 (1945).

Manner of Waiver — Exclusive: The provision of Art. III, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., that a jury may be waived in the manner prescribed by law was mandatory and prohibitory. It is the duty of the court to grant to litigants the rights given them by the constitutional provision. The Constitution, in effect, commanded that a jury trial, if waived, should be waived in a certain manner and prohibited its being waived in any other manner. Chessman v. Hale, 31 M 577, 79 P 254 (1905).

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

Probation Search of Purse Based on Reasonable Suspicion — Motion to Suppress Correctly Denied: As a condition of her probation, the defendant was required to inform her probation officer of her prescriptions. During a home visit, the officer searched her purse because of her suspicious behavior. Her purse contained illegal pills, and the state filed a petition to revoke her probation. The defendant filed a motion to suppress the evidence from the purse search, contending that the officer lacked reasonable grounds to search it. The District Court denied the motion to suppress and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the denial. While a probation officer may not go through a probationer's belongings unless there is reasonable suspicion of a violation, in this case, the defendant's nervous behavior and excuses about her pills constituted reasonable grounds. St. v. Fischer, 2014 MT 112, 374 Mont. 533, 323 P.3d 891.

Sentencing Condition Lacked Nexus — No History of Substance Use or Abuse: A 17-year-old defendant was charged as an adult with one count of sexual intercourse without consent and one count of sexual assault. Subsequently, the defendant was sentenced and one of the conditions required him to report the conviction to all medical providers, as well as reporting addiction history and prescriptions for narcotics or medical marijuana. On appeal, the Supreme Court relied on St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 Mont. 187, 179 P.3d 1164, and reversed the reporting requirement on the grounds that the sentencing conditions lacked a nexus to either the offense or the offender. St. v. Dietsch, 2013 MT 245, 371 Mont. 460, 308 P.3d 111. See also St. v. Mehan, 2019 MT 100, 395 Mont. 383, 440 P.3d 25.

DUI Sentencing Scheme Reasonably Related to Rehabilitation and Protection of Society — Felony DUI Considered Constitutionally Appropriate: Blue asserted that the DUI sentencing scheme violated the constitutional provision that punishment for crime must be based on principles of prevention, reformation, public safety, and restitution for victims. The Supreme Court noted that rather than escalating punishment for the same offense, the DUI statutes provide discrete punishments for discrete convictions, and that it is within the power of the Legislature to distinguish among criminal offenses and to establish punishments. The DUI sentencing limitations and conditions are reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and protection of the victim and society, and the enhanced penalty for felony DUI is a constitutionally appropriate sentence. St. v. Blue, 2009 MT 304, 352 M 382, 217 P3d 82 (2009), distinguishing Missoula v. Shea, 202 M 286, 661 P2d 410 (1983). See also St. v. Bruns, 213 M 372, 691 P2d 817 (1984).

Home Visit of Probationer's Residence by Supervising Officer Not Considered Search — Diminished Expectation of Privacy — When Reasonable Cause Required to Search Probationer's Residence: As part of Moody's conditions of probation, the sentencing court required that Moody's home be open and available for the probation and parole officer to visit as required by state policy. Moody objected to the condition on grounds that it obviated the reasonable cause requirement for searches of probationers' homes and thus violated the constitutional rights of privacy and protection from unreasonable search and seizure. The Supreme Court noted that in Montana, a probation officer may search a probationer's residence without a warrant if the officer has reasonable cause for the search. The reasonable cause standard is substantially less than the probable cause standard required for searches of other citizens' homes because probationers do not enjoy the absolute liberty and heightened expectations of privacy afforded every Montana citizen. Rather, probationers are subject to conditional liberty that is properly dependent upon special restrictions. A convicted felon who is unambiguously aware of the clearly expressed condition that the residence be open and available for home visits does not have a reasonable expectation of privacy that precludes home visits, and because there is no reasonable expectation of privacy, there is no search. Therefore, home visits conducted as a routine and reasonable element of supervising a convicted person are not searches and are not subject to the reasonable cause standard. Although a home visit has the potential to turn into a search pursuant to an officer's plain view observations, it must remain within the parameters of a home visit unless and until reasonable cause exists for the officer to engage in a search. A probationer's diminished expectation of privacy during supervision nevertheless provides that the enclosed areas of the probationer's residence, such as closets, cabinets, and drawers, cannot be searched without reasonable cause. Thus, Moody's constitutional rights to privacy and to be free from unreasonable searches were not violated by the home visit probation condition. St. v. Moody, 2006 MT 305, 334 M 517, 148 P3d 662 (2006), followed in St. v. Greeson, 2007 MT 23, 336 M 1, 152 P3d 695 (2007).

Sentencing Condition Unrelated to Underlying Offense Stricken: Attorney Holt pleaded not guilty to five counts of felony theft of clients' funds. As a condition of a suspended sentence, the trial court prohibited Holt from possessing or consuming alcohol and from establishing a checking or credit card account. Holt appealed both sentencing conditions. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), and St. v. Lucero, 2004 MT 248, 323 M 42, 97 P3d 1106 (2004), a sentencing limitation or condition must have some correlation to the underlying offense in order to be reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and protection of the victim and society. In this case, there was no evidence that alcohol contributed to the offenses in question, so the Supreme Court struck that condition from the judgment. However, there was a correlation between Holt being allowed to establish a checking or credit card account and the crime of theft of clients' funds, so imposition of that condition was not improper and was affirmed. St. v. Holt, 2006 MT 151, 332 M 426, 139 P3d 819 (2006), followed in St. v. Armstrong, 2006 MT 334, 335 M 131, 151 P3d 46 (2006), and St. v. Greeson, 2007 MT 23, 336 M 1, 152 P3d 695 (2007). However, see St. v. Green, 2012 MT 87, 364 Mont. 515, 276 P.3d 929.

Mandatory Life Sentence Not Violative of Due Process, Cruel and Unusual Punishment, or Separation of Powers — Exception Properly Considered: Webb pleaded guilty to second offense sexual intercourse without consent and was sentenced to life in prison without parole pursuant to 46-18-219. Webb appealed the sentence on grounds that the mandatory life sentence violated procedural and substantive due process, the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, and the separation of powers doctrine. Webb also asserted that the sentencing court failed to properly consider the exception to mandatory sentencing set out in 46-18-222(3). The Supreme Court affirmed. The sentencing court properly considered the exception and did not abuse its broad discretion in finding no unusual and substantial distress. The sentencing court offered Webb all the procedural due process necessary and did not violate substantive due process because the sentence fit within the statutory sentencing limits. Webb's contention that life without parole was cruel and unusual punishment failed because the sentence was commensurate with the gravity of the crime and consistent with state sentencing and correctional policy. The argument that mandatory sentences violate the separation of powers doctrine also failed because it is in the Legislature's province to distinguish between criminal offenses and to establish punishments, and enactment of 46-18-219 was based on constitutional principles and Montana public policy. St. v. Webb, 2005 MT 5, 325 M 317, 106 P3d 521 (2005). See also St. v. Bruns, 213 M 372, 691 P2d 817 (1984), and St. v. Dahms, 252 M 1, 825 P2d 1214 (1992).

Order for Restitution Upon Imposition of Deferred or Suspended Sentence — 1999 Amendments to Sentencing Statute Clarified: Heath was convicted of theft and possession of burglary tools and sentenced to 10 years in prison with 2 years suspended upon conditions, including payment of restitution. Heath appealed on grounds that the 1999 amendments to 46-18-201 no longer allowed a sentencing court to impose restitution as a condition of a suspended or deferred sentence. Upon amendment in 1999, an internal reference in 46-18-201(5) was not changed to reflect the renumbering of the other subsections, which resulted in an ambiguity in the plain language of the 46-18-201, potentially rendered 46-18-237 and 46-18-251(2) meaningless, created uncertain directives for payment of restitution for all victims in 46-18-241(1) and 46-18-244(2), and created a potentially absurd application of 46-18-201(1). Because of the potentially absurd consequences of the 1999 amendment, the Supreme Court looked beyond the words of the statute and inquired whether the Legislature intended to make any change in the substance and effect of 46-18-201. The court concluded that the 1999 amendment was a simple codification error that resulted in a cross-reference problem that was completely inconsistent with legislative intent to authorize sentencing courts to impose restitution when necessary for rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society if there is an appropriate correlation to the offense committed. Heath's argument failed, and the imposition of restitution as a condition of Heath's suspended sentence was affirmed. (Note: The erroneous internal reference in 46-18-201(5) was deleted in 2003.) St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004), followed in St. v. McDanold, 2004 MT 167, 322 M 31, 97 P3d 1076 (2004), and St. v. McIntire, 2004 MT 238, 322 M 496, 97 P3d 576 (2004).

Sex Offender Registration and Disclosure Requirements Not Violative of Privacy or Right of Convicted to Restoration of Rights: Mount was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent and served his sentence. Nine days after final discharge from prison in 1996, Mount registered as a sexual offender, but he was convicted in 2000 of failing to update the registration as required in 46-23-507. On appeal, Mount asserted that the ongoing registration and disclosure requirements of the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act violated the right to privacy under Art. II, sec. 10, Mont. Const., and constitutional and statutory provisions for reinstatement of the rights of a citizen under 46-18-801 and this section. The Supreme Court disagreed. As a fundamental right, the right to individual privacy may be infringed only by a compelling state interest; however, protection of the public from the recidivism of sex offenders, prevention of the victimization of vulnerable children, and assistance in keeping track of sex offenders constitute the requisite compelling interest. Further, 46-18-801 and this section apply only to the restoration of civil and political rights, and a conviction for sexual intercourse without consent does not fall under this category of protected rights. Thus, Mount was not deprived of any rights by the registration and disclosure requirements of the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act. St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003), followed in Wagner v. St., 2004 MT 31, 319 M 413, 85 P3d 750 (2004). See also St. v. Brooks, 2012 MT 263, 367 Mont. 59, 289 P.3d 105 (ruling that SVORA did not violate privacy rights of a violent offender).

No Constitutional Liberty Interest in Being Housed Exclusively at State Prison: Following a conviction for deliberate homicide and use of a firearm, Wright was sentenced in 1996 to the state prison in Deer Lodge for 75 years, where he was originally placed. Over the years, Wright was placed at various other institutions, including out-of-state and in-state regional detention and private correctional centers. Wright filed a writ of prohibition to prevent the state from housing him anywhere but the state prison in Deer Lodge, pursuant to the terms of the written judgment. Under the law in effect at the time of Wright's sentencing, the Deer Lodge prison was the only adult male correctional facility in Montana, but the statutory definition has since been expanded to include other facilities. Wright contended that application of the amended definition to his sentence was unconstitutionally ex post facto, in violation of his liberty interests. The Supreme Court disagreed. Pursuant to Meachum v. Fano, 427 US 215 (1975), Wright's conviction sufficiently extinguished Wright's liberty interest to empower the state to confine him in any of its prisons, and under Olim v. Wakinekona, 461 US 238 (1983), Wright also had no justifiable expectation that he would be imprisoned in any particular state. Further, in order for the state to create a liberty interest, under McDermott v. Dept. of Corrections, 2001 MT 134, 305 M 462, 29 P3d 992 (2001), it must first enact a law that establishes a right of real substance, and then even those statutorily defined interests are restricted to freedom from atypical and significant hardships in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life or restraints that inevitably affect the duration of the prisoner's confinement. The Supreme Court held that even if the 1995 definition of state prison did confer a right of real substance, being transferred from one prison to another, even out of state, did not meet the McDermott test for hardship or duration of confinement. Thus, Wright had neither a federal nor a state constitutional liberty interest in being housed exclusively at the state prison in Deer Lodge, and the state has authority to transfer Wright from that facility. Wright v. Mahoney, 2003 MT 141, 316 M 173, 71 P3d 1195 (2003).

Prison Behavior Modification Plans Violative of Excessive Sanction Protection and Equal Protection — State Directed to Revise Incarceration Procedures: Walker, an inmate with diagnosed mental illness, alleged that conditions at the state prison violated constitutional sanctions against excessive punishment and equal protection guarantees because of his mental condition. Although Walker had been released from the state prison when his petition for postconviction relief was considered by the Supreme Court, the case was not moot, as the state contended, because the prison programs remained in place. The court went on to consider whether behavior modification programs used at the prison unconstitutionally exacerbated inmates' mental health conditions and concluded that they do. The plain meaning of the dignity clause in Art. II, sec. 4, Mont. Const., commands that the intrinsic worth and basic humanity of persons may not be violated, and if the particular conditions of confinement cause serious mental illness to be greatly exacerbated or deprive inmates of their sanity, those conditions then cross into the realm of psychological torture. Thus, prison behavior modification programs and living conditions in maximum security constitute an affront to the inviolable right to human dignity and constitute cruel and unusual punishment when they exacerbate an inmate's mental health condition. The prison was directed to conform the operations of its administrative segregation units to the requirements of this opinion. Walker v. St., 2003 MT 134, 316 M 103, 68 P3d 872 (2003). See also Campbell v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 146, 306 M 45, 29 P3d 1034 (2001), and Wilson v. St., 2010 MT 278, 358 Mont. 438, 249 P.3d 28.

Authority to Condition Parole on Participation in Sexual Offender Program — Parole Considered Privilege, Not Right: McDermott pleaded guilty to four counts of assault and one count of bail-jumping in exchange for dismissal of four counts of incest and was sentenced to 30 years in prison. Because of the violent nature of the assaults and the fact that they were committed against young victims, the sentencing court found that McDermott was a substantial danger to society and designated him a dangerous offender for purposes of parole. When he began serving his sentence, an initial needs assessment concluded that he suffered from severe sexual problems and recommended participation in the prison sexual offender program (SOP). McDermott chose not to participate in the SOP, and the Board of Pardons and Parole later considered that fact during evaluations for placement in a prerelease center and for purposes of parole and inmate classification. The Board recommended that McDermott participate in the SOP to enhance success on parole. McDermott again declined to participate and, as a result, four points were added to his classification status for noncompliance with the Board's recommendation. McDermott then petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus ordering his immediate release and rescinding the four points. McDermott argued that the Board did not have the authority to consider his lack of participation in the SOP as a basis for denying his early release on parole, citing St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), and St. v. Field, 2000 MT 268, 302 M 62, 11 P3d 1203 (2000). The Supreme Court distinguished both Ommundson and Field, noting that under Montana and federal precedents, parole is a privilege, not a right. Because parole is granted as a matter of grace rather than right, the state may offer that grace under and subject to conditions that are considered most conducive to accomplish the desired purpose. Rather than restricting the Board's authority to set conditions precedent to parole, 46-23-201 obligates the Board to ensure that no prisoner is released on parole who cannot meet the statutory criteria, and the Board may also consider factors that may not be considered by the District Court at trial and sentencing and evidence of offenses that were charged in dismissed counts. Even though McDermott was not a convicted sex offender, he did have four counts of incest dismissed and was identified as having severe sexual problems. Thus, his completion or lack of completion of the SOP was pertinent to his ability to be released without detriment to the community and to fulfill the obligations of a law-abiding citizen. The Board was well within its authority to consider McDermott's failure to enroll in the SOP when his petition for early release was denied. McDermott's petition for a writ of habeas corpus was denied. McDermott v. McDonald, 2001 MT 89, 305 M 166, 24 P3d 200 (2001). See also Christopher v. U.S. Bd. of Pardons, 589 F2d 924 (7th Cir. 1978), and Robinson v. Hadden, 723 F2d 59 (10th Cir. 1983).

Liberty Interest in Parole by Inmates Who Committed Offenses Prior to 1989 — Due Process Consideration: As a general rule, inmates have no liberty interest in parole. However, prior to amendment in 1989, 46-23-201 required the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) to release on parole any prison inmate when the Board determined that there was a reasonable probability that the prisoner could be released without detriment to the prisoner or the community. The U.S. Supreme Court subsequently held in Bd. of Pardons v. Allen, 482 US 369 (1987), that this mandatory statutory language created a liberty interest in parole that was protected by the federal constitutional due process clause. Although the mandatory language was removed in 1989, the Montana Supreme Court later held in Worden v. Bd. of Pardons & Parole, 1998 MT 168, 289 M 459, 962 P2d 1157 (1998), that inmates who committed offenses prior to 1989 continue to enjoy a federally protected liberty interest in parole. In the present case, McDermott committed his offenses in 1985 and 1986, so pursuant to Allen and Worden, his liberty interest in parole could not be denied without due process. McDermott v. McDonald, 2001 MT 89, 305 M 166, 24 P3d 200 (2001), followed in George v. Bd. of Pardons, 2001 MT 163, 306 M 115, 30 P3d 1065 (2001).

Defendant Incarcerated Prior to Sentencing Entitled to Ten Days a Month of Good Time Credit: Sebastian argued that the policy of awarding 10 days of good time allowance a month for presentence incarceration served under 53-30-105 (now repealed) constituted a wealth-based classification, in violation of MacPheat v. Mahoney, 2000 MT 62, 299 M 46, 997 P2d 753 (2000). The Supreme Court noted that it had previously addressed the good time issue in Corcoran v. Mahoney, No. 00-346 (July 2000), an unpublished opinion holding that because security levels in county jails are consistent with close custody security classifications at the state prison, defendants who are incarcerated prior to sentencing are entitled to 10 days a month of good time credit under the former good time statute. The court found the policy determination that pretrial detainees are entitled to no more than 10 days of good time credit to be reasonable and declined to apply the classification system in MacPheat to pretrial detainees. Sebastian v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 88, 305 M 158, 25 P3d 163 (2001).

Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus Not Necessarily Mooted by Release of Petitioner From Physical Custody: Sebastian argued that he was entitled to a writ of habeas corpus because he was being unlawfully imprisoned under the Department of Corrections good time policy. The state contended that the legality of Sebastian's imprisonment was moot because he had been released from incarceration. Sebastian argued that even though he was released from prison, he was still suffering under an unlawful restraint on his liberty because the discharge date of the 10-year suspended sentence that he was serving depended on good time credit to which he was entitled. The Supreme Court noted that release from custody may moot some habeas corpus petitions because the relief requested, i.e., release from unlawful imprisonment, can no longer be granted. However, release from physical custody does not necessarily moot the petition when the court can still grant effective relief. In this case, the completion date of Sebastian's suspended sentence depended on the discharge date of his term of confinement and was thus based on the jail good time credit to which he was entitled. If the good time policy was in fact unlawful and its application to Sebastian's prison term led to an erroneous discharge date, the completion date of the suspended sentence would also be incorrect. Thus, despite the fact that Sebastian was no longer imprisoned, it was still within the power of the court to grant relief to prevent the possible unlawful restraint on Sebastian's liberty, so the petition was not moot, and the court went on to address the merits of the petition. Sebastian v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 88, 305 M 158, 25 P3d 163 (2001).

Mental Disease Not Affecting Ability to Appreciate Criminality of Behavior — Prison Sentence, Rather Than Hospitalization, Appropriate: Smith contended that the District Court erred in concluding that he did not suffer from a mental disease or defect that rendered him unable to appreciate the criminality of his behavior or to conform it to the requirements of law, pursuant to 46-14-311 and 46-14-312, and that because of his personality disorder, he should have been sentenced to the state hospital rather than the state prison for felony assault and assault on a peace officer in order to satisfy state principles of prevention and reformation in light of his unique and particular posture as a mentally ill person. However, even assuming that Smith had a mental disease or defect, the District Court found that Smith's mental condition did not have the effect of rendering him unable to appreciate the criminality of his behavior or to conform it to the requirements of law. Smith failed to satisfy this additional element of 46-14-311, so hospitalization was not required under 46-14-312. St. v. Smith, 2000 MT 57, 299 M 6, 997 P2d 768, 57 St. Rep. 272 (2000).

Sentencing Condition Required to Have Correlation or Connection to Underlying Offense: Ommundson pleaded guilty to felony DUI. In imposing sentence, the District Court considered a presentence investigation that documented Ommundson's criminal history, which included more than 10 convictions for indecent exposure. The court also considered a sex offender evaluation, which determined that Ommundson qualified for community-based treatment. The court committed Ommundson to the Department of Corrections for 54 months, with all but 6 months suspended on condition that Ommundson participate in a sex offender treatment program and not have any contact with children without adult supervision. Ommundson did not object to the condition prohibiting contact with children, so that issue was not cognizable on appeal. However, on the issue of whether the District Court had authority to impose a condition of participation in a sex offender program as a penalty for DUI, the Supreme Court held that 46-18-202 allows only the imposition of sentencing limitations reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society. That authority is broad, but not without limit. In order to be reasonably related, a sentencing limitation or condition must have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense for which the defendant is being sentenced. In the present case, the requirement that Ommundson participate in a sex offender program was not reasonably related to the rehabilitation of a DUI offender or to the protection of society from drunk drivers. The Supreme Court reversed the part of Ommundson's sentence requiring that he participate in a sex offender program. St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620, 56 St. Rep. 70 (1999), following St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982), and St. v. Black, 245 M 39, 798 P2d 530, 47 St. Rep. 1677 (1990), distinguishing Dahlman v. District Court, 215 M 470, 698 P2d 423, 42 St. Rep. 550 (1985), St. v. Shaver, 233 M 438, 760 P2d 1230, 45 St. Rep. 1617 (1988), and St. v. Blanchard, 270 M 11, 889 P2d 1180, 52 St. Rep. 54 (1995), and followed in St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), St. v. Setters, 2001 MT 101, 305 M 253, 25 P3d 893 (2001), St. v. Smith, 2001 MT 111, 305 M 298, 27 P3d 39 (2001), St. v. Watson, 2001 MT 143, 306 M 33, 29 P3d 1026 (2001), and St. v. Armstrong, 2006 MT 334, 335 M 131, 151 P3d 46 (2006). In St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008), the Ommundson nexus rule was expanded to allow a sentencing judge to impose a particular condition of probation as long as the condition has a nexus either to the offense for which the offender is being sentenced or to the offender. However, offender-related conditions may be imposed only in cases in which the history or pattern of conduct to be restricted is recent and significant or chronic. A passing, isolated, or stale instance of behavior or conduct is insufficient to support a restrictive probation condition imposed in the name of offender rehabilitation. Ashby was followed in St. v. Bullplume, 2013 MT 169, 370 Mont. 453, 305 P.3d 753. See also St. v. Mehan, 2019 MT 100, 395 Mont. 383, 440 P.3d 25.

Discovery of Shotgun Case During Routine Walk-Through of Probationer's Residence Constituting Reasonable Grounds for Further Warrantless Search: Probationer Stucker allowed a voluntary tour of his residence by probation officers, who discovered two weapons cases in plain view in the master bedroom. One case contained a bow, which Stucker was allowed to possess under the terms of his probation; the other contained a semiautomatic shotgun, which constituted contraband under the probation conditions. The discovery of the shotgun case in plain view constituted reasonable grounds for the officers to conduct a warrantless search of the residence to determine if additional weapons were present. The District Court did not err in denying Stucker's motion to suppress the fruits of the search. St. v. Stucker, 1999 MT 14, 293 M 123, 973 P2d 835, 56 St. Rep. 65 (1999).

Illegal Search of Person but Lawful Search of Vehicle — Vehicle Search Upheld as Probation Search and Not "Fruit of Poisonous Tree": Deputy Turner watched New make several turns in his vehicle without signaling and, after determining by his vehicle license plate that New was on probation, stopped the vehicle and searched New. Upon discovering drugs in New's pocket, Turner impounded the vehicle. Detective Jacobs questioned New, and New gave Jacobs approval to search the vehicle. Then Jacobs talked to Forsyth, New's probation officer, who conducted the search of New's vehicle with Jacobs. Turner's search of New's pockets was subsequently held illegal but the District Court refused to quash evidence taken from the vehicle as a result of Forsyth's search. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the search of the vehicle was not the "fruit of the poisonous tree", the illegal personal search of New, but was justified upon the independent grounds that Forsyth had previously determined that he wanted to search New's vehicle because of pending charges of violations of the conditions of New's probation. St. v. New, 276 M 529, 917 P2d 919, 53 St. Rep. 510 (1996).

Restoration of Rights — Federal Limit: The automatic restoration of rights under Montana law does not preclude the federal government from regulating the possession of firearms by a convicted felon. U.S. v. Dahms, 938 F2d 131 (9th Cir. 1991).

Warrantless Search by Probation Officer Lawful if Based on Reasonable Suspicion of Probation Violation: Defendant's deferred sentence was revoked after a warrantless search initiated by her probation officer pursuant to the terms of her probation revealed that defendant possessed dangerous drugs in violation of the terms of her probation. Search by a probation officer of his probationer's car, premises, or other belongings is lawful if it is based on the probation officer's reasonable suspicion of a probation violation. St. v. Small, 235 M 309, 767 P2d 316, 46 St. Rep. 9 (1989), followed in St. v. New, 276 M 529, 917 P2d 919, 53 St. Rep. 510 (1996), and St. v. Olmsted, 1998 MT 301, 292 M 66, 968 P2d 1154, 55 St. Rep. 1235 (1998).

Warrantless Police Search of Probationers' Car and Residence Allowed — Reasonable Grounds Standard — Fogarty Overruled: A police officer's warrantless search of the probationers' car and residence based on the officer's observations and with permission of the probation officer, in compliance with probationary conditions, did not violate the fourth amendment. St. v. Fogarty, 187 M 393, 610 P2d 140 (1980), is specifically overruled and the "reasonable grounds" standard of Griffin v. Wis., 483 US 868, 97 L Ed 2d 709, 107 S Ct 3164 (1987), is adopted. Police cooperation with probation officers is to be encouraged as an important aid to effective administration of the probation system. To impose a warrant requirement for residential searches, on the basis of rights enjoyed by persons not on probation, would artificially raise a probationer's privacy interest to a level inconsistent with conditional liberty status. St. v. Burke, 235 M 165, 766 P2d 254, 45 St. Rep. 2278 (1988), followed in St. v. Hawkins, 239 M 404, 781 P2d 259, 46 St. Rep. 1786 (1989), St. v. Boston, 269 M 300, 889 P2d 814, 51 St. Rep. 1142 (1994), St. v. Burchett, 277 M 192, 921 P2d 854, 53 St. Rep. 590 (1996), St. v. Stucker, 1999 MT 14, 293 M 123, 973 P2d 835, 56 St. Rep. 65 (1999), and St. v. Moody, 2006 MT 305, 334 M 517, 148 P3d 662 (2006), and clarified, regarding the fact that probation officers, other than the one assigned to a probationer, are not precluded from authorizing a probationary search, in St. v. Olmsted, 1998 MT 301, 292 M 66, 968 P2d 1154, 55 St. Rep. 1235 (1998). See also St. v. Charlie, 2010 MT 195, 357 Mont. 355, 239 P.3d 934, and St. v. Fischer, 2014 MT 112, 374 Mont. 533, 323 P.3d 891.

Ineligibility for Parole Not in Conflict With Rehabilitation: Defendant asserted that his designation as ineligible for parole conflicted with society's desire to rehabilitate him because serving a minimum 40-year term would make him a permanent public charge, discourage his pursuit of education and development of skills, and wither his religious faith. However, it was within the discretion of the District Court, in light of the violence associated with defendant's crimes and the frequency of their commission, to restrict defendant's opportunity for parole in order to protect society. In re Petition of Arledge, 232 M 450, 756 P2d 1169, 45 St. Rep. 1188 (1988).

Inability to Pay Restitution — Not Violative of Equal Protection in Light of State Correctional Policy and Previous Offenses: A defendant convicted of felony theft was sentenced to 5 years in the state prison with 2 years suspended and, in addition, was ordered to pay restitution. The defendant asserted on appeal that he was sentenced to a prison term because of his indigency, in violation of his right to equal protection. However, the District Judge specifically noted the prison term was necessary to protect the property of others and that the defendant's criminal record contained three previous misdemeanor thefts. The Supreme Court found these to be sufficient reasons to support incarceration and upheld the state's correctional policy outlined in 46-18-101. The court noted that the sentence was well within the parameters of punishment for felony theft in 45-6-301. Finding no abuse of discretion or violation of the defendant's constitutional rights, the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Carroll, 220 M 466, 716 P2d 212, 43 St. Rep. 531 (1986).

Lengthy Sentence — Based on Prevention of Future Crimes: On conviction of deliberate homicide the defendant received the maximum allowable sentence, 100 years, and was determined ineligible for designation as a nondangerous offender, or for parole. On appeal, he argued the sentence was not based on any credible evidence presented at the sentencing hearing or contained in the presentence report, but was motivated by the trial court's desire for vengeance on behalf of the victim's family. The court indicated it imposed the sentence because it believed defendant should be removed from society. The Supreme Court held that the sentence did not violate Art. II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., which prior to the 1998 amendment required that "laws for the punishment of crime shall be founded on the principles of prevention and reformation", nor did it violate 46-18-101, which provides that the policy behind sentencing is the rehabilitation, if possible, of convicts. Article II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., allows a trial court in its discretion to base a sentence on the principle of prevention of future crimes. This includes the power to remove a person from society, as the court found necessary in this case. Also, the sentence is within the permissible statutory range, and in the absence of clear abuse of discretion is properly reviewed by the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985), followed in St. v. Valcourt, 254 M 174, 835 P2d 753, 49 St. Rep. 686 (1992).

Constitutional Requirement Satisfied by Sentence Founded on Prevention and Reformation: The defendant, who has an extensive record of driving under the influence of alcohol, was convicted on three counts of driving under the influence (DUI). She was sentenced to serve time in the county jail. The defendant contends her sentence violates the constitution as it does not provide for her rehabilitation. Article II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., which prior to the 1998 amendment required that laws for punishment of crime be founded on the principles of prevention and reformation. The defendant's sentence furthers the prevention principle through her incarceration, addresses the reformation principle through ordering her to abstain from the use of alcohol, and provides the avoidance of further incarceration as an incentive to reform. Thus, the constitutional requirement is satisfied. St. v. Bruns, 213 M 372, 691 P2d 817, 41 St. Rep. 2178 (1984).

Objection to Sentence for Punishment Rather Than Prevention and Reformation — Lack of Proof: Objection that sentence was for punishment rather than for prevention of further crime and reformation of defendant was clearly without merit, as there was no evidence or authority cited by appellant to establish that the sentence will not deter him or others from future wrongful conduct or that the sentence would not lead to reformation. St. v. Stroud, 210 M 58, 683 P2d 459, 41 St. Rep. 919 (1984).

Mention of "Setting an Example" at Sentencing — Not Error Viewed in Context: Although the trial court did mention "setting an example" when imposing sentence, that is not a reason for remanding for resentencing as a violation of Art. II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., because the judge's use of the presentencing report and his reasons for the length of the sentence indicate no impropriety in the sentencing. St. v. DeSilva, 209 M 169, 679 P2d 1237, 41 St. Rep. 620 (1984).

Persistent Offender Statute:

Article II, sec. 28, does not prevent increases in punishment for repeat offenders, whether under the persistent felony offender statutes or otherwise. Thus, where the defendant was convicted under 45-8-316 of carrying a concealed weapon, the increase in his sentence allowed by that section because of a prior felony conviction was not unconstitutional. St. v. Sanders, 208 M 283, 676 P2d 1312, 41 St. Rep. 338 (1984).

Article II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., grants an offender who has served his sentence a fair opportunity to enjoy the rights that law-abiding citizens enjoy. It does not grant him immunity from being treated as a persistent felony offender. St. v. Radi, 176 M 451, 578 P2d 1169 (1978). See St. v. Gafford, 172 M 380, 563 P2d 1129 (1977).

Rather than involving any civil or political "right", increasing the sentence of a persistent felony offender is entirely consistent with the constitutional mandate that "laws for the punishment of crime shall be founded on the principles of prevention and reformation". St. v. Maldonado, 176 M 322, 578 P2d 296 (1978).

Escalating Fines for Parking Violations — Unconstitutional: An escalating fine schedule for parking violations where the amount to be paid depends on the length in the delay in paying after being cited is in violation of the basic principle of law that punishment must be for the violation and proportional to the gravity of the offense and hence is violative of Art. II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., which provides that laws for punishment of crime shall be founded on principles of prevention and reformation. Missoula v. Shea, 202 M 286, 661 P2d 410, 40 St. Rep. 91 (1983).

Alcoholics — Refraining as Condition of Parole or Suspended Sentence: One who, because of addiction or character disorder, is unable to control his excessive drinking of alcoholic beverages has no constitutional or statutory right to release free from limitations on his use of alcohol, either on parole or pursuant to a suspended sentence. There was no merit to appellant's contention that it was vindictive and unreasonable or illegal to require him, an acknowledged alcoholic, to refrain from drinking as a condition of his probation or parole. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982), followed, with regard to the requirement for nexus between the sentencing limitation or condition and the underlying offense, in St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620, 56 St. Rep. 70 (1999).

Death Penalty — Public Attitude Considered: Petitioner alleged that the death penalty is imposed so rarely that it does not deter crime and serves no legitimate state interest. The U.S. Supreme Court has held that the death penalty is not per se cruel and unusual. Inhumane punishment is forbidden, as is punishment that does not suit the crime. The court looks to "objective indicia that reflect the public attitude toward a given sanction", because an assessment of contemporary values concerning the infliction of a challenged sanction is relevant to the application of the eighth amendment to the United States Constitution (Art. II, sec. 22, Mont. Const.). Montana voters elected to retain capital punishment, and the Legislature voted to reject an attempt to change the penalty to a different means of inflicting death. The State appears to have retained a legitimate interest in capital punishment. The District Judge properly dismissed the claim. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981).

Sentencing — Restrictions on Parole and Furlough Permissible: Section 46-18-202 provides that whenever a sentence of imprisonment in the state prison for a term exceeding 1 year is given, the court may impose the restriction that the defendant be ineligible for parole and participation in the prisoner furlough program while serving his term. If the court finds the restriction necessary, it shall impose the restriction as part of the sentence and set forth its reasons for imposing the statute. It does not permit District Judges to add any time beyond the statutory maximum underlying the offense. Petitioners, who both pleaded guilty, were represented by counsel and were given presentence hearings. Parole and participation in the furlough program are privileges, not rights. Petitioners were not denied due process or equal protection in being sentenced under 46-18-202. Cavanaugh v. Crist, 189 M 274, 615 P2d 890, 37 St. Rep. 1461 (1980).

Unlimited Search and Polygraph Provisions on Probation Unconstitutional: As conditions for imposition of a suspended sentence, defendant was required to submit to an unlimited search provision by any lawful authorities and to submit to a polygraph examination upon the request of any law enforcement officer. The Supreme Court when reviewing the revocation of defendant's suspended sentence held that the unlimited polygraph examination condition was overly broad and thus an invalid condition of probation and that the unlimited warrantless search provision is an unconstitutional condition of probation. The Supreme Court said that a sentencing court cannot inject prosecuting attorneys or law enforcement officials into the probation process by granting them direct rights to search the probationer, his home, or vehicle. A type of probable cause or some identifiable reason is required before a search clause may be exercised to search the probationer or his vehicle. The legal interests of innocent third persons living with a probationer are to be protected by requiring a search warrant before searching the probationer's home. Polygraph examinations as a condition of probation can be effectively contained within constitutional parameters by confining the right to demand a polygraph examination to the probation officer. St. v. Fogarty, 187 M 393, 610 P2d 140 (1980), overruled in St. v. Burke, 235 M 165, 766 P2d 254, 45 St. Rep. 2278 (1988).

Review of Death Sentence — Disproportionate Application: The Supreme Court, in reviewing a death sentence to determine whether it is disproportionate, reviews the circumstances of the crime of which the defendant is accused and, in light of those circumstances, the judgment and the sentence thereupon imposed. It examines cases involving similar crimes to make certain that, as far as the defendant in this particular case is concerned, there has been no discriminatory action on the part of the sentencing judge, no abuse of discretion by the sentencing judge, and that the sentencing judge has considered and applied fairly and without discrimination the applicable law. The Supreme Court looks for the even-handed application of death sentences without regard to sex, color, creed, or race or any other discriminating consideration. When this has occurred, as here, the death sentence must be upheld. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000 (1979), followed in St. v. Langford, 248 M 420, 813 P2d 936, 48 St. Rep. 492 (1991).

Failure to Reenact Capital Punishment Authorization: The failure to specifically reenact the authorization for the death penalty contained in Art. III, sec. 24, 1889 Mont. Const., might have significance had not the Constitutional Convention given the people the option of adopting into the 1972 Constitution language expressly prohibiting the enactment of the death penalty. The people voted to retain the death penalty. Such a vote negates any argument that the death penalty violates contemporary standards of decency. St. v. McKenzie, 171 M 278, 557 P2d 1023 (1976), followed in St. v. Langford, 248 M 420, 813 P2d 936, 48 St. Rep. 492 (1991), and in St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 1, 864 P2d 249, 50 St. Rep. 1250 (1993).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Penalty Assessment on Forfeited Bail and Fines: Insofar as statute provided for penalty assessment on forfeited bail and on fines, it was void as violation of constitutional provision that laws for punishment of crime should be founded on principles of reformation and prevention. State ex rel. Sanders v. Butte, 151 M 171, 441 P2d 190 (1968).

Attorney General's Opinions

Validity of Ordinance Allowing Escalating Penalty for Failure to Obtain Business License: A Lewistown city ordinance that allows an escalating monthly penalty for failure to obtain a local business license is valid despite Missoula v. Shea, 202 M 286, 661 P2d 410, 40 St. Rep. 91 (1983). The Shea case determined that escalating penalties for parking violations were criminal penalties and violative of Art. II, sec. 28, Mont. Const. In analyzing the Lewistown ordinance, the Attorney General observed that the crucial issue is whether the penalty imposed is civil or criminal in nature. Applying the five factors outlined in Brown v. Multnomah County District Court, 570 P2d 52 (Ore. 1977), he concluded that the instant ordinance imposed civil penalties and that the ordinance was valid. 40 A.G. Op. 75 (1984).

Official Misconduct Conviction — Right to Run for Subsequent Term: Section 45-7-401, providing that a public servant convicted of official misconduct "shall permanently forfeit his office", mandates forfeiture of the rest of his term of office and forbids reinstatement, reappointment, or reelection to that term but does not bar him from running for another term of that office after state supervision for the offense has ended. To conclude that 45-7-401 prevents him from running for a subsequent term after the end of state supervision would violate this section's provision for full restoration of rights upon termination of state supervision for an offense against the state. 39 A.G. Op. 61 (1982).

Prisoner Voting Rights: No person may vote in the state of Montana while serving a sentence in a penal institution resulting from conviction of a felony. 37 A.G. Op. 125 (1978).

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

No Taking When Government Under Mistaken Belief It Owned Property — Tort Instead of Taking: The District Court did not err in concluding that the county's use of the upper branch of a road did not amount to a taking under the U.S. and Montana Constitutions. When viewed in a light most favorable to the plaintiff landowner, the evidence presented established no genuine issue of material fact. The Supreme Court determined that it is a very different matter when the government claims that it is dealing with its own property and recognizes no title superior to it. In that instance, the government, or the officers who seize the property, are guilty of a tort if the property is in fact private. The Supreme Court further noted that federal case law provides that mistaken applications of the law are inevitable but that no principle of constitutional law requires compensation for every mistake. Letica Land Co., LLC v. Anaconda-Deer Lodge, 2019 MT 30, 394 Mont. 218, 435 P.3d 634.

Ownership Necessary for Award of Attorney Fees: The defendant had an interest in property subject to condemnation and sold that interest. In litigation over the condemnation, the District Court awarded attorney fees to the defendant as a prevailing condemnee for expenses incurred after the sale. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, holding that upon sale of the property, the defendant ceased being an owner and condemnee and could not recover expenses incurred after the sale. Missoula v. Mtn. Water Co., 2018 MT 245, 393 Mont. 68, 427 P.3d 1018.

Right to Just Compensation Self-Executing: At the conclusion of a long and complex condemnation suit in which both parties hired out-of-state counsel, the District Court held that the defendants were entitled to attorney fees. The defendants sought the actual expenses paid to their attorneys, including the out-of-state counsel, who charged much higher hourly rates than Montana counsel. However, the District Court capped the rates for out-of-state counsel to the customary rates for the county pursuant to 70-30-306. The defendants argued that the cap violated their right to just compensation under Art. II, sec. 29, Mont. Const. On appeal, the Supreme Court ruled that this section is self-executing. Missoula v. Mtn. Water Co., 2018 MT 139, 391 Mont. 422, 419 P.3d 685.

Incorrect Jury Instruction on Inverse Condemnation — Not Reversible Error Given Entirety of Jury Instructions: After a rock slab fell from above their home and rendered the home uninhabitable, the plaintiffs sued the state Department of Highways for inverse condemnation. A jury found that the state was not negligent and the plaintiffs contributed 100% to the cause of their damages. On appeal, the plaintiffs argued that the District Court's jury instruction on inverse condemnation was erroneous because it was not a full, fair, and accurate representation of the law on inverse condemnation. Although the Supreme Court agreed that one of the instructions was incorrect, the court affirmed, concluding that when it was read in the context of the jury instructions in their entirety and in connection with the evidence that was presented at trial, the District Court's failure to give the plaintiff's jury instruction on inverse condemnation did not constitute reversible error. Deschner v. St., 2017 MT 37, 386 Mont. 342, 390 P.3d 152.

Attorney Fees on Prior Appeal: The plaintiffs sued the city related to the widening of a city road and the taking of their property for that purpose. The city lost in District Court and appealed the decision to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court affirmed in part and reversed in part and remanded the case to the District Court to recalculate the amount of damages owed to the plaintiffs. The city claimed that the plaintiffs were not entitled to fees and costs incurred during the appeal because they did not prevail on their cross-appeal. The plaintiffs argued that they were the prevailing party and thus were entitled to fees and costs incurred during both the underlying litigation and the appeal. The District Court agreed and awarded fees and costs as requested by the plaintiffs. The city appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed the award, noting that the plaintiffs had a constitutional right to be made whole in a condemnation case in which the landowner prevails. Wohl v. Missoula, 2014 MT 310, 377 Mont. 148, 339 P.3d 58.

Lis Pendens Not Unconstitutional Taking: The filing of a lis pendens does not constitute an unconstitutional taking because a lis pendens does not create substantive rights; it only serves to put prospective purchasers of real property on notice of a pending lawsuit involving a title issue. LeMond v. Yellowstone Dev., LLC, 2014 MT 181, 375 Mont. 402, 336 P.3d 345.

Inverse Condemnation Compensation Based on Value of Land When Land Is Seized: Due to inconsistencies between original surveys and actual square footage found near a right-of-way, Missoula claimed extra area belonged to the city rather than to adjacent landowners, and during litigation, the city completed improvements on the disputed land. The District Court determined that landowners should be compensated for the encumbrance and awarded compensation based on the amount the land was worth after the improvements. On appeal, the city cited 70-30-302, which provides that compensation should be based on value on the date of the summons. The Supreme Court declined to apply 70-30-302 to an inverse condemnation, noting that the proper compensation for an inverse condemnation is the value of the land at the time it is seized. Wohl v. Missoula, 2013 MT 46, 369 Mont. 108, 300 P.3d 1119.

Landowners Entitled to Compensation for Property Taking: Due to inconsistencies between original surveys and actual square footage found near a right-of-way, Missoula claimed extra area belonged to the city rather than to adjacent landowners, and during litigation, the city seized the land and completed improvements on it. The District Court determined Missoula was not entitled to claim the extra area under its right-of-way. On appeal, Missoula claimed that the landowners were not entitled to compensation because the District Court had enlarged the landowners' land and the landowners had not paid taxes on the increase. The Supreme Court found that no legal evidence was presented regarding the relevance of tax payment for the compensation for takings and that the District Court had made no findings as to payment of taxes. During trial, the parties stipulated that the land in question belonged to the landowners. The litigation question had been whether the excess land was encumbered by a city right-of-way, not over the ownership of the land, so the landowners were properly entitled to compensation. Wohl v. Missoula, 2013 MT 46, 369 Mont. 108, 300 P.3d 1119.

Application for Mining Permit Not Protected Entitlement When Department Retains Discretion to Deny Application — Compensation May be Required for Certain Zoning Regulations: Helena Sand and Gravel, Inc., (HSG) received a gravel mining permit from the Department of Environmental Quality (DEQ) that applied to 110 of its approximately 421 acres located north of East Helena. Subsequently, the Lewis and Clark County Board of Commissioners adopted a special district based on a citizens' petition that included all of HSG's property and prohibited sand and gravel mining within the district's boundaries. HSG brought suit alleging that the county had improperly prohibited HSG from mining sand and gravel on its property. The District Court granted summary judgment to the county and concluded that HSG failed to show a protected entitlement to a mining permit, but the court did not separately consider HSG's ownership interest in the real property. On appeal, HSG first asserted that DEQ would have been required by statute to issue HSG a permit or permit amendment for the remaining 311 acres, and thus the regulations adopted by the Board amounted to a taking of private property. The Supreme Court disagreed and held that the statutory language gave DEQ leeway to withhold its approval of a permit application unless the application satisfied 14 separate requirements outlined in 82-4-434. Because DEQ retained discretion to deny unacceptable applications, HSG did not have a constitutionally protected property interest in its right to apply for a mining permit. Additionally, HSG asserted that the impact of the zoning regulations on the value of its property was a taking. The court concluded that under its decision in Kafka v. Mont. Dept. of Fish, Wildlife & Parks, 2008 MT 460, 348 Mont. 80, 201 P.3d 8, because justice and fairness may require that a person deprived of an established property interest be compensated for the loss even when that compensable property interest retains some economic value, the case had to be remanded for the District Court to consider the magnitude of the economic impact of the county's regulations and the degree to which those regulations interfered with HSG's legitimate property interests. Helena Sand & Gravel, Inc. v. Lewis & Clark County Planning & Zoning Comm'n, 2012 MT 272, 367 Mont. 130, 290 P.3d 691.

Denial of Subdivision — No Taking: Plaintiff claimed that the county's denial of his subdivision constituted a regulatory taking. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's grant of summary judgment to the county, concluding that the plaintiff could not allege economic loss when he purchased his property fully aware that he could subdivide the land only with county approval. Richards v. Missoula County, 2012 MT 236, 366 Mont. 416, 288 P.3d 175.

No Protected Property Interest in Use of Public Right-of-Way — Inverse Condemnation Claim Denied: Plaintiff property owner filed an inverse condemnation action against the Department of Transportation after its reconstruction of a portion of highway adjacent to the plaintiff's property significantly reduced the amount of space between the plaintiff's garage and the highway, although it did not encroach on the plaintiff's property itself. The Supreme Court held that no taking occurred since the plaintiff did not have a protected property interest in the use of the public right-of-way. Malpeli v. St., 2012 MT 181, 366 Mont. 69, 285 P.3d 509, distinguishing St. Highway Comm'n v. Keneally, 142 Mont. 256, 384 P.2d 770 (1963).

Implied Easement by Necessity — Negated by Eminent Domain Power: In the context of federal checkerboard land grants to railroads, the claimant of an implied easement by necessity traced common ownership of the dominant and servient parcels to the federal government, and the necessity for the easement arose when the parcels were severed from the federal government's common ownership, thus satisfying the unity of ownership requirement. However, the easement failed because the United States' power of eminent domain negated the "strict necessity" requirement, and the claimant failed to produce evidence regarding the government's intent to reserve an easement and its inability to condemn an easement. Yellowstone River, LLC v. Meriwether Land Fund I, LLC, 2011 MT 263, 362 Mont. 273, 264 P.3d 1065.

Public Utility — Authority for Condemnation: In a condemnation proceeding, the District Court dismissed a public utility's complaint for condemnation on the basis that the utility did not possess the power of eminent domain and had no authority to take private property. The Supreme Court reversed on the basis that the District Court's order conflicted with HB 198 (Ch. 321, L. 2011), which clarified a public utility's eminent domain power, codified that authority into the Major Facility Siting Act, and applied retroactively to the issues in the case. MATL, LLP v. Salois, 2011 MT 126, 360 Mont. 510, 255 P.3d 158.

City Council Denial of Subdivision Exemption Not Violative of Constitutional Protections: The Missoula City Council denied plaintiffs' applications for exemptions from subdivision requirements, and plaintiffs appealed on grounds that denial of the applications constituted violations of constitutional rights of equal protection and public participation, was a taking, and was a tortious violation of the city council's statutory duties. The District Court granted summary judgment for the city on all the claims and plaintiffs appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The equal protection argument was merely a bald assertion that was largely unclear and poorly supported, failing to demonstrate a discriminatory purpose, and was properly dismissed on summary judgment. The takings claim failed because plaintiffs never possessed a right to obtain an exemption, but instead only lost the opportunity to obtain an exemption, and the discretion to grant or deny the exemption was properly exercised by the city council. Plaintiffs raised the public participation claim in District Court but failed to discuss the issue in briefs on appeal, so the Supreme Court declined to consider the issue. The claim of a tortious violation of the city council's statutory duties also failed as a cognizable negligence claim because plaintiffs failed to prove that the council's actions damaged plaintiffs. Roe v. Missoula, 2009 MT 417, 354 M 1, 221 P3d 1200 (2009). See also Gudmundsen v. State ex rel. Mont. St. Hosp. Warm Springs, 2009 MT 56, 349 M 297, 203 P3d 813 (2009).

Res Judicata Applicable to Action Regarding County's Failure to Transfer Conditional Use Permit: Plaintiff filed an 18-count complaint for damages contending that Flathead County did not follow zoning regulations and violated plaintiff's due process and property rights when the County Board of Adjustment failed to transfer a conditional use permit to plaintiff to allow a gravel pit on property plaintiff purchased. However, plaintiff's petition for a writ of mandamus to compel the Board to transfer the conditional use permit was properly dismissed (see Beasley v. Flathead County Bd. of Adjustment, 2009 MT 120, 350 M 171, 205 P3d 812 (2009)), so the County argued that the damage complaint was res judicata. Plaintiff had appealed the Board's decision pursuant to 76-2-227 but moved to dismiss the appeal with prejudice after a local citizens' group intervened to defend the Board's decision. The District Court held that the damage complaint involved the same issues as the appeal of the decision to deny transfer of the conditional use permit, so the damage complaint was dismissed as res judicata. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Plaintiff failed to establish a protected property interest in obtaining the transfer of the permit, so the constitutional claims were properly dismissed. Likewise, plaintiff's purported tort claims involved the same subject matter and issues as the prior appeal, so res judicata applied. Plaintiff's opportunity to challenge the legality of the Board's decision to deny transfer of the permit ended when plaintiff elected to dismiss the appeal under 76-2-227 with prejudice. Section 76-2-227 remained an available remedy if plaintiff chose to apply for a conditional use permit in his own right and the application was denied, but that remedy was no longer available for the current challenges. Beasley v. Flathead County, 2009 MT 121, 350 M 177, 206 P3d 915 (2009).

Absent Disputed Facts, Liability in Takings Case Considered Question of Law for Court, Not Question of Fact for Jury: In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court was presented with the issue of whether liability for a categorical or regulatory taking was a question of law to be decided by a court or a question of fact for a jury. While declining to adopt a bright-line rule regarding the role of the jury in the takings context, the court noted that given the primarily legal nature of takings inquiries, a jury determination should be required only in cases in which resolution of a factual dispute is necessary to determine whether a taking has occurred. In the present case, the District Court determined that the issue of takings liability was a question of law that, absent factual disputes, would be determined by the court, and that if liability was found, the question of damages would be presented to the jury. Under these particular circumstances, the District Court did not err in deciding the takings liability question without the presence of a jury. Buhmann v. St., 2008 MT 465, 348 M 205, 201 P3d 70 (2008).

No Categorical Takings Claim if Property Retains Beneficial Use: In a game farm takings case following the passage of Initiative No. 143, the District Court rejected the notion that plaintiffs' alternative livestock could be the object of a categorical taking pursuant to Lucas v. S. Car. Coastal Council, 505 US 1003 (1992), and plaintiffs appealed. A categorical taking occurs when a regulation or state action forces an owner to sacrifice all economically beneficial uses for the common good, leaving the property economically idle. Lucas implied that only land, not personal property, could be subject to a categorical taking, but plaintiffs cited Maritrans, Inc. v. U.S., 342 F3d 1344 (Fed. Cir. 2003), for the proposition that personal property can in fact form the basis for a categorical takings claim. Without resolving the question of whether personal property, by itself, can form the object of a categorical takings claim, the Supreme Court concluded that plaintiffs' categorical takings claim failed because the alternative livestock still retained beneficial uses following passage of the initiative. Thus, the District Court was affirmed. Buhmann v. St., 2008 MT 465, 348 M 205, 201 P3d 70 (2008).

State and Federal Constitutional Takings Protection Considered Coextensive: In a game farm takings case following the passage of Initiative No. 143, the District Court considered the rights afforded under both Art. II, sec. 29, Mont. Const., and the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution and ultimately concluded that the takings analysis based on federal law under Penn Cent. Transp. Co. v. New York City, 438 US 104 (1978), applied to the regulatory takings claim brought against the state. Plaintiffs asserted that the Montana Constitution afforded greater constitutional protection against the taking of private property than the U.S. Constitution and that the court erred in concluding otherwise. On appeal, the Supreme Court reaffirmed the position taken in Kafka v. Mont. Dept. of Fish, Wildlife & Parks, 2008 MT 460, 348 M 80, 201 P3d 8 (2008), that the takings protection in the Montana Constitution is coextensive with the protection granted under the U.S. Constitution, so a takings analysis based on federal law is to be applied to takings claims brought under either the state or federal constitution. Buhmann v. St., 2008 MT 465, 348 M 205, 201 P3d 70 (2008).

Initiative Prohibiting Fee Shooting on Game Farms Not Unconstitutional Taking: In 2000 Montana voters approved Initiative No. 143 prohibiting the shooting of alternative livestock on game farms for a fee. Plaintiff game farm owners claimed that the initiative constituted a taking of their private property by the state without compensation in violation of Art. II, sec. 29, Mont. Const., because it removed the expectation of profitability from their businesses. The District Court held that the initiative did not constitute a regulatory taking of compensable property interests in plaintiffs' lands and that plaintiffs were not entitled to compensation for damage to the goodwill and going concern value of their businesses. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Compensable property interests can exist in government-issued licenses or permits if the licenses or permits are free from express statutory language precluding the formation of a property right in combination with the presence of the right to transfer and the right to exclude. In this case, the state retained the power at all times to revoke or change plaintiffs' licenses if it chose to do so, so plaintiffs possessed no common-law property right to the licenses. Therefore, the licenses were not compensable property interests under Art. II, sec. 29, Mont. Const. Further, an expectation of profitability in a highly regulated field of business that requires a license or permit for participation is virtually never considered a compensable property interest, so plaintiffs were not entitled to compensation for damage to the goodwill and going concern value of their businesses. Plaintiffs should reasonably have anticipated that the game farm industry might be phased out because of health and safety concerns over chronic wasting disease or even that the state might make the regulatory burden so onerous that game farms would no longer be profitable enterprises, and the elimination of the in-state market for fee shooting should have been within plaintiffs' reasonable investment-backed expectations given the absence of assurances from the state on that point. That expectation factor also weighed against finding of a compensable regulatory taking of plaintiffs' alternative livestock. Kafka v. Mont. Dept. of Fish, Wildlife & Parks, 2008 MT 460, 348 M 80, 201 P3d 8 (2008), distinguishing NRG Co. v. U.S., 24 Fed. Cl. 51 (Cl. Ct. 1991), and Cienega Gardens v. U.S., 331 F3d 1319 (Fed. Cir. 2003). Costs of Litigation in Inverse Condemnation Cases: In providing for costs of litigation in condemnation cases, the Montana Constitution does not distinguish between condemnation litigation initiated by a government entity and condemnation cases initiated by the property owner, and Montana statutes do not distinguish between inverse condemnation and traditional condemnation cases. The only requirement for an award of litigation expenses is that the condemnee prevail by obtaining a judgment in excess of the condemnor's pretrial offer. In the present case, defendant asserted that under 70-31-303, plaintiff was not entitled to litigation expenses in an inverse condemnation case because federal money was not involved, but the Supreme Court affirmed that litigation expenses must be awarded in inverse condemnation cases when the condemnee prevails, as provided in 70-30-305. Initiative Banning Cyanide Mining — Reverse Condemnation Against State not Justiciable in Federal Court: Initiative Measure No. 137, enacting 82-4-390, which barred use of cyanide leaching in mining, could not be the basis of a reverse condemnation action in federal court because a reverse condemnation action against a state in federal court is barred by the 11th amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The 11th amendment bar cannot be avoided under the application of Ex parte Young, 209 US 123 (1908), because reverse condemnation actions are a form of retroactive relief, not a claim for prospective relief. Seven Up Pete Venture v. Schweitzer, 523 F3d 948 (9th Cir. 2008).

Reasonable Access Not Denied by Highway Reconstruction Project — Inverse Condemnation Claim Properly Denied: Plaintiffs sued the state for inverse condemnation and taking for constructing a highway improvement project that allegedly impaired access by large trucks to plaintiffs' business on a main street in Dillon. Plaintiffs presented evidence that it was difficult for large trucks to back into plaintiffs' receiving area without encroaching on the street and running off of curbs. The state presented evidence that a large truck could access the receiving area through curb cuts without falling off the curbs. The business manager testified that larger truck-trailer combinations could be unhooked to make them shorter and that a power unit could then push the trailers into the receiving area, that the plant was set up for pneumatic delivery and could receive almost all its products in this manner, precluding the necessity of maneuvering large trucks, and that it was possible to request delivery of the product in any size truck and trailer combination. The jury evaluated the conflicting evidence and concluded that plaintiffs' access was reasonable, and on appeal, the Supreme Court declined to disturb the verdict. Williams Feed, Inc. v. St., 2007 MT 79, 336 M 493, 155 P3d 1228 (2007).

Showing of Constitutionally Protected Property Interest Required — Federal and State Claims: Plaintiff brought property interest claims against a city and city council members on several state and federal grounds after a state liquor license was denied. The city had enacted ordinances disallowing the sale of alcohol in the city without a conditional use permit and then denied plaintiff's application for a permit. The District Court held that plaintiff's property interest claims were invalid, and plaintiff appealed. The Supreme Court noted that to establish a viable claim under 42 U.S.C. 1983, a plaintiff must first establish that it possesses a protected liberty or property interest and has a legitimate claim of entitlement to that interest. Under state due process and takings law, a plaintiff must also establish a property interest, and a property interest exists only when the Legislature has so narrowly circumscribed the issuing agency's discretion that approval of the interest is virtually assured. Receipt of a liquor license is a privilege and not a right. Plaintiff had yet to obtain a state liquor license at the time that the ordinances were passed and thus had no property interest in operating a bar, nor could plaintiff assert ultimate entitlement to a liquor license. Therefore, plaintiff's inability to demonstrate a protected property interest in operating property as a bar precluded the establishment of federal or state property claims against the city and City Council members, nor did the city deprive plaintiff of a protected property interest by enacting the ordinances or denying a conditional use permit. The District Court was affirmed. Germann v. Stephens, 2006 MT 130, 332 M 303, 137 P3d 545 (2006), following ISC Distrib., Inc. v. Trevor, 273 M 185, 903 P2d 170 (1995), and Kiely Constr. v. Red Lodge, 2002 MT 241, 312 M 52, 57 P3d 836 (2002).

Initiative Banning Cyanide Mining Not Unconstitutional Taking or Impairment of Contract — Opportunity to Apply for Mining Permit Not Property Right: Plaintiffs had an operating permit pending for a cyanide leach pit gold mine when voters passed Initiative Measure No. 137 (I-137) that prohibited cyanide mining in Montana. Plaintiffs sued on grounds that I-137 interfered with their property right in the permit, constituted an unconstitutional regulatory taking for which they should be compensated, and violated the contract clause in Art. II, sec. 31, Mont. Const. The District Court found for the state on all issues, and plaintiffs appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Plaintiffs' mere opportunity to seek a mining permit did not constitute a property right, given the state's wide discretion to reject the application even without the passage of I-137. Further, I-137 did not constitute a taking because plaintiffs had not yet obtained a right to mine that the initiative took away. Moreover, even though the District Court incorrectly held that plaintiffs' corporate mining agreement was not substantially impaired by I-137, the court nonetheless correctly concluded that there was no contract clause violation because I-137 was reasonably related to the legitimate and significant public purpose of protecting the environment. Seven Up Pete Venture v. St., 2005 MT 146, 327 M 306, 114 P3d 1009 (2005).

Oil Well Not Considered Mine to Which Right-of-Way May Be Obtained Through Eminent Domain — No Condemnation Power of Private Individuals and Corporation Except Through Legislative Grant — Condemnation Statutes Strictly Construed: Plaintiff filed a federal action seeking to condemn an access easement and right-of-way across defendant's ranch land for access to drill and operate oil wells. The federal District Court certified two questions to the Montana Supreme Court regarding whether: (1) exploration and development of a federal oil and gas lease are considered a mine that constitutes a public use under 70-30-102; and (2) 82-2-201 grants the owner of a federal oil and gas lease the power, as the owner of a "mining claim", to condemn a right-of-way across land of another for access to explore and develop the lease. The Supreme Court answered both questions in the negative. Private individuals and corporations, like state agencies, have no inherent power of eminent domain, so their authority to condemn derives only from a legislative grant. Public uses for which the power of eminent domain are granted must be interpreted pursuant to the plain language set forth by the Legislature and may not be implied. Because eminent domain interferes with the fundamental constitutional right to the private ownership of real property, any statute that allows condemnation of private property must be strictly construed, giving the statute its plain interpretation but favoring the person's fundamental rights. Under the plain meaning of 70-30-102, oil wells are not considered mines to which rights-of-way for roads may be obtained through eminent domain proceedings. Further, exploration and development of a federal oil and gas lease are not a mine that constitutes a public use, so the owner of an oil and gas lease has no power under 82-2-201 to condemn a right-of-way. McCabe Petroleum Corp. v. N Bar Ranch, LLC, 2004 MT 73, 320 M 384, 87 P3d 995 (2004), following St. v. Aitchison, 96 M 335, 30 P2d 805 (1934), and Bozeman v. Vaniman, 264 M 76, 869 P2d 790 (1994), and distinguishing Mid-Northern Oil Co. v. Walker, 65 M 414, 211 P 353 (1922), Rice Oil Co. v. Toole County, 86 M 427, 284 P 145 (1930), and Mont. Talc Co. v. Cyprus Mines Corp., 229 M 491, 748 P2d 444 (1987).

Determination of Fair Market Value Proper — Expert Testimony Properly Allowed: In condemning a parcel of defendants' property for a state highway project, the state's expert testified considering possible depreciation of the remainder of the property based on how the property was being used, the impact of any buildings on the property, no unreasonable impairment of access to the remainder of the property, comparable land sales in the area, and the value of comparable land without highway access. This testimony regarding fair market value was not considered speculative or conjectural, and the District Court properly allowed it. Dept. of Transportation v. Simonson, 2004 MT 60, 320 M 249, 87 P3d 416 (2004).

Lack of Evidence on Impact of Taking on Value of Remaining Property — Jury Instructions on Compensation for Taking of Access Proper: The District Court instructed the jury that defendants were not entitled to compensation merely because traffic access was diverted because of road construction or for defendants' loss of business resulting from the taking of a part of defendants' property. Defendants contended that the instructions were an abuse of discretion because they were not seeking compensation for access impairment, traffic diversion, or loss of business, but rather that those factors had caused severance damages when the remaining property's commercial value sustained a permanent market value loss, entitling defendants to a new trial. The Supreme Court disagreed. Defendants failed to offer any evidence of a loss of revenue from their business and the impact of the loss on the fair market value of the remainder of the property. Thus, the jury instructions did not materially affect defendants' substantial rights, and the motion for a new trial was properly denied. Dept. of Transportation v. Simonson, 2004 MT 60, 320 M 249, 87 P3d 416 (2004).

No Constitutional Right to Privacy for Nonhuman Entities — Protection of Trade Secrets Under Other Constitutional and Statutory Schemes: Montana's constitutional individual privacy exception to the public's right to know is limited to natural human individuals only and does not apply to nonhuman entities such as corporations. However, nothing in Art. II, sec. 9, Mont. Const., requires disclosure of trade secrets and other confidential proprietary information when that data is protected from disclosure elsewhere in the state or federal constitution or by statute. Great Falls Tribune v. Mont. Pub. Serv. Comm'n, 2003 MT 359, 319 M 38, 82 P3d 876 (2003), overruling Mtn. States Tel. & Tel. v. Dept. of Public Service Regulation, 194 M 277, 634 P2d 181 (1981), and its progeny to the extent that those decisions relied on the constitutional balancing test of the right to individual privacy against the public's right to examine documents or observe governmental deliberations as a basis of protecting trade secrets and other confidential proprietary information of nonhuman entities.

Denial of Application for Subdivision — Failure to State Claim for Inverse Condemnation: Madison River R.V. Ltd. (RV) applied to build a recreational vehicle park in Ennis, but the application was denied. RV's petition to the District Court included a claim that denial of the project amounted to an inverse condemnation of RV's property without just compensation. The District Court dismissed the claim on grounds that RV had not alleged facts from which the court could find that RV had suffered a taking, citing Kudloff v. Billings, 260 M 371, 860 P2d 140, 50 St. Rep. 1108 (1993). The Supreme Court affirmed. There was nothing in the record to suggest that the effect of the denial of the application denied RV all economically beneficial use of the property in question. Madison River R.V. Ltd. v. Ennis, 2000 MT 15, 298 M 91, 994 P2d 1098, 57 St. Rep. 84 (2000).

Criminal Defendant Entitled to Interest Earned on Cash Deposited as Bail Bond — Constitutional Issues: Richland County sought to retain the interest earned on a defendant's $50,000 cash bail bond that had been deposited with the court in an interest-bearing account and to apply the money to the county's general fund. Applying the general rule in Webb's Fabulous Pharmacies, Inc. v. Beckwith, 449 US 155, 66 L Ed 2d 358, 101 S Ct 446 (1980), the Supreme Court held that, absent a statutory provision allowing retention of the interest, the county is no more entitled to retain interest on a cash bail bond than it would be to retain accruing dividends on a deposit of stocks or bonds or the appreciated value on a pledge of real estate under 46-9-401. Retention of interest by the county would also violate several constitutional provisions as well, including: (1) the guarantee in Art. II, sec. 17, Mont. Const., that a citizen cannot be deprived of property without due process of law; (2) the guarantee in this section that property cannot be taken for public use without just compensation; and (3) a potential thwarting of Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., which guarantees a speedy trial, through the incentive by the county to prolong a criminal prosecution as long as possible in order to earn more interest on a bond deposit. Therefore, if the Clerk of Court deposits bond money in an interest-bearing account, then interest earned on the deposit belongs to the owner of the funds that generated the interest. Siroky v. Richland County, 271 M 67, 894 P2d 309, 52 St. Rep. 343 (1995), distinguishing Fresno Firefighters' Local 753 v. Jernagan, 222 Cal. Rep. 886, 177 Cal. App. 3d 403 (Cal. Ct. App. 5th Dist. 1986).

Condemnation Including Private Offices — Evidence to Be Considered — Due Process of Law: The state condemned part of the Vanimans' land for a highway interchange, rest area, and visitor center. The city of Bozeman, which funded part of the project, agreed with the Bozeman Chamber of Commerce that the Chamber would locate its corporate offices in the visitor center. The Vanimans objected to the condemnation as not being for a public purpose. The Supreme Court held that the District Court erred when it failed to consider evidence showing that the Bozeman Chamber of Commerce intended to locate its corporate offices in the proposed visitor center and that this failure constituted a denial of due process of law. Bozeman v. Vaniman, 264 M 76, 869 P2d 790, 51 St. Rep. 154 (1994).

Denial of Recovery for Previous Expenditures by Utilities Not Denial of Just Compensation: The Mountain Water Company (MWC) sought an increase in utility rates to cover previous expenditures that it had been compelled to provide for its customers under 69-4-511 (now repealed), seeking recovery through a 2-year amortization. The Public Service Commission (PSC) authorized recovery through rates of annual and prospective expenses, but denied recovery of previous expenditures. On appeal, the District Court held that PSC's refusal to allow recovery of back expenses failed to justly compensate MWC for the taking of its property under 69-4-511 (now repealed). The rule set out in Galveston Elec. Co. v. Galveston, 258 US 388, 66 L Ed 678, 42 S Ct 351 (1922), is that a utility may not set its rates so as to amortize past deficits, and the rule applies to a private as well as to a municipal utility. MWC was aware of the passage of 69-4-511 (now repealed) and could have applied for coverage of the utility costs prospectively, but failed to do so. The District Court erred in concluding that MWC was not justly compensated by PSC's denial of retroactive recovery. Mtn. Water Co. v. Dept. of Public Service Regulation, 254 M 76, 835 P2d 4, 49 St. Rep. 632 (1992).

Forfeiture of Water Rights Not Considered Unjust Taking Without Compensation: Former water rights holders who forfeited their rights through failure to meet the filing deadline contended that 85-2-226 was an unconstitutional taking without just compensation under state and federal laws because invalidating existing water rights for failure to file extended beyond what was reasonably necessary to preserve the public welfare. However, the deprivation occurred only as the result of the appropriators' neglect or the neglect of their predecessors and not as the result of excessive or unreasonable state action. Section 85-2-226 does not result in taking property without just compensation because the state is not required to compensate the owner for the consequences of the owner's own neglect. In re Adjudication of Existing Yellowstone River Water Rights, 253 M 167, 832 P2d 1210, 49 St. Rep. 413 (1992). See also Texaco, Inc. v. Short, 454 US 516, 70 L Ed 2d 738, 102 S Ct 781 (1982).

Stratified Sales Assessment Ratio — Unconstitutional: On October 12, 1990, the court issued its written order explaining that the use of 1990 tax values derived from the stratified sales assessment ratio study and the subsequent application of a percentage factor to certain residential properties, which in 1989 were assessed or appraised at or above their true market values, resulted in unfair discrimination by requiring those property owners to bear a disproportionate share of the state tax burden in violation of the equal protection and due process requirements of both the U.S. and Montana Constitutions. The court further found that application of the ratio violated statutory appraisal provisions requiring general and uniform appraisal, assessment, and equalization of all taxable property in the state. Dept. of Revenue v. Barron, 245 M 100, 799 P2d 533, 47 St. Rep. 1869 (1990), followed, with regard to the unconstitutionality of a 2% phasein of changes in real property value (revised Ch. 584, L. 1999) on equal protection grounds, in Roosevelt v. Dept. of Revenue, 1999 MT 30, 293 M 240, 975 P2d 295, 56 St. Rep. 125 (1999).

Property Interest Not Created by Constitution: Plaintiff claimed that a city's denial of water and sewer permits deprived him of his property interest in those permits without just compensation. However, plaintiff had no property interest in the permits that could be afforded constitutional protection. Property interests are not created constitutionally; they come from independent sources, such as state law. Mogan v. Harlem, 238 M 1, 775 P2d 686, 46 St. Rep. 1043 (1989).

State as Condemning Agency — Compensation for Vagrant Surface Waters Required: The state, as a condemning agency, is held to a standard of paying just compensation for land when the diversion of vagrant surface waters causes damage to private lands. St. v. Feenan, 231 M 255, 752 P2d 182, 45 St. Rep. 589 (1988).

No Recovery if No Actual Taking: When a public improvement is made on property adjoining that of one who claims to be damaged by general factors like change of neighborhood, noise, dust, change of view, increased traffic, pollution, and inconvenience of ingress and egress, there can be no recovery if there has been no actual taking or severance of the claimant's property. Adams v. Dept. of Highways, 230 M 393, 753 P2d 846, 45 St. Rep. 298 (1988). However, see Knight v. Missoula, 252 M 232, 827 P2d 1270, 49 St. Rep. 230 (1992), wherein the District Court erred in its broad reading and application of Adams by summarily dismissing a case involving a dirt road in a residential area. The Supreme Court found that limited circumstances could arise in which problems associated with increased traffic may be compensable, and the court remanded for a finding of whether the increased traffic and resulting problems caused a depreciation in the value of adjoining residential property sufficient to give rise to compensation under the doctrine of inverse condemnation.

Necessary Expenses of Litigation Authorized Regardless of Form of Action: Plaintiff obtained a declaratory judgment that certain stream use legislation (Title 23, ch. 2, part 3) constituted an unconstitutional taking of private property without just compensation. The court held that under this section the right to just compensation, including necessary expenses of litigation, does not depend on the form of the action and is not limited to the traditional eminent domain proceeding in the form of a condemnation or inverse condemnation action, but extends to a declaratory judgment action as well. Galt v. St., 230 M 327, 749 P2d 1089, 45 St. Rep. 246 (1988).

Open-Pit Excavation Necessary for Backslope as Authorized Public Use — Landowner Notification Act Ineffectual to Prevent Condemnation: An open-pit excavation necessary to backslope the mining of an ore body is an authorized public use for which condemnation may be had. The Landowner Notification Act appears to preclude this kind of condemnation because under 82-2-303, an open-pit mine operator must obtain from the surface owner of private lands specific written approval of proposed work before commencing operations. However, the Supreme Court noted that the Act was aimed at the protection of private persons, while eminent domain law, constitutionally grounded and deriving from the power of sovereignty, was enacted to protect the public good. The court found it inconceivable that the Legislature intended provisions enacted for the benefit of private persons to overcome and supersede provisions preserving the public good. Therefore, the Landowner Notification Act was found not to adversely affect the right to use eminent domain against a nonconsenting landowner. Mont. Talc Co. v. Cyprus Mines Corp., 229 M 491, 748 P2d 444, 44 St. Rep. 2161 (1987). See also McCabe Petroleum Corp. v. N Bar Ranch, LLC, 2004 MT 73, 320 M 384, 87 P3d 995 (2004), in which the Supreme Court held that eminent domain condemnation provisions applicable to open-pit mines in Mont. Talc Co. did not apply to oil and gas leases and wells.

"Means End Test" — Owner Consent Statute Violative of Due Process, Impairment of Obligation of Contract, and Eminent Domain: Applying the "means end test" adopted in Lawton v. Steele, 152 US 133, 38 L Ed 385, 14 S Ct 499 (1894), wherein the state's authority on behalf of the public is balanced against the constitutional due process requirement in the protection of private property, the Supreme Court declared 82-4-224 (now repealed), the owner consent statute of the Montana Strip and Underground Mine Reclamation Act, to be unconstitutional. The court concluded that the denial of just compensation placed an unreasonable burden on mineral owners, in violation of due process, and that the statute does not bear the requisite relation to the public health, safety, morals, or general welfare. The statute does not address reclamation, conservation, or any other policy goal; does not prevent strip mining operations; does not regulate how mining or reclamation is performed; does not conserve agricultural land; and is inapplicable unless the surface rights have been severed from the mineral rights or the mineral estate is owned in fee by the federal government or in trust for an Indian tribe. W. Energy Co. v. Genie Land Co., 227 M 74, 737 P2d 478, 44 St. Rep. 904 (1987), distinguishing Keystone Bituminous Coal Ass'n v. DeBenedictis, 480 US 470, 94 L Ed 2d 472, 107 S Ct 1232 (1987).

Public Recreational Use of Dearborn River — No Inverse Condemnation: Landowner along Dearborn River was sued by parties seeking a determination of the public's right to use the river for recreational uses. Landowner counterclaimed for inverse condemnation, basing the counterclaim on his claim to ownership of the riverbed. The Supreme Court held that the question of title to the bed was irrelevant to determining navigability for use by the public; that landowner had no claim to the waters; that since there was no claim to the waters, nothing was taken and thus there was no ground for an inverse condemnation claim; and that, consequently, the District Court did not err in dismissing the counterclaim. Mont. Coalition for Stream Access, Inc. v. Curran, 210 M 38, 682 P2d 163, 41 St. Rep. 906 (1984).

Inverse Condemnation — Damage Claim: When inverse condemnation of land occurs prior to its sale, purchaser is not entitled to claim damages for the condemnation. Howard v. St., 198 M 470, 647 P2d 828, 39 St. Rep. 1111 (1982).

"Taking" — Interference With Right to Use Property: A taking occurs not only when there is an interference with the actual use of the property but also, even if the land is unused, when there is an interference with the right to use the property. Howard v. St., 198 M 470, 647 P2d 828, 39 St. Rep. 1111 (1982).

Damages Recoverable for Diminution in Value of Land Caused by Change in Access: In an action to condemn 20.45 acres of land for the purpose of expanding a municipal airport, landowners appealed the commissioners' assessment to the District Court. Prior to trial, the District Court granted the airport board's motion in limine and excluded evidence on diminution of value of landowners' remaining land due to the abandonment of a county road contained in the condemned parcel, ruling that landowners had no legal interest in the continuance of a county road unless discontinuance of that road deprived them of access to their remaining property. The Supreme Court reversed, ruling that although condemnees cannot recover damages for a reduction in traffic flow caused by discontinuance of a county road, they can recover damages if the change in access has caused a substantial change in value in the condemnees' land and landowners should have been permitted to introduce evidence on this issue. McCone County v. James, 198 M 430, 646 P2d 1209, 39 St. Rep. 1107 (1982).

Inverse Condemnation by City: Where the city of Billings widened and developed a major arterial street adjacent to plaintiff's residentially zoned property, where property on opposite side of street was condemned by city in process of developing the street, and where plaintiff's property was significantly reduced in value because of the city's refusal to rezone plaintiff's property, the city, although exercising its police power properly, nonetheless interfered with plaintiff's private property interests so as to constitute taking by inverse condemnation. Knight v. Billings, 197 M 165, 642 P2d 141, 39 St. Rep. 385 (1982), distinguished in Adams v. Dept. of Highways, 230 M 393, 753 P2d 846, 45 St. Rep. 298 (1988), and in McElwain v. Flathead County, 248 M 231, 811 P2d 1267, 48 St. Rep. 410 (1991). See also Wohl v. Missoula, 2013 MT 46, 369 Mont. 108, 300 P.3d 1119.

Nature of Easement — When Deprivation of Property Occurs: A landowner brought an action to prevent the state from opening a fishing access site and from paving a road to the site, based on a claimed fee title to the roadway. The District Court granted the state a summary judgment as a matter of law. The Supreme Court found the landowner's interest was an ordinary easement. The words "private road" did not clearly indicate intent to create in him an "exclusive" easement. The state's use of the road cannot be declared inconsistent with the landowner's on the basis of speculation. Furthermore, under various statutory provisions, the state obtained its land lawfully. The plaintiff had not yet been deprived of his property interest. Any damages remained speculative at the time of the decision. The summary judgment was accordingly affirmed. Titeca v. St., 194 M 209, 634 P2d 1156, 38 St. Rep. 1533 (1981).

City as Public Utility — Cost of Relocating — "Taking" — Local Self-Government: A city acting in its proprietary capacity as an operator of water, sewer, and lighting facilities is a public utility; therefore, Title 60, ch. 4, part 4, applies. The city must pay 25% of the costs of relocating its water, sewer, and light systems incurred as a result of the Broadway Avenue-Federal Aid Urban System project. Necessary relocation of municipally owned utility systems is not a taking of private property requiring just compensation. The doctrine of local self-government does not prevent the application of 60-4-403 (now repealed) as an unconstitutionally imposed tax or compelled incurrence of debt. St. v. Helena, 193 M 441, 632 P2d 332, 38 St. Rep. 1283 (1981).

Attorney Fees and Costs Taxed After Final Judgment: When the condemnee filed its motion to tax costs and attorney fees, it was not entitled to a judgment on the award of the Commissioners because the time for appeal had not begun to run on the day that the motion was filed. The Supreme Court rejected the condemnor's contention that an appeal from the Commissioners' award must be perfected by one of the parties and thereafter, within 30 days, the condemnor must submit to the condemnee a written final offer of judgment before the condemnee is entitled to attorney fees and costs. That result is inconsistent with Art. II, sec. 29, Mont. Const. If a condemnee prevails in litigation, he is entitled to recover his expenses. Bozeman Parking Comm'n v. First Trust Co. of Mont., 190 M 107, 619 P2d 168, 37 St. Rep. 1610 (1980).

Attorneys' Fees — Award for Services of Two Attorneys: An award for attorneys' fees for work of both an attorney representing respondent up to the appellate stage and a second attorney representing respondent through the appellate stage may properly be granted; within the contemplation of Art. II, sec. 29, Mont. Const., "reasonable, necessary expenses of litigation" include fees paid to two attorneys representing the same party, particularly where the work does not overlap and there is no prejudice to the appellant. St. v. Helehan, 189 M 339, 615 P2d 925, 37 St. Rep. 1516 (1980).

Attorneys' Fees — Reliance by Courts on Experts: In determining attorneys' fees, the court, as a jury, is not bound absolutely to the testimony of expert witnesses. It can reduce or increase the figures submitted to it by experts as reasonable attorneys' fees, and as long as its findings are not clearly erroneous, the determination made in its discretion will not be disturbed. St. v. Helehan, 189 M 339, 615 P2d 925, 37 St. Rep. 1516 (1980).

Necessary Cost of Litigation — Expert Who Doesn't Testify: Under Art. II, sec. 29, Mont. Const., "necessary expenses of litigation" include the cost of hiring an expert who doesn't actually testify. St. v. Helehan, 189 M 339, 615 P2d 925, 37 St. Rep. 1516 (1980).

Moving or Raising Utility Wires — Constitutional Exercise of Police Power: A police power regulation must be reasonably adapted to its purpose and must injure or impair property rights only to the extent reasonably necessary to preserve the public welfare. The standard of reasonableness is the constitutional measure of the proper exercise of the police power. As a general rule, acts conducted in the proper exercise of police power do not constitute a taking of property and do not entitle the owner of such property to compensation for the regulation or impairment thereof except in cases that exceed regulation or impairment and that entail an appropriation of property that amounts to a taking or deprivation of property for public use. The momentary raising of utility lines or their severing was under a statute which amounts to a regulation or impairment of utility property and not an actual taking or appropriation of property for the private use of another. The statute is a reasonable exercise of police power. Yellowstone Valley Elec. Co-op v. Ostermiller, 187 M 8, 608 P2d 491 (1980). The reasonableness standard was applied to enactment of septic regulations in McElwain v. Flathead County, 248 M 231, 811 P2d 1267, 48 St. Rep. 410 (1991).

Moving or Raising Utility Wires — Police Power, Not Eminent Domain: Under 69-4-603, a utility was required to move or raise utility wires so that oversized objects could be moved through public streets. The statute was determined to be an exercise of police power rather than sounding in eminent domain. Therefore, due process requirements of the 14th amendment may be met without compensation. Four factors were cited in the determination that the statute exercises police power: (1) public safety is concerned; (2) a public benefit is conferred; (3) a reasonable and necessary public use is allowed; and (4) the public's right to use the highways is recognized under the statute. Yellowstone Valley Elec. Co-op v. Ostermiller, 187 M 8, 608 P2d 491 (1980).

Attorney Fees — When Right Arises: The right to necessary costs of litigation provided by 70-30-305 does not arise when the suit is filed but vests only when the private property owner prevails, securing a verdict higher than the state's final offer. St. v. Burlingame, 182 M 298, 597 P2d 51 (1979).

Reasonableness of Contingent Attorney's Fee Based on Agreement Made Prior to 1977 Amendment Precluding Contingent Fees: In eminent domain proceeding, attorney's fee of $9,600 based on a contingent fee agreement entered into in May of 1977 was properly awarded when respondent had introduced evidence as to the reasonableness of the contingent percentage and the appellant offered no evidence as to either a reasonable hourly rate or the reasonableness of the contingent percentage. St. v. Rogers, 184 M 181, 602 P2d 560 (1979).

Attorney Fees — Inverse Condemnation: Because there is a clear constitutional requirement that attorney fees be paid in condemnation cases whenever the landowner prevails and because the words "condemnor" and "condemnee" were used in the statute implementing the constitutional provision, attorney fees were permitted in an inverse condemnation case. Rauser v. Toston Irrigation District, 172 M 530, 565 P2d 632 (1977). See also Wohl v. Missoula, 2013 MT 46, 369 Mont. 108, 300 P.3d 1119.

Inverse Condemnation: There may be a taking by the defendant in the form of inverse condemnation without a showing of negligence in design, construction, or operation if the damages are an inevitable result of the intentional undertaking of the project. It is enough to show the damages were proximately caused by and a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the undertaking. Rauser v. Toston Irrigation District, 172 M 530, 565 P2d 632 (1977). See also Knight v. Missoula, 252 M 232, 827 P2d 1270, 49 St. Rep. 230 (1992).

Severance Damage to Remainder of Land When Condemnation Results in Excising Very Heart of Ranch: Damage award to remainder of ranch was inadequate for not allowing compensation for permanent interference with farming, as distinguished from temporary interference or inconvenience, when heart of ranch was excised by condemnation, as just compensation for a public taking of private land is computed by adding fair market value of land taken to "value of remainder before taking minus value of remainder after taking". Meagher County Newlan Creek Water District v. Walter, 169 M 358, 547 P2d 850 (1976).

Intent — Compliance — Effective Date: By enacting Art. II, sec. 29, Mont. Const., the Constitutional Convention intended to make the landowner whole in eminent domain proceedings in that a judgment would be a "net recovery" with the expenses of litigation being assessed against the state. The directive of this section cannot be frustrated by inadvertent or intentional violations of the statutory procedure. The right to costs vests upon judgment, and property owner is entitled to costs upon a verdict secured subsequent to the effective date. Dept. of Highways v. Olsen, 166 M 139, 531 P2d 1330 (1975).

Litigation Costs: Right to necessary cost of litigation does not arise at the time suit is filed but vests only when private property owner secures verdict higher than state's final offer. Thus, award of litigation costs was proper in case filed before enactment of new law but decided after law was in effect. Dept. of Highways v. Olsen, 166 M 139, 531 P2d 1330 (1975).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION
GENERAL PROVISIONS

Examination of Mining Claim:

The court has the power to compel a defendant, upon the payment of the reasonable cost, to lower and hoist the agents of the plaintiff into and from the underground workings of a lode mining claim, while engaged in the inspection thereof, without infringing the provisions of Art. III, sec. 14, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Boston & Mont. Consol. Copper & Silver Min. Co. v. District Court, 30 M 206, 76 P 206 (1904).

An examination of a lode mining claim was not in contravention of Art. III, sec. 14, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Parrot Silver & Copper Co. v. District Court, 28 M 528, 73 P 230 (1903).

Provision — Mandatory, Prohibitory, and Self-Executing: Article III, sec. 14, 1889 Mont. Const., was both mandatory and prohibitory, and it was also self-executing. Less v. Butte, 28 M 27, 72 P 140 (1903).

Purpose of Provision: Article III, sec. 14, 1889 Mont. Const., was drafted in broad language for the express purpose of preventing unjust or arbitrary exercise of the power of eminent domain. Less v. Butte, 28 M 27, 72 P 140 (1903).

PUBLIC USE

Municipal Property: Property held by city is private property and, when taken by state for more necessary public use, must be paid for in same manner as if taken from a private owner. Three Forks v. Highway Comm'n, 156 M 392, 480 P2d 826 (1971).

Rights-of-Way of Necessity: For examples of implied reservations or implied grants of easement by necessity see: Thisted v. Country Club Tower Corp., 146 M 87, 405 P2d 432 (1965), which overruled Herrin v. Sieben, 46 M 226, 127 P 323 (1912) and Simonson v. McDonald, 131 M 494, 311 P2d 982 (1957). See also Violet v. Martin, 62 M 335, 205 P 221 (1922), overruled in Simonson v. McDonald, ibid.

Subdivision Public Park Dedication: Law, since repealed, requiring that a portion of platted subdivisions be dedicated to public park purposes was not an unconstitutional delegation of legislative authority to city and county authorities. The enforcement of this requirement was not a confiscation of private property without compensation or an invalid extension of the police power. Billings Properties, Inc. v. Yellowstone County, 144 M 25, 394 P2d 182 (1964).

State Housing Projects: Sections constituting the state housing law did not violate Art. III, sec. 14, 1889 Mont. Const., housing projects being devoted to a public use. The grant of right of eminent domain to the housing authorities and providing just compensation for property taken be made to the owners is within the constitutional provisions. Rutherford v. Great Falls, 107 M 512, 86 P2d 656 (1939).

Statutory Construction of Public Road Legislation: Public highways are such as have been established by the public authorities or were recognized by them and used generally by the public or which had become such by prescription or adverse use at the time of the enactment of the statute. Peasley v. Trosper, 103 M 401, 64 P2d 109 (1936).

When Title Passes: Title to land condemned for a public use does not pass until payment is made or tendered. School District v. Powers, 62 M 151, 204 P 598 (1921).

Destruction of Infected Fruit: The statutes authorizing the state inspector of fruit pests to destroy infected fruit are valid although the destruction is without compensation to the owner. Colvill v. Fox, 51 M 72, 149 P 496 (1915).

Construction of Drains: Laws (since repealed) providing for the construction and maintenance of drains "wherever the same shall be conducive to the improvement or reclamation of agricultural lands, public health, convenience, or welfare" were not unconstitutional as permitting the taking of private property for other than a public use. Billings Sugar Co. v. Fish, 40 M 256, 106 P 565 (1910).

Vacation of Public Road: By the vacation of a public road, there was no taking of private property for public use, within the meaning of Art. III, sec. 14, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Johnson v. Bd. of Comm'rs, 19 M 582, 49 P 147 (1897).

JUST COMPENSATION

Waiver of Sovereign Immunity — Trespass Damages: When State took city property without first paying just compensation it waived its sovereign immunity, and measure of damages properly included trespass damages. Three Forks v. St. Highway Comm'n, 156 M 392, 480 P2d 826 (1971).

Just Compensation — Scope of Review:

When amount of just compensation as determined by jury is based on credible evidence as to market value of highest and best use for which land is available, the verdict and judgment will not be set aside. St. Highway Comm'n v. Vaughan, 155 M 277, 470 P2d 967 (1970).

In eminent domain proceedings the findings of the court will generally not be disturbed on appeal unless they are so obviously and palpably out of proportion to the injury done as to be in excess of just compensation provided for by Art. III, sec. 14, 1889 Mont. Const. St. Highway Comm'n v. Woodcock, 147 M 291, 411 P2d 357 (1966).

In eminent domain proceedings, the jury findings will generally not be disturbed on appeal unless they are so obviously and palpably out of proportion to the injury done as to be in excess of just compensation provided by Art. III, sec. 14, 1889 Mont. Const. St. v. Peterson, 134 M 52, 328 P2d 617 (1958).

Just Compensation — Evidence of Reconstruction Costs and Comparable Sales: When condemnee's house was between 50 and 60 years old and had been converted into a multiple family dwelling, court did not err in excluding evidence of reconstruction costs or comparable sales elsewhere in determining value of the property since there was no way of determining depreciation of the old house in arriving at reconstruction cost figures, nor were there sufficient comparable sales in the area. St. Highway Comm'n v. Tubbs, 147 M 296, 411 P2d 739 (1966).

Just Compensation — Conflicting Testimony: When there was conflicting testimony as to amount of damage to plaintiff's land after condemnation by state of part of that land, jury's finding as to amount of damage for the injury done was not so excessive as to be a violation of Art. III, sec. 14, 1889 Mont. Const., providing for just compensation. St. Highway Comm'n v. Biastoch Meats, Inc., 145 M 261, 400 P2d 274 (1965).

Easement as Property: A ditch is an easement and was property as used in Art. III, sec. 14, 1889 Mont. Const. It may not be taken for public purpose without just compensation. Colarchik v. Watkins, 144 M 17, 393 P2d 786 (1964).

Just Compensation — Evidence of Value: An owner may testify as to the reasonable value of the property for the general use to which he is putting it, but to go beyond that field, in estimating its worth, he must possess the qualifications required of a general witness as to value. St. Highway Comm'n v. Keneally, 142 M 256, 384 P2d 770 (1963); Alexander v. St. Highway Comm'n, 142 M 93, 381 P2d 780 (1963).

Suit by Landowner Not Inverse Condemnation Action: When party sued the State for damages and just compensation, the action was treated as any other damage action and on appeal plaintiff could not claim it to be an inverse condemnation action and require the State to pay into court the amount of damages prayed for in the complaint. State ex rel. St. Highway Comm'n v. District Court, 142 M 198, 383 P2d 481 (1963).

Announcement of Highway Route: When plaintiff's property was within the announced route of proposed interstate highway and he was unable to sell, lease, develop, or finance his property for a period of 5 years after the announcement, he was allowed no recovery under Art. III, sec. 14, 1889 Mont. Const., because no property was actually taken or damaged by the state. Bakken v. St. Highway Comm'n, 142 M 166, 382 P2d 550 (1963).

Private Road Action — Expenses: Under Art. III, sec. 15, 1889 Mont. Const., attorney's fees were not allowed as an expense of the proceedings to open a private road of necessity. Tomten v. Thomas, 125 M 159, 232 P2d 723 (1951), overruled in Callant v. Fed. Land Bank of Spokane, 181 M 400, 593 P2d 1036 (1979).

Private Road Action — Expenses to Successful Plaintiff: In action to open a private road, the Constitution and statutes providing for an award of expenses of the proceeding to defendant apply only when the plaintiff is successful. Kendrick v. Powell, 119 M 622, 178 P2d 859 (1947).

Subject to Statutes of Limitation: An action against a city to recover damages caused by the flooding of plaintiff's city property in consequence of the raising of a street level, based upon Art. III, sec. 14, 1889 Mont. Const., was subject to Statutes of Limitation which affect the remedy rather than the right. Stranahan v. Havre, 112 M 591, 119 P2d 629 (1941).

Appeal by Plaintiff: Contention that sections authorizing an appeal by plaintiff after payment of the judgment into court for defendant and after securing possession of the land were invalid under constitutional provision prohibiting the taking of private property for public use without paying just compensation therefor, and that the appeal should therefore be dismissed, held not meritorious. St. v. Bradshaw Land Co., 99 M 95, 43 P2d 674 (1935).

Payment or Tender of Compensation Condition Precedent:

By adopting Art. III, sec. 14, 1889 Mont. Const., the Convention modified the common-law rule which denied to the owner compensation for infringements upon his right of free access to his property by changes in the grade of the street upon which it abuts and secured to him the possession and enjoyment of it free from interference with it by any means for any public purpose, until just compensation has been ascertained and made or tendered to him. The making or tendering of compensation is a condition precedent. Eby v. Lewistown, 55 M 113, 173 P 1163 (1918); Less v. Butte, 28 M 27, 72 P 140 (1903).

Private property cannot be taken for a public use in invitum, except upon compensation first being made to the owner. In other words, the payment or tender of compensation, the amount of which has been ascertained in the manner provided by law, is made a condition precedent to the acquisition of any right by the public. Possession taken from the owner without compliance with this condition is wrongful, and ejectment will lie in favor of the owner to recover it. The fact that the wrongdoer is a municipal corporation does not affect the right to maintain the action. Eby v. Lewistown, 55 M 113, 173 P 1163 (1918); Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. v. Nolan, 53 M 129, 162 P 169 (1916); Flynn v. Beaverhead County, 49 M 347, 141 P 673 (1914).

Statute Limiting Time for Claims Unconstitutional: Laws (since repealed) that cast upon the owner of city or town realty embraced within the limits of a proposed special improvement district the burden of ascertaining the amount of damages likely to ensue to the property by reason of its creation and making claim for the amount within a specified time or being barred thereafter from doing so were in violation of Art. III, sec. 14, 1889 Mont. Const. Eby v. Lewistown, 55 M 113, 173 P 1163 (1918).

Damages Caused by Street Grading:

The right to compensation for damages to property occasioned by the grading of a street from contour to established grade was guaranteed by Art. III, sec. 14, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Butte v. District Court, 48 M 614, 139 P 791 (1914).

A landowner is entitled to compensation for damages owing to the grading of a street on which his property abuts, in accordance with a grade established by a city, notwithstanding the fact that such grade is the first one ever fixed. Less v. Butte, 28 M 27, 72 P 140 (1903).

Applicable to Railroads: The assumption that a railroad has, through being given authority by the Legislature to construct its line, rights to which the rights of adjacent property holders are subordinated is limited by the principle that no person can be deprived of property without due process of law and compensation first being made to the owner. Wine v. N. Pac. Ry., 48 M 200, 136 P 387 (1913).

Condemnor Entitled to Property on Appeal: A railway company is entitled to possession of condemned property upon making a deposit of the damages awarded by the commission. Title pending appeal is merely provisional, and the fact that an appeal has been taken does not abrogate the award of the commission. Until revised by appeal such award was just compensation and Art. III, sec. 14, 1889 Mont. Const., had been complied with thereby. State ex rel. Volunteer Min. Co. v. McHatton, 15 M 159, 38 P 711 (1894).

Private Road Action — Mining Claims: The provisions of Art. III, sec. 15, 1889 Mont. Const., did not abrogate statute granting to the owners of mining claims a right-of-way across the claims of others and providing for the assessment of damages by Commissioners but merely modified the statute as to the method of determining the damages, leaving the jurisdiction and procedure in other respects unchanged. State ex rel. Coleman v. District Court, 14 M 476, 37 P 7 (1894).

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

Deletion of Hanging as Form of Capital Punishment Not Bill of Attainder: Pursuant to the version of 46-19-103 that was in effect at the time that Langford was sentenced for execution, he affirmatively elected that death be imposed by hanging rather than lethal injection. Langford appealed to the District Court for a declaration that execution by hanging was cruel and unusual punishment that violated the eighth amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The District Court denied the motion, holding that Langford's choice of hanging rendered the cruel and unusual punishment argument moot. Langford appealed to the appropriate federal courts for a writ of habeas corpus, applying the same argument. During the pendency of Langford's federal habeas corpus proceedings, the Montana Legislature met and amended 46-19-103 by removing the hanging option, rendering the federal proceedings moot and nonjusticiable. Langford asserted that the amendment to 46-19-103 constituted a bill of attainder in violation of this section, inflicting punishment without a judicial trial. However, 46-19-103 does not inflict punishment, but simply delineates the procedure by which a previously imposed sentence is carried out. Thus, the amendment to 46-19-103 as not a bill of attainder. Langford v. St., 287 M 107, 951 P2d 1357, 54 St. Rep. 1522 (1997).

1983 Amendments Not Bill of Attainder: Chapter 411, L. 1983, amended 46-19-103 to allow the defendant to choose death by lethal injection as an alternative to hanging. Section 7 makes the act applicable to death sentences whether first pronounced before or after its effective date, making the act specifically retroactive. The act is not a bill of attainder as argued by the defendant who was convicted before the effective date of the act and sentenced to death after its effective date. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 211 M 341, 684 P2d 1112, 41 St. Rep. 1400 (1984).

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION
EX POST FACTO

Ex Post Facto Application of Longer Statute of Limitations — Violation of Constitution — Charges Dismissed With Prejudice: Nearly three decades after a child's rape, the defendant's DNA identified him as the perpetrator and he was charged. At the time of the crime, the statute of limitations for rape was 5 years. Later, it was extended to 1 year after a suspect is conclusively identified by DNA testing. The defendant filed a motion to dismiss because the statute of limitations in effect at the time of the crime had expired. The District Court denied the motion and reasoned that the statute extending the timeframe applied retroactively and did not violate ex post facto laws of the Montana Constitution or the U.S. Constitution. The defendant filed a writ of supervisory control, which the Supreme Court granted. The court held that even though the Legislature had intended the new statute of limitations to apply retroactively, its application violated the ex post facto clause. Accordingly, the court reversed and remanded the case to the District Court to grant the defendant's motion to dismiss the charges with prejudice. Tipton v. 13th Judicial District Court, 2018 MT 164, 392 Mont. 59, 421 P.3d 780.

Consideration of Suspension of License Prior to Enactment of Aggravated DUI Law — Not Ex Post Facto Violation: In 2007, the defendant's driver's license was suspended when she declined to submit to the preliminary alcohol screening test after being arrested for DUI. In 2011, the Legislature enacted 61-8-465, the aggravated DUI statute, which provides that a person has committed an aggravated DUI when the person operates a vehicle under the influence of alcohol, refuses to provide a breath or blood sample required under 61-8-402, and has had his or her license suspended for refusing to give a breath or blood sample within 10 years of the current DUI. In 2013, the defendant was again arrested for DUI and again refused to provide a breath or blood sample. She was charged with aggravated DUI based on her refusal to submit to a breath or blood test in 2007. The defendant moved to dismiss the charge, asserting that it violated the prohibition against ex post facto laws because it relied on her 2007 refusal, which predated the enactment of the aggravated DUI statute. The Justice Court denied the motion, concluding that a conviction would rely on the defendant's 2013 conduct rather than her 2007 conduct, and subsequently the defendant was convicted of aggravated DUI. The defendant appealed the denial of her motion to dismiss to the District Court, which affirmed the Justice Court, and the defendant then appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the defendant was punished for her conduct in 2013, while her conduct in 2007 was merely taken into account in meeting the elements of the aggravated DUI statute and that the statute therefore did not constitute ex post facto legislation. St. v. Hislop, 2016 MT 130, 383 Mont. 482, 373 P.3d 834.

New Conditions of Parole Imposed After Original Sentence — No Increase in Punishment — No Ex Post Facto Violation: The criminal defendant had originally been sentenced to 30 years in prison with 10 years suspended. After being discharged to serve the suspended portion of his sentence, he violated the conditions of his parole. The District Court imposed a new suspended sentence with 14 new conditions, and the defendant argued the imposition of the conditions violated ex post facto laws. The state argued that the conditions did not violate ex post facto laws because they did not increase the defendant's original sentence and were standard conditions placed on sex offenders who are on parole. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed that the new conditions were not punitive in nature and therefore affirmed the sentence. St. v. Piller, 2014 MT 342, 377 Mont. 374, 343 P.3d 153.

Extended Statute of Limitations for Criminal Offense Applicable to Offenses Not Barred at Time of Amendment: When a statute is amended to extend the limitations period for a criminal offense, the extended limitations period applies to all offenses not barred at the time that the amendment was enacted. Mordja v. District Court, 2008 MT 24, 341 M 219, 177 P3d 439 (2008), overruling Penrod v. Hoskinson, 170 M 277, 552 P2d 325 (1976), and other cases reaching conclusions to the contrary.

Extension of Criminal Statute of Limitations Not Considered Retroactive: The 1989 version of 45-1-205 provided that if the victim of sexual intercourse without consent was a minor at the time of the offense, the offender could be prosecuted up to 5 years after the victim turned 18 years old. In 2001, the Legislature extended the statute of limitations to expire 10 years after the victim turned 18 years old. The victim in this case turned 18 in 2001, and Mordja was charged in 2007, 5 years and 10 months after the victim turned 18. Mordja moved to dismiss the charges against him on grounds that the statute of limitations had expired. The District Court denied the motion, holding that because 45-1-205 was amended before the original statute of limitations expired in Mordja's case, the new limitations period applied to Mordja. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. A defendant cannot have a vested right in a statute of limitations that has not yet expired. The statute of limitations did not expire in Mordja's case before 45-1-205 was amended, so Mordja did not have any vested right in an affirmative defense. Application of the 2001 amendment to Mordja's case was not retroactive within the meaning of 1-2-109 because it did not affect Mordja's vested rights or impose any additional obligations or detriments on Mordja. Thus, the state had the right to prosecute Mordja at any time within the newly extended limitations period, and the District Court did not err in denying Mordja's motion to dismiss. Mordja v. District Court, 2008 MT 24, 341 M 219, 177 P3d 439 (2008), following St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001), and Stogner v. Calif., 539 US 607 (2003).

Res Judicata Not Bar to Correction of Manifest Error in Prior Decision — Illegal Sentence Reversed: In 1998, when Southwick committed two felonies, 46-18-201 limited commitment to the Department of Corrections (DOC) to 5 years. In 1999, the Legislature amended the statute to allow a longer DOC commitment up to the maximum time that a defendant could be sentenced for a particular offense, provided that all but the first 5 years of commitment are suspended. When Southwick's parole was subsequently revoked in 2003, the District Court revoked the suspended portion of Southwick's commitments to the DOC, even though Southwick had discharged his unsuspended commitments to the DOC, and ordered Southwick to be recommitted to the DOC for an additional 5 years in each case. Southwick petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus on grounds that the sentence was illegal, but the petition was denied on grounds of res judicata. Southwick also moved the District Court for resentencing on grounds that the sentence was illegal, but the motion was denied, and Southwick appealed. The Supreme Court noted that res judicata generally precludes reviewing an issue already decided and that relitigation of issues in criminal cases is barred if: (1) the same ground presented in the subsequent application was determined adversely to the applicant on the prior application; (2) the prior determination was on the merits; and (3) the ends of justice would not be served by reaching the merits of the subsequent application. The court also noted that when a criminal defendant is potentially subject to a facially illegal sentence, the ends of justice suggest that res judicata should not bar rehearing the issues even if the first two criteria are met. In this case, the District Court applied a statute that was not in effect at the time that Southwick committed the crimes, which violated the prohibition on ex post facto laws. Because the District Court did not have authority to impose the sentence, the sentence was illegal and facially invalid. The 5-year DOC commitment for each offense was valid, but not the suspended portions following Southwick's commitment. Southwick had discharged the maximum time that he could have been committed to DOC before the petition to revoke was filed, and the District Court had no authority to revoke a suspended commitment that was illegally imposed. Therefore, the Supreme Court vacated the order revoking the suspended portion of Southwick's commitments. St. v. Southwick, 2007 MT 257, 339 M 281, 169 P3d 698 (2007).

Imposition of More Burdensome Prison Sentence in Place of Placement With Department of Corrections — Illegal Ex Post Facto Application of Former Sentencing Statute: Tracy's original sentence in Cascade County was for 10 years suspended with the Department of Corrections, to run concurrently with two other sentences that Tracy received in Yellowstone County. Tracy eventually discharged the incarceration portions of both Yellowstone County sentences. When Tracy violated his release conditions, the District Court in Cascade County revoked the original 10-year sentence to the Department of Corrections and resentenced Tracy to 10 years at the state prison. Tracy appealed the imposition of the prison sentence. Under the version of 46-18-203 in effect at the time of Tracy's original offense in 1996, if Tracy violated the terms of his suspended sentence, the District Court could revoke the sentence and require Tracy to serve either the sentence imposed or a lesser sentence. The statute was later amended to require an offender to serve either the sentence imposed or any sentence that could have been imposed as long as the sentence is not longer than the original sentence. The Supreme Court held that a prison sentence was not the same or less than the original sentence with the Department of Corrections in an appropriate facility or program. Rather, the new sentence imposed an additional, more burdensome condition requiring Tracy to go to prison. Although the new sentence was appropriate under the amended 2003 version of 46-18-203, application of the 2003 version to a crime committed in 1996 was an ex post facto application that could not pass constitutional muster, so the Supreme Court vacated the prison sentence and remanded for resentencing under the version of 46-18-203 in effect at the time of the original judgment. St. v. Tracy, 2005 MT 128, 327 M 220, 113 P3d 297 (2005), followed in St. v. Graves, 2015 MT 262, 381 Mont. 37, 355 P.3d 769.

No Error in Allowing Parole Officer to Set Restitution Schedule — Refusal to Waive Administrative Fees Proper: Denham contended that it was error for the sentencing court to delegate the scheduling of monthly restitution payments to a parole officer because the version of 46-18-244 in effect at the time of the crime did not provide for that delegation of authority. The Supreme Court held that the amendments to the statute were purely procedural and did not constitute retroactive legislation, impair Denham's rights, or impose additional duties on Denham, so allowing the parole officer to set the restitution schedule was not error. Denham also appealed the $60,099 restitution and the 10% administrative fee and minimal surcharges. However, Denham assured the court at sentencing of his ability to pay the restitution amount, so it was reasonable to assume that he also had the ability to pay the administrative fee and surcharges. The sentencing court was affirmed. St. v. Denham, 2005 MT 26, 326 M 24, 107 P3d 1263 (2005).

Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act Nonpunitive — Not Considered Ex Post Facto Legislation: Defendant was convicted of failing to update registration as a violent sexual offender. The District Court found that the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act, Title 46, ch. 23, part 5, was ex post facto because 46-23-504 subjected defendant to enhanced punishment based on a prior conviction. The state appealed. Applying Smith v. Doe, 538 US 84, 123 S Ct 1140 (2003), which dealt with an Alaskan registration act similar to the Montana Act, the Supreme Court noted that if both the declared purpose and the structure of a sexual violent offender registration law are nonpunitive, then the intent is to enact a civil regulatory scheme. The court then conducted an indepth analysis of the intent and effects of Montana's law, finding that the legislative intent was clearly nonpunitive, noting that codification of the law in the Montana code of criminal procedure did not in itself transform the law from a nonpunitive civil regulatory scheme into a criminal one. As to effects, the court applied the factors in Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez, 372 US 144 (1963), finding the regulatory scheme to be a reasonable effort on the part of the Legislature to tailor what information may and may not be disclosed, and held that the registration requirements were not excessive. As a nonpunitive act designed for public protection, the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act does not violate the ex post facto clauses of the state or federal constitution. The District Court was reversed, and the charges against defendant were reinstated. St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003), followed in St. v. Murphy, 2003 MT 276, 317 M 500, 78 P3d 843 (2003).

Use of Langford Test to Analyze Ex Post Facto Challenges in Criminal Contexts: Three slightly different tests have emerged in case law since 1963 for analyzing ex post facto challenges in criminal cases. The most recent formulation, set out in Langford v. St., 287 M 107, 951 P2d 1357 (1997), states that a law is ex post facto if it (1) punishes as a crime an act that was not unlawful when committed; (2) makes punishment for a crime more burdensome; or (3) deprives a person charged with a crime of any defense available under the law at the time that the crime was committed. Given that this test is more comprehensive and is in line with the progression of ex post facto jurisprudence, the Langford test will henceforth be used in analyzing ex post facto challenges in criminal contexts. St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003), followed in St. v. Murphy, 2003 MT 276, 317 M 500, 78 P3d 843 (2003).

No Constitutional Liberty Interest in Being Housed Exclusively at State Prison: Following a conviction for deliberate homicide and use of a firearm, Wright was sentenced in 1996 to the state prison in Deer Lodge for 75 years, where he was originally placed. Over the years, Wright was placed at various other institutions, including out-of-state and in-state regional detention and private correctional centers. Wright filed a writ of prohibition to prevent the state from housing him anywhere but the state prison in Deer Lodge, pursuant to the terms of the written judgment. Under the law in effect at the time of Wright's sentencing, the Deer Lodge prison was the only adult male correctional facility in Montana, but the statutory definition has since been expanded to include other facilities. Wright contended that application of the amended definition to his sentence was unconstitutionally ex post facto, in violation of his liberty interests. The Supreme Court disagreed. Pursuant to Meachum v. Fano, 427 US 215 (1975), Wright's conviction sufficiently extinguished Wright's liberty interest to empower the state to confine him in any of its prisons, and under Olim v. Wakinekona, 461 US 238 (1983), Wright also had no justifiable expectation that he would be imprisoned in any particular state. Further, in order for the state to create a liberty interest, under McDermott v. Dept. of Corrections, 2001 MT 134, 305 M 462, 29 P3d 992 (2001), it must first enact a law that establishes a right of real substance, and then even those statutorily defined interests are restricted to freedom from atypical and significant hardships in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life or restraints that inevitably affect the duration of the prisoner's confinement. The Supreme Court held that even if the 1995 definition of state prison did confer a right of real substance, being transferred from one prison to another, even out of state, did not meet the McDermott test for hardship or duration of confinement. Thus, Wright had neither a federal nor a state constitutional liberty interest in being housed exclusively at the state prison in Deer Lodge, and the state has authority to transfer Wright from that facility. Wright v. Mahoney, 2003 MT 141, 316 M 173, 71 P3d 1195 (2003).

Conviction of Felony Nonsupport Prior to Legislative Creation of Felony Offense Considered Improper Ex Post Facto Application Warranting Reversal — Common-Law Plain Error Doctrine Applied: Price was convicted of felony nonsupport for failure to make payments from 1988 through 1996 and was given the maximum 2-year sentence; however, the felony nonsupport statute was not enacted until 1993. On appeal, Price contended that the manner in which the felony nonsupport statute was applied violated the fundamental constitutional right to be free from ex post facto laws. The state argued that because Price failed to object at trial, the issue could not be raised on appeal. The issue of whether Price was convicted of felony nonsupport that occurred before the statute was enacted brought into question the fundamental fairness of Price's trial. The Supreme Court held that because a fundamental right was at issue, the common-law plain error doctrine applied despite Price's failure to preserve the issue at trial. A jury instruction allowed the jury to find Price guilty based on acts committed from 1988 through 1996 and thus subjected Price to increased punishment for conduct that occurred prior to enactment of the felony statute. This was an unconstitutional ex post facto application of the felony nonsupport law, constituting reversible error. St. v. Price, 2002 MT 284, 312 M 458, 59 P3d 1122 (2002).

Plenary Review of Criminal Sentence by Supreme Court Even Though No Objection Made at Sentencing: Brister was sentenced to 20 years for felony sexual assault with 10 years suspended, served the 10-year prison sentence, and then was released and began the 10-year suspended sentence. About 6 years into the suspended sentence, Brister was arrested for felony theft and for violating various parole conditions. The District Court then revoked the suspended sentence and reimposed another 10-year suspended sentence to run consecutively with a 5-year felony theft sentence. The new suspended sentence included 26 additional conditions. Brister did not object to any of the conditions when they were imposed, but filed a motion objecting to the sentence 2 months later, claiming that the conditions were not and could not have been included in the original suspended sentence, and thus violated double jeopardy and ex post facto laws. The state maintained that Brister waived any objections to the conditions by failing to contemporaneously object when the sentence was pronounced, and that the appeal from the sentence was not timely filed. The Supreme Court disagreed and reversed. Under St. v. Lenihan, 184 M 338, 602 P2d 997 (1979), the court will review a sentence imposed in a criminal case if it is alleged that the sentence is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, even if no objection is made at the time of sentencing.

Further, Brister provided the District Court with an opportunity to correct any sentencing errors by filing an objection under 46-18-117 (now repealed), which allowed 120 days for correction of an illegal sentence, so Brister retained the right to appeal the purportedly illegal sentence. St. v. Brister, 2002 MT 13, 308 M 154, 41 P3d 314 (2002), overruling St. v. Taylor, 2000 MT 202, 300 M 499, 5 P3d 1019 (2000), St. v. St. John, 2001 MT 1, 304 M 47, 15 P3d 970 (2001), and St. v. Smith, 2001 MT 111, 305 M 298, 27 P3d 39 (2001), to the extent that those cases held that failure to raise a contemporaneous objection to an illegal sentence at the time of hearing resulted in waiver of defendant's objection, and followed in St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002). See also St. v. Southwick, 2007 MT 257, 339 M 281, 169 P3d 698 (2007).

Retroactivity of New Judicial Rules and Judicial Interpretation — Section 46-23-1012 (1999) Applied Retroactively to Parole Revocations Between April 28, 1999, and May 1, 2001: On April 26, 2001, the Supreme Court held that a probable cause hearing was mandatory only when an offender had been arrested pursuant to a warrant issued by a judge. On May 4, 2001, Goebel petitioned the court to look beyond the plain language of 46-23-1012 and hold that the probable cause hearing was mandatory only when an offender has been arrested by a probation officer rather than pursuant to a warrant issued by a judge. Effective May 1, 2001, the Legislature amended 46-23-1012 to delete the requirement for a probable cause hearing. On May 9, 2001, Giddings filed a petition for rehearing, asking the court to direct the District Court to dismiss the petition to revoke Giddings' suspended sentence on grounds that the District Court lacked jurisdiction to revoke the suspended sentence because of the amendment to 46-23-1012, contending that application of the new statute would violate the constitutional ban on ex post facto legislation. The Supreme Court declined to modify the decision in either Goebel or Giddings because no material fact or question decisive of the cases themselves was overlooked and the decisions did not conflict with any express statute or controlling decision. However, the court did discuss the retroactive application of judicial rules of criminal procedure and the judicial interpretation of a statute, as well as the claim that the retroactive application of 46-23-1012 was a violation of the ex post facto clause. Citing Rivers v. Roadway Express, 511 US 298 (1994), the court held that a court's interpretation of a statute is never new law because the decision declares what the statute meant from the day of its enactment, not from the date of the decision. In determining whether a statute violates the ex post facto clause, the court referred to the test in St. v. Duffy, 2000 MT 186, 300 M 381, 6 P3d 453 (2000), which provided that to be in violation of the clause, a statute must be retrospective and must disadvantage the offender affected by it. In this case, Giddings was not disadvantaged because the statutory change did not alter the definition of or punishment for the probation violation that Giddings was charged with. Further, the error that was the basis for reversal of Giddings' case was jurisdictional, so all proceedings in the District Court were void ab initio, and the state was entitled to proceed anew, following the procedure outlined in the newly amended version of 46-23-1012. The Supreme Court's decisions based on the 1999 version of 46-23-1012 were applicable retroactively to persons whose probation or parole was revoked between April 28, 1999, and May 1, 2001. Thus, if a person was arrested during that period pursuant to a warrant issued by a judge and was not afforded a probable cause hearing within 36 hours of arrest, then the District Court did not have jurisdiction to hold a revocation hearing, so the state could refile the petition to revoke the person's probation pursuant to the 2001 version of 46-23-1012, as long as the probationer was still under the custody or supervision of the Department of Corrections on May 1, 2001. If the person was afforded a probable cause hearing within 36 hours of arrest, then the District Court did have jurisdiction to hold a revocation hearing. St. v. Goebel, 2001 MT 155, 306 M 83, 31 P3d 340 (2001), followed in St. v. Finley, 2003 MT 239, 317 M 268, 77 P3d 193 (2003), and St. v. Van Haele, 2005 MT 153, 327 M 400, 114 P3d 225 (2005).

Sentences Reviewed for Legality Only — Change in Standard of Review Not Ex Post Facto Violation: Application of the clarified standard of review of sentences is not an ex post facto violation. Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Procedural Change in Statute of Limitations Not Violative of Ex Post Facto Protection: At the time that Duffy was alleged to have committed sexual intercourse without consent and incest with his daughter in 1986, the applicable statute of limitations provided that a prosecution be commenced within 5 years after the offense if the victim was less than 16 years old at the time that the offense occurred. In 1989, the statute was amended to provide that a prosecution be commenced within 5 years after the victim reached 18 years of age if the victim was less than 18 at the time of the offense. In Duffy's case, if the statute of limitations had not been amended, prosecution would have been barred, so Duffy maintained that applying the 1989 statute of limitations was an unlawful application of the constitutional ex post facto provisions. The Supreme Court applied the ex post facto test in St. v. Leistiko, 256 M 32, 844 P2d 97 (1992), which established that an ex post facto violation occurs when: (1) the law is retrospective; and (2) the law disadvantages the offender. Duffy failed to satisfy the second part of the Leistiko test because the 1989 change in the statute of limitations did not alter the definition of or punishment for the crimes, but merely expanded the time in which the punishment might be imposed and thus did not violate constitutional ex post facto provisions. The conduct of which Duffy was accused was illegal and punishable both before and after the statute of limitations was extended. St. v. Duffy, 2000 MT 186, 300 M 381, 6 P3d 453, 57 St. Rep. 734 (2000). See also U.S. v. Marrow, 177 F3d 272 (5th Cir. 1999).

Youth Court Transfer Provision Illegal Mechanism to Rectify Youth's Failure to Pay Restitution — Ex Post Facto: As a teenager, Young entered a consent decree to dispose of three felony property offenses. He was ordered to pay $3,788 in restitution while on probation, but paid only $125. Later, Young was adjudicated as delinquent and sentenced to the Department of Corrections until age 18, with conditions. Restitution was not required, but the prior restitution was reinstated. Young then committed new offenses and was institutionalized until age 19, but restitution was not made by the time that he was 19. Young's cases were then transferred to District Court pursuant to 41-5-208, and he was placed on probation until the restitution was paid. Young appealed the transfer of the case, contending that he had successfully completed a residential treatment program in Utah according to the court's disposition order and that applying 41-5-208 violated state and federal constitutional ex post facto provisions because the law was not in effect when he committed any of the offenses and because applying the transfer provisions would increase the possible penalty for offenses that he previously admitted. The Supreme Court found that ex post facto application of the transfer provisions did not provide a lawful mechanism to rectify Young's failure to pay restitution. Applying the two-part test in St. v. Leistiko, 256 M 32, 844 P2d 97 (1992), the court held that the transfer provision was retrospective because it was not in effect when Young committed the offenses and that 41-5-208 is more onerous than the prior law because it changed the legal consequences by allowing the Youth Court to extend probation for an additional 6 years through transfer to the District Court. Since Young had successfully completed the Utah residential treatment program and was age 20 at the time that the appeal was decided, the cases should be closed. In re Young, 1999 MT 195, 295 M 394, 983 P2d 985, 56 St. Rep. 759 (1999).

Deletion of Hanging as Form of Capital Punishment Not Ex Post Facto Application: Pursuant to the version of 46-19-103 that was in effect at the time that Langford was sentenced for execution, he affirmatively elected that death be imposed by hanging rather than lethal injection. Langford appealed to the District Court for a declaration that execution by hanging was cruel and unusual punishment that violated the eighth amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The District Court denied the motion, holding that Langford's choice of hanging rendered the cruel and unusual punishment argument moot. Langford appealed to the appropriate federal courts for a writ of habeas corpus, applying the same argument. During the pendency of Langford's federal habeas corpus proceedings, the Montana Legislature met and amended 46-19-103 by removing the hanging option, rendering the federal proceedings moot and nonjusticiable. Langford asserted that the amendment to 46-19-103 constituted an ex post facto law in violation of this section because it effectively removed his defense of arguing that hanging was cruel and unusual punishment. However, Langford was not asserting a defense to a crime with which he was charged; he had already pleaded guilty and been sentenced, and the validity of the convictions was not at issue. The Supreme Court found no ex post facto violation because Langford's purely conjectural assertions that he potentially would have a due process-type right to avoid execution under the earlier version of the statute did not create a current substantive right that would be infringed by an amendment altering only the procedure by which his sentence would be carried out. Langford v. St., 287 M 107, 951 P2d 1357, 54 St. Rep. 1522 (1997). See also McKenzie v. Day, 57 F3d 1461 (9th Cir. 1995).

Requirement of Payment of Reinstatement Fee Not Violation of Ex Post Facto Law: Cooney argued that under the law as it existed prior to 1989, the revoked status of his license would have been removed whether or not he paid any fee when his license expired by its own terms and that therefore the application of the new law requiring payment of a fee before the revoked status of a license may be changed was an ex post facto violation as applied to him. The Supreme Court held that the application of the law did not violate the ban on ex post facto legislation because it did not change the legal consequences of Cooney's prior conduct and that in addition, the 1989 amendment was intended to clarify that a period of revocation continues until a defendant pays the required fee. St. v. Cooney, 284 M 500, 945 P2d 891, 54 St. Rep. 967 (1997).

Parolee and Probationer Supervision Fee Not Violative of Ex Post Facto Restriction: Frazier asserted that because he was sentenced prior to the enactment of 46-23-1031, the supervisory fee assessed in that section against parolees and probationers could not be retroactively applied to him or other parolees and probationers similarly situated. For a criminal or penal statute to be ex post facto, it must: (1) be retrospective, applying to events occurring before its enactment; and (2) disadvantage the affected offender. A civil sanction will implicate ex post facto concerns only if it can be fairly characterized as punishment. The legislative history of 46-23-1031 indicated that the supervisory fee was assessed to help defray the costs of supervision and to hold parolees and probationers accountable, rather than to punish. Because the fee is administrative rather than punitive, it does not violate the prohibition against ex post facto laws. Frazier v. Dept. of Corrections, 277 M 82, 920 P2d 93, 53 St. Rep. 551 (1996), distinguishing St. v. Leistiko, 256 M 32, 844 P2d 97 (1992).

Defendant to Be Sentenced Under Statute Existing at Time of Original Sentencing: Suiste argued that the District Court had violated the ban against ex post facto legislation by designating him as a dangerous offender when it revoked his suspended sentence for a crime that he was originally convicted of in 1979. By so doing, Suiste argued that the court was subjecting him to a harsher penalty than he could have received at the time that he committed the offense. The Supreme Court held that the defendant was entitled to be sentenced under the statute in effect at the time of the original sentencing. St. v. Suiste, 261 M 251, 862 P2d 399, 50 St. Rep. 1309 (1993).

Increase in Restitution Based on Revised Sentencing Provisions Barred as Ex Post Facto: At a sentence revocation hearing, the District Court considered Leistiko's motion to reduce his monthly restitution payments based on his financial situation. The court reduced payments for 3 months but increased the total restitution by $10,000. Leistiko relied on the 1983 version of 46-18-203 that was in effect at the time of the crime and the initial sentencing, contending that the court did not have authority to apply the 1991 revised version of 46-18-203 to increase restitution. Under Weaver v. Graham, 450 US 24, 67 L Ed 2d 17, 101 S Ct 960 (1981), an increase in the severity of a criminal punishment compared with that authorized at the time the act was committed is a criminal conduct measure coming within the ban on ex post facto laws. The Supreme Court applied the test set out in Miller v. Fla., 482 US 423, 96 L Ed 2d 351, 107 S Ct 2446 (1987), in determining whether the constitutional ban on ex post facto laws was violated: (1) the law must be retrospective; and (2) it must disadvantage the offender affected by it. The revised version of 46-18-203 changed the legal consequences of Leistiko's crime by allowing the District Court to change the sentence, placing a more onerous burden on Leistiko than he could have foreseen at the time he committed the crime and entered into the original plea agreement. The portion of the order imposing additional restitution was vacated under this section. St. v. Leistiko, 256 M 32, 844 P2d 97, 49 St. Rep. 1104 (1992), cited in St. v. Brander, 280 M 148, 930 P2d 31, 53 St. Rep. 1340 (1996), which upheld that there was no ex post facto violation but reversed because of the court's improper consideration of an expunged DUI conviction, and followed, as to an ex post facto application of law, in St. v. Cooney, 284 M 500, 945 P2d 891, 54 St. Rep. 967 (1997), St. v. Beckman, 284 M 459, 944 P2d 756, 54 St. Rep. 977 (1997), St. v. Pratt, 286 M 156, 951 P2d 37, 54 St. Rep. 1349 (1997), In re Young, 1999 MT 195, 295 M 394, 983 P2d 985, 56 St. Rep. 759 (1999), St. v. Shockley, 2001 MT 180, 306 M 196, 31 P3d 350 (2001), and St. v. Brister, 2002 MT 13, 308 M 154, 41 P3d 314 (2002).

Retroactive Enforcement of Incest Statute — Unconstitutional Ex Post Facto Application: An April 1983 amendment added "stepdaughter" to the list of prohibited incestuous relationships; however, the amendment did not become effective until October 1, 1983, a fact that went unnoticed through trial and sentencing for acts committed July 2, 1983. The imposition of a sentence for a conviction under statutes not in force at the time the offense was committed was held to be an ex post facto application of the law and therefore unconstitutional under Art. II, sec. 31, Mont. Const. St. v. Hall, 224 M 187, 728 P2d 1339, 43 St. Rep. 2120 (1986), reversed regarding double jeopardy, 481 US 400, 95 L Ed 2d 354, 107 S Ct 1825 (1987).

Ex Post Facto Rule — Inapplicable to Tax Delinquency Proceedings: The prohibition against ex post facto laws applies only to penal or criminal matters. The collection of delinquent taxes by the assessment of interest and penalties on the amounts due does not change a civil proceeding to a penal or criminal matter. Thus the ex post facto rule does not apply to a legislative enactment that retroactively applied an increase in the rate of interest charged on delinquent tax payments. O'Shaughnessey v. Wolfe, 212 M 12, 685 P2d 361, 41 St. Rep. 1557 (1984).

Parole Eligibility — Ex Post Facto Application: Defendant committed a crime in 1975 for which he was tried and convicted in 1979. In sentencing defendant, the trial court declared him a dangerous offender under 46-18-404 (now repealed) and declared him ineligible for parole under 46-18-202. Both of these statutes became effective July 1, 1977. Application of a law which eliminates or delays a defendant's parole eligibility after the criminal offense has been committed is ex post facto as applied to that defendant and is therefore unconstitutional. St. v. Beachman, 189 M 400, 616 P2d 337, 37 St. Rep. 1558 (1980).

Sentencing Under Statutes Amended After Date of Crime: The sentencing of the defendant to death for a conviction of aggravated kidnapping under statutes amended after section 94-5-304, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), was declared unconstitutional did not violate the constitutional prohibition against ex post facto laws. The amendments were ameliorative in nature and did not deprive defendant of a substantial right or immunity that he possessed at the time the crime was committed. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

Amendment of Procedure to Apply Death Penalty: When, after the commission of the crime of homicide, the U.S. Supreme Court found the death penalty statute unconstitutional and the state Legislature took only the procedural step of redefining the punishment and not the crime, there is no ex post facto violation in upholding the previous death penalty imposed, since the defendant had "fair warning" of the consequences of homicide. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000 (1979).

Ex Post Facto Laws — Persistent Felony Offender Statute: The persistent felony offender statute, as applied to defendant, did not violate constitutional safeguards dealing with ex post facto laws because the law did not punish him for conduct prior to enactment of this section but merely notified defendant he was subject to increased punishment if he in the future committed an additional felony crime. St. v. Maldonado, 176 M 322, 578 P2d 296 (1978), followed in St. v. Brander, 280 M 148, 930 P2d 31, 53 St. Rep. 1340 (1996), which upheld that there was no ex post facto violation but reversed because of the court's improper consideration of an expunged DUI conviction.

IMPAIRMENT OF CONTRACTS

Alcohol Sale Commissions Changed to Reflect Enacted Law — Existing Contract Altered — Contracts Clause: The plaintiffs, owners of an agency liquor store and 2 years into a 10-year contract with the Department of Revenue relating to the sale of alcohol, alleged breach of contract and a state and federal contracts clause violation when the Department changed the commission structure of their contract. The Department changed the commission structure in order to implement changes made by SB 193 (Ch. 362, L. 2015). The state court lawsuit was eventually removed to federal District Court to consider the contracts clause issue. The federal District Court ruled in favor of the Department, finding that a provision in the contract expressly allowed for modifications based on changes to Montana law. On appeal, the Ninth Circuit Court affirmed, holding that the state did not impair its contractual obligation to the plaintiffs within the meaning of the contracts clause because the plaintiffs retained a cause of action to allege breach of contract with the state. LL Liquor, Inc. v. Montana, 912 F.3d 533 (9th Cir. 2018).

Initiative Banning Cyanide Mining Not Unconstitutional Taking or Impairment of Contract — Opportunity to Apply for Mining Permit Not Property Right: Plaintiffs had an operating permit pending for a cyanide leach pit gold mine when voters passed Initiative Measure No. 137 (I-137) that prohibited cyanide mining in Montana. Plaintiffs sued on grounds that I-137 interfered with their property right in the permit, constituted an unconstitutional regulatory taking for which they should be compensated, and violated the contract clause in this section. The District Court found for the state on all issues, and plaintiffs appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Plaintiffs' mere opportunity to seek a mining permit did not constitute a property right, given the state's wide discretion to reject the application even without the passage of I-137. Further, I-137 did not constitute a taking because plaintiffs had not yet obtained a right to mine that the initiative took away. Moreover, even though the District Court incorrectly held that plaintiffs' corporate mining agreement was not substantially impaired by I-137, the court nonetheless correctly concluded that there was no contract clause violation because I-137 was reasonably related to the legitimate and significant public purpose of protecting the environment. Seven Up Pete Venture v. St., 2005 MT 146, 327 M 306, 114 P3d 1009 (2005).

Question of Whether Change in Tax Law Impaired County Bond Contract Moot When Bonds Paid in Full: Big Horn County argued that legislation that imposed a fixed tax rate on coal, oil, and natural gas and exempted the proceeds from local mill levies impaired the contract of the county with purchasers of the county's general obligation bonds. The Supreme Court held that because the bonds had been paid in full, there was no justiciable controversy and therefore the question of contract impairment was moot. Powder River County v. St., 2002 MT 259, 312 M 198, 60 P3d 357 (2002).

Grant of Preliminary Injunction — Prima Facie Showing of Violation of Constitutional and Contract Rights: A 1963 contract between the city of Billings and the Billings Heights County Water District fixed water rate charges and limited any subsequent rate increase charged the district unless the same percentage increase was applied to all city water users. Needing to raise additional revenue, in 1993, the city raised average water rates by 9.2% and the district rates by 32%. The district relied on the contract and increased its payments by 9.2%. In 1994, the city initiated an action to recover from the district the difference between the 1993 rate and the rate that the district paid from that time. In 1996, the city raised rates again, resulting in a 123% increase to the district and no such dramatic increase to any other city water customer. The district applied for a preliminary injunction to prevent the city from imposing the 1996 rate until the 1994 action had been addressed, but the application was denied and the district appealed. The Supreme Court found that the district made: (1) a sufficient showing that application of 69-7-101, granting the city control over utility rates, substantially impaired the district's rights under the 1963 contract; and (2) a prima facie case that application of 69-7-101 violated its rights under contract clauses of the U.S. and Montana Constitutions. Without ruling on the merits of the case, the court held that the district was thus entitled to the temporary injunction. Billings v. County Water District of Billings Heights, 281 M 219, 935 P2d 246, 54 St. Rep. 144 (1997).

1989 Retirement Benefit Increase Not Applicable to Judge Who Retired After Date of Enactment but Before Effective Date of Legislation: Gulbrandson was an active member of the judges' retirement system at the time of enactment of Ch. 664, L. 1989, which provided an increase in state funding to the system and an increase in retirement benefits for those years served by a judge after the 15th year. Implementation of the increase under 19-5-502 was delayed until July 1, 1991. Gulbrandson voluntarily retired prior to the delayed effective date. The Supreme Court held that based on the plain meaning of the statute, Gulbrandson was not entitled to the increased retirement benefit upon his retirement prior to July 1, 1991. Denial of the benefit did not impair Gulbrandson's contract with the system in violation of this section because the statute affecting his contract at the time of retirement did not include the benefit increase. Moreover, denial of the benefit does not violate equal protection provisions of Art. II, sec. 4, Mont. Const., because although Ch. 664 effectively created two classes of retired judges, it operates equally upon those within each class. Nearly all such legislation creates classifications regarding applicability, benefits, and recipients of retirement benefits. The fact that some of the classifications are imperfect does not necessarily mandate a conclusion that they violate equal protection. Under the rational basis test, which is the proper test in this case, the legitimate government interest of encouraging judges with significant years of service to remain in service longer was met. Thus, the 1989 amendment to 19-5-502 was not unreasonable or arbitrary or devoid of rational basis. Gulbrandson v. Carey, 272 M 494, 901 P2d 573, 52 St. Rep. 843 (1995), following Hughes v. Judges Retirement Bd., 282 NW 2d 160 (Mich. 1979), and distinguishing Leonard v. Seattle, 503 P2d 741 (Wash. 1972).

Implementation of Department Directors' Pay Plan Prevented by Governor — No Violation of Separation of Powers — No Impairment of Contract: Directors of two Executive Branch agencies notified employees that employees would be eligible for reinstatement of pay plan steps lost to multigrade promotions. The Governor prohibited the proposed plan. Plaintiffs sued, claiming that the Governor acted unconstitutionally. The Supreme Court held that the Department of Administration's broad powers and duties relating to the state pay plan must be read in conjunction with the Governor's statutory duties of supervision, approval, appointment, and direction over executive agency departments while also taking into consideration the Governor's constitutional status as chief executive officer of the state. The doctrine of separation of powers is not violated when the Governor exercises the very sorts of powers and duties authorized by the Legislature in the statutes enacted. Because the directors' offer was gratuitous and there was no consideration for the offer, no contract was formed under which the employees gained any vested rights to the reinstatement of the lost step. Past consideration (the employees' prior work) is not sufficient to support a promise. Because there was no contract, there were no contractual obligations that were impaired by the Governor's action. Mont. Pub. Employees Ass'n v. Office of Governor, 271 M 450, 898 P2d 675, 52 St. Rep. 523 (1995).

Forfeiture of Water Rights Not Impairment of Contracts: Former water rights holders who forfeited their rights through failure to meet the filing deadline contended that 85-2-226 constituted an impairment of contracts by rendering invalid water rights upon which substantial contractual relationships were based. However, failure to demonstrate the existence of any specific contract, let alone its impairment, was fatal to the impairment of contracts claim under either the state or federal constitution. In re Adjudication of Existing Yellowstone River Water Rights, 253 M 167, 832 P2d 1210, 49 St. Rep. 413 (1992).

Lack of Standing to Raise Constitutional Issues Absent Wrongful Discharge: A jury found that plaintiffs were not discharged wrongfully. On appeal, plaintiffs raised numerous issues regarding the constitutionality of the Wrongful Discharge From Employment Act, contending that the Act violated the right of trial by jury and the Montana Constitution's privileges and immunities clause, equal protection clause, impairment of contracts clause, and due process clause. The Supreme Court, citing Jones & Harriot v. Judge, 176 M 251, 577 P2d 846 (1978), and Stelling v. Rivercrest Ranches, Inc., 224 M 313, 730 P2d 388 (1986), found that plaintiffs lacked standing to challenge the constitutionality of the Act because consideration of the issues was rendered moot by the jury verdict, resulting in no adverse effect on plaintiffs by the challenged statutes. Allmaras v. Yellowstone Basin Properties, 248 M 477, 812 P2d 770, 48 St. Rep. 519 (1991), followed in Lutey Constr. v. St., 257 M 387, 851 P2d 1037, 50 St. Rep. 321 (1993).

No Vested Contract Right in Human Rights Discrimination Claim: Unlike a workers' compensation claimant, a claimant in a human rights discrimination action has no vested contract right to application of the laws in effect at the time of the injury. Even though the alleged discriminatory acts could be termed a breach of the implied employment contract, the gravamen of the claim is still discrimination. Because there is no vested contract right, the exclusive remedy provision of 49-2-509 (now repealed) does not violate the claimant's right to contract. Harrison v. Chance, 244 M 215, 797 P2d 200, 47 St. Rep. 1539 (1990), distinguishing Carmichael v. Workers' Comp. Court, 234 M 410, 763 P2d 1122 (1988).

Beneficial Use Tax on Investor-Owned Utilities Upheld: A contract between individuals cannot have the effect of depriving the state or any municipal subdivision of any power of taxation otherwise belonging to it. So long as the state does not violate a fundamental right of the individual, the state is free to vary the existing mode of taxation. Pac. Power & Light Co. v. Dept. of Revenue, 237 M 77, 773 P2d 1176, 46 St. Rep. 636 (1989).

Retroactive Application of Workers' Compensation Mediation Procedure — Unconstitutional Impairment of Contracts: The 1987 amendments to the Workers' Compensation Act concerning dispute resolution and mediation may not be applied retroactively to cases in which a petition was filed prior to July 1, 1987, because such application would unconstitutionally impair a contractual obligation. In analyzing a contract clause challenge, the court adopted a three-tier analysis: (1) Is the state law a substantial impairment of contractual relationship? (2) Does the state have a significant and legitimate purpose for the law? (3) Does the law impose reasonable conditions reasonably related to achieving a legitimate and public purpose? The court held that the delay occasioned by the requirement to mediate a dispute represents a substantial impairment of the employee's contractual rights under the insurance policy, that the state has a legitimate and significant purpose for the law because it is intended to encourage out-of-court settlements and lessen the volume of cases in the Workers' Compensation Court, and that there is insufficient evidence to show that the mediation process would achieve a more manageable caseload for the Workers' Compensation Court. Carmichael v. Workers' Comp. Court, 234 M 410, 763 P2d 1122, 45 St. Rep. 2012 (1988). See also Billings v. County Water District of Billings Heights, 281 M 219, 935 P2d 246, 54 St. Rep. 144 (1997), wherein the three-tiered Carmichael analysis was applied to a water rate contract.

"Means End Test" — Owner Consent Statute Violative of Due Process, Impairment of Obligation of Contract, and Eminent Domain: Applying the "means end test" adopted in Lawton v. Steele, 152 US 133, 38 L Ed 385, 14 S Ct 499 (1894), wherein the state's authority on behalf of the public is balanced against the constitutional due process requirement in the protection of private property, the Supreme Court declared 82-4-224 (now repealed), the owner consent statute of the Montana Strip and Underground Mine Reclamation Act, to be unconstitutional. The court concluded that the denial of just compensation placed an unreasonable burden on mineral owners, in violation of due process, and that the statute does not bear the requisite relation to the public health, safety, morals, or general welfare. The statute does not address reclamation, conservation, or any other policy goal; does not prevent strip mining operations; does not regulate how mining or reclamation is performed; does not conserve agricultural land; and is inapplicable unless the surface rights have been severed from the mineral rights or the mineral estate is owned in fee by the federal government or in trust for an Indian tribe. W. Energy Co. v. Genie Land Co., 227 M 74, 737 P2d 478, 44 St. Rep. 904 (1987), distinguishing Keystone Bituminous Coal Ass'n v. DeBenedictis, 480 US 470, 94 L Ed 2d 472, 107 S Ct 1232 (1987).

Workers' Compensation — Employer Not Liable for Contribution or Indemnity Despite Express Indemnity Agreement: When a third party was sued by an injured worker, the third party joined the employer as a third-party defendant, seeking contribution or indemnity, on the basis of an express indemnity agreement. On certification from the federal District Court, the Montana

Supreme Court held that an employer can assert the statutory prohibition against third-party claims for contribution or indemnity as a complete defense to a third-party claim based on an express agreement. The statute serves a significant and legitimate public purpose of perpetuating Montana's workers' compensation system and does not violate the constitutional prohibition against impairment of obligation of contracts. Raisler v. Burlington N. RR, 219 M 254, 717 P2d 535, 42 St. Rep. 1997 (1985).

Title to and Public Recreation on Dearborn River — Ex Post Facto, Contract Clause, and Irrevocable Privileged Considerations: The Supreme Court held that the State, not the landowner along the Dearborn River, held title to the bed of the river under the federal test of navigability (at the time Montana became a state) for purposes of determining title to the riverbed. The court also held that landowner had no right to exclude the public from recreational use of the waters of the Dearborn. Because of these holdings, landowner's questions relating to ex post facto laws, violation of the contract clause of the constitution, and irrevocable rights and privileges were not germane to the case. Mont. Coalition for Stream Access, Inc. v. Curran, 210 M 38, 682 P2d 163, 41 St. Rep. 906 (1984).

Retroactive Filing of Exemption Held Not to Impair Obligations of Contract: The Supreme Court reversed a District Court decision and held that an amendment to the homestead exemption statutes allowing the filing of a homestead declaration after an auditor obtained a judgment applied retroactively to allow exemption of homesteads from judgments obtained prior to the effective date of the amendment. The Supreme Court also held that the retroactive application did not violate the provisions of the state and federal constitutions prohibiting interference with obligations of contracts. Under the rationale of Energy Reserves Group, Inc. v. Kansas Power and Light Co., 459 US 400, 74 L Ed 2d 569, 103 S Ct 697 (1983), the Supreme Court determined that the amendment did not substantially impair the obligations of the contract between the parties because: (1) the area of law of homestead exemptions had been heavily regulated by statute in the past; (2) when the defendant bank made its loan to the plaintiff, it was made subject to further state regulation of homestead exemptions; and (3) the bank should have been aware that the exemption had been increased over the last 50 years, knew that the plaintiff's home would be subject to a homestead exemption, and took its chances that the State might increase the exemption. Moreover, because the loan was not secured by a mortgage on the home, the bank could not have relied on the plaintiff's continued ownership of the home. For these reasons, the bank's reasonable contract expectations were not impaired by the State's amendment of the statute. Neel v. First Fed. S & L Ass'n, 207 M 376, 675 P2d 96, 41 St. Rep. 18 (1984).

Impairment of Contract and Diminution of Salary — Preventing Legislative Meddling in Judicial Decisions: Plaintiff contended 3-2-104 and 3-5-212 (now repealed), which imposed sanctions on judges if decisions were not reached or opinions were not written within the procedural constraints and time limits set by the statutes, were unconstitutional. The penalty provisions of both statutes required a 1-month salary forfeiture in the event of a violation. Plaintiff contended the penalty violated the impairment of contract and diminution of judicial salary provisions of the Montana Constitution. Defendant contended that since the judiciary imposed the sanctions, the constitution was not violated. The constitutional prohibition against diminution of salaries is designed to prevent lawmakers from exerting control over the judiciary. Even if the court were to allow the indirect violation by allowing the Legislature to mandate a scheme administered by the courts, the statutes would violate the impairment of contract prohibition. Public employment gives rise to certain obligations protected by the contract clause of the constitution. Promised compensation is one such protected right. Once vested, the right to compensation cannot be eliminated without unconstitutionally impairing the contract obligation. Coate v. Omholt, 203 M 488, 662 P2d 591, 40 St. Rep. 586 (1983).

Substantial Impairment of City's Contractual Obligations — Retrospective Application: On November 25, 1978, a city and a private garbage collection service entered into a contract in which the latter was to provide garbage collection services for the city from November 1, 1978, through June 30, 1979. On June 30, 1979, the city voted to provide its own garbage service. Retroactive application of 7-13-4107, relating to compensation of private garbage carriers, would clearly substantially impair the contractual obligations of the city. Whether it constitutes an unconstitutional impairment of contract was not decided because the contract expired before the effective date of the statute. D & F Sanitation Serv. v. Red Lodge, 196 M 490, 640 P2d 461, 39 St. Rep. 287 (1982).

Impairment of Contracts — Alcoholic Beverage Code: The Montana Alcoholic Beverage Code appears to be a valid exercise of the state police power, and it is not repugnant to the federal constitutional provisions prohibiting impairment of contracts or similar language in the Montana Constitution. Libbey II v. Jos. Schlitz Brewing Co., 34 St. Rep. 1254 (1977).

Repeal of Ordinance Establishing Longevity Pay for Firefighters: A contract was created for the benefit of firefighters by the city's adoption of a resolution concerning longevity pay; therefore, a subsequent resolution repealing the provision was unconstitutional as applied to firefighters covered by the contract in effect between the city and labor organization representing the firefighters at time of the repeal. Local 8 Int'l Ass'n of Firefighters v. Great Falls, 174 M 53, 568 P2d 541 (1977).

Liens on Property of Welfare Recipients: Section releasing all liens held by the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) on real property of welfare recipients did not violate this provision since state had no vested rights in its liens. Carkulis v. Doe, 164 M 315, 521 P2d 1305 (1974).

IRREVOCABLE PRIVILEGES, FRANCHISES, OR IMMUNITY

No Demonstration Beyond a Reasonable Doubt That the Statute is Unconstitutional: Plaintiffs argued that 39-71-413 of the Workers' Compensation Act violated various Montana constitutional provisions including the right to equal protection, the prohibition against legislation conferring any irrevocable grant of special privileges, franchises, or immunities, and the prohibition against special legislation. Statutes are presumed to be constitutional, and the court concluded that the plaintiffs failed to meet their burden of demonstrating beyond a reasonable doubt that 39-71-413 is unconstitutional. Alexander v. Bozeman Motors, Inc., 2010 MT 135, 356 Mont. 439, 234 P.3d 880.

Franchise Not Irrevocable — Constitutionality: On cross-appeal, respondent city of Billings contended that 7-2-4736 violated Art. II, sec. 31, Mont. Const., because it granted an irrevocable franchise to appellant private garbage haulers. The Supreme Court in Glodt v. Missoula, 121 M 178, 190 P2d 545 (1948), defined franchise as a "special privilege conferred by the government on an individual which does not belong to the citizens generally". In this case, the court agreed that 7-2-4736 conferred a special privilege or franchise upon the garbage haulers, but noted that the franchise was not an irrevocable one within the meaning of Art. II, sec. 31, Mont. Const., since the privilege could be terminated by either a showing that the private carrier was unable or refused to provide adequate service or by written request of a majority of residents after a set period of time. Therefore, 7-2-4736 was held to be constitutional under Art. II, sec. 31, Mont. Const. D & F Sanitation Serv. v. Billings, 219 M 437, 713 P2d 977, 43 St. Rep. 74 (1986).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

EX POST FACTO

Repeal of Criminal Statute — Effect of Saving Clause: General saving clause interpreted so as to preserve for prosecution all criminal offenses committed prior to repeal, absent an express legislative intent to contrary contained in repealing act, did not violate Art. III, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const., as constituting ex post facto legislation. State ex rel. Huffman v. District Court, 154 M 201, 461 P2d 847 (1969).

Ex Post Facto Application — Change of Parole Requirements: A parole and probation statute that had not been in effect at the time prisoner began serving his sentence but was in effect following a new trial in which prisoner was reconvicted and began again serving a 10-year sentence, which had the effect of increasing prisoner's time by allowing less time off for good behavior than did the prior probation law, was ex post facto as to that prisoner. State ex rel. Nelson v. Ellsworth, 142 M 14, 380 P2d 886 (1963).

Applies Only to Crimes: Article III, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const., had reference to crimes and not to matters which affect private rights retroactively, and as to the latter the only inhibition against retroactive legislation found therein was that such legislation must not impair the obligation of contract or interfere with vested rights. Durocher v. Myers, 84 M 225, 274 P 1062 (1929).

RETROACTIVE

Retroactive Intention to Be Clear: While no constitutional barriers, other than those stated in Art. III, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const., exist to restrain retroactive legislation in this state, and while a certain amount of retrospection is necessarily involved in many of our laws, it is nevertheless a fundamental rule of construction that retroactive effect is not to be given to a statute unless commanded by its context, terms, or manifest purpose. Falligan v. School District, 54 M 177, 169 P 803 (1917).

Retrospective Law Permissible: There was no prohibition in the Constitution against retrospective legislation other than that contained in Art. III, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const. The Legislature was therefore untrammeled and free, insofar as constitutional provisions are concerned, to pass any retrospective laws which did not violate the obligations of contracts or interfere with any vested rights. Bullard v. Smith, 28 M 387, 72 P 761 (1903).

IMPAIRMENT OF CONTRACTS

Relocation of Utility Facilities: The provisions of former section relating to the costs of relocating utility facilities did not violate Art. III, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const. Jones v. Burns, 138 M 268, 357 P2d 22 (1960).

Amendment of Veterans' Honorarium: Statute amending initiative act providing for honorarium for World War II veterans to make Korean War veterans eligible to receive honorariums did not violate Art. III, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const. Cottingham v. St. Bd. of Examiners, 134 M 1, 328 P2d 907 (1958), overruled on other grounds in State ex rel. Ward v. Anderson, 158 M 279, 491 P2d 868 (1971).

Agreement Between City Council and Housing Authority: When a city council created a housing authority and entered into a cooperative agreement with the housing authority, it could not later pass an ordinance which repudiated the cooperation agreement without violating Art. III, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Housing Authority v. Helena, 125 M 592, 242 P2d 250 (1952).

Impairment of Contract — Retirement Pay Interest: Retirement law that changed the rate of interest which a withdrawing member would receive was invalid. Clarke v. Ireland, 122 M 191, 199 P2d 965 (1948).

Change of Tax Rate on Trust: When trust was created in 1915 and the transfer was taxed on the inheritance tax rate in existence in 1945, the time of the settlor's death, there was no violation of Art. III, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const. In re Kohr, 122 M 145, 199 P2d 856 (1948).

Prohibition Against Counties Including Anticipated Tax Delinquencies in Budget: Section prohibiting consideration of anticipated loss of revenue for nonpayment of taxes does not offend against Art. III, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const., as impairing obligations of contracts of a county, since the budget law contemplates issuance of interest-bearing registered warrants up to budget appropriation if there be no money which may be budgeted for the succeeding year. Great N. Ry. v. Phillips County, 112 M 542, 118 P2d 754 (1941).

Levy to Fund Obligations Entered Into Prior to Repeal of Authorization: Although law authorizing issuance by counties of emergency relief warrants expired by its own terms, a county issuing such warrants during the life of the act would have authority to make necessary levies to pay the warrants after the act expired, since Legislature will not be said to have intended to impair the obligation of the county. Kraus v. Riley, 107 M 116, 80 P2d 864 (1938).

Exemptions From Execution: Section creating additional exemption on automobile of the value of not more than $300 in favor of head of a family or persons over 60 years of age was invalid under Art. III, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const., and federal Constitution when the judgment on which execution was issued was obtained on a contract antedating the effective date of the section. Rieger v. Wilson, 102 M 86, 56 P2d 176 (1936).

Contract Between Parties Not to Deprive State of Taxing Power:

Under the rule that a contract between individuals cannot deprive the state of any power of taxation otherwise belonging to it, sections (since repealed) did not impair the obligation of a contract when applied to royalty accruing under a contract executed before the enactment of the sections. Forbes v. Mid-Northern Oil Co., 100 M 10, 45 P2d 673 (1935).

Former law was not open to the objection that it impaired the obligation of a contract in that, at the time of the contract of lease between the operator and the lessor of oil land, the law contemplated but one assessment and that, in addition to the operator, it imposed part of the tax upon the lessor. A contract between individuals does not have the effect of depriving the state of its power of taxation. Byrne v. Fulton Oil Co., 85 M 329, 278 P 514 (1929).

Remission of Interest and Penalties: Law authorizing remission of interest and penalties was not violative of Art. III, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Sparling v. Hitsman, 99 M 521, 44 P2d 747 (1935).

Rights Based on Existing Contracts to Yield to Common Welfare: If a city ordinance can reasonably be said to be a proper exercise of the police power, it is of no consequence that it affects property rights or rights based upon existing contracts, since such rights must yield to the common welfare. Butte v. Roberts, 94 M 482, 23 P2d 243 (1933).

Liability of Directors: The liability of directors under section 15-407, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), not being founded in contract and there being no vested interest in an unenforced penalty, section 15-407, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), taking away the right of action against the directors of a corporation for incurring debts in excess of its subscribed capital stock, held not invalid as impairing the obligation of contract or interfering with vested rights. Cont. Oil Co. v. Mont. Concrete Co., 63 M 223, 207 P 116 (1922), overruled in Cont. Supply Co. v. Abell, 95 M 148, 24 P2d 133 (1933).

Street Railway Subject to Legislative Regulation: A municipal corporation does not stand in a position to assert against the state the benefit of the constitutional provision against the impairment of the obligation of contracts. While the grant of a street railway franchise and its acceptance constitute a contract, it is one subject to legislative restriction and regulation and control by the Public Service Commission and therefore cannot be claimed to be inviolable so as to prevent the grantee from discontinuing a part of a line of its system in face of a provision in the franchise requiring it to operate the line for the entire term of the grant, irrespective of the question of loss sustained in its operation. Helena v. Helena Light & Ry., 63 M 108, 207 P 337 (1922).

Impairment of Contract — Authorization to Sell Corporate Property: Law authorizing the directors of a mining corporation to sell the board's property did not impair the obligation of contracts. Somerville v. St. Louis Min. & Milling Co., 46 M 268, 127 P 464 (1912); Allen v. Ajax Min. Co., 30 M 490, 77 P 47 (1904).

Judgment — Not a Contract: A judgment is in the nature of a contract, but it is not a contract within the meaning of Art. III, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const., and a statute changing the rate of interest which a judgment bears after entry was not unconstitutional. Stanford v. Coram, 28 M 288, 72 P 655 (1903).

Degree of Impairment Immaterial: A statute that changes the terms of an agreement by imposing new conditions or dispensing with those expressed or implied is repugnant to the Constitution as being a law impairing the obligation of a contract, and the degree of impairment is immaterial. State ex rel. Sav. Bank v. Barret, 25 M 112, 63 P 1030 (1901).

Impairment of State Contract: The Legislature can no more impair the obligation of a contract entered into by the state than it can the obligation of a contract made between individuals. State ex rel. Sav. Bank v. Barret, 25 M 112, 63 P 1030 (1901).

IRREVOCABLE PRIVILEGES, FRANCHISES, OR IMMUNITY

Creation of Water Conservation Board: Sections relating to creation of Water Conservation Board were not unconstitutional as irrevocably granting special privileges, franchises, or immunities under Art. III, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Normile v. Cooney, 100 M 391, 47 P2d 637 (1935).

Allowance of On-Track Betting: Laws making it unlawful to record or register or to aid or abet in recording, reporting, or registering any bet or wager upon races held outside the state and which among other things allow betting on speed contests held within racetrack or fairground enclosures in this state are not in contravention of the provisions of Art. III, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const., prohibiting the irrevocable granting of any special privileges, franchises, or immunities. St. v. Rose, 40 M 66, 105 P 82 (1909).

Attorney General's Opinions

Board of Investments Allowed to Complete Grants Entered Between Board of Science and Technology Development and University System: In 1989, the Legislature created the Board of Science and Technology Development and allowed that Board to administer a statutorily allocated amount of money from the in-state investment fund for seed capital project loans. From 1989 to 1997, the Legislature continued to fund the Board of Science and Technology Development, which used the money to enter into research and development loans with different units of the Montana University System. In 1997, the Legislature deleted the Board of Science and Technology Development's authority to make loans that had been authorized in previous sessions, effective July 1, 1999, but authorized the Board of Science and Technology Development to grant up to $2 million of interest and income from investments to university research and development projects during the interim between 1997 and 1999. Relying on that authority, the Board of Science and Technology Development entered into six separate grant agreements with the University System, and the various units relied on the grants to secure matching federal funds for the projects. In 1999, in an attempt to make the coal tax permanent trust fund whole, the Legislature dismantled the Board of Science and Technology Development and directed the Board of Investments to administer agreements entered into by the Board of Science and Technology Development that had been funded with coal tax permanent trust funds and, at the same time, eliminated the funds set aside for the completion of the agreements, creating an inherent statutory conflict. Nevertheless, the agreements were fully integrated, binding contracts. The Attorney General concluded that the 1999 elimination of the Board of Investment's ability to complete the grant obligations to the University System would constitute a substantial impairment of contracts. Further, without the funds, the University System would not be able to complete the projects and federal matching funds would be jeopardized. To harmonize the conflict and avoid a contract impairment, the Attorney General held that the Board of Investments could complete the payment of grants to the University System from interest and income derived from Board of Science and Technology Development loans. 49 A.G. Op. 2 (2001).

Unified Retirement — Firefighters Entitled to Prior Benefits: In converting to the Unified Retirement System, all eligible firefighters are entitled to all pension benefits accrued to them under the old retirement system. A firefighter's pension constitutes an element of compensation, and a vested contractual right to pension benefits, which are stated in the retirement plan during the firefighter's employment, accrues when he begins paying into the retirement fund. Vested pension rights include the provisions that were used to compute the adjusted benefits under the old system. Firefighters hired before July 1, 1973, and who retired during the period from July 1, 1973, and July 1, 1981, are entitled to all pension benefits accrued to them under the old retirement system. 39 A.G. Op. 51 (1982).

Appropriation for Salaries — Impairment of Contract: House Bill 747, L. 1974, provided for a salary adjustment "in lieu of all forthcoming, broad-based salary increases in the 1975 biennium". Because this provision would have reduced the salary increases to be received under contracts entered into between union bargaining units and state agencies, it was an impairment of contract, and the employees were entitled to the salary increases contained in the contracts. 35 A.G. Op. 89 (1974).

Case Notes

Deletion of Hanging as Form of Capital Punishment Not Denial of Ability to Present Argument Regarding Cruel and Unusual Punishment: Pursuant to the version of 46-19-103 that was in effect at the time that Langford was sentenced for execution, he affirmatively elected that death be imposed by hanging rather than lethal injection. Langford appealed to the District Court for a declaration that execution by hanging was cruel and unusual punishment that violated the eighth amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The District Court denied the motion, holding that Langford's choice of hanging rendered the cruel and unusual punishment argument moot. Langford appealed to the appropriate federal courts for a writ of habeas corpus, applying the same argument. During the pendency of Langford's federal habeas corpus proceedings, the Montana Legislature met and amended 46-19-103 by removing the hanging option, rendering the federal proceedings moot and nonjusticiable. Langford asserted that the amendment to 46-19-103 violated numerous constitutional provisions by denying him the ability to present the cruel and unusual punishment argument to the federal courts. The Supreme Court found no merit in Langford's argument that the state Attorney General advised the Legislature to amend 46-19-103 in order to deny Langford the grounds for appeal, because the Attorney General supported but did not initiate the legislation. Further, the court did not agree with Langford's assertion that the amendment rendered the time that Langford spent in pursuing the cruel and unusual punishment argument retroactively useless and chargeable to the state as a form of cruel and unusual punishment in itself, because the eighth amendment argument was not the only claim that Langford pursued. Therefore, the entire time could not be charged to the state as being related to the amendment to 46-19-103. Having concluded that Langford failed to establish any constitutional violations, his petition for writ of injunction staying his execution was denied. Langford v. St., 287 M 107, 951 P2d 1357, 54 St. Rep. 1522 (1997).

Convention Notes

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

Permissive Provision: This section is permissive and does not provide an independent ground for finding that the veterans' preference was more than a mere governmental gratuity. Femling v. Mont. St. Univ., 220 M 133, 713 P2d 996, 43 St. Rep. 235 (1986).

Claimed Veterans' Preference Not Protected by Due Process Provision: A claimed veterans' preference is not property within the meaning of Art. II, sec. 17, of the Montana Constitution or the Due Process Clause of the 14th amendment to the United States Constitution. A veterans' preference is a gratuity, not a contractual right, nor may a reliance interest in a veterans' preference be obtained before the preference is actually received. Nick v. Dept. of Highways, 219 M 168, 711 P2d 795, 42 St. Rep. 1926 (1985).

Retroactivity of Employment Preference — No Equal Protection Violation: A provision (Ch. 1, sec. 14, Sp. L. 1983) in the 1983 employment preference law (Title 39, ch. 30), making the repeal of the former law retroactive, is not a violation of Art. II, sec. 4, of the Montana Constitution or the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th amendment to the United State Constitution. The proper standard of review in this case is the rational basis test since the employment preference law neither burdens a fundamental right nor involves a suspect class. The law is valid under the rational basis test since it was a rational response to the Legislature's legitimate concerns of fiscal integrity, employee competence, and academic freedom created by the implications of the decision in Crabtree v. Mont. St. Library, 204 M 398, 665 P2d 231, 40 St. Rep. 963 (1983). Nick v. Dept. of Highways, 219 M 168, 711 P2d 795, 42 St. Rep. 1926 (1985).

Veterans' Preference Gratuity — Not Vested Right: Plaintiff served in the capacity of deputy clerk of the Supreme Court for 20 years. He ran for the Clerk of Court position but was defeated. The newly elected Clerk terminated plaintiff and appointed a new deputy. Plaintiff contended that as a veteran he was entitled to a preference in employment and that the Legislature's repeal of the former veterans' preference law was invalid. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the veterans' preference rights granted under the repealed portion of the veterans' preference law are not rights earned through years of service to the state, but are a gratuity given to citizens of Montana by the state to show its appreciation for service in the armed forces. They do not amount to rights vested in the veterans. The Legislature could properly repeal the law by majority vote at any time, and veterans acting under the old law are considered to have acted in contemplation of the Legislature's power of repeal. Conboy v. St., 214 M 492, 693 P2d 547, 42 St. Rep. 120 (1985).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Korean War Honorarium: Statute amending initiative act providing for honorarium for World War II veterans so as to make Korean veterans eligible to receive honorariums did not violate Art. III, sec. 27, 1889 Mont. Const. Cottingham v. St. Bd. of Examiners, 134 M 1, 328 P2d 907 (1958), overruled on other grounds in State ex rel. Ward v. Anderson, 158 M 279, 491 P2d 868 (1971).

Attorney General's Opinions

Fee Waivers for Veterans for Extra Studies: The Board of Regents may not require veterans qualifying under the provisions of 10-2-311 (now repealed) to pay fees for extension or continuing education courses offered by units of the Montana University System. 37 A.G. Op. 167 (1978).

LEGISLATIVE BRANCH

Legislative Employee's Fiscal Assumptions Cannot Trigger Tax Credits — Unlawful Delegation of Power — Invasion of Executive Branch Power Impermissible: Legislative Referendum 123 (LR-123) provided a potential tax credit, tax refund, or payment to individuals when a certain level of surplus revenue was in the state treasury at the close of the fiscal year. As part of the process of determining whether there was surplus revenue, the Legislative Fiscal Analyst (LFA) was required to perform two dozen steps or calculations, including discretionary projections of balances, revenues, transfers, appropriations, and reversions. The Supreme Court held that the delegation of authority to the LFA violated Article V, section 1, of the Montana Constitution as an unlawful delegation of legislative power, similar to the unlawful delegation of authority to a legislative interim committee in State ex rel. Judge v. Legislative Fin. Comm., 168 Mont. 470, 543 P.2d 1317 (1975). Moreover, the requirement that the LFA exercise judgment and interpretations regarding the law violated the separation of powers under Article III, section 1, of the Montana Constitution, since these are Executive Branch functions. MEA-MFT v. McCulloch, 2012 MT 211, 366 Mont. 266, 291 P.3d 1075.

Mandatory Life Sentence Not Violative of Due Process, Cruel and Unusual Punishment, or Separation of Powers — Exception Properly Considered: Webb pleaded guilty to second offense sexual intercourse without consent and was sentenced to life in prison without parole pursuant to 46-18-219. Webb appealed the sentence on grounds that the mandatory life sentence violated procedural and substantive due process, the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, and the separation of powers doctrine. Webb also asserted that the sentencing court failed to properly consider the exception to mandatory sentencing set out in 46-18-222(3). The Supreme Court affirmed. The sentencing court properly considered the exception and did not abuse its broad discretion in finding no unusual and substantial distress. The sentencing court offered Webb all the procedural due process necessary and did not violate substantive due process because the sentence fit within the statutory sentencing limits. Webb's contention that life without parole was cruel and unusual punishment failed because the sentence was commensurate with the gravity of the crime and consistent with state sentencing and correctional policy. The argument that mandatory sentences violate the separation of powers doctrine also failed because it is in the Legislature's province to distinguish between criminal offenses and to establish punishments, and enactment of 46-18-219 was based on constitutional principles and Montana public policy. St. v. Webb, 2005 MT 5, 325 M 317, 106 P3d 521 (2005). See also St. v. Bruns, 213 M 372, 691 P2d 817 (1984), and St. v. Dahms, 252 M 1, 825 P2d 1214 (1992).

Admissibility of Proof of Refusal to Take Sobriety Test Not Violative of Separation of Powers Doctrine: Robertson claimed that by enacting 61-8-404, regarding admission of evidence of a person's refusal to take a sobriety test, the Legislature unconstitutionally infringed on the function of courts to determine the admissibility of evidence, in violation of the separation of powers doctrine. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that ultimately, the admissibility of evidence lies with the court pursuant to Rule 104, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). The Legislature routinely passes laws that determine whether certain kinds of evidence are admissible, without violating the separation of powers doctrine in the process. Further, "admissible" means that evidence may, but is not required, to be admitted. Missoula v. Robertson, 2000 MT 52, 298 M 419, 998 P2d 144, 57 St. Rep. 250 (2000). See also St. v. Long, 778 P2d 1027 (Wash. 1989).

Supreme Court Power to Review Legislative Act for Constitutional Conformity Not Violative of Separation of Powers Doctrine: Although the Montana Constitution confers upon the Legislature the exclusive power to set appropriate punishments for criminal acts, the Supreme Court is constitutionally vested with the exclusive power to review whether a particular legislative act conforms to the constitution. Thus, the court's holding that the Montana weapon enhancement statute was violative of state constitutional double jeopardy protections was not a violation of the separation of powers doctrine. Law Clerk or Master Not a Public Officer — No Violation of Constitution by Legislator: A law clerk acting as an employee of the court is not exercising the sovereign power of the state since he or she is subject to the supervision of the judge or justice who is the employer. A master, although having duties and obligations of a judicial officer, acts in an advisory capacity and does not sit as a court. Therefore, neither a law clerk nor a master is a public officer. A person who holds these positions while holding office as a state legislator does not violate the constitutional provision requiring separation of powers. State ex rel. Paugh v. Bradley, 231 M 46, 753 P2d 857, 45 St. Rep. 419 (1988).

Valid Reason for Mandatory Retirement — Legislative, Not Judicial Task: Since compulsory game warden (now game wardens' and peace officers') retirement statute contained no qualifications or justification, it would be in excess of the authority of a court hearing a warden's suit challenging the statute's validity to hold a factfinding hearing to determine whether there was a basis for the age discrimination grounded in the reasonable demands of the position. That is a legislative function; the effort would be great; and the Legislature, not the courts, has the resources for such an undertaking. Taylor v. Dept. of Fish, Wildlife, & Parks, 205 M 85, 666 P2d 1228, 40 St. Rep. 1112 (1983).

Budget Information — Legislative Finance Committee: Sections 5-12-302 and 5-12-303 do not impose unconstitutional burden upon state government, since power to approve appropriation bills and budget is in legislative branch, and committee may require such information from other branches as is reasonably necessary to form rational basis for budget determinations. State ex rel. Judge v. Legislative Fin. Comm., 168 M 470, 543 P2d 1317 (1975).

Interim Committees — Power to Approve Budget Amendments Unconstitutional: Those parts of 5-12-102, 5-12-401, and 5-12-402 (now repealed) empowering finance committee to approve budget amendments are declared invalid as unconstitutional delegations of legislative power since this power is properly exercisable only by either entire Legislature or executive officer or agency, not by interim committee. State ex rel. Judge v. Legislative Fin. Comm., 168 M 470, 543 P2d 1317 (1975).

Subpoena Power of Legislature — Unavailable to Attorney General: The Attorney General cannot exercise the subpoena powers of the Legislature in the course of investigating public offenses disclosed by an audit performed by the Legislative Auditor. State ex rel. Woodahl v. District Court, 167 M 514, 540 P2d 312 (1975).

EXECUTIVE BRANCH

Request to Overturn Attorney General Opinion — Governor and Agency Director Have Standing: The Governor directed the Department of Fish, Wildlife, and Parks (FWP) to finalize a conservation easement without the approval of the State Land Board. The Attorney General subsequently issued a legal opinion that the easement required the approval of the State Land

Board under 87-1-209. The Governor and the FWP Director filed a petition to the Supreme Court, asking it to hold the Attorney General's opinion incorrect as a matter of law. The Attorney General argued that neither had standing to challenge his legal opinion. The Supreme Court disagreed, ruling that because only the Governor and the FWP Director had the authority to sign the paperwork to close the transaction to purchase the easement, their injuries were personal, concrete, and redressable. Bullock v. Fox, 2019 MT 50, 395 Mont. 35, 435 P.3d 1187.

JUDICIAL BRANCH

Challenge to Alleged Improper Certification by Secretary of State — Not Political Question Excluding Consideration by Court: After the Secretary of State certified the Montana Green Party for the 2018 ballot, the plaintiff, the Montana Democratic Party, sought a declaratory judgment that the certification was invalid due to noncompliance with 13-10-601. The plaintiff also sought an injunction to prevent the Secretary of State from giving any effect to the Green Party's petition. The Secretary of State argued that the plaintiff's claim involved a nonjusticiable political question. After the District Court ruled that a number of signatures were invalid, the Secretary of State appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that the courts have the exclusive authority to adjudicate a defendant's compliance with well-defined statutorily prescribed processes and standards. Larson v. St., 2019 MT 28, 394 Mont. 167, 434 P.3d 241.

Statutory Filing Deadline Not Jurisdictional — District Court to Allow Equitable Relief Upon Remand — Separation of Powers Implicated: Because of a calendaring error, the plaintiff railway's counsel missed the deadline imposed by 49-2-505 for an appeal of a decision of the Human Rights Bureau to the Human Rights Commission but submitted an out-of-time appeal. The defendant argued that the 14-day deadline imposed by 49-2-505 was jurisdictional, and the Commission and the District Court, in issuing an order to enforce the order of the Human Rights Bureau, agreed. Citing Davis v. St., 2008 MT 226, 344 Mont. 300, 187 P.3d 654, Miller v. Eighteenth Jud. Dist., 2007 MT 149, 337 Mont. 488, 162 P.3d 121, and St. v. Johnston, 2008 MT 318, 346 Mont. 93, 193 P.3d 925, among other cases, for the proposition that "categorical time prescriptions" or filing deadlines do not withdraw subject matter jurisdiction from a District Court, the Supreme Court reversed. The Supreme Court held that the District Court was not deprived of jurisdiction and that, upon remand, the District Court should consider the issue of why the railway's counsel missed the deadline and should, if it finds good cause, exercise its equitable powers to allow the appeal. The dissent argued that the majority's opinion implicated the separation of powers doctrine because the majority had no authority to allow an exception to the statutory filing deadline. BNSF Ry. Co. v. Cringle, 2010 MT 290, 359 Mont. 20, 247 P.3d 706. See also BNSF Ry. Co. v. Cringle, 2012 MT 143, 365 Mont. 304, 281 P.3d 203, and St. v. Robertson, 2015 MT 341, 381 Mont. 520, 363 P.3d 427.

Full-Time District Court Reporters Subject to Statutory Workweek Requirement — Recordkeeping Required — Designation of Court Reporter's "Workstation": A District Court reporter who is treated as a full-time salaried county employee is subject to the statutory 40-hour workweek requirement in 7-5-2108, and recordkeeping to document a court reporter's working hours, including overtime, annual leave, and sick leave, must be as determined by the District Court Judge who employs the court reporter. However, any method used to fulfill these requirements must comport with the District Court Judge's authority to control court assistants because allowing a Board of County Commissioners to enforce county personnel policies on court reporters would infringe on that authority. Any mandatory location of work for a court reporter that is set by anyone but the District Court Judge would interfere with the necessary flexibility of the judge. Thus, a court reporter's "workstation" is wherever that reporter is required to be to perform the duties for the judge for whom that court reporter works. Bd. of County Comm'rs v. District Court, 2000 MT 258, 301 M 496, 10 P3d 805, 57 St. Rep. 1061 (2000).

Statutes Granting Child Support Enforcement Division Judicial Power to Make and Enforce Child Support Orders Violative of Constitutional Separation of Powers: As part of a marriage dissolution, the District Court ordered that the husband pay monthly child support in a specific amount. The Child Support Enforcement Division (CSED) subsequently notified the court that it intended to modify the order pursuant to its authority in 40-5-272 and 40-5-273. The court, sua sponte, then enjoined CSED from modifying any child support orders issued by a Montana District Court, asserting that CSED's actions in modifying a court order violated the constitutional separation of powers clause. On appeal, CSED maintained that the statutes did not violate the separation of powers clause because: (1) the statutory scheme was merely a quasi-judicial function that did not threaten the institutional integrity of the Judicial Branch; (2) the statutes in question were a reasonable response to both the federal legal requirements for expedited child support modification and the sheer magnitude of child support collection in Montana; (3) CSED was empowered to modify a support order only if the facts changed; (4) every contested modification was subject to a hearing before an administrative law judge; (5) all modifications were subject to judicial review; and (6) the Legislature's grant of jurisdictional authority to CSED was not exclusive. The District Court responded that the statutes were an unconstitutional violation of separation of powers because: (1) they gave CSED judicial power that is exclusively reserved to the judiciary; (2) they gave CSED statutory authority to modify a child support order, file it with the District Court, and then enforce the order as a District Court judgment; and (3) the procedure for judicial review of a CSED modification was not automatic and was limited by the scope of the Montana Administrative Procedure Act. The Supreme Court concluded that 40-5-272 and 40-5-273 are an unconstitutional violation of the separation of powers clause to the extent that they grant CSED the judicial power to make and enforce child support orders without automatic and mandatory judicial review. Although appreciative of the magnitude of the agency's modification and enforcement tasks, the court found that that fact did not justify unbridled departure from constitutional norms respecting the autonomy of the individual branches of government. Seubert v. Seubert, 2000 MT 241, 301 M 382, 13 P3d 365, 57 St. Rep. 1006 (2000), distinguishing Chastain v. Chastain, 932 SW 2d 396 (Mo. 1996), and State of Iowa ex rel. Sara Allee v. Gocha, 555 NW 2d 683 (Iowa 1996).

Admissibility of Proof of Refusal to Take Sobriety Test Not Violative of Separation of Powers Doctrine: Robertson claimed that by enacting 61-8-404, regarding admission of evidence of a person's refusal to take a sobriety test, the Legislature unconstitutionally infringed on the function of courts to determine the admissibility of evidence, in violation of the separation of powers doctrine. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that ultimately, the admissibility of evidence lies with the court pursuant to Rule 104, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). The Legislature routinely passes laws that determine whether certain kinds of evidence are admissible, without violating the separation of powers doctrine in the process. Further, "admissible" means that evidence may, but is not required, to be admitted. Missoula v. Robertson, 2000 MT 52, 298 M 419, 998 P2d 144, 57 St. Rep. 250 (2000). See also St. v. Long, 778 P2d 1027 (Wash. 1989).

Statute Allowing Transfer of Jurisdiction of Juvenile to District Court Not Violative of Constitutional Separation of Powers Doctrine: Bedwell was 17 when he was charged with burglary, theft, and misdemeanor criminal mischief. The motion to charge him as an adult under 41-5-206 was granted. Bedwell moved to dismiss on grounds that 41-5-206 unconstitutionally violated the separation of powers doctrine, impermissibly vesting the court with prosecutorial powers to determine the manner in which to enforce laws with respect to specified juvenile offenders, by allowing the courts discretion to decide whether a juvenile should be treated as an adult. The District Court agreed, finding that courts were allowed to indirectly determine what charges should be filed against a juvenile by determining the legal forum in which a juvenile proceeding should be prosecuted, and remanded for filing in Youth Court. The state appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. In determining whether to accept jurisdiction, a District Court is not making a prosecutorial decision on how the law should be enforced or deciding whether a prosecution should go forward or what charges should be brought. The statute merely allows District Courts a proper judicial function to exercise discretion in determining whether to accept or reject jurisdiction over juvenile offenders under specified circumstances, which does not usurp or intrude into prosecutorial duties and powers of the County Attorney or intrude a court into Executive Branch powers. Thus, 41-5-206 is not violative of the separation of powers doctrine. St. v. Bedwell, 1999 MT 206, 295 M 476, 985 P2d 150, 56 St. Rep. 805 (1999).

Requirement for Arrangement of Transportation for Delinquent Youth by District Court Held Constitutional — Counties Required to Pay Transportation Costs Only Within State — Unfunded Mandate Unaddressed: After the District Youth Court found that J.A. was a delinquent youth, the court committed J.A. to the custody of the Department of Corrections (DOC) for placement at a treatment center in Texas and ordered the DOC to pay the costs of transporting J.A. to that center. When the DOC refused to pay those costs, Lake County paid the costs but later challenged the constitutionality of 52-5-109 as being a violation of the doctrine of the separation of powers and, in addition, argued that 52-5-109 is an unfunded mandate in violation of 1-2-116 and that 52-5-101 and 52-5-109 require Lake County to pay for transportation costs only within Montana. The Supreme Court held that the requirement of 52-5-109 that the District Court "arrange the transportation" of a committed youth does not encroach on judicial authority, require the judiciary to exercise executive power, or interfere with internal judicial operations, but, in the context of the statutes, is only an administrative detail. The Supreme Court also held that it was logical to assume that the DOC, being a Montana state agency, would receive custody only within Montana and not in some other state. The Supreme Court pointed out that 52-5-101 names only in-state institutions for the commitment of youth and that neither that statute nor 52-5-109 makes any mention of out-of-state facilities and, for those reasons, ruled that the DOC must pay for transportation costs of a committed youth outside of the State of Montana. Because the Supreme Court considered its holding "dispositive", it declined to address the issue of whether 52-5-109 is an unfunded mandate in violation of 1-2-116. In re J.A., 1999 MT 148, 295 M 46, 983 P2d 327, 56 St. Rep. 585 (1999).

Court Order for Suitable Jury Room — Supervisory Control Properly Used — Inherent Powers Not Implicated — Findings Not Clearly Erroneous: Judge Moran issued an order pursuant to 3-5-404 (now repealed) for the Gallatin County Sheriff to provide a specific space in the Gallatin County courthouse for use as a jury room and to have the room remodeled and for the expenses to be paid from the Gallatin County general fund. Gallatin County requested the Supreme Court to take supervisory control to prevent protracted litigation, a request with which Judge Moran joined. However, Judge Moran asked that a District Court Judge be appointed to make findings and conclusions. The Supreme Court accepted jurisdiction in order to prevent protracted litigation of the issues and appointed a neutral District Court Judge, Judge Wilson, to hold a hearing and make findings and conclusions. The Supreme Court held that Judge Moran had the authority under 3-5-404 (now repealed) to issue an order to the Sheriff to provide a suitable jury room; that the space provided by the Sheriff pursuant to the order was "suitable", within the dictionary definition of that word; that because the Legislature provided the authority under which Judge Moran acted, the implied powers of the District Court and the separation of powers doctrine were not implicated by Judge Moran's action; and that the findings of fact concerning the suitability of the room provided by the Sheriff and the suitability of another alternative jury room designated by the County Commissioners were not clearly erroneous. Gallatin County v. District Court, 281 M 33, 930 P2d 680, 54 St. Rep. 46 (1997).

Court Suggestion of Alternative Charging Options in Stalking Case Not Violative of Separation of Powers: Following denial of a state motion for leave to file an information charging stalking, because of a lack of probable cause, the court suggested that alternative charges concerning breach of a restraining order or breach of a lower court order at the time of arraignment might provide an adequate remedy. The state contended that the comments constituted a violation of the separation of powers doctrine. However, on appeal, the Supreme Court found no constitutional violation because the conduct did not infringe on the state's prosecutorial discretion and could not be construed as an attempt to dictate what charges the state could bring. St. v. David, 266 M 365, 880 P2d 1308, 51 St. Rep. 844 (1994).

Separation of Powers Doctrine Not to Preclude Compliance With Employee Grievance Procedure by Justice's Court: A Justice of the Peace involved in a disciplinary action against the court office manager contended that a grievance hearing before the County Commission would violate the separation of powers doctrine by interfering with the independence of the court by requiring the Justice of the Peace to be an adverse witness against court personnel, allowing the Justice of the Peace's decision on personnel matters to be overruled by another branch of government, and possibly requiring the Justice of the Peace to accept an employee believed to be unsatisfactory. However, as established in Hillis v. Sullivan, 48 M 320, 137 P 392 (1913), the hiring by the County Commission of a clerk to assist a court does not violate the separation of powers doctrine. In addition, the County Commission is statutorily required to provide a Justice of the Peace with clerical assistance. Thus, a grievance hearing before the County Commission does not violate the separation of powers doctrine because the County Commission's independent hiring of the office manager is consistent with the doctrine; nor does the County Commission's hearing of the grievance constitute an exercise of authority belonging to the Judicial Branch. Clark v. Dussault, 265 M 479, 878 P2d 239, 51 St. Rep. 642 (1994).

Failure of District Court to Grant Motions to Dismiss as Directed by Attorney General for Government Misconduct — Violation of Separation of Powers: The Attorney General directed the Lincoln County Attorney to file motions to dismiss charges against certain criminal defendants for the reason that outrageous government misconduct had occurred in the course of the prosecution. The Lincoln County Attorney filed the motions, but they were denied by the District Court. In a proceeding for supervisory control, the Supreme Court held that the Attorney General was within his authority to direct the County Attorney to move to dismiss the charges and held that the Attorney General's conclusion that there had been outrageous government misconduct in the cases served as a basis under 46-13-401(1) for the District Court to dismiss the charges. The refusal of the District Court to dismiss the charges was an abuse of discretion and a violation of the doctrine of separation of powers. By refusing to grant the motions to dismiss, the District Court intruded upon the lawful functions of the County Attorney and the Attorney General, who belong to the Executive Branch of government. State ex rel. Fletcher v. District Court, 260 M 410, 859 P2d 992, 50 St. Rep. 992 (1993). See also St. v. Schneiderhan, 261 M 161, 862 P2d 37, 50 St. Rep. 1242 (1993).

Authority to Award Damages — Delegation to Human Rights Commission: The grant of authority to the Human Rights Commission to award reasonable damages does not grant unbridled authority and does not constitute an unlawful delegation of judicial and legislative powers. Vainio v. Brookshire, 258 M 273, 852 P2d 596, 50 St. Rep. 529 (1993).

Validity of Attorney License Tax: A $25 license tax on attorneys, along with the attendant penalty provision for nonpayment, has the effect of regulating the practice of law in that an attorney may not practice law in Montana without paying the tax. The tax is a minimal and inoffensive intrusion on the Supreme Court's constitutional prerogatives and is valid as a legislative enactment in aid of the power of the court to regulate the practice of law. In re Application of Kradolfer v. Smith, 246 M 210, 805 P2d 1266, 47 St. Rep. 1861 (1990).

Mandatory Transfer of Prosecution of Older Youth to District Court — Not Violation of Doctrine of Separation of Powers: The automatic transfer provisions of 41-5-206(3), providing for the prosecution of older youth for certain offenses in District Court rather than Youth Court, are not a usurpation of the judiciary's power to hear and decide motions and is not in violation of the Montana Constitution's requirement for separation of powers. The transfer provision is within the Legislature's inherent power to create other courts under Art. VII, sec. 1, Mont. Const. The 1987 amendment providing for transfer without hearing on mitigating factors was merely a revision of protection afforded youth under earlier legislative action and not a violation of the separation of powers doctrine. In re Wood, 236 M 118, 768 P2d 1370, 46 St. Rep. 228 (1989).

Separation of Powers — Commitment by Youth Court: Pursuant to 41-5-523 (renumbered 41-5-1512), the Youth Court committed a delinquent youth to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) for placement in an appropriate facility. The youth appealed the placement, contending that the judiciary is the proper decisionmaking body for the placement of delinquent youths. In response to the youth's allegation that it is a violation of the separation of powers clause of the state constitution for the Department to make the placement decision, the Supreme Court held that there is no violation because the statute provides authority to the Youth Court to decide the commitment of delinquent youths and youths in need of supervision (now youths in need of intervention) and that authority is not diminished through granting the Department placement power. The court has the authority to review the placement decision to determine if it is in the best interests of the minor. In re Peterson, 235 M 313, 767 P2d 319, 46 St. Rep. 13 (1989).

Law Clerk or Master Not a Public Officer — No Violation of Constitution by Legislator: A law clerk acting as an employee of the court is not exercising the sovereign power of the state since he or she is subject to the supervision of the judge or justice who is the employer. A master, although having duties and obligations of a judicial officer, acts in an advisory capacity and does not sit as a court. Therefore, neither a law clerk nor a master is a public officer. A person who holds these positions while holding office as a state legislator does not violate the constitutional provision requiring separation of powers. State ex rel. Paugh v. Bradley, 231 M 46, 753 P2d 857, 45 St. Rep. 419 (1988).

Violation of Right to Know — Exhaustion of Remedies Not Applicable Under Separation of Powers: Plaintiff was negotiating his salary with the school board. The board closed their meeting to discuss plaintiff's salary request. Plaintiff contacted counsel and began proceedings against the board for violating the open meeting law. The board met at another closed meeting and withdrew its offer of employment. The board contended plaintiff was required to exhaust his administrative remedies before filing suit in District Court. The Supreme Court held that the exhaustion doctrine does not apply to constitutional issues. Plaintiff claimed violation of his constitutional right to observe deliberations of a public body under the constitution's right to know provisions. Constitutional questions are properly decided by a judicial body, not an administrative official, under the separation of powers doctrine. Jarussi v. Bd. of Trustees, 204 M 131, 664 P2d 316, 40 St. Rep. 720 (1983).

Time Limits on Judicial Decisions — Solely Within Judicial Sphere: Plaintiff contended 3-2-104 and 3-5-212 (now repealed), which imposed sanctions on judges if decisions were not reached or opinions were not written within the procedural constraints and time limits set by the statutes, were unconstitutional. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that under the separation of powers doctrine the legislative branch of government is without constitutional authority to limit the judicial branch of government in respect to when it shall hear or determine any cause of action within its lawful jurisdiction. The time limits within which judicial decisions must be rendered were held to be a sphere of activity so fundamental and necessary to a court that to divest it of its absolute control would be to make meaningless the very phrase "judicial power". Coate v. Omholt, 203 M 488, 662 P2d 591, 40 St. Rep. 586 (1983).

Lobbying — Initiative 85 — Attorneys — Constitutionality: Initiative 85, as emended in Mont. Auto. Ass'n v. Greely, 193 M 378, 632 P2d 300, 38 St. Rep. 1174 (1981), is not so vague as to be unconstitutionally uncertain, nor does it intrude on the power of the Supreme Court to regulate the conduct of attorneys. The act applies equally to attorneys and nonattorneys acting in the nonlegislative lobbying field. The right of the court to supervise the conduct of the members of the bar is undiminished by any provision of the Initiative. St. Bar of Mont. v. Krivec, 193 M 477, 632 P2d 707, 38 St. Rep. 1322 (1981).

Constitutionality of Judicial Nomination Procedure: The established procedures for filling judicial vacancies in Montana are constitutional and not repugnant to applicable provisions of the Montana Constitution. Jones v. Judge, 176 M 251, 577 P2d 846 (1978).

Termination of Judge by City Commission Unconstitutional: Provision of 7-3-4462, prior to amendment in 1977, which allowed termination of a police judge at the will of the City Commission, was unconstitutional as a violation of the mandate of the doctrine of separation of powers. State ex rel. Morales v. City Comm'n, 174 M 237, 570 P2d 887 (1977).

DELEGATION OF LEGISLATIVE AUTHORITY

TransADE Program Not Unconstitutional Delegation of Legislative Authority: The Legislature enacted the TransADE program to provide bus transportation for elderly and disabled persons around the state. The program, administered by the Department of Transportation, required the Department to calculate and distribute formula grants to applicants meeting the criteria. The program was challenged as an unconstitutional delegation of legislative authority and was upheld by the Montana Supreme Court. The Court held that the statute's policy was clear, requiring certain funds to be used for transportation services for elderly and disabled persons, that the implicit yet clear rationale was evidence to efficiently administer grant awards to avoid duplication of services in geographic areas, and that the statute provides a standard sufficient for the Department to understand its obligations. Mont. Independent Living Project v. St., 2019 MT 298, 398 Mont. 204, 454 P.3d 1216, following Duck Inn, Inc. v. Mont. St. Univ.-N., 285 Mont. 519, 949 P.2d 1179 (1997).

24/7 Sobriety and Drug Monitoring Program Testing Fee — Permissible Delegation of Legislative Authority: The District Court held that 44-4-1204 of the Montana 24/7 Sobriety and Drug Monitoring Program Act unconstitutionally delegated legislative power to the executive branch because it lacked any objective criteria to guide the Attorney General in imposing fees, other than requiring that the fees be reasonable. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, concluding that 44-4-1204 is a permissible delegation of legislative authority because the section limits fees to reasonable amounts necessary to pay for the administration of the program and does not give the Attorney General unfettered discretion when implementing fees. St. v. Spady, 2015 MT 218, 380 Mont. 179, 354 P.3d 590.

Constitutional Authority of Public Employees' Retirement Board to Make Actuarial Calculations — No Overbroad Delegation of Legislative Authority: The District Court held that 2001 amendments contained in House Bill No. 294, which included a definition of actuarial equivalent that changed the method by which the Public Employees' Retirement Board calculated certain benefits, unconstitutionally delegated unconstrained discretion to the Board in violation of the separation of powers doctrine in this section. On appeal, the Board asserted that Art. VIII, sec. 15, Mont. Const., gave the Board the authority to make actuarial evaluations and thus to implement the 2001 amendments, so there was no constitutional violation. The Supreme Court agreed. This section allows one branch of government to exercise power properly belonging to another branch if the constitution expressly directs or permits that exercise. Because Art. VIII, sec. 15, Mont. Const., delegated authority to the Board to make actuarial determinations, the District Court committed reversible error in concluding that the Legislature and House Bill No. 294 (2001) unconstitutionally delegated authority to the Board to make determinations allowed by another section of the constitution. Baumgardner v. Pub. Employees' Retirement Bd., 2005 MT 199, 328 M 179, 119 P3d 77 (2005), following Duck Inn, Inc. v. Mont. St. Univ.-N., 285 M 519, 949 P2d 1179 (1997).

Establishment of Work and Construction Zone Speed Limits by Appropriate Entities Not Unconstitutional Delegation of Legislative Authority: Mathis was cited for speeding in a construction zone in violation of 61-8-314. Mathis challenged the constitutionality of the statute on grounds that the Legislature improperly delegated its authority to the Executive Branch by allowing speed limits in particular work and construction zones to be set by the Department of Transportation, local authorities, or private entities, such as utility companies and private contractors, rather than setting the speed limit by law. The Supreme Court disagreed. Although the authority to establish speed limits is legislative in nature, the delegation of authority in this case did not grant an unfettered discretion to other entities to establish traffic regulations in work and construction zones. The statute provided limitations on that discretion with reasonable clarity and provided policy guidelines to the entities. The rationale behind the statute is to protect drivers and workers in work and construction zones, as evidenced by the enhanced penalties applicable to the crime. Because of the diverse nature of work and construction zones, establishing a speed limit for every construction project would be an impractical if not impossible task for the Legislature, so it was rational for the Legislature to delegate that duty to the entities most familiar with the nuances of each project. Unable to overcome the implied constitutionality of 61-8-314, Mathis's assertion of improper delegation of legislative authority was properly rejected. St. v. Mathis, 2003 MT 112, 315 M 378, 68 P3d 756 (2003), following Duck Inn, Inc. v. Mont. St. Univ.-N., 285 M 519, 949 P2d 1179 (1997).

Department of Revenue's Activity in Proposing Tax Legislation Not Violation of Separation of Powers: In 1994 and 1995, the Department of Revenue engaged in a project to build a consensus between various parties on how best to achieve a simplification of oil and natural gas taxes. The Department proposed legislation to the 1995 Legislature, and it was passed as the Montana Oil and Natural Gas Production Tax Act. Certain counties and taxpayers challenged the law on the basis that neither the Legislature nor the Governor had granted the Department any power to conduct the project and that the Department's actions violated the doctrine of separation of powers. The Supreme Court upheld the tax law on the basis that the constitution requires the Governor to provide the Legislature with information and to recommend measures that the Governor considers necessary and further that 15-1-203 is an enabling statute allowing the Department to formulate and recommend legislation. Powder River County v. St., 2002 MT 259, 312 M 198, 60 P3d 357 (2002).

School Territory Transfer Statutes Unconstitutional — Insufficient Guidelines for Delegation of Legislative Authority: In 1994, the respondents, individuals residing in both Rosebud and Big Horn Counties but outside of the Northern Cheyenne Indian Reservation, petitioned their respective County Superintendents of Schools requesting a territory transfer from the Lame Deer High School District (LDHSD—created in 1993) back to the Colstrip and Hardin High School Districts. The requests were granted. LDHSD appealed the decisions to the State Superintendent of Public Instruction, who reversed the decisions. The respective District Courts reversed the Superintendent of Public Instruction's decision. The Supreme Court reversed the District Courts' decisions on the grounds that the school territory transfer statute is an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power. The broad grant of discretion to a County Superintendent of Schools, unchecked by any standard, policy, or rule of decision, renders the statute unconstitutional. Hayes v. Lame Deer High School District, 2000 MT 342, 303 M 204, 15 P3d 447, 57 St. Rep. 1464 (2000). See also Belgrade Elementary & High School District No. 44 v. Morris, 2000 MT 347, 303 M 245, 15 P3d 482, 57 St. Rep. 1484 (2000), and In re Petitions to Transfer Territory, 2000 MT 348, 303 M 249, 16 P3d 1000, 57 St. Rep. 1486 (2000).

Implementation of Department Directors' Pay Plan Prevented by Governor — No Violation of Separation of Powers — No Impairment of Contract: Directors of two Executive Branch agencies notified employees that employees would be eligible for reinstatement of pay plan steps lost to multigrade promotions. The Governor prohibited the proposed plan. Plaintiffs sued, claiming that the Governor acted unconstitutionally. The Supreme Court held that the Department of Administration's broad powers and duties relating to the state pay plan must be read in conjunction with the Governor's statutory duties of supervision, approval, appointment, and direction over executive agency departments while also taking into consideration the Governor's constitutional status as chief executive officer of the state. The doctrine of separation of powers is not violated when the Governor exercises the very sorts of powers and duties authorized by the Legislature in the statutes enacted. Because the directors' offer was gratuitous and there was no consideration for the offer, no contract was formed under which the employees gained any vested rights to the reinstatement of the lost step. Past consideration (the employees' prior work) is not sufficient to support a promise. Because there was no contract, there were no contractual obligations that were impaired by the Governor's action. Mont. Pub. Employees Ass'n v. Office of Governor, 271 M 450, 898 P2d 675, 52 St. Rep. 523 (1995).

Authority to Award Damages — Delegation to Human Rights Commission: The grant of authority to the Human Rights Commission to award reasonable damages does not grant unbridled authority and does not constitute an unlawful delegation of judicial and legislative powers. Vainio v. Brookshire, 258 M 273, 852 P2d 596, 50 St. Rep. 529 (1993).

Subdivision and Platting Act Constitutional — Permissible Delegation of Legislative Authority: Plaintiff challenged the constitutionality of the Montana Subdivision and Platting Act on the grounds that the statutory preamble to the Act's exemptions amounted to an unconstitutional delegation or usurpation of legislative authority on the basis that the Act contains insufficient guidelines. The Supreme Court distinguished this case from cases relating to a legislative grant of rulemaking authority to administrative agencies based on differences in nature between agencies and local governments. The delegation of authority by the Legislature was not impermissible, and rules adopted by the county pursuant to the Act are constitutional when the rules are not inconsistent with or contradictory to the Act and when they give notice to the property owner as to what the county will look at in making a determination. State ex rel. Dreher v. Fuller, 257 M 445, 849 P2d 1045, 50 St. Rep. 349 (1993).

State Auditor as Member of Hail Board — Not Dual Office Holding: The State Auditor is a constitutional office with "such duties as are provided by law" (Art. VI, sec. 4, Mont. Const.). One of these prescribed duties is being a member of the Board of Hail Insurance established under 2-15-3003. The State Auditor does not hold dual offices by carrying out legislatively imposed duties. The only limitation on the Legislature in prescribing such duties is that the duties may not pertain to the legislative or judicial department of government. Mtn. States Ins. Co. v. St., 218 M 365, 708 P2d 564, 42 St. Rep. 1657 (1985).

Little Davis-Bacon Act — No Unconstitutional Delegation by Legislature: Appellant contended that 18-2-401(5)(b) is an unconstitutional delegation of authority from the Legislature to private parties for determination of the prevailing wage rate. The court held that such provision was not applicable to the facts of the case. The case is governed by 18-2-401(5)(a). Montana's Little Davis-Bacon Act authorizes the Commissioner of Labor to establish standard prevailing rates using union contracts and "other information" as guidelines. Therefore, collective bargaining agreements are advisory, but not compulsory, where there is other evidence of prevailing wage rates in the community as there was in the Bozeman area. No unconstitutional delegation of authority has occurred in 18-2-401(5)(a). Hunter v. Bozeman, 216 M 251, 700 P2d 184, 42 St. Rep. 784 (1985).

Delegation of Legislative Authority — Contingent Authorization Allowed: Plaintiff filed a complaint for declaratory judgment in the Supreme Court seeking to determine the validity of several acts of the Legislature allowing the issuance of state revenue bonds. Plaintiff contended that Ch. 705, L. 1983, granted the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (BNRC) (now abolished) the power and authority to determine the feasibility of various water conservation projects and make recommendations on the projects to the Board of Examiners. Plaintiff contended the delegation was unconstitutional in that it failed to set forth adequate standards or to place limits on the discretion of the BNRC. The court found the standards imposed with reasonable clarity in 85-1-501 and 85-1-502. Under these statutes, the Department of Natural Resources and Conservation (DNRC) is required to study the economic and environmental feasibility of constructing and operating power generating facilities on water projects. Once DNRC has reached its determination, it is the BNRC's duty to determine feasibility and public interest. The court found the legislative enactments complete and sufficiently clear, definite, and certain to enable the agencies to know their respective rights and obligations. The court found that determinations of economic and environmental feasibility are more appropriate in the administrative than the legislative sector. The court found nothing improper in the Legislature's making its authorizations contingent upon administrative decisions properly made in the executive side of state government. Grossman v. St., 209 M 427, 682 P2d 1319, 41 St. Rep. 804 (1984).

Zoning Variance Based Solely on Neighbors' Consent: A zoning ordinance provided that a variance to place a mobile home in a residential district would be granted only if at least 80% of the landowners residing within 300 feet of the proposed location of the mobile home agreed and if all adjoining landowners also agreed. To be a lawful delegation of legislative power, a consent ordinance such as this must not be arbitrary or capricious and must contain standards or guidelines that can be used by the zoning authority to judge the propriety of a withholding of consent. This ordinance fails on both counts and is an unconstitutional delegation of legislative authority and an unwarranted application of the police power. Shannon v. Forsyth, 205 M 111, 666 P2d 750, 40 St. Rep. 1129 (1983).

Location of Legislative Chambers — Legislative Delegation to Committee of Power to Recommend: The provision in 5-17-102 (renumbered 2-17-805) that the Capitol Building and Planning Committee may decide the location of legislative chambers, when read together with the provision in 5-17-103 (renumbered 2-17-825) that the Committee shall report its recommendations to each regular session of the Legislature, means that the Committee must report its decision to the Legislature and that the Legislature is not bound by the decision of the Committee and may either approve or disapprove the decision. Since the decision must be approved by the Legislature, the Legislature did not unconstitutionally delegate its authority to the Committee in violation of this section. Goodover v. Dept. of Administration, 201 M 92, 651 P2d 1005, 39 St. Rep. 1975 (1982).

Permitted Delegation of Legislative Authority: Section 30-14-104 prescribes with reasonable clarity the limits of power delegated to the state administrative agency in defining unlawful or deceptive practices in trade and commerce and does not represent an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power to either the state administrative agency or to the Federal Trade Commission and the federal courts, whose determinations the state agency is empowered but not required to adopt. T & W Chevrolet v. Darvial, 196 M 287, 641 P2d 1368, 39 St. Rep. 112 (1982).

Impermissible Delegation of Legislative Authority — 55-Mile-Per-Hour Case: Section 61-8-304 (now repealed), which delegated a mandatory duty upon the Attorney General to issue proclamations setting Montana's highway speed limits in conformance with federal law, was an unconstitutional delegation of legislative authority under this section because its mandatory directions were a handing over of the sovereign power of this state to federal jurisdiction. To prevent loss of federal highway funds to the state, the effective date of this decision was prospective, to take effect October 1, 1981, or such earlier date as corrective legislation became effective. Lee v. St., 195 M 1, 635 P2d 1282, 38 St. Rep. 1729 (1981), rehearing denied, 195 M 1, 38 St. Rep. 1931 (1981).

Separation of Powers Argument Rejected: The Supreme Court rejected plaintiff's contention that the Medical Malpractice Panel Act violates the prohibitions against unlawful delegation of judicial and legislative power and infringes on the doctrine of separation of powers. The decision of the panel is not enforceable, and unlike the panel decisions in most states, it is not even admissible at trial. Consequently, there are no constitutional violations under the Montana act. Linder v. Smith, 193 M 20, 629 P2d 1187, 38 St. Rep. 912 (1981).

Sentencing — Not Delegation of Legislative Authority: Petitioners contend that 46-18-202(2) unlawfully delegates legislative authority to the judicial and executive branches of government. The thrust of this argument appears to be that the section vests too much discretion in District Judges and prosecuting attorneys. A District Judge is particularly well positioned to predict whether the restriction (ineligibility for parole or furlough) is necessary for the protection of society. The determination of whether to impose the restriction is manifestly with the District Judge alone. Cavanaugh v. Crist, 189 M 274, 615 P2d 890, 37 St. Rep. 1461 (1980).

Overdelegation of Legislative Authority: Section 32-2-231 (renumbered 32-2-271) directed the Department of Business Regulation (now Department of Labor and Industry) to rule on merger applications by savings and loan associations but provides no standards or guidelines either expressed or otherwise ascertainable. There is nothing in the statute to enable the agency to know its rights and obligations, and it is therefore an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power. In re Gate City S & L Ass'n, 182 M 361, 597 P2d 84 (1979).

Delegation to Agency — Guidelines Required: Plaintiff challenged the constitutionality of Ch. 533, L. 1975, which provided for development of renewable natural resources. Bonds were to be issued and the money used by the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now abolished) to make loans to farmers and ranchers for the development and preservation of natural resources. The loans could be made only on proper application to and recommendation by the Department of Natural Resources and Conservation. Total control over granting the loans was vested in the Department. When the Legislature confers authority on an administrative agency, it must lay down the policy or reasons behind the statute and also prescribe standards and guides for the grant of power given to the agency. The provisions of the statutes involved here were sufficiently clear, definite, and certain to enable the agency to know its rights and obligation. Douglas v. Judge, 174 M 32, 568 P2d 530 (1977).

Power to Regulate Parking on University Campuses: The authority of the Board of Regents to regulate student parking and motor vehicle registration was not an improper delegation of legislative powers. Mont. St. Univ. v. Ransier, 167 M 149, 536 P2d 187 (1975).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION
GENERAL PROVISIONS

Counties: Counties are administrative or executive bodies of the state, and the same rules apply as apply to any state agency insofar as Art. IV, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., is concerned. Plath v. Hi-Ball Contractors, Inc., 139 M 263, 362 P2d 1021 (1961).

Standing: One charged with unlawfully keeping, giving, and consuming intoxicating liquor and not with violating any rule of the Montana Liquor Control Board (now Department of Revenue) was not in a position to challenge the constitutionality of the State Liquor Control Act of Montana (now repealed) on the ground that it delegated legislative and judicial powers to the Board in authorizing it to make such regulations. St. v. Andre, 101 M 366, 54 P2d 566 (1936).

Unlawful Usurpation of Powers: The officials of one branch may not, under Art. IV, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., usurp or exercise the powers of either of the others. State ex rel. DuFresne v. Leslie, 100 M 449, 50 P2d 959 (1935).

Division of Government — Powers Divided: The powers of state government are reposed in three departments. If a power is reposed in one department, the other two may not encroach upon or exercise that power, except as expressly directed or permitted in the Constitution. Mills v. Porter, 69 M 325, 222 P 428 (1924).

Extent of the Exception: The exception embodied in Art. IV, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., was not intended to extend further than to matters arising out of some unforeseen menace, public calamity, accident, sudden emergency, extraordinary occurrence, or unprecedented climatic condition rendering immediate action imperative to prevent serious or irreparable injury to the public. State ex rel. Goodman v. Stewart, 57 M 144, 187 P 641 (1920).

Purpose: The purpose of Art. IV, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., was to constitute each department an exclusive trustee of the power vested in it, accountable to the people alone for its faithful exercise, so that each may act as a check upon the other and may be prevented the tyranny and oppression which would be the result of a lodgment of all power in the hands of one body. State ex rel. Smith v. District Court, 50 M 134, 145 P 721 (1914); O'Neill v. Yellowstone Irrigation District, 44 M 492, 121 P 283 (1912); State ex rel. Schneider v. Cunningham, 39 M 165, 101 P 962 (1909).

Common Link: The separation of the government into three departments does not mean that there shall be no common link of connection or dependence but only that the powers properly belonging to one shall not be exercised by the others. State ex rel. Hillis v. Sullivan, 48 M 320, 137 P 392 (1913).

Division of Government — Exceptions: The Constitution divided the powers of government into three distinct departments, the only exception being where some provision is found in the Constitution expressly providing otherwise. State ex rel. Schneider v. Cunningham, 39 M 165, 101 P 962 (1909).

Interference With Governmental Department: It is not lawful for any department or officer thereof to interfere with the power of any other department. Jordan v. Andrus, 26 M 37, 66 P 502 (1901).

County Attorney as Notary: A County Attorney may hold the office of notary public without violating the provisions of Art. IV, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., and it is no objection to an affidavit used by the State, on a motion for a new trial, that the notary before whom it was taken was the County Attorney. St. v. Jackson, 9 M 508, 24 P 213 (1890).

LEGISLATIVE BRANCH

Legislative Interim Council: Laws creating legislative interim councils do not violate the doctrine of separation of powers required by Art. IV, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. James v. Aronson, 132 M 120, 314 P2d 849 (1957), overruling State ex rel. Mitchell v. Holmes, 128 M 275, 274 P2d 611 (1954).

Legislature Not to Exercise Judicial Function Through Commission: Under Art. IV, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., the Legislature could not, through the medium of the Public Service Commission, exercise judicial powers. State ex rel. P.S.C. v. District Court, 107 M 240, 84 P2d 335 (1938).

State Auditor as Member of Industrial Accident Board: The fact that the State Auditor is a member of the Industrial Accident Board (now Division of Workers' Compensation) does not render the Workers' Compensation Act unconstitutional on the ground that he holds two offices. The only limitation upon the Legislature in imposing duties upon that officer under Art. IV, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., prohibited the imposition of duties appertaining to the legislative or judicial, not the executive, departments of government. Shea v. North-Butte Min. Co., 55 M 522, 179 P 499 (1919).

Legislature — Cannot Impose Ministerial or Executive Duties on Courts: The orderly disposition of the business of the state requires the faithful observance of Art. IV, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., and the Legislature could not impose upon the Supreme Court or its Justices the performance of an act not judicial in its character but purely ministerial or executive. In re Weston, 28 M 207, 72 P 512 (1903).

EXECUTIVE BRANCH

Interference of Executive in Judiciary: Governor is not empowered to exclude or remove from office the duly elected, qualified, and acting judge of a judicial district or to order the judge of one district into another district. State ex rel. Bennett v. Bonner, 123 M 414, 214 P2d 747 (1950).

Delegation of Appointment Power to Courts: Generally speaking, the power of appointment is an executive function that cannot be delegated to the judiciary. Application of O'Sullivan, 117 M 295, 158 P2d 306 (1945).

Judicial Interference: A statute which authorizes District Judges to order the payment of claims against a county after disapproval by the Auditor would seem to violate Art. IV, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., for the reason that it undertakes to cast upon District Court Judges a power which pertains exclusively to the executive branch of the government. State ex rel. Dolin v. Major, 58 M 140, 192 P 618 (1920).

JUDICIAL BRANCH

Disqualification of Judges Statute: Section dealing with disqualification of judges did not violate the separation of powers provision in that it does not impinge upon the existence or supremacy of the judicial system or alter its jurisdiction or duties but is a reasonable manner of providing a fair trial for all litigants. State ex rel. Peery v. District Court, 145 M 287, 400 P2d 648 (1965).

Judicial Discretion Not to Be Substituted for That of Board: Because of the division of governmental powers into three branches, neither the District Courts nor the Supreme Court may substitute its discretion for the discretion reposed in boards and commissions by legislative acts. Peterson v. Livestock Comm'n, 120 M 140, 181 P2d 152 (1947).

Courts Not to Change or Amend Venue Statute: When the court in State ex rel. Interstate Lumber Co. v. District Court, 54 M 602, 172 P 1030 (1918), held that the term "contract", as used in the general venue statute, must be accepted in its broadest signification and as including every kind of contract, whether express or implied, and inserted into the statute the imperative word "must" in lieu of the permissive word "may", it entirely eliminated the application of the venue rule declared in the first sentence of the section, irrespective of whether or not any place of performance was stipulated, thereby changing and amending the statute, a power reserved to the Legislature. Hardenburgh v. Hardenburgh, 115 M 469, 146 P2d 151 (1944).

Courts — Not to Delete From or Add Words to Statute: Courts were enjoined by Art. IV, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., from exercising powers properly belonging to the legislative department of the state government and therefore could not delete words from or add words to a statute. Such changes may be made only by the Legislature. State ex rel. Grant v. Eaton, 114 M 199, 133 P2d 588 (1943).

Court Not to Set Valuation of Property — Tax Purposes: That part of section authorizing action to recover taxes paid under protest on ground of overvaluation of property with trial by jury after the State Board of Equalization (now State Tax Appeal Board) has refused to grant relief was in conflict with Art. IV, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., relating to the powers of the three departments of government, in that it attempts to impose upon the judiciary functions in factfinding matters that properly belong to another department of state government. IBM v. Lewis & Clark County, 111 M 384, 112 P2d 477 (1941).

Courts — Not to Interfere With Discretionary Powers of Railroad Commissioners: Under Art. IV, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., courts could not interfere with the discretionary powers lodged in the Board of Railroad Commissioners (now Public Service Commission) in the administration of the motor vehicle laws, as long as it was acting within lawful authority. Fulmer v. Bd. of R.R. Comm'rs, 96 M 22, 28 P2d 849 (1934).

Separation of Powers — Bank Receivership: The Legislature in providing that a receiver appointed to take charge of an insolvent state bank shall conduct its affairs under the supervision of the State Bank Examiner did not intend for the District Court to be deprived of authority to give directions to him or confirm a sale of the bank's property. State ex rel. Rankin v. Yegen, 79 M 184, 255 P 744 (1927).

Administrative Powers of District Courts: Article IV, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., did not forbid the conference on state District Courts the administrative powers in connection with and ancillary to their judicial functions. St. v. Johnson, 75 M 240, 243 P 1073 (1926); O'Neill v. Yellowstone Irrigation District, 44 M 492, 121 P 283 (1912). Compare State ex rel. Kellogg v. District Court, 13 M 370, 34 P 298 (1893); State ex rel. Hillis v. Sullivan, 48 M 320, 137 P 392 (1913); Porter v. Investors Synd., 287 US 346, 77 L Ed 354, 53 S Ct 132 (1932).

Judicial Powers: The legislative declaration that an emergency exists and that for that reason a certain act is necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace and safety, making the act immune from a referendum of the people, is not conclusive, the question, backed by facts, whether the act is within the authority of the Legislature, being a judicial one determinable by the courts. State ex rel. Goodman v. Stewart, 57 M 144, 187 P 641 (1920).

Judge Not Ministerial Agent: The constitutional requirement that the several departments of government be kept distinct prevents a judge of court being made a ministerial agent to gather and furnish testimony for use by the Legislature in passing upon the qualifications of its members. State ex rel. Smith v. District Court, 50 M 134, 145 P 721 (1914).

Creation of Irrigation Districts — Duties Imposed on Courts: Section providing for the creation of irrigation districts was not violative of the provisions of Art. IV, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., in conferring certain alleged nonjudicial powers and duties in that connection upon a District Judge. O'Neill v. Yellowstone Irrigation District, 44 M 492, 121 P 283 (1912).

When Courts May Control Governor by Mandamus: Article IV, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., did not prevent the courts from controlling by mandamus the exercise of a purely ministerial duty by the Governor of the state. State ex rel. St. Publishing Co. v. Smith, 23 M 44, 57 P 449 (1899).

DELEGATION OF LEGISLATIVE AUTHORITY

Zoning: The provisions of sections granting zoning powers to city-county planning boards and to County Commissioners were invalid as an unauthorized delegation of legislative power to counties. Plath v. Hi-Ball Contractors, Inc., 139 M 263, 362 P2d 1021 (1961).

Guidelines Sufficient: Chapter giving County Commissioners power to establish zoning districts and to create a commission contained sufficient guidelines so that it is not an invalid delegation of legislative powers. Missoula v. Missoula County, 139 M 256, 362 P2d 539 (1961), explained in Plath v. Hi-Ball Contractors, Inc., 139 M 263, 362 P2d 1021 (1961); Doull v. Wohlschlager, 139 M 274, 362 P2d 542 (1961).

Health Districts: Former laws relating to rules by health districts violated Art. IV, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., by delegating legislative power to a board. Bacus v. Lake County, 138 M 69, 354 P2d 1056 (1960), distinguished in Billings v. Smith, 158 M 197, 490 P2d 221 (1971), and followed in Hayes v. Lame Deer High School District, 2000 MT 342, 303 M 204, 15 P3d 447, 57 St. Rep. 1464 (2000). See also Belgrade Elementary & High School District No. 44 v. Morris, 2000 MT 347, 303 M 245, 15 P3d 482, 57 St. Rep. 1484 (2000), and In re Petitions to Transfer Territory, 2000 MT 348, 303 M 249, 16 P3d 1000, 57 St. Rep. 1486 (2000).

Sale of Bonds: Initiative providing for the payment of a soldiers' bonus and authorizing the Board of Examiners (now Department of Administration) to issue bonds with which to pay the bonus and providing for an additional cigarette tax with which to retire the bonds was not a delegation of legislative powers to the Board, since standards are set up in the act. State ex rel. Graham v. Bd. of Examiners, 125 M 419, 239 P2d 283 (1952).

Sale of Debentures: The Highway Treasury Anticipation Debenture Act of 1945 (omitted), imposing a 5 cents a gallon gasoline tax on dealers and distributors, is not unconstitutional as delegating to the Highway Commission (now Transportation Commission) legislative authority to determine what debentures may be sold in the specified 10-year period. Therefore the authority to determine the extent of the indebtedness, in view of history of gasoline tax collections, removed question of payment from legislative discretion. Pioneer Motors, Inc. v. Highway Comm'n, 118 M 333, 165 P2d 796 (1946).

Armory Board: Sections (since repealed), creating the armory board and authorizing it to select and purchase sites and erect armories thereon and donate any to the state after payment of all indebtedness secured by such property, are not a delegation of legislative power because the state will not become the owner of any of the property until or unless donated to it by the board. Geboski v. Armory Bd., 110 M 487, 103 P2d 679 (1940).

Emergency Relief by Creation of High School Districts: In providing emergency relief by the creation of high school districts in counties having county high schools, the Legislature, by formulating the policy to be followed in broad terms and leaving the details to designated officers, did not delegate legislative power to administrative officers in violation of Art. IV, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Berthot v. School District, 102 M 356, 58 P2d 264 (1936).

Delegation to Board: While one of the three departments of state government cannot lawfully delegate any of its powers to either of the others, when a statute merely authorizes a board to carry out the expressed will of the Legislature, although procedural directions are specified only in general terms, the act is not vulnerable to the criticism that it delegates legislative powers contrary to Art. IV, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const. St. v. Andre, 101 M 366, 54 P2d 566 (1936).

Specific Direction Not Required: Sections in authorizing water conservation boards to carry out the expressed will of the Legislature but leaving certain matters of detail to it without specific direction as to how they shall be done was not a delegation of legislative authority in contravention of Art. IV, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Normile v. Cooney, 100 M 391, 47 P2d 637 (1935).

Criteria: A statute granting a board or commission certain powers to be exercised under general rules given for its guidance, with the requirement that it must find certain ultimate facts before taking a prescribed action, is not open to condemnation as delegating legislative power when because of multifarious fact conditions, which may properly be considered in the administration of the powers given, it is impossible to incorporate in the statute a more detailed recital of such conditions. N. Pac. Ry. v. Bennett, 83 M 483, 272 P 987 (1928).

Drainage Act: The drainage act does not attempt to delegate legislative power to the judiciary and therefore does not impinge upon the state Constitution, prohibiting the exercise of powers of a state department properly belonging to any other. In re Drain District, 64 M 545, 211 P 218 (1922).

Private Organizations: Section providing that any person who shall wear or use the insignia or ceremonies of any society, order, or organization of 10 years' standing in this state, "unless entitled to use or wear the same, under the constitution and by-laws, rules, and regulations of such society or organization", shall be guilty of a misdemeanor is unconstitutional and void. By allowing the different societies to supply in their secret work the description of the articles which it is unlawful to use or wear, the Legislature delegated legislative powers to the orders mentioned. St. v. Holland, 37 M 393, 96 P 719 (1908). See also State ex rel. Bennett v. St. Bd. of Examiners, 40 M 59, 104 P 1055 (1909); O'Neill v. Attorney General's Opinions

Judicial Decision Invalidating Constitutional Amendments — Constitutional Language and Statutory Implementation Language Restored: In 2002, Montana voters approved Constitutional Amendment Nos. 37 and 38, along with statutory implementing provisions, to modify county distribution requirements for signatures to qualify an initiative petition for the ballot. In Mont. PIRG v. Johnson, CV 03-183-M-DWM (D.C. Mont. 2005), a federal District Court held that the amended distribution requirements resulted in an unequal treatment of qualified electors in different counties and were unconstitutional on their face and invalid. The Attorney General cited State ex rel. Woodahl v. District Court, 162 M 283, 511 P2d 318 (1973), in concluding that the nullification of the constitutional amendments by the judicial decision invalidating the county distribution requirements restored the language of the constitution and implementing statutes as they existed before the approval of the invalid amendments. 51 A.G. Op. 2 (2005).

Chief Water Judge Not Subject to State Leave Policies — Executive Branch Not to Supervise Judicial Branch: Although the Chief Water Judge is appointed and not elected, the Chief Water Judge is a judicial officer and is not subject to the vacation leave policies of the Department of Administration. This interpretation of the statutes is also required by the application of the separation of powers clause of the Montana Constitution. To hold otherwise would subject a judicial officer to control by the Executive Branch of state government and not to the control of the Montana Supreme Court or the Judicial Standards Commission. 48 A.G. Op. 2 (1999).

Line Item Appropriations and Conditions: Because the constitution is a limit on and not a grant of authority to the Legislature, line item appropriations and conditions attached thereto are permissible so long as they do not intrude into areas that distinctly and uniquely belong under the jurisdiction of the Board of Regents. 36 A.G. Op. 2 (1975).

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

Jurisdiction of Montana Courts' Over Tribal Member: Montana courts have jurisdiction over a tribal member whose actions involve significant contacts with the state outside reservation boundaries. By taking a constitutional oath of office to support, protect, and defend the Montana Constitution, a justice of the peace made himself subject to Montana courts when running for elective tribal office. Judicial Standards Comm'n v. Not Afraid, 2010 MT 285, 358 Mont. 532, 245 P.3d 1116.

Substitute Justice of the Peace Not Duly Authorized or Properly Called — Search Warrants Invalid: A Justice of the Peace submitted a written waiver request form for proposing substitute Justices of the Peace but failed to create a list of proposed substitutes as required in 3-10-231. One of the designated substitutes took the judicial oath of office, but not in the form required by this section. The substitute justice was called by a Deputy Sheriff, who requested warrants allowing a search of defendant's property. The warrants were issued and executed, but the warrants were challenged by defendants on the grounds that the warrants were not issued by a properly authorized substitute justice. The state argued that the authorization and call-in of the substitute justice were in substantial compliance with the law and that any technical errors in the procedures should not operate to suppress evidence. Applying Potter v. District Court, 266 M 384, 880 P2d 1319 (1994), the Supreme Court held that substantial compliance was insufficient. The procedure used in authorizing the substitute justice with a variant form of the constitutional oath of office was a major discrepancy in the authorization process, and the procedure of providing law enforcement with a menu of substitutes from which to choose clearly violated Potter. The substitute Justice of the Peace was not duly authorized, thus the warrants issued by the substitute were void ab initio. St. v. Vickers, 1998 MT 201, 290 M 356, 964 P2d 756, 55 St. Rep. 859 (1998), distinguishing U.S. v. Leon, 468 US 897, 82 L Ed 2d 677, 104 S Ct 3405 (1984), and followed in Blodgett v. DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Creation of Legislative Council: Chapter 143, L. 1953 (sections 43-701 through 43-708, R.C.M. 1947, now repealed), which purported to create the "Montana Legislative Council" under which all of the members of the Council were members of the Legislature and which Council was permitted to accept grants or gifts of money from any person or corporation, is in direct conflict with and violative of the constitutional oath required by Art. XIX, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Mitchell v. Holmes, 128 M 275, 274 P2d 611 (1954), overruled in State ex rel. James v. Aronson, 132 M 120, 314 P2d 849 (1957).

Supreme Court — May Raise Question: Since, under the Constitution, judicial officers are required to take an oath that they will defend the federal and state Constitutions, the Supreme Court, in a case where decision of the question of constitutionality of a statute is decisive of the appeal, which question, however, was not raised by either party, may properly raise the question on its own motion. In re Clark's Estate, 105 M 401, 74 P2d 401 (1937).

Filing Requirement: Article XIX, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., requiring every public officer to take the official oath therein prescribed, is self-executing, mandatory, and conclusive upon the Legislature; but it not being prohibited from requiring the filing of the oath, it could, as it did by 2-16-212, prescribe that such oath should be filed without thereby rendering the section unconstitutional. State ex rel. Wallace v. Callow, 78 M 308, 254 P 187 (1927).

Self-Executing: The provision of Art. XIX, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., requiring every public officer within the state to take the oath therein prescribed, is self-executing. State ex rel. Scollard v. Bd. of Examiners, 52 M 91, 156 P 124 (1916).

Alderman — Oath Required: Before entering upon his duties, an alderman must swear that he will not knowingly receive, directly or indirectly, any money or other valuable thing for the performance or nonperformance of any act or duty pertaining to his office other than the compensation allowed by law. State ex rel. Ryan v. Bd. of Aldermen, 45 M 188, 122 P 569 (1912).

2002 Amendment by Referendum: Constitutional Amendment No. 38, proposed by Ch. 330, L. 2001, and approved at the general election held November 5, 2002, in (2) near middle of first sentence substituted "one-half of the counties" for "one-third of the legislative representative districts". Case Notes

Denial of Request for Supreme Court to Exercise Original Jurisdiction to Enjoin Initiative — Examination of Constitutionality When and If Initiative Passes: The plaintiffs challenged the constitutionality of an initiative by filing a petition for declaratory relief and seeking an injunction to prevent the Secretary of State from certifying the initiative. The Supreme Court denied the petition without prejudice, concluding that the court lacked authority to determine the constitutionality of the initiative's provisions until, and if, the initiative passed. Mont. AFL-CIO v. McCulloch, 2016 MT 200, 384 Mont. 331, 380 P.3d 728.

Repeal of City Resolution Via Referendum Invalid: Plaintiffs challenged a referendum approved by voters in the city of Whitefish, which repealed a city resolution that authorized the city to enter into an interlocal agreement with the county concerning planning and zoning authority over a 2-mile area around the city, arguing that the resolution was not subject to the right of voter initiative and referendum. The District Court determined that the resolution was an administrative act by the city and was therefore not subject to repeal by referendum. On appeal, the Supreme Court applied the guidelines adopted in Whitehall v. Preece, 1998 MT 53, 288 Mont. 55, 956 P.2d 743, to determine whether the action by the city was administrative or legislative in nature and affirmed, concluding that the city's action had significant administrative characteristics, which made it not subject to repeal by referendum. Phillips v. Whitefish, 2014 MT 186, 375 Mont. 456, 330 P.3d 442.

Summary Ballot Statements Legally Sufficient: In an original proceeding challenging the legal sufficiency of a proposed ballot measure that sought to prohibit enforcement of the federal Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act (ACA) in Montana, petitioners argued that the ballot statements approved by the Attorney General were insufficient because the statements failed to explain to voters the substantive provisions of the ACA that would be void if the measure passed and failed to explain the far-reaching consequences that the measure would have on existing Montana programs. The Supreme Court denied the petitioners' challenge, concluding that the Attorney General's statement mentioned the topics that the petitioners claimed would be affected by the measure, thereby capturing the purpose, implication, and fiscal impacts in a summary fashion and sufficiently informing voters of the implications of a vote for or against the measure. Hoffman v. St., 2014 MT 90, 374 Mont. 405, 328 P.3d 604. See also Montanans Against Tax Hikes v. St., 2018 MT 201, 392 Mont. 344, 423 P.3d 1078.

Attorney General Review of Ballot Initiative — No Power to Review Substantive Legality: The Attorney General's review of a ballot initiative for legal sufficiency is limited to determining whether the initiative complies with requirements governing the submission of the proposed issue to voters and does not include consideration of the substantive legality of the initiative if it were approved by voters. Montanans Opposed to I-166 v. St., 2012 MT 168, 365 Mont. 520, 285 P.3d 435, followed in Hoffman v. St., 2014 MT 90, 374 Mont. 405, 328 P.3d 604. See also Mont. Min. Assoc. v. St., 2018 MT 151, 391 Mont. 529, 420 P.3d 523.

Challenge to Invalidate Signatures for Minimum Wage Initiative Rendered Moot by Election: Montanans for Equal Application of Initiative Laws (Montanans for Equal Application) filed an action to invalidate signatures gathered by supporters of Initiative Measure No. 151 (I-151), a proposal to raise the state minimum wage, and to enjoin the Secretary of State from including I-151 on the general election ballot. Supporters of I-151 filed a motion for summary judgment, contending that Montanans for Equal Application's challenge was barred by the 30-day limitation period then provided in 3-5-302 (see 13-27-317 for similar limitation). The District Court granted summary judgment for Raise Montana, ruling that Montanans for Equal Application's claim was untimely under 3-5-302 because it was not filed within the then-required 30 days after the date on which the Secretary of State notified the Governor that a sufficient number of signatures had been obtained to qualify for the ballot. Montanans for Equal Application appealed, arguing that the District Court ignored the plain meaning of 3-5-302, which allowed a challenge of a ballot issue "at any time" after discovery of illegal signatures. Raise Montana countered that not only did the District Court correctly interpret the former version of 3-5-302 to bar a claim filed 83 days after certification, but more importantly, this section, which prohibits a challenge of the sufficiency of an initiative after an election, rendered the challenge moot. Agreeing with Raise Montana, the Supreme Court ruled that Montanans for Equal Application did not begin their litigation in sufficient time to appeal the trial court's decision before the election and the unambiguous language of subsection (3) of this section became operative. Montanans for Equal Application of Initiative Laws v. St., 2007 MT 75, 336 M 450, 154 P3d 1202 (2007).

Expedited Hearing on Validity of Ballot Measure Not Violative of Procedural Due Process: Opponents to a ballot measure timely filed a challenge, and the District Court expedited the hearing and denied the proponents additional time for discovery. On appeal, the proponents asserted that their due process rights were violated by the District Court's actions. The Supreme Court disagreed. The requirements for a procedural due process claim are notice and opportunity for a hearing appropriate to the nature of the case. The proponents could not claim lack of notice because: (1) the opponents' complaint was sufficiently specific to put the proponents on notice that the opponents contested the validity of addresses listed by paid signature gatherers; (2) the proponents acknowledged that the Secretary of State notified them during the signature gathering process that complaints had been received related to address falsification; and (3) denial of additional time for discovery regarding address falsification did not prejudice the proponents because the signature gatherers were contacted, hired, and paid by the proponents, so any information regarding the true addresses was within the exclusive knowledge of the proponents. The due process claim of lack of a meaningful hearing was also denied by the Supreme Court. The record showed that the proponents failed to use the time allocated for discovery or to avail themselves of available procedural remedies. The proponents did not answer the opponents' complaint, request any discovery, move for a continuance, take any depositions, file a pretrial brief, attend depositions conducted by the opponents, file proposed findings of fact or conclusions of law, or object to the District Court's proposed expedited schedule. Thus, any deprivation of a meaningful hearing was more a construct of the proponents' own failure to act than it was a function of the District Court's denial of more time for trial preparation. The proponents' due process claim failed. Montanans for Justice: Vote No on CI-98 v. St., 2006 MT 277, 334 M 237, 146 P3d 759 (2006), distinguishing Wilson v. Dept. of Public Service Regulation, 260 M 167, 858 P2d 368 (1993).

Signature Distribution Invalid: The 2002 amendment to this section requiring that signatures be gathered on a county basis rather than on a legislative district basis was unconstitutional on its face under the 14th amendment's equal protection clause and therefore invalid. Mont. PIRG v. Johnson, CV 03-183-M-DWM (D.C. Mont. 2005).

Guidelines for Distinguishing Between Legislative and Administrative Acts of Local Government — Initiative and Referendum Power Reserved for Legislative Acts Only: Beginning with Billings v. Nore, 148 M 96, 417 P2d 458 (1966), the Supreme Court recognized a distinction between legislative acts, which are subject to the powers of initiative and referendum, and administrative or quasi-judicial acts, which are not. Because local governments are empowered by Art. XI, sec. 4, Mont. Const., to exercise legislative, administrative, and other powers, the question arose as to whether 7-5-131 unconstitutionally limits local government referendum power to resolutions and ordinances within the legislative jurisdiction. In order to clarify the distinction between legislative and administrative acts of a local government, the Supreme Court adopted the following guidelines in Wichita v. Kans. Taxpayers Network, 874 P2d 667 (Kans. 1994): (1) An ordinance that makes new law is legislative, while an ordinance that executes an existing law is administrative. Permanency and generality are key features of a legislative ordinance. (2) Acts that declare public purpose and provide ways and means to accomplish that purpose generally may be classified as legislative. Acts that deal with a small segment of an overall policy question generally are administrative. (3) Decisions that require specialized training and experience in municipal government and intimate knowledge of the fiscal and other affairs of a city in order to make a rational choice may properly be characterized as administrative, even though they may also be said to involve the establishment of a policy. (4) No act of a governing body is likely to be solely administrative or legislative, and the operation of the initiative and referendum statute is restricted to measures that are quite clearly and fully legislative and not principally executive or administrative. In the present case, an ordinance that implemented the use of water meters as part of a town's water system improvement plan was an administrative act that was not subject to referendum. The District Court properly declared a referendum challenging the ordinance invalid. The Supreme Court affirmed the constitutionality of 7-5-131. Whitehall v. Preece, 1998 MT 53, 288 M 55, 956 P2d 743, 55 St. Rep. 219 (1998), followed in Phillips v. Whitefish, 2014 MT 186, 375 Mont. 456, 330 P.3d 442, and overruling Chouteau County v. Grossman, 172 M 373, 563 P2d 1125 (1977), and Dieruf v. Bozeman, 173 M 447, 568 P2d 127 (1977), to the extent that those decisions stand for the rule that a local government's act is administrative based solely on a statutory grant of authority.

Reasonableness of Time Periods: Under 13-27-316(2), certification by the Secretary of State to the Governor of qualification for the ballot triggers the time in which opponents to the measure may act. The opponents have 10 days following certification to file a challenge in District Court. The opponent has the time from the petition's initiation until its certification to prepare the action but is not required to act until it qualifies for the ballot. The statutes then provide for immediate access to the courts. This is a reasonable procedure for challenging the sufficiency of the title of an initiative. State ex rel. Boese v. Waltermire, 224 M 230, 730 P2d 375, 43 St. Rep. 2156 (1986).

Initiative Solicitation in School Polling Place Constitutional: Plaintiff was not allowed to gather signatures for an initiative petition on a general election day in a school building used as a polling place. The school district had a general policy prohibiting solicitation of any kind in school buildings. The District Court granted summary judgment to the school district. On appeal, the Supreme Court said that although 13-35-218 permits some manner of solicitation at polling places on election day, it does not guarantee the right. The court found the initiative process to be within the protection of Montana's counterparts of the first amendment. This does not assure that the process may not be regulated, however. The court, relying on the time, place, and manner regulations on the right to use public places for expressive activity found in Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 US 104 (1972), and Tinker v. Des Moines School District, 393 US 503 (1969), found that the school district's policy was not narrowly tailored to further its interests in undisrupted school functioning. The policy applied regardless of whether classes were being held and applied to all solicitors regardless of whether they acted peaceably. Fear of disruption was not sufficient to overcome the right to freedom of expression. The school district's policy was found unconstitutional. Dorn v. Bd. of Trustees, 203 M 136, 661 P2d 426, 40 St. Rep. 348 (1983).

Prohibition Against Voters' Promise of Support as Unconstitutional: Section 5-7-102(7)(c)(i) from Initiative 85 is an unconstitutional infringement of the right of free speech and is therefore void. The prohibited conduct is nothing more than a standard and accepted means of involvement in the political process. It is a free expression of the only real power an elector possesses. Criticism of government is at the very center of the constitutional protection of free speech. No law could stand that would prevent an elector from voting for or against an incumbent. Likewise, no law can stand that would prevent a voter from expressing to an elected official an intention to vote for or against that official if certain action is or is not taken. Further, the first amendment applies to associations as well as individuals and protects the right of associations to engage in advocacy on behalf of their members. Mont. Auto. Ass'n v. Greely, 193 M 378, 632 P2d 300, 38 St. Rep. 1174 (1981).

Accounting Requirements Void for Vagueness: Subsections (5)(a)(i) and (5)(a)(iv) of section 5-7-208, enacted by Initiative 85, are void for vagueness. It is impossible to tell when "original and derivative" research is being performed; likewise, the court is unable to determine what additional information ought to be disclosed under the subheading of "news media". Mont. Auto. Ass'n v. Greely, 193 M 378, 632 P2d 300, 38 St. Rep. 1174 (1981).

Common Understanding and Judicial Precedent Sufficient to Show Compelling State Interest: The compelling need or state interest in enactment of Initiative 85 is demonstrated by both common understanding and judicial precedent, and no additional evidence need be presented to show compelling state interest. Mont. Auto. Ass'n v. Greely, 193 M 378, 632 P2d 300, 38 St. Rep. 1174 (1981).

Definition Subsections Impermissibly Vague: Subsections (7)(c)(iv), (7)(c)(v), and (7)(f) of 5-7-102, enacted by Initiative 85, are impermissibly vague, unconstitutional, and therefore void. (Following U.S. v. Dupree, 544 F2d 1050 (9th Cir. 1976).) The court asks rhetorically: Is there a form of "proper" economic reprisal? How does a lobbyist determine when he may retaliate lawfully against a public official? Can conduct which is potentially criminal be defined as "any means other than" the permitted means of argument on the merits? To "reflect discredit" is not sufficiently definite to give a person of ordinary intelligence fair notice that his conduct is forbidden. Mont. Auto. Ass'n v. Greely, 193 M 378, 632 P2d 300, 38 St. Rep. 1174 (1981).

Exemptions for Montana Citizens Unconstitutional: The exemption provided in subsection (2) of 5-7-101 and subsection (5)(b)(i) of 5-7-102, enacted by Initiative 85, for Montana citizens is constitutionally impermissible under the Privileges and Immunities Clause of the United States Constitution. There is no basis for creating an exception solely for individual Montana citizens. Citizens of other states may have an interest in some official action in Montana that warrants their efforts to influence the outcome of that action in Montana. The word "Montana" is void and without effect in both sections. Mont. Auto. Ass'n v. Greely, 193 M 378, 632 P2d 300, 38 St. Rep. 1174 (1981).

Language Requiring Nonlobbying Expenses to Be Disclosed — Unconstitutional: The words "regardless of whether it was paid solely" as used in subsection (5)(c) of 5-7-208, enacted by Initiative 85, are void as a violation of the first amendment right of association which exists as a necessary corollary to the freedoms of speech and assembly. The forced disclosure of contributions and membership fees "regardless of whether . . . paid solely for the purpose of lobbying" compels revelation of information that has no relationship to the ends that the lobbyist disclosure laws and Initiative 85 seek to achieve. That some money is in fact spent for lobbying does not lessen the repugnance of subsection (5)(c) of 5-7-208. Further, the forced disclosure of the name of an individual who contributed $250 reaches too broadly and too blindly into an area that is essential to the exercise of our most basic freedoms. Mont. Auto. Ass'n v. Greely, 193 M 378, 632 P2d 300, 38 St. Rep. 1174 (1981).

Statewide Vote Through Initiative as Demonstrating Compelling State Interest: The absence of factfinding capabilities in the initiative process is not proof of the absence of a compelling state interest in the enactment of Initiative 85. To so hold would result in the emasculation of the initiative process in Montana with a result that no initiative could withstand a first amendment challenge. The statewide vote on Initiative 85 is a demonstration of a compelling state interest in enactment of Initiative 85. Mont. Auto. Ass'n v. Greely, 193 M 378, 632 P2d 300, 38 St. Rep. 1174 (1981).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Cigarette Tax: Constitutional prohibition against appropriations of money by initiative is directed solely to appropriations from the general funds; hence, Initiative Measure No. 54, L. 1951, p. 781 (16-11-111), which provides for an additional cigarette tax with which to pay a soldiers' bonus and that such additional tax is to go into a special fund and be used only for that special purpose, did not violate Art. V, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Graham v. Bd. of Examiners, 125 M 419, 239 P2d 283 (1952).

Initiative — Technical Objections to or Sufficiency of Petition Disregarded After Election: After the people have voted on a matter and a great majority of the voters have expressed their approval, the courts presume that the public interest was there and objections that there were not the required number of signatures on the petition are disregarded. State ex rel. Graham v. Bd. of Examiners, 125 M 419, 239 P2d 283 (1952), followed in Montanans for Equal Application of Initiative Laws v. St., 2007 MT 75, 336 M 450, 154 P3d 1202 (2007).

"Appropriation" Defined: An "appropriation", within the meaning of this section, has reference exclusively to the state general fund or a fund already in existence or for which provision has been made, rather than to money received in the treasury and credited to a fund for the sale of an authorized debenture issue, such as authorized by Initiative Measure No. 41, the 1938 debenture act. Martin v. St. Highway Comm'n, 107 M 603, 88 P2d 41 (1939).

Power of People to Initiate Laws Limited by the Constitution: In the exercise of their prerogative to initiate laws under Art. V, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., the people are subject to the same constitutional limitations as are applicable to the Legislative Assembly. State ex rel. Bonner v. Dixon, 59 M 58, 195 P 841 (1921), overruled on other grounds in Bd. of Regents v. Judge, 168 M 433, 543 P2d 1323 (1975).

Procedure in Initiating a Measure: In initiating a measure under the power reserved to the people by Art. V, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., a substantial compliance with the legislative direction contained in the provisions of sections 37-105 and 37-106, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), is necessary. State ex rel. Bonner v. Dixon, 59 M 58, 195 P 841 (1921), overruled on other grounds in Bd. of Regents v. Judge, 168 M 433, 543 P2d 1323 (1975).

Attorney General's Opinions

Signature Distribution Reverts to Legislative District Basis: A judicial decision (Mont. PIRG v. Johnson, CV 03-183-M-DWM (D.C. Mont. 2005)) invalidating the county distribution requirements for signatures to qualify an initiative petition for the ballot, as approved in Const. Amend. No. 37 and No. 38 and enacted in their implementing legislation, restores the language of the constitution and statutes as they existed before the approval of the invalid amendments. Therefore, the constitution reverts to the original legislative district basis for signature distribution. 51 A.G. Op. 2 (2005).

Initiative Inappropriate Process for Alteration of Method of Establishment and Collection of County Solid Waste Management District Service Charges: The initiative process may not be used to amend the resolution creating a county solid waste management district when the district encompasses an area smaller than the entire county and the initiative petition seeks to alter the method of establishing and collecting service charges. Such a proposed action is administrative in character rather than a legislative act subject to initiative or referendum. 45 A.G. Op. 5 (1993).

Legislative Power to Amend Voter-Initiated Act — Amendment Controls: It is within the power of the Legislature to modify initiatives enacted by the electorate, and in cases of conflict between the valid amendment and the initiative, the amendment controls. 42 A.G. Op. 21 (1987).

Gathering Initiative Petition Signatures at Primary Election Polling Places: The orderly gathering of initiative petition signatures at primary election polling places that does not interfere with the election process or obstruct voter access to the polling place may not be prohibited. Any interference with the initiative process must be narrowly construed in light of the state constitution's provisions guaranteeing an open initiative process. 39 A.G. Op. 62 (1982).

Convention Notes

Revises 1889 constitution by allowing people to vote on any act of the legislature except appropriations and by requiring referendum petitions to be signed by 5% of the electors in 1/3 of the legislative districts instead of 8% of the electors in 2/5 of the counties. (1889 Constitution does not allow referendums on laws "necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, or safety.")

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

Repeal of City Resolution Via Referendum Invalid: Plaintiffs challenged a referendum approved by voters in the city of Whitefish, which repealed a city resolution that authorized the city to enter into an interlocal agreement with the county concerning planning and zoning authority over a 2-mile area around the city, arguing that the resolution was not subject to the right of voter initiative and referendum. The District Court determined that the resolution was an administrative act by the city and was therefore not subject to repeal by referendum. On appeal, the Supreme Court applied the guidelines adopted in Whitehall v. Preece, 1998 MT 53, 288 Mont. 55, 956 P.2d 743, to determine whether the action by the city was administrative or legislative in nature and affirmed, concluding that the city's action had significant administrative characteristics, which made it not subject to repeal by referendum. Phillips v. Whitefish, 2014 MT 186, 375 Mont. 456, 330 P.3d 442.

Referendum — Issues Addressed Prior to Election Ballot — Justiciable Controversy: Legislative Referendum 123 (LR-123) was enacted by the Legislature in 2011 and was set to appear on the November 2012 general election ballot. The plaintiffs challenged the constitutionality of the referendum before it appeared on the ballot, and the Secretary of State claimed the challenge was not ripe and justiciable. The Supreme Court determined the constitutional issues could be raised and that a present case or controversy existed. In determining that the case could go forward, the Supreme Court reasoned that ripeness has both a constitutional dimension based on the case or controversy requirement and a prudential dimension that weighs the fitness of the issues for judicial decision and the hardship to the parties of withholding a decision. The issues were definite and concrete, and given the time and money involved, there was no prudential reason for allowing the election on LR-123 to proceed prior to addressing the constitutional issues. MEA-MFT v. McCulloch, 2012 MT 211, 366 Mont. 266, 291 P.3d 1075.

Preelection Challenge to Legislative Referendum — Constitutional Amendments by Statutory Referendum — Justiciable Where Proposed Law Facially Defective: The Legislature passed a bill to put a referendum on the ballot to change elections for Supreme Court justices from statewide to regional. Prior to the election, citizens from each of the seven proposed regions filed an action against the Secretary of State, seeking a declaratory judgment that the proposed referendum was unconstitutional as well as an injunction to bar the Secretary of State from putting the measure on the ballot. The District Court granted the plaintiffs summary judgment and the state appealed. The Supreme Court agreed with the District Court that the matter was justiciable even though the voters had not yet passed the referendum. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court concluded that preelection consideration of the appeal was appropriate because the proposed law was facially unconstitutional. The measure sought to amend the Montana Constitution by means of a statutory referendum, in clear violation of constitutional provisions. Therefore, the Supreme Court agreed the matter was justiciable and affirmed the District Court's granting of summary judgment. Reichert v. St., 2012 MT 111, 365 Mont. 92, 278 P.3d 455.

Guidelines for Distinguishing Between Legislative and Administrative Acts of Local Government — Initiative and Referendum Power Reserved for Legislative Acts Only: Beginning with Billings v. Nore, 148 M 96, 417 P2d 458 (1966), the Supreme Court recognized a distinction between legislative acts, which are subject to the powers of initiative and referendum, and administrative or quasi-judicial acts, which are not. Because local governments are empowered by Art. XI, sec. 4, Mont. Const., to exercise legislative, administrative, and other powers, the question arose as to whether 7-5-131 unconstitutionally limits local government referendum power to resolutions and ordinances within the legislative jurisdiction. In order to clarify the distinction between legislative and administrative acts of a local government, the Supreme Court adopted the following guidelines in Wichita v. Kans. Taxpayers Network, 874 P2d 667 (Kans. 1994): (1) An ordinance that makes new law is legislative, while an ordinance that executes an existing law is administrative. Permanency and generality are key features of a legislative ordinance. (2) Acts that declare public purpose and provide ways and means to accomplish that purpose generally may be classified as legislative. Acts that deal with a small segment of an overall policy question generally are administrative. (3) Decisions that require specialized training and experience in municipal government and intimate knowledge of the fiscal and other affairs of a city in order to make a rational choice may properly be characterized as administrative, even though they may also be said to involve the establishment of a policy. (4) No act of a governing body is likely to be solely administrative or legislative, and the operation of the initiative and referendum statute is restricted to measures that are quite clearly and fully legislative and not principally executive or administrative. In the present case, an ordinance that implemented the use of water meters as part of a town's water system improvement plan was an administrative act that was not subject to referendum. The District Court properly declared a referendum challenging the ordinance invalid. The Supreme Court affirmed the constitutionality of 7-5-131. Whitehall v. Preece, 1998 MT 53, 288 M 55, 956 P2d 743, 55 St. Rep. 219 (1998), followed in Phillips v. Whitefish, 2014 MT 186, 375 Mont. 456, 330 P.3d 442, and overruling Chouteau County v. Grossman, 172 M 373, 563 P2d 1125 (1977), and Dieruf v. Bozeman, 173 M 447, 568 P2d 127 (1977), to the extent that those decisions stand for the rule that a local government's act is administrative based solely on a statutory grant of authority.

Suspension of Income Tax Law Pending Vote of the People Not Violation of Equal Protection: An increase in the state income tax passed by the Legislature was referred to the people, and its effect was suspended by petition pending that vote. Nicholson filed suit, arguing that the suspension of the law caused by the petition of a minority of voters vetoed the will of the majority, acting through their Legislature, in passing the income tax increase. The Supreme Court held that in adopting the constitutional provision providing for petition, referendum, and suspension, the majority had granted the minority the powers complained of and that in any event, the majority would have its opportunity to vote upon the tax increase at the referendum election. There was therefore no violation of the equal protection provisions of the constitution. Nicholson v. Cooney, 265 M 406, 877 P2d 486, 51 St. Rep. 579 (1994).

Tax Increase Not Appropriation of Money — Tax Increase Subject to Referendum: Natelson collected enough petition signatures on an income tax increase passed by the Legislature to suspend the increase and refer it to the people for a vote. Nicholson filed suit, claiming that the income tax increase was so inextricably tied to appropriation of the money raised by the tax as to constitute an appropriation itself, which is excepted from the referendum power of the people. Citing St. v. Dixon, 59 M 58, 195 P 841 (1921), the Supreme Court held that the income tax increase did not fit the definition of an appropriation. The Supreme Court also noted that the increase was purely revenue raising in nature, contained no provisions for expenditures, and was offered, debated, and voted upon separate from appropriation bills. Nicholson v. Cooney, 265 M 406, 877 P2d 486, 51 St. Rep. 579 (1994).

Governor's Signature Not Required on Legislative Referendum: As used in the Montana Constitution, the term "referendum measures" means both legislative and initiative referendums. The plain language of Art. VI, sec. 10, Mont. Const., and this section makes it clear that legislation calling for a referendum measure is not required to be signed by the Governor. State ex rel. Gould v. Cooney, 253 M 90, 831 P2d 593, 49 St. Rep. 410 (1992).

Referendum Measure Redirecting Coal Trust Fund Not Appropriation: A legislative referendum that redirected coal severance taxes from the permanent trust to a treasure state endowment trust was not on its face an appropriation of money subject to the provisions of this section, which prohibits the submission of an appropriation measure to electors as a ballot issue. State ex rel. Gould v. Cooney, 253 M 90, 831 P2d 593, 49 St. Rep. 410 (1992).

Validity of Voter Referendum — Paving of County Road: A proposed resolution for voter referendum to prevent the use of funds and acceptance of bids by the Board of County Commissioners to pave a county road was not subject to referendum since it concerned an administrative rather than legislative function. Chouteau County v. Grossman, 172 M 373, 563 P2d 1125 (1977).

Referendum of Ratification of Amendment of Federal Constitution: Submission of referendum to voters seeking their approval or rejection of the completed ratification by the Montana Legislative Assembly of the Equal Rights Amendment to the United States Constitution was enjoined as a useless act since the voters' approval or rejection would not affect the ratification. State ex rel. Hatch v. Murray, 165 M 90, 526 P2d 1369 (1974).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Referendum — Not Applicable to Appropriation: Article V, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., provided that the initiative and referendum powers reserved to the people did not extend to the appropriations of money, hence Referendum Measure No. 47, Ch. 217, L. 1943 (omitted), which required that the entire act should be submitted at an election, containing among other matters an appropriation of $50,000 for expenses of such election, could not constitutionally be submitted to the people for approval or rejection and injunction from holding election granted. Burgan & Walker, Inc. v. St. Highway Comm'n, 114 M 459, 137 P2d 663 (1943).

Statutes Take Effect, When, and Remain in Effect Until When: Under 1-2-201, every statute, unless a definite time is prescribed therein, takes effect on July 1 (now amended to be October 1) of the year of passage and approval and remains in full force and effect during the interim in which the referendum clause of the Constitution may be resorted to by the people and the date of the subsequent election, unless it shall become "inoperative" by reason of the signing of a petition for referendum by 15% of the legal voters of a majority of the whole number of counties of the state; hence bonds sold under an operative law in full force and effect would be valid. Lodge v. Ayers, 108 M 527, 91 P2d 691 (1939).

Act Held Not Making Appropriation Within Meaning of This Provision: Title 16, ch. 3 and 4, known as the liquor control act, allocating license fees 50% to public school fund and 50% to public welfare fund is not an act relating to appropriations of public money and therefore not exempt from referendum, an "allocation" or apportionment to certain funds not doing away with the necessity of making an appropriation by legislative authority. State ex rel. Haynes v. District Court, 106 M 470, 78 P2d 937 (1938).

"Immediate Preservation of the Public": Under Art. V, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., which provided that certain laws were not subject to a referendum, the Legislature's words regarding whether or not an enactment is an emergency enactment are facts, but the ultimate determination was for the courts. State ex rel. Haynes v. District Court, 106 M 470, 78 P2d 937 (1938).

Moot Questions — Suit Testing Constitutionality of Act Defeated on Referendum: An action attacking the constitutionality of the state insurance act (sections 173.2 through 173.20, R.C.M. 1935, repealed) defeated on referendum at the general election held on November 3, 1936, with the result that all contracts issued under the act became terminated, judgment of dismissal affirmed, for the reason that naught but moot questions remained for decision of which the Supreme Court does not take cognizance. Thomas v. St. Bd. of Examiners, 106 M 120, 75 P2d 789 (1938).

Interim Referred Act in Full Force: The state insurance act (sections 173.2 through 173.20, R.C.M. 1935, repealed) was in full force and effect during the interim, allowing the people to act between its operative date as declared in the act itself and the date of the declaration of the result of the election, at which time it becomes ineffective from the beginning, not by repeal but for lack of approval of a constitutional branch of the legislative department. The entire process of the referendum is legislative in character. Fitzpatrick v. St. Bd. of Examiners, 105 M 234, 70 P2d 285 (1937).

Emergency — Fact Determination for Court: The question whether an act passed as an emergency measure falls within the exception found in Art. V, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., wherein the people reserve to themselves the right to approve or reject on referendum an act passed by the Legislature except as to laws necessary for "the immediate preservation of the public peace, health or safety"—i.e., matters arising out of some unforeseen menace, accident, sudden emergency, extraordinary occurrence, or unprecedented climatic conditions—is one of fact for the court's determination, and in determining it, the court may look to the act, the history of the legislation, contemporaneous declarations of the Legislature, and the evil to be remedied, and in case of doubt the question should be resolved in favor of the people. State ex rel. Veeder v. St. Bd. of Educ., 97 M 121, 33 P2d 516 (1934).

Signatures for Referendum: Under the amendment to Art. V, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., a petition for referendum to be effective must be signed by 5% of all the legal voters of the state, and each of the two-fifths of all the counties must furnish as signers 5% of the legal voters of that county; if then the whole number from those counties does not make the required 5%, the petition may be rendered effective by a sufficient number of signers from other counties to supply the deficiency. State ex rel. Gleason v. Stewart, 57 M 397, 188 P 904 (1920).

"Emergency" Defined: Held, that the exception embodied in Art. V, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., i.e., that acts necessary for the immediate preservation of the public health, peace, or safety shall not be subject to the referendum, was not intended to extend further than to matters arising out of some unforeseen menace, public calamity, accident, sudden emergency, extraordinary occurrence, or unprecedented climatic condition rendering immediate action imperative to prevent serious or irreparable injury to the public. State ex rel. Goodman v. Stewart, 57 M 144, 187 P 641 (1920).

Referendum Amendment to the Constitution: By force of the referendum amendment to the Constitution, a referable act does not become finally effective until the people have exercised their reserved power, either by declining to refer it or by approving or disapproving it at the polls. State ex rel. Esgar v. District Court, 56 M 464, 185 P 157 (1919).

Referendum — Nature and Effect: The referendum, while in political effect a veto, is not such in the sense in which that term is used in our Constitution and is not an invasion of the executive function. Under it the people proceed toward bills enacted by the Assembly, expressing assent or dissent, in essentially the same manner as the Senate upon a bill which has passed the House; they are an additional body through which acts of the Legislature must pass in certain cases, and disapproval, when it occurs, is purely legislative. State ex rel. Esgar v. District Court, 56 M 464, 185 P 157 (1919); State ex rel. Hay v. Alderson, 49 M 387, 142 P 210 (1914).

Attorney General's Opinions

Applicability of Referendum Containing Retroactive Effective Date: Unless a law that has been suspended by referendum contains a specific effective date, upon approval by the voters, the law becomes effective upon completion of the canvass of the election results, as provided in 13-27-105. However, when a law that has been suspended by referendum contains a retroactive effective date, approval of the law by the voters also includes approval of its retroactive applicability. 45 A.G. Op. 20 (1993).

Legislative Power to Enact New Laws or Repeal Suspended Laws Dealing With Subject Matter of Pending Referendum: The Legislature may enact laws dealing with the subject matter encompassed in a referendum that is subject to a pending election, but the enactment may not change the text of the measure that will be put to a public vote, nor will any enactments in this area affect the necessity of holding the referendum election. However, the Legislature does not have the power to repeal a law that is suspended by referendum petition. Because the law is suspended pending further legislative action through the referendum process, it is not an effective statute and may not be repealed until the people have given it their approval. Once approved, the Legislature retains its power to maintain the law's effectiveness through amendment or repeal. 45 A.G. Op. 20 (1993).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

"Special Election" as Used Herein Defined: Held, that the provision of Art. V, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., as amended in 1905, that "all elections on measures referred to the people" shall be at the biennial regular election, except when the Legislature shall order a special election, by the use of the words "special election" means a special general election, i.e., a statewide election. State ex rel. Diederichs v. St. Highway Comm'n, 89 M 205, 296 P 1033 (1931).

Time of Election: There is not any repugnancy between the provision of Art. V, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., which requires referred measures to be voted upon at biennial general elections, and the provisions of section 2041, R.C.M. 1907 (since repealed), which forbid a local option election to be held in any month in which a general election is held. They deal with different subjects, and each is controlling in its appointed sphere. State ex rel. Eagye v. Bawden, 51 M 357, 152 P 761 (1915).

Attorney General's Opinions

Power of Legislature to Adopt Date of Special Election on Initiative Referendum: The date of a referendum election is not essential to the efficacy of the referendum power, nor is the ability of the people to exercise the referendum power impaired by the fact that the people have returned to the Legislature the power to order a referendum election at a time other than a biennial general election. Therefore, the Legislature may order a statewide special election on an initiative referendum at a time other than a biennial general election if the issue is submitted at an election in which all qualified electors may vote and all statutory requirements for a special election are met. 45 A.G. Op. 18 (1993).

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

"Poker All Keno" Not Authorized by Card Games Law: A gambling game using 52 balls marked with playing card symbols that were mixed and drawn in the same manner as keno but paid off by the house based upon hands of various types of poker is not authorized under the card games law at Title 23, ch. 5, part 3, which was enacted pursuant to this section, because it is a "banking" type of game; the players vied against the house rather than against each other. Goott v. St., 193 M 108, 630 P2d 232, 38 St. Rep. 1037 (1981).

Groups Empowered to Legalize Gambling: The term "the people", as used in Art. III, sec. 9, Mont. Const., is synonymous with the voters of the entire state of Montana and not the voters of a local government unit. Therefore, the Legislature or "the people" of the entire state are the only two groups empowered to legalize forms of gambling in this state. Anaconda-Deer Lodge County v. Lorello, 181 M 195, 592 P2d 1381 (1979).

Effect on Prior Laws: Article III, sec. 9, Mont. Const., did not revive or make constitutional any gambling laws which had been held invalid under 1889 Constitution but merely provided that people or Legislature could legalize gambling by some affirmative act after effective date of new Constitution. State ex rel. Woodahl v. District Court, 162 M 283, 511 P2d 318 (1973), distinguished in State ex rel. Woodahl v. Straub, 164 M 141, 520 P2d 776 (1974).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Initiative Lottery Measure Unconstitutional: The provisions of Art. XIX, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const., were both mandatory and prohibitory. Proposed initiative that would have legalized lotteries was unconstitutional. State ex rel. Steen v. Murray, 144 M 61, 394 P2d 761 (1964).

Purpose — Statutory Interpretation: The framers of the Constitution were seeking to suppress and restrain the spirit of gambling, which is cultivated and stimulated by schemes whereby one is induced to hazard his earnings with the hope of large winnings. The statutes that define and prohibit lotteries must therefore be interpreted with this purpose in mind. St. v. Cox, 136 M 507, 349 P2d 104 (1960).

Valuable Consideration: When one is required to make an outlay of money in order to participate in a scheme whereby an award is made by chance, the participant pays valuable consideration for the chance to participate, notwithstanding the fact he may also receive merchandise at the same time that the outlay is made. St. v. Cox, 136 M 507, 349 P2d 104 (1960), distinguished in State ex rel. Stafford v. Fox Theatre Corp., 114 M 52, 132 P2d 689 (1942).

Lottery: Laws were unconstitutional as an attempt to authorize lotteries. St. v. Tursich, 127 M 504, 267 P2d 641 (1954).

Trade Stimulators: Sections (now repealed) authorizing and licensing trade stimulators such as punchboards were violative of this provision. State ex rel. Harrison v. Deniff, 126 M 109, 245 P2d 140 (1952).

Standing: Question whether a law authorizing the licensing of slot machines was in violation of Art. XIX, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const., could not be raised by a "citizen and taxpayer" in an action under the declaratory judgment act. Chovanak v. Matthews, 120 M 520, 188 P2d 582 (1948).

Nature of Provisions: While the first part of Art. XIX, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const., prohibiting legislative authorization of lotteries or gift enterprises is self-executing, the second part, commanding the enactment of laws, is not self-executing but requires legislative action to make it operative. State ex rel. Stafford v. Fox Theatre Corp., 114 M 52, 132 P2d 689 (1942).

Theater "Bank Night" Held Lottery: When part of theater admissions was used by proprietor to make up cash fund from which prizes were awarded to patrons whose numbers were drawn, there was consideration to the proprietor and the system constituted a lottery prohibited by Art.

XIX, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Dussault v. Fox Theatre Corp., 110 M 441, 101 P2d 1065 (1940), overruled in Stafford v. Fox Theatre Corp., 114 M 52, 132 P2d 689 (1942).

Attorney General's Opinions

Historical Horseracing Not Authorized, Unlike Live or Simulcast Horseracing: Although Montana law expressly authorizes parimutuel wagering on the part of "live" and "simulcast" horseracing occurring in real time, it does not authorize historical horseracing, which are those races that have already taken place and that are later broadcast. Because historical horseracing is not expressly authorized under Montana law, it is prohibited. 57 A.G. Op. 2 (2017).

Exemptions for Montana Citizens Unconstitutional: The exemption provided in subsections (2) and (5)(b)(i) of 5-7-102 from Initiative 85 for Montana citizens is constitutionally impermissible under the Privileges and Immunities Clause of the United States Constitution. There is no basis for creating an exception solely for individual Montana citizens. Citizens of other states may have an interest in some official action in Montana that warrants their efforts to influence the outcome of that action in Montana. The word "Montana" is void and without effect in both sections. Mont. Auto. Ass'n v. Greely, 193 M 378, 632 P2d 300, 38 St. Rep. 1174 (1981).

Incarcerated Felons Excluded From Suffrage: The provisions of Montana's Constitution excluding incarcerated felons from suffrage are constitutionally permissible under the Equal Protection Clause, both in the federal and state constitutional versions. Further, 13-1-111, defining the qualifications of electors, also passes constitutional muster. Emery v. St., 177 M 73, 580 P2d 445 (1978).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Debt or Liability — Provision Not Confined to Ad Valorem Funding: Since the U.S. Supreme Court held invalid the provisions of Art. IX, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const., restricting to taxpayers the right to vote on measures creating a debt or liability, there is no longer any reason to limit the requirement for approval by the voters to debts to be retired from ad valorem taxes. Therefore, measures authorizing the issuance of bonds secured by the pledge of portions of the constitutional sources of revenue, including income tax, corporation license tax, cigarette tax, and gasoline distributors' license tax, at least create liabilities within the meaning of Art. IX, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const., and are invalid unless approved by the electors. State ex rel. Ward v. Anderson, 158 M 279, 491 P2d 868 (1971), distinguishing Cottingham v. St. Bd. of Examiners, 134 M 1, 328 P2d 907 (1958).

Taxpayer Requirement Invalid: That portion of Art. IX, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const., that restricts the franchise in certain elections to taxpayers violates the Equal Protection Clause of the United States Constitution and is invalid. State ex rel. Ward v. Anderson, 158 M 279, 491 P2d 868 (1971).

Racial Discrimination Prohibited: Congress is empowered, as it did in the Voting Rights Act Amendments of 1970, 42 U.S.C. § 1973aa-1, to prohibit use of literacy tests or other devices used to discriminate against voters on account of their race in all state and national elections. Oreg. v. Mitchell, 400 US 112, 27 L Ed 2d 272, 91 S Ct 260 (1970).

Residence: As it did in the Voting Rights Act Amendments of 1970, 42 U.S.C. § 1973aa-1, Congress can prohibit states from disqualifying voters in elections for presidential and vice-presidential electors because they have not met state residency requirements and can set residency requirements and provide for absentee balloting in presidential and vice-presidential elections. Oreg. v. Mitchell, 400 US 112, 27 L Ed 2d 272, 91 S Ct 260 (1970).

Debt or Liability Provision Confined to Ad Valorem Funding: Article IX, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const., in adding the property holding qualification to voting on debts or liabilities, confined the additional qualification to only those debts or liabilities that look to ad valorem taxes for their retirement. Cottingham v. St. Bd. of Examiners, 134 M 1, 328 P2d 907 (1958), distinguished in State ex rel. Ward v. Anderson, 158 M 279, 491 P2d 868 (1971).

Electors in School Election: The fact that some electors in school bond elections pay taxes only on personal property does not disqualify them from voting at the election, for the names of such electors appear on the assessment roll the same as do those of the electors who pay taxes on real estate. Habel v. School District, 129 M 588, 292 P2d 349 (1956).

Objection to Be Raised Before Election: Under Art. IX, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const., and the statutes enacted supplementing it, the objection that a measure created a state debt, levy, or liability and that therefore it should have been placed upon a separate ballot to be voted upon by taxpayers is waived if not raised before the election. State ex rel. Graham v. Bd. of Examiners, 125 M 419, 239 P2d 283 (1952).

Application to Referendum Required by Article XIII, 1889 Constitution: The provisions of Art. IX, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const., relating to the qualifications of voters when the question submitted concerns the creation of a levy, debt, or liability, applied to laws submitted to the people under Art. XIII, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const. Thomas v. Bd. of Examiners, 122 M 564, 207 P2d 553 (1949).

Questions Concerning Creation of Levy, Debt, or Liability: The constitutional provisions for submission of certain measures "to the people" or "to the people of the state" are qualified by the provisions that, if the question submitted concerns the creation of any levy, debt, or liability, the voter in addition to possessing general qualifications must also be a taxpayer. Pioneer Motors, Inc. v. Highway Comm'n, 118 M 333, 165 P2d 796 (1946).

Voting an Affirmative Act — Vote for Deceased Candidate Not Counted as Opposed to Write-In: The casting of a ballot at an election of public officers is an affirmative rather than a negative act. If it is the purpose of voters to defeat a certain candidate, that purpose can be accomplished only by voting for some person in opposition to him and not by voting for a person who died some weeks before election with the expectation that the vote cast for him would be counted as opposed to the person sought to be defeated. One who has died is no longer a person for whom, under Art. IX, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const., a voter may cast his ballot. State ex rel. Wolff v. Guerkink, 111 M 417, 109 P2d 1094 (1941).

When Objections to Electors' Qualifications Too Late: Under Art. IX, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const., which required that persons voting on a question under initiative and referendum concerning the creation of a public debt or liability must be taxpayers whose names appeared on the last preceding assessment roll, the point that some were permitted to vote who were not qualified, when raised after the election and where the measure carried by a vote of nearly 4 to 1, held not sufficient to defeat the act. Martin v. Highway Comm'n, 107 M 603, 88 P2d 41 (1939).

Absentee Voters: The absent voters law was a valid enactment and not open to the objection that in permitting a ballot to be delivered to the election officers by mail it violated the state Constitution. The contention that the section, by providing that an elector shall have resided in the state 1 year immediately preceding the election "at which he offers to vote", impliedly requires his personal presence at the polls was not tenable. Goodell v. Judith Basin County, 70 M 222, 224 P 1110 (1924).

Ownership of Property: In the absence of any property test for voters, a person who possesses the qualifications enumerated in this section and who is duly registered is entitled to vote without reference to his property holdings. State ex rel. Eagye v. Bawden, 51 M 357, 152 P 761 (1915).

"Qualified Elector": Except when otherwise indicated, the term "qualified elector" means a person who possesses the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution as necessary to entitle him to vote. It does not mean simply a registered voter. State ex rel. Lang v. Furnish, 48 M 28, 134 P 297 (1913).

Location of School: A section (since repealed) establishing county free high schools provided that the electors who favored the establishment of such a school were designated as the persons to determine the location of it. This was not a valid objection to its constitutionality as depriving those opposed to such school of the right to vote on the question of its location, contrary to Art. IX, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const. Evers v. Hudson, 36 M 135, 92 P 462 (1907).

Attorney General's Opinions

What Electors Considered Qualified Voters for County Zoning Initiatives: A zoning regulation is subject to citizen initiative, and nothing in county zoning law limits qualified electors to only voters living in the area affected by the zoning regulations. Thus, in the case of county zoning regulation initiatives effective in all unincorporated areas of a county, all county residents are considered qualified voters, including those residing within incorporated areas of the county. 52 A.G. Op. 6 (2008).

Voter Qualifications — Irrigation District Election: In order to vote in an irrigation district election under Title 85, ch. 7, part 17, an individual must be: (1) a landowner in the irrigation district; (2) a citizen of the United States; (3) 18 years of age or older; and (4) a resident of Montana and the county in which he offers to vote for at least 30 days. 42 A.G. Op. 47 (1987).

Election on Annexation of Portions of Yellowstone Park: Eligible residents of the portion of Yellowstone National Park proposed for annexation into Park County under Ch. 447, L. 1977, must be accorded the opportunity to vote on the question of annexation. A majority vote must be attained both among voters registered in Park County and among voters who reside in the area to be annexed in order to ratify the annexation. 37 A.G. Op. 161 (1978).

Eligibility as Trustee — Registered Voter: A person must be registered to vote in the school district to be eligible for the office of school trustee. "Eligibility", as used in 20-3-305, refers to the qualifications required of a school trustee to hold the office, not the qualifications to be elected. 37 A.G. Op. 145 (1978).

Prisoner Voting Rights: No person may vote in the state of Montana while serving a sentence in a penal institution resulting from conviction of a felony. 37 A.G. Op. 125 (1978).

Convention Notes

Revises 1889 constitution. Provides legislative rather than constitutional establishment of requirements which are often affected by (and sometimes in conflict with) federal law and court decisions. When necessary to comply with federal requirements it is much easier to change the law than to amend the constitution. Second sentence specifically authorizes legislature to provide for voter registration at time and place of voting—rather than in advance of election.

Vacancy Based on Corrupt Practices Act: Under Art. IX, sec. 9, 1889 Mont. Registration Not Elector Qualification: Registration is no part of the qualifications of an elector and adds nothing to them; it is merely a method of ascertaining who the qualified electors are in order that abuses of the elective franchise may be guarded against. Laws Requiring Resignation on Candidacy for Other Office: Laws (since repealed) providing that the holder of a public office must tender his resignation upon becoming a candidate for another office did not violate Art. IX, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const., as prescribing qualifications for eligibility to public office in addition to those herein provided or as a limitation upon the right to seek another office. Mulholland v. Ayers, 109 M 558, 99 P2d 234 (1940).

Absence of Legislative Qualifications — Citizenship Required: When the Legislature, in creating an elective office, prescribes no limitations or qualifications, the right to hold it is an implied attribute of citizenship and is presumed to be coextensive with that of voting for that office. State ex rel. Shea v. Cocking, 66 M 169, 213 P 594 (1923).

Sex as Qualification for Office: By the adoption of the suffrage amendment to the Constitution, the sex attribute as a qualification to hold office was eliminated, and the use of the word "male" in a statute prescribing a qualification for office is of no effect. Rose v. Sullivan, 56 M 480, 185 P 562 (1919).

Superintendent of Schools: The Constitution prescribes no other qualifications for a County Superintendent of Schools than those provided for in Art. IX, sec. 10 and 11, 1889 Mont. Const.; that is, the person must be either a woman or a person qualified to vote at general elections and for state officers in this state. State ex rel. Chenoweth v. Where Deceased Candidate Received Majority of Votes — Highest Write-In Candidate Held Elected: Where a candidate for reelection to a county office died 24 days before election, his death known generally to electors, but his name placed on ballot and majority voted for him supposing to retain his widow, appointed to fill the vacancy, until the next general election, a write-in candidate whom they intended to defeat, receiving the highest vote cast for any living person, held, on his application for Writ of Mandate to compel the county canvassing board to reconvene and cause certificate of election issued to him, that write-in candidate was elected and entitled to the office. State ex rel. Wolff v. Guerkink, 111 M 417, 109 P2d 1094 (1941).

Election Contest — Ouster: If section 94-1468, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), permits a candidate who did not receive the highest number of legal votes to be declared elected upon a judgment of ouster in a contest proceeding, it is void as in contravention of Art. Attorney General's Opinions

Judicial Decision Invalidating Constitutional Amendments — Constitutional Language and Statutory Implementation Language Restored: In 2002, Montana voters approved Constitutional Amendment Nos. 37 and 38, along with statutory implementing provisions, to modify county distribution requirements for signatures to qualify an initiative petition for the ballot. In Mont. PIRG v. Johnson, CV 03-183-M-DWM (D.C. Mont. 2005), a federal District Court held that the amended distribution requirements resulted in an unequal treatment of qualified electors in different counties and were unconstitutional on their face and invalid. The Attorney General cited State ex rel. Woodahl v. District Court, 162 M 283, 511 P2d 318 (1973), in concluding that the nullification of the constitutional amendments by the judicial decision invalidating the county distribution requirements restored the language of the constitution and implementing statutes as they existed before the approval of the invalid amendments. 51 A.G. Case Notes

Nonjusticiable Ballot Measure Controversy Dismissed: Proponents for a 2006 ballot measure petitioned the Supreme Court to reverse the District Court's invalidation of the legal sufficiency of the ballot measure to allow the measure to be placed on the ballot. However, the Supreme Court previously held in Montanans for Justice: Vote No on CI-98 v. St., 2006 MT 277, 334 M 237, 146 P3d 759 (2006), that the ballot measure was invalid and that no votes for the measure would be counted. Lacking jurisdiction over nonjusticiable matters, the Supreme Court may raise questions of justiciability sua sponte, but moot questions and advisory opinions are among matters that exceed the court's jurisdiction. A question becomes moot when effective relief can no longer be granted, and a justiciable controversy is one upon which the judgment of the court may effectively operate. In this case, even if the Supreme Court determined that the District Court erred when it overruled the Attorney General's determination of legal sufficiency, votes for the initiative could not be counted because the Secretary of State's certification of the ballot measure was invalidated in Montanans for Justice. Additionally, the decision in Montanans for Justice ensured that any judgment in the present case would have no effect on the rights of the parties, so this appeal was reduced to a request for an advisory opinion that exceeded the court's jurisdiction. Thus, this nonjusticiable appeal was dismissed. Not in Montana: Citizens Against CI-97 v. St., 2006 MT 278, 334 M 265, 147 P3d 174 (2006).

Expedited Hearing on Validity of Ballot Measure Not Violative of Procedural Due Process: Opponents to a ballot measure timely filed a challenge, and the District Court expedited the hearing and denied the proponents additional time for discovery. On appeal, the proponents asserted that their due process rights were violated by the District Court's actions. The Supreme Court disagreed. The requirements for a procedural due process claim are notice and opportunity for a hearing appropriate to the nature of the case. The proponents could not claim lack of notice because: (1) the opponents' complaint was sufficiently specific to put the proponents on notice that the opponents contested the validity of addresses listed by paid signature gatherers; (2) the proponents acknowledged that the Secretary of State notified them during the signature gathering process that complaints had been received related to address falsification; and (3) denial of additional time for discovery regarding address falsification did not prejudice the proponents because the signature gatherers were contacted, hired, and paid by the proponents, so any information regarding the true addresses was within the exclusive knowledge of the proponents. The due process claim of lack of a meaningful hearing was also denied by the Supreme Court. The record showed that the proponents failed to use the time allocated for discovery or to avail themselves of available procedural remedies. The proponents did not answer the opponents' complaint, request any discovery, move for a continuance, take any depositions, file a pretrial brief, attend depositions conducted by the opponents, file proposed findings of fact or conclusions of law, or object to the District Court's proposed expedited schedule. Thus, any deprivation of a meaningful hearing was more a construct of the proponents' own failure to act than it was a function of the District Court's denial of more time for trial preparation. The proponents' due process claim failed. Montanans for Justice: Vote No on CI-98 v. St., 2006 MT 277, 334 M 237, 146 P3d 759 (2006), distinguishing Wilson v. Dept. of Public Service Regulation, 260 M 167, 858 P2d 368 (1993).

Initiative Amendment Void — Material Language Difference — Improper Publication Procedures: In a decision that resulted in the enactment of this section, the Supreme Court held that the language of an amendment to Art. II, sec. 16, Mont. Const., as filed and certified by the Secretary of State, was not the same language submitted to the voters at the election. Because the difference in language was material and because publication of the proposed initiative prior to election did not follow constitutional mandates, the purported amendment was held to be void. State ex rel. Mont. Citizens for the Preservation of Citizens' Rights v. Waltermire, 227 M 85, 738 P2d 1255, 44 St. Rep. 913 (1987). Petitions for rehearing, reconsideration, and clarification denied, 44 St. Rep. 929A (1987).

Case Notes

Challenge to Term Limits Barred by Doctrine of Laches: Constitutional Initiative No. 64, which in 1992 enacted term limits for various elective offices, was challenged in 2002 on several grounds by two state senators whose terms were affected by the limits. The Supreme Court did not address the merits of the claims because it held that they were barred by the doctrine of laches. Laches is a concept of equity that can apply when a person is negligent in asserting a right, and exists when there has been an unexplainable delay of such duration or character as to render the enforcement of an asserted right inequitable. Laches is appropriate when a party is actually or presumptively aware of the party's rights, but fails to act. In order to apply laches, a showing must be made that the passage of time has prejudiced the party asserting laches or has rendered the enforcement of a right inequitable. To allow plaintiffs' challenge 9 years after the enactment of the initiative would prejudice those who relied on its presumptive validity, and raise a question of the inequity of permitting the claim to be enforced. The court noted that voters still retain the right to repeal the term limits provision, by initiative or through legislative referendum, but that the point had been reached at which a claim asserting that voters failed to follow the proper procedures in enacting the constitutional initiative was simply too late. Cole v. State ex rel. Brown, 2002 MT 32, 308 M 265, 42 P3d 760 (2002), followed in Phillips v. Whitefish, 2014 MT 186, 375 Mont. 456, 330 P.3d 442, in which the Supreme Court concluded that filing a lawsuit challenging a referendum 4 days after the referendum passed did not warrant dismissal based on laches when no demonstration of prejudice or inequity was made, aside from the ordinary cost of the election process.

Congressional Limits Illegal: Article I, sec. 5, clause 1, U.S. Const., prohibits states from imposing congressional qualifications additional to those specifically enumerated in its text. State imposition of term limits for congressional service would effect such a fundamental change in constitutional framework that it must be passed under the procedure set forth in Art. V, U.S. Const. U.S. Term Limits, Inc. v. Thornton, 514 US 779 (1995).

Attorney General's Opinions

Applicability of Constitutional Term Limits to Senate Terms — Initiative Applicability Clause Prevailing: In situations in which application of subsection (2) of this section and the applicability clause of Constitutional Initiative No. 64 could produce conflicting results, the latter prevails. Therefore, for a state Senator serving a term of office beginning in January 1991, the term limit calculation did not apply until that Senator was elected to or otherwise began serving in a term beginning during or after January 1993, as stated in the applicability clause of Constitutional Initiative No. 64. For a state Senator who served continuously since January 1991, this means that the term first counted for purposes of the term limits found in this section is the term that began in January 1995. 47 A.G. Op. 9 (1997).

Applicability of Term Limit Provisions to Appointed Senators — Definitions: Regarding the status of state Senators appointed upon the death or resignation of the incumbent to fill an unexpired term of office that began in 1991, the word "terms" refers to time served in terms beginning or ending before or after January 1993. The word does not refer to a particular date and does not simply exclude or include years prior to the date, but rather includes time by reference to the beginning or ending date of a term of office. Further, the word "year" does not refer strictly to a calendar year of 12 months when used in the context of legislative terms of office because a term does not necessarily begin on the first day of a calendar year. Applying the word "year" in such a strict manner would lead to an unintended, absurd result. A term of office for a state Senator is 4 years beginning on the first Monday in January in the year following the general election. If a Senator accedes to office by appointment or election, that Senator serves to complete the term of the person originally elected. Thus, for a Senator continually serving from the date of appointment or election to fill the unexpired portion of a term that began when the original incumbent took office in 1991, the first term of office counted toward the term limit is the term beginning in January 1995. 47 A.G. Op. 9 (1997).

Officeholder Who Sits Out Two Terms Before Running Again — Bar on Candidate Who Served Eight or More Years: Although one reading of this section could produce the conclusion that the intention is to limit a former officeholder to 8 years of service in any 16-year period and that at the conclusion of the 8-year period the former officeholder would be free to serve in that office again, by its terms, this section does not prevent a person from serving more than 8 years. Rather, it operates to prevent a person from becoming a candidate for an office if, at the conclusion of the term of office in which the person seeks to become a candidate, the person served 8 years in the previous 16-year period, effectively barring the candidate's election for longer than 16 years. 47 A.G. Op. 9 (1997), superseded by 54 A.G. Op. 4 (2012), holding that pursuant to 13-10-201, the phrase "current term" used in Art. IV, sec. 8, Mont. Const., means the term served after regular election to a full term of office. Under this definition, a candidate may file for office if, at the time the candidate begins to serve in, rather than file for, that office, the candidate will have had an 8-year break in service over a 16-year period.

24/7 Sobriety and Drug Monitoring Program Testing Fee — Permissible Delegation of Legislative Authority: The District Court held that 44-4-1204 of the Montana 24/7 Sobriety and Drug Monitoring Program Act unconstitutionally delegated legislative power to the executive branch because it lacked any objective criteria to guide the Attorney General in imposing fees, other than requiring that the fees be reasonable. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, concluding that 44-4-1204 is a permissible delegation of legislative authority because the section limits fees to reasonable amounts necessary to pay for the administration of the program and does not give the Attorney General unfettered discretion when implementing fees. St. v. Spady, 2015 MT 218, 380 Mont. 179, 354 P.3d 590.

Legislative Employee's Fiscal Assumptions Cannot Trigger Tax Credits — Unlawful Delegation of Power — Invasion of Executive Branch Power Impermissible: Legislative Referendum 123 (LR-123) provided a potential tax credit, tax refund, or payment to individuals when a certain level of surplus revenue was in the state treasury at the close of the fiscal year. As part of the process of determining whether there was surplus revenue, the Legislative Fiscal Analyst (LFA) was required to perform two dozen steps or calculations, including discretionary projections of balances, revenues, transfers, appropriations, and reversions. The Supreme Court held that the delegation of authority to the LFA violated Article V, section 1, of the Montana Constitution as an unlawful delegation of legislative power, similar to the unlawful delegation of authority to a legislative interim committee in State ex rel. Judge v. Legislative Fin. Comm., 168 Mont. 470, 543 P.2d 1317 (1975). Moreover, the requirement that the LFA exercise judgment and interpretations regarding the law violated the separation of powers under Article III, section 1, of the Montana Constitution, since these are Executive Branch functions. MEA-MFT v. McCulloch, 2012 MT 211, 366 Mont. 266, 291 P.3d 1075.

School Territory Transfer Statutes Unconstitutional — Insufficient Guidelines for Delegation of Legislative Authority: In 1994, the respondents, individuals residing in both Rosebud and Big Horn Counties but outside of the Northern Cheyenne Indian Reservation, petitioned their respective County Superintendents of Schools requesting a territory transfer from the Lame Deer High School District (LDHSD—created in 1993) back to the Colstrip and Hardin High School Districts. The requests were granted. LDHSD appealed the decisions to the State Superintendent of Public Instruction, who reversed the decisions. The respective District Courts reversed the Superintendent of Public Instruction's decision. The Supreme Court reversed the District Courts' decisions on the grounds that the school territory transfer statute is an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power. The broad grant of discretion to a County Superintendent of Schools, unchecked by any standard, policy, or rule of decision, renders the statute unconstitutional. Hayes v. Lame Deer High School District, 2000 MT 342, 303 M 204, 15 P3d 447, 57 St. Rep. 1464 (2000). See also Belgrade Elementary & High School District No. 44 v. Seed Capital Bond Act Unconstitutional Delegation of Administrative Authority — Adoption of Rules No Cure of Defects: The Science and Technology Development Board Seed Capital Bond Act (Ch. 461, L. 1987, codified in large part as Title 90, ch. 3, part 4, now repealed) was declared unconstitutional under this section on the following grounds: (1) failure to set forth through legislatively defined policy, standard, or rule the law under which the Montana Science and Technology Development Board would function; (2) failure to prescribe with reasonable clarity the limits of Board power; and (3) failure to define terms on which technology investments were to be invested. Adoption of rules by the Board controlling investments did not cure defects. The court focused on the authority delegated by the Legislature and whether limits on that authority are clearly prescribed. Constitutional law does not allow for an administrative board to legislate the limits of its own power, which the Board in this case was required to do in order to give some meaning to the vague terms of the bill. Delegation of Legislative Authority — Contingent Authorization Allowed: Plaintiff filed a complaint for declaratory judgment in the Supreme Court seeking to determine the validity of several acts of the Legislature allowing the issuance of state revenue bonds. Plaintiff contended that Ch. 705, L. 1983, granted the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (BNRC) (now abolished) the power and authority to determine the feasibility of various water conservation projects and make recommendations on the projects to the Board of Examiners. Plaintiff contended the delegation was unconstitutional in that it failed to set forth adequate standards or to place limits on the discretion of the BNRC. The court found the standards imposed with reasonable clarity in 85-1-501 and 85-1-502. Under these statutes, the Department of Natural Resources and Conservation (DNRC) is required to study the economic and environmental feasibility of constructing and operating power generating facilities on water projects. Once DNRC has reached its determination, it is the BNRC's duty to determine feasibility and public interest. The court found the legislative enactments complete and sufficiently clear, definite, and certain to enable the agencies to know their respective rights and obligations. The court found that determinations of economic and environmental feasibility are more appropriate in the administrative than the legislative sector. The court found nothing improper in the Legislature's making its authorizations contingent upon administrative decisions properly made in the executive side of state government. Grossman v. St., 209 M 427, 682 P2d 1319, 41 St. Rep. 804 (1984).

Valid Reason for Mandatory Retirement — Legislative, Not Judicial Task: Since compulsory game warden (now game wardens' and peace officers') retirement statute contained no qualifications or justification, it would be in excess of the authority of a court hearing a warden's suit challenging the statute's validity to hold a factfinding hearing to determine whether there was a basis for the age discrimination grounded in the reasonable demands of the position. That is a legislative function; the effort would be great; and the Legislature, not the courts, has the resources for such an undertaking. Taylor v. Dept. of Fish, Wildlife, & Parks, 205 M 85, 666 P2d 1228, 40 St. Rep. 1112 (1983).

Separation of Powers Argument Rejected: The Supreme Court rejected plaintiff's contention that the panel act violates the prohibitions against unlawful delegation of judicial and legislative power and infringes on the doctrine of separation of powers. The decision of the panel is not enforceable, and unlike the panel decisions in most states, it is not even admissible at trial. Consequently, there are no constitutional violations under the Montana act. Linder v. Smith, 193 M 20, 629 P2d 1187, 38 St. Rep. 912 (1981).

Housing Act of 1975: Delegation to the Board of Housing to determine the income level of "persons and families of lower income" does not violate any constitutional prohibitions. It is a clear, definite, and certain direction to the agency that makes clear its rights and obligations. Huber v. Groff, 171 M 442, 558 P2d 1124 (1976).

Budget Information Powers of Legislative Finance Committee: Sections 5-12-302 and 5-12-303 do not impose unconstitutional burden upon state government, since power to approve appropriation bills and budget is in legislative branch, and Committee may require such information from other branches as is reasonably necessary to form rational basis for budget determinations. State ex rel. Judge v. Legislative Fin. Comm., 168 M 470, 543 P2d 1317 (1975).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Reservation of Power: The provision of Art. V, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., reserving to the people the right to refer and to approve or reject an act of the Legislature by their ballot and declaring that in the interim the legislation shall be in full force and effect, means that it is in force and effect, subject to the will of the people, and that upon disapproval of a measure it becomes ineffective from the beginning because it lacks the approval of a constitutional branch of the legislative department, namely, the people. State ex rel. Esgar v. District Court, 56 M 464, 185 P 157 (1919).

Attorney General's Opinions

Gathering Initiative Petition Signatures at Primary Election Polling Places: The orderly gathering of initiative petition signatures at primary election polling places that does not interfere with the election process or obstruct voter access to the polling place may not be prohibited. Any interference with the initiative process must be narrowly construed in light of the state constitution's provisions guaranteeing an open initiative process. 39 A.G. Op. 62 (1982).

Section 2. Size.

Convention Notes

New provision for determining size of legislature.

Delayed Effective Date: Section 2 of the Transition Schedule implementing the 1972 Montana Constitution provided: "Section 2. Delayed effective date. The provisions of sections 1, 2, and 3 of Article V, THE LEGISLATURE, shall not become effective until the date the first redistricting and reapportionment plan becomes law."

By letter of December 4, 1974, the Attorney General certified to the Secretary of State that: "The first redistricting and reapportionment plan was filed with the Secretary of State on February 27, 1974, and pursuant to Section 43-117, Revised Codes of Montana 1947, became law as of that date. Therefore, the provisions of Sections 1, 2 and 3, Article V, Constitution of Montana (1972), are now in effect."

The convention note to section 2 of the Transition Schedule provided: "Sections on size of legislature, election and terms of its members would become effective when the reapportionment plan becomes law. If this is in 1974 then elections would be held in November, 1974 for new members of the legislature to take office January 1, 1975."

1974 Reapportionment Plan: In 1974, the apportionment plan, submitted to the Legislature by the Montana Districting and Apportionment Commission, provided for 100 House districts and 50 Senate districts. Maps showing district makeup and boundaries and a certified copy of the apportionment plan are on file with the Secretary of State. After the plan has been submitted to the Legislature for recommendations and upon its filing, it becomes law.

The 1974 apportionment plan will be revised by a new Commission and submitted to the 1981 or 1983 Legislature.

Attorney General's Opinions

Legislative Determination of Size of Legislative Assembly — Not Controlling: The Commission to Redistrict and Reapportion was not bound by a legislative determination of the size of the Legislative Assembly, and sections 43-106.6 and 43-106.7, R.C.M. 1947 (repealed by sec. 1, Ch. 14, L. 1975), enacted prior to the adoption of the 1972 Montana Constitution, are not controlling. 35 A.G. If this is in 1974 then elections would be held in November, 1974 for new members of the legislature to take office January 1, 1975."

Terms of Legislators During Transition: Section 5 of the Transition Schedule implementing the 1972 Montana Constitution provided: "Section 5. Terms of legislators. (1) The terms of all legislators elected before the effective date of this Constitution shall end on December 31 of the year in which the first redistricting and reapportionment plan becomes law.

(2) The senators first elected under this Constitution shall draw lots to establish a term of two years for one-half of their number."

By letter of March 24, 1977, the Attorney General certified to the Secretary of State that the following provisions of the Transition Schedule have been fully executed: "Section 5. Terms of legislators. Subsection (1) of Section 5 has been fully executed. Under that subsection, the first redistricting and reapportionment plan was filed with the Secretary of State and became effective on February 27, 1974. Therefore, the terms of all legislators elected prior to the effective date of the 1972 Constitution on July 1, 1973, ended on December 31, 1974.

Subsection (2) of Section 5 of the Transition Schedule has been fully executed."

The convention note to section 5 of the Transition Schedule provided: "(1) If the reapportionment and redistricting plan becomes effective after the 1974 legislative session, the terms of legislators serving in that session would end December 31, 1974. (2) Section 3, Article V provides that senators have four year terms but that one-half are elected every two years. This section provides that one-half of the senators first elected will have only two year terms."

Attorney General's Opinions

Reapportionment — Holdover Senators: Article V, sec. 3, Mont. Const., provides that state Senators be elected to 4-year terms on a staggered basis. The constitution and statutes provide no authority for changing Senators' terms after reapportionment. The reapportionment plan is the responsibility of the Montana Districting and Apportionment Commission. The Commission has the inherent authority under Art. V, sec. 14, Mont. Const., to do what is necessary to implement a plan that complies with the state's laws. How to deal with holdover Senators is the responsibility of the Commission. The terms of office of members of the Montana State Senate who were elected in 1982 may not be shortened as a result of reapportionment and redistricting. 40 A.G. Op. 2 (1983).

Residency: The apparent intent of this section, based on the debate of the constitutional convention, is that a legislative candidate who resides in a district crossing county boundaries may run in another district in the county of residency which is wholly contained within that county, but may not run in another district in the county of residency which also crosses into another county. A legislative candidate who resides in a district wholly contained within the county of residency may run in another district in the county of residency which is also wholly contained within that county, but may not run in another district in the county of residency which also crosses into another county. 35 A.G. Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

Legislature's Appropriating Money Not Fixing Compensation: Gehring argued that the 1993 Legislature had violated the constitution by fixing its own compensation. The Supreme Court held that the 1991 Legislature had fixed the amount of compensation for the 1993 Legislature and that the appropriation of money by the 1993 Legislature to pay itself the compensation set by the previous Legislature did not violate the constitution. Gehring v. Members of 1993 Legislature, 269 M 373, 889 P2d 1164, 52 St. Rep. 34 (1995).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Equal Protection — Prohibition Against Salary Change: Prohibition against increase or diminution of salary or emolument of public officer after election or appointment contained in Art. V, sec. 31, 1889 Mont. Const., did not violate Equal Protection Clause of United States Constitution. Shubat v. St., 157 M 143, 484 P2d 278 (1971).

Creation of Legislative Council: Laws which created a "legislative council" under which all of the members of the Council were also members of the Legislature and which act allowed "actual travel and other expenses incurred in the discharge of their duties, including attendance at meetings", did not contravene Art. V, sec. 5, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. James v. Aronson, 132 M 120, 314 P2d 849 (1957), overruling State ex rel. Mitchell v. Holmes, 128 M 275, 274 P2d 611 (1954).

Restriction on Legislative Power: Article V, sec. 8, 1889 Mont. Const., embodied an express restriction upon the powers of the Legislative Assembly. Lloyd v. Silver Bow County, 11 M 408, 28 P 453 (1891).

Appropriation to Fund Second Legislature Constitutional: Article V, sec. 5 and 8, 1889 Mont. Const., fixed the compensation of members of the First Legislative Assembly and conferred upon that body the power to enact laws for the payment of its successors. Such legislation can be amended at any time, subject to the restrictions that no Legislative Assembly can pass a law which defines its own compensation and that members cannot receive an increase of salary or mileage. It was also contemplated that the First Legislative Assembly would provide the statutes that were applicable to these conditions, but it failed to discharge its functions by the passage of any laws. The Second Legislative Assembly having made an appropriation by law for the payment of its members at the same rate established by this section, it was held that the intent of the Constitution being to prevent a Legislative Assembly from securing extravagant compensation by its own votes, the Second Legislative Assembly did not fix its own compensation within the intent, spirit, or scope of these sections, and the appropriation was valid. State ex rel. Harrington v. Kenney, 10 M 410, 25 P 1022 (1891).

Rights of Legislators — Enforceability: Article V, sec. 5 and 15, 1889 Mont. Const., guaranteed to persons occupying the office of Legislator certain rights, privileges, and emoluments, which courts of justice will regard and enforce in proper cases and upon proper showing. State ex rel. Thompson v. Kenney, 9 M 223, 23 P 733 (1890).

Section 6. Sessions.

Convention Notes

New provision. "Continuous body" does not mean the legislature is in continuous session but means the legislature has legal existence even when not actually meeting. It will have regular annual sessions of 60 days. A legislature cannot pass a law that IT can meet for more than 60 legislative days but can provide that future legislatures may meet longer. Legislature as well as the governor may call a special session. [Note — see Accelerated Effective Date compiler's comment to this section.]

1974 Amendment by Initiative: Constitutional Initiative No. 1, proposed by initiative petition and approved at the general election held November 5, 1974, deleted two sentences at beginning of section that read: "The legislature shall be a continuous body for two-year periods beginning when newly elected members take office. Any business, bill, or resolution pending at adjournment of a session shall carry over with the same status to any other session of the legislature during the biennium", in first sentence after "shall meet" substituted "each odd-numbered year" for "at least once a year", and increased length of session from 60 to 90 days. Amendment effective December 31, 1974. (See text of initiative in final volume of 1975 Laws of Montana where text of initiative is erroneously referred to as Constitutional Amendment No. 3.)

Accelerated Effective Date: Section 1 of the Transition Schedule for implementing the 1972 Montana Constitution provided: "Section 1. Accelerated effective date: Section 6 (SESSIONS) and section 14 (DISTRICTING AND APPORTIONMENT) of Article V, THE LEGISLATURE, shall be effective January 1, 1973."

The convention note for section 1 of the Transition Schedule provided: "Proposed section on annual legislative sessions and reapportionment of the legislature would be effective January 1, 1973. The reapportionment commission could then be appointed by the 1973 legislature and report its plan to the 1974 legislature."

Interim Committees: Laws creating the legislative interim committees do not extend the limitation of 60 days specified by Art. V, sec. 5, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. James v. Aronson, 132 M 120, 314 P2d 849 (1957), overruling State ex rel. Mitchell v. Holmes, 128 M 275, 274 P2d 611 (1954).

Passage of Bill After Time Limits Expire — Journals Binding on Courts: On collateral attack upon the validity of sections (since repealed) known as a chain store license tax law, based upon the ground that it was passed after the 60-day limit for holding a regular legislative session under Art. V, sec. 5, 1889 Mont. Const., had expired, the legislative journals showing on their face a compliance with such limitation, import absolute verity and are binding upon the courts. It was error to admit parol testimony showing the contrary. Standard Oil Co. v. St. Bd. of Equalization, 110 M 5, 99 P2d 229 (1940).

Biennial Sessions: For ordinary purposes, the Legislature may not convene more often than once in 2 years. State ex rel. Bennett v. St. Bd. of Examiners, 40 M 59, 104 P 1055 (1909).

Attorney General's Opinions

Majority of Members, Not Majority of Each House, Required to Call Special Session: Under this section of the Montana Constitution, a majority of all of the members of the Legislature is required to request that the Legislature be convened in a special session. A majority of each house is not required to request that a special session be convened. 41 A.G. Op. 27 (1985), overruling 35 A.G. Op. 6 (1973).

Recorded Vote — Fulfills Requisites of a "Writing": The Legislative Assembly may reconvene itself in special session by a recorded vote of the majority of each house voting on the proposal. 35 A.G. Op. 7 (1973).

Case Notes

Representative's Immunity From Litigation for Statements Made in House of Representatives — Defamation Action Properly Dismissed: While giving a speech on the floor of the House of Representatives, Representative Glaser referenced a letter that was sent to the Legislature by Cooper. On a point of personal privilege, Glaser said Cooper had spent time in prison for threatening an officer while in the military, had threatened his neighbors, had spent time in the State Hospital in Warm Springs, was a "kook", and was "not an ordinary member of society". Cooper sued Glaser for defamation. Glaser claimed legislative immunity under Art. V, sec. 8, Mont. Const., but Cooper contended that immunity did not apply because Glaser's statements were personal and not within the sphere of legitimate legislative activity. The District Court granted Glaser's motion to dismiss, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. The question was not whether the statements were legislative in nature, but whether Glaser was engaged in a legislative function when speaking. Thus, regardless of the truth of the statements, Glaser spoke from the floor of the House of Representatives while in session and therefore was immune from the threat of prosecution pursuant to Art. V, sec. 8, Mont. Const. Cooper v. Glaser, 2010 MT 55, 355 Mont. 342, 228 P.3d 443.

Conduct of City Council Meeting Hearing Criticism of City Employee — Not Restricted by Free Speech and Privileged Communication Cases and Statute — Not Legislative Act Shielded by Legislative Immunity: Denke filed complaints with the Human Rights Commission alleging that Thompson Falls and Shoemaker, a City Council member, retaliated against her for previously filing sexual harassment charges with the Commission by holding a City Council meeting at which Shoemaker was allowed, with virtually no limitation, to severely criticize her conduct as city clerk and finance officer. The Commission hearing examiner, the Commission, and the District Court held that Shoemaker's criticism of Denke's actions as city bookkeeper aired during the City Council meeting was a "legislative act" within the meaning of 2-9-111 and the city was therefore immune from a charge of retaliation. The Supreme Court held that 27-1-804(2) and free speech cases such as New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 US 254 (1964), and Skinner v. Pistoria, 194 M 257, 633 P2d 672 (1981), did not limit the City Council's ability to regulate the time, place, and manner of Shoemaker's criticism. The Supreme Court also held that Denke's claim did not involve the calling of the City Council meeting (for which the city would be immune under 2-9-114) so much as the manner in which the meeting was conducted and that the conduct of the meeting did not fall within the definition of a "legislative act", and remanded the case for further proceedings. Denke v. Shoemaker, 2008 MT 418, 347 M 322, 198 P3d 284 (2008).

Absolute Immunity: Plaintiffs claimed that Montana legislators violated single mothers' constitutional rights when the legislators voted to enact legislation deregulating the Montana energy markets. The District Court relied upon Chappell v. Robbins, 73 F3d 918 (9th Cir. 1996), holding that legislators have an absolute common-law immunity against civil suit for their legislative acts. The Ninth Circuit Court upheld the District Court's dismissal of the claims against the legislators. Single Moms, Inc. v. Mont. Power Co., 331 F3d 743 (9th Cir. 2003).

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

Law Clerk or Master Not a Public Officer — No Violation of Constitution by Legislator: A law clerk acting as an employee of the court is not exercising the sovereign power of the state since he or she is subject to the supervision of the judge or justice who is the employer. A master, although having duties and obligations of a judicial officer, acts in an advisory capacity and does not sit as a court. Therefore, neither a law clerk nor a master is a public officer. A person who holds these positions while holding office as a state legislator does not violate the constitutional provision requiring separation of powers. State ex rel. Paugh v. Bradley, 231 M 46, 753 P2d 857, 45 St. Rep. 419 (1988).

Delegation of Powers — Legislative Finance Committee: A committee of the Legislature may not be considered an executive agency for the purpose of delegating powers to it because, under this section, members of the Legislature are disqualified from membership on executive agencies. State ex rel. Judge v. Legislative Fin. Comm., 168 M 470, 543 P2d 1317 (1975).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Constitutional Convention Delegates:

Delegates to the 1972 Constitutional Convention were considered representatives who are prohibited by this section from holding any other state office during the term for which elected. Mahoney v. Murray, 159 M 176, 496 P2d 1120 (1972).

Members of the Legislature may not serve as delegates to state Constitutional Convention, since a delegate holds a civil office. Legislative Assembly v. Lennon, 156 M 416, 481 P2d 330 (1971), distinguished in Mahoney v. Murray, 159 M 176, 496 P2d 1120 (1972).

Constitutional Convention Delegates — Term of Office: The term of office of delegates to the 1972 Constitutional Convention extended to June 30, 1973, the date of repeal of the 1972 Constitutional Convention Enabling Act, despite the prior adjournment sine die of the Convention, since the Convention, when it adjourned, constituted a committee to carry on many of the functions of the Convention. Mahoney v. Murray, 159 M 176, 496 P2d 1120 (1972).

Interim Committee Membership Not Civil Office: Membership of Legislators in the legislative interim council serving in interim between sessions was not a civil office within the meaning of Art. V, sec. 7, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. James v. Aronson, 132 M 120, 314 P2d 849 (1957), overruling State ex rel. Mitchell v. Holmes, 128 M 275, 274 P2d 611 (1954).

Member Relief Commission Civil Officer: A member of the Montana Relief Commission (now terminated) was a civil officer and not mere state employee and subject to Art. V, sec. 7, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Nagle v. Kelsey, 102 M 8, 55 P2d 685 (1936).

Violation by Others Immaterial to Determination of Case: In Quo Warranto proceeding to oust civil officer from office to which he was appointed during term for which he was elected state Senator in contravention of Art. V, sec. 7, 1889 Mont. Const., the fact that others of like disqualification held similar offices is not entitled to consideration. State ex rel. Nagle v. Kelsey, 102 M 8, 55 P2d 685 (1936).

Ousting — Quo Warranto — Complaint: Supreme Court has original jurisdiction of a Quo Warranto proceeding brought by Attorney General to oust state Senator appointed during his term to "civil office under the state". Plaintiff need not set forth in complaint the name of other claimant to office nor that anyone else is entitled to the office. State ex rel. Nagle v. Kelsey, 102 M 8, 55 P2d 685 (1936).

Boiler Inspector Not State Officer: Upon review of the statutes pertaining to the appointment and duties of state boiler inspectors, in a proceeding in Quo Warranto to determine whether an inspector upon his election and qualification as state Senator became disqualified, under Art. V, sec. 7, 1889 Mont. Const., a boiler inspector is not a public or state officer but merely a state employee. Therefore the constitutional provision has no application to him. State ex rel. Nagle v. Page, 98 M 14, 37 P2d 575 (1934).

"Civil Office" Defined:

The words "civil office" as used in Art. V, sec. 7, 1889 Mont. Const., in providing that no Senator or Representative shall, during the term for which elected, be appointed to any civil office, mean any public office not of a military character. State ex rel. Barney v. Hawkins, 79 M 506, 257 P 411 (1927).

To make any position of employment a public office of a civil nature, it must be created by the state Constitution or by the Legislature or created by a municipality pursuant to authority delegated to it; it must possess a delegation of a portion of the sovereign power of government, to be exercised for the benefit of the public; the powers conferred and the duties to be discharged must be defined, directly or impliedly, by the Legislature or through legislative authority. The duties must be performed independently and without control of a superior power, other than the law, unless they be those of an inferior or subordinate office, created or authorized by the Legislature and by it placed under the control of a superior office or body. It must have permanency and continuity, and the incumbent must take and file an oath, hold a commission, and give an official bond, if required by proper authority. State ex rel. Barney v. Hawkins, 79 M 506, 257 P 411 (1927). See also State ex rel. Nagle v. Page, 98 M 14, 37 P2d 575 (1934).

Legislator Prohibited From Appointment to Board of Review: Membership on the Board of Review established in 30-16-302 is considered a public office of a civil nature pursuant to the five-part test in State ex rel. Barney v. Hawkins, 79 M 506, 257 P 411 (1927). Therefore, 5-2-104 and this section prohibit the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives from appointing a legislator as a member of the Board of Review, including appointment as a nonvoting member. Because of the prohibition against the appointment of a legislator to a civil office during the legislator's term of office, the President and Speaker may appoint only a nonlegislator as a member of the Board of Review. 49 A.G. Op. 15 (2002).

Mayor Prohibited From Serving as Legislator: An elected Mayor holds a "public office of a civil nature" as defined in State ex rel. Barney v. Hawkins, 79 M 506, 257 P 411 (1927). The office of Mayor is vested with a portion of the sovereign power of government which is executive in character. A Mayor is therefore prohibited by Art. V, sec. 9, Mont. Const., from serving as a member of the Legislature while serving as Mayor. 41 A.G. Op. 79 (1986).

Municipal Officer Holding "Public Office of Civil Nature" Disqualified From Service in Legislature: A municipal officer who holds "public office of a civil nature", as that phrase is defined in State ex rel. Barney v. Hawkins, 79 M 506, 257 P 411 (1927), is prohibited by Art. V, sec. 9, Mont. Const., from serving as a member of the Legislature during his continuance in municipal office. 40 A.G. Op. 46 (1984).

When Legislator May Run — When Terms Not Overlapping: The prohibition contained in this section bars a Legislator from holding two civil offices during the "term" for which he is elected. A Legislator may run for another public office if the terms of the offices do not overlap. However, if the legislative term and the term of another public office are overlapping and conflicting, a Legislator is constitutionally prohibited from being a candidate for that office. 35 A.G. Op. 76 (1974). See 5-2-101, MCA.

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

Budget Information — Legislative Finance Committee: Sections 5-12-302 and 5-12-303 do not impose unconstitutional burden upon state government, since power to approve appropriation bills and budget is in legislative branch, and committee may require such information from other branches as is reasonably necessary to form rational basis for budget determinations. State ex rel. Judge v. Legislative Fin. Comm., 168 M 470, 543 P2d 1317 (1975).

Interim Committees — Approval of Budget Amendments Unconstitutional: Those parts of 5-12-102, 5-12-401, and 5-12-402 (now repealed) empowering finance committee to approve budget amendments are declared invalid as unconstitutional delegations of legislative power, since this power is properly exercisable only by either entire Legislature or executive officer or agency, not by interim committee. State ex rel. Judge v. Legislative Fin. Comm., 168 M 470, 543 P2d 1317 (1975).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

When Court Does Not Interfere With Jurisdiction Lodged in Senate: When a member of the Senate was seated by that body though illegally appointed to fill a vacancy which did not exist and who by mandamus sought to compel payment of mileage and per diem to him, the Supreme Court in denying relief to relator does not interfere with the jurisdiction lodged in the Senate by Art. V, sec. 9, 1889 Mont. Const., but simply exercises its own jurisdiction, voluntarily invoked by relator in his endeavor to recover emoluments to which he is not entitled under the law. State ex rel. Grant v. Eaton, 114 M 199, 133 P2d 588 (1943).

Recount of Votes for Candidates for Legislature: Sole purpose of recount statutes is to determine whether the official canvass of the vote was correct. The recount is not an election contest, and the result is not binding upon the legislative branch when the proceeding involves candidates for the Legislature. Therefore, the courts may order a recount in such cases without infringing upon the prerogatives of the legislative houses. State ex rel. Ainsworth v. District Court, 107 M 370, 86 P2d 5 (1938).

No Judicial Remedy: Though each house of the Legislative Assembly has plenary power to judge the qualifications, elections, and returns of its membership, the courts are not for that reason required to aid one who was appointed to a vacancy in one of the houses, contrary to a provision of the Constitution, in his endeavor to secure the emoluments attached to the office. State ex rel. Cutts v. Hart, 56 M 571, 185 P 769 (1919).

Continuing Authority to Determine Qualifications: Each house is by the 1889 Montana Constitution clothed with plenary and exclusive authority to determine for itself and in its own way whether a person who presents himself for membership is entitled to a seat. Each member, after seated, holds his office at the will and pleasure of the house to which he belongs, its authority in this respect being a continuing one running throughout the term for which he is elected. State ex rel. Boulware v. Porter, 55 M 471, 178 P 832 (1919).

Quo Warranto — No Jurisdiction: Since each house of the Legislature is the judge of the ultimate right of persons to seats as members thereof, the Supreme Court is without jurisdiction to entertain a proceeding in Quo Warranto to determine such right. State ex rel. Ford v. Cutts, 53 M 300, 163 P 470 (1917).

Grant of Power to Legislature: The state Constitution is a limitation of powers, but the provision contained in Art. V, sec. 9, 1889 Mont. Const., that each house shall judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members is an exception to that rule. This is a distinct grant of power by the people to each branch of the Legislative Assembly, a power necessary to the existence and independence of each house as an instrumentality of government. This power cannot be delegated by either house or both acting together. Likewise, neither house possesses the power to divest itself of the authority conferred upon it. State ex rel. Smith v. District Court, 50 M 134, 145 P 721 (1914).

Contents of Journals Discretionary: Article V, sec. 12, 1889 Mont. Const., required that each house keep a journal of its proceedings; but, except those instances where the Constitution required a specific entry to be made in the journals, the questions what entries were to be made and how full or minute the entries were to be were matters addressed to the legislative discretion. State ex rel. Gregg v. Erickson, 39 M 280, 102 P 336 (1909).

Legislature as Judge of Who Are Members: The power to try the ultimate right of a person claiming to be a member of the Legislative Assembly is in the house where he claims his seat. State ex rel. Thompson v. Kenney, 9 M 223, 23 P 733 (1890).

Attorney General's Opinions

Power of Legislative Standing Committee to Meet During Special Session to Investigate Matter Not Within Call: There is no express or implied constitutional or statutory limitation circumscribing the interim investigative activity of a legislative standing committee, including activity during a special session. Therefore, a standing committee of the Legislature not formally discharged prior to the final adjournment of the preceding session may meet during a special session for the purpose of gathering information and taking testimony on a matter not within the call of the special session. 43 A.G. Op. 60 (1990).

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

Single-Subject Requirement — Inapplicable to Constitutional Initiatives: The single-subject requirement of Art. V, sec. 11(3), Mont. Const., does not apply to constitutional amendments proposed by initiative. Mont. Ass'n of Counties v. St., 2017 MT 267, 389 Mont. 183, 404 P.3d 733.

Referendum Title Unnecessarily Redundant but Legally Sufficient — Clarification in Ballot Statement Required: MEA-MFT challenged the title of a legislative referendum that ended same-day voter registration, claiming it was inaccurate and misleading. The title of the referendum "ensur[ed] compliance with the National Voter Registration Act", and a provision was placed in the bill referencing the federal law, although Montana was already compliant with the federal Act. MEA-MFT argued that the title's reference to the National Voter Registration Act (NVRA) misled voters by suggesting that ending same-day voter registration was required by the Act. The Supreme Court found that although the reference to NVRA compliance was unnecessary, the superfluous language did not make it void. Nevertheless, the court found that the stand-alone title could lead to voter confusion and ordered the Attorney General to revise the ballot statement to make it clear that the NVRA did not require elimination of same-day voter registration. MEA-MFT v. St., 2014 MT 33, 374 Mont. 1, 318 P.3d 702.

Failure to Give Notice of Constitutional Challenge to Landowner's Liability Law — Consideration of Constitutional Challenge Precluded: Plaintiff was injured on a sledding hill at a city park. Plaintiff contended that legislation that provided immunity to landowners was defective because the title did not mention that liability was also extended to governmental units, including municipalities. However, plaintiff failed to give notice to the Supreme Court or to the Attorney General, pursuant to former Rule 38, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), that an action in which neither the state nor a state agency or employee was a party was being challenged for constitutionality. The municipality was not a state agency, so the rule applied, and absent plaintiff's compliance with the notice requirements, the Supreme Court declined to address the constitutional issue. Weinert v. Great Falls, 2004 MT 168, 322 M 38, 97 P3d 1079 (2004).

Process for Establishing County Building Code Jurisdictional Area Based on Franchise Limitation Unconstitutional: The 2001 Legislature enacted Senate Bill No. 242 (SB 242), which established a process for designating a county building code jurisdictional area and eliminating municipal jurisdictional areas by an election procedure limited to record owners of real property instead of the general constituency. When questioned regarding the constitutionality of the process, the Supreme Court noted that because voting rights cases involve a fundamental political right, strict scrutiny required the state to demonstrate a compelling governmental interest in restricting the voting franchise. The court concluded that: (1) the application and enforcement of building codes is an issue of public safety that affects all persons living in the area, not just record owners of real property; (2) governmental entities that oversee building codes are not special-purpose units whose functions and actions exclusively or disproportionately affect record owners of real property over other constituents in the area that do not own real property; and (3) elections to determine who may impose and enforce building codes in a given area are general interest elections rather than special interest elections. The state failed to show a compelling interest in limiting the voting franchise to only record owners of real property, and because the valid provisions of SB 242 were not severable from the invalid provisions, the court held that SB 242 was invalid in its entirety. (However, see Ch. 443, L. 2003, wherein the Legislature amended the voting procedure to address the franchise limitation.) Finke v. State ex rel. McGrath, 2003 MT 48, 314 M 314, 65 P3d 576 (2003). See also Kramer v. Union School District, 395 US 621 (1969).

School Territory Transfer Statutes Unconstitutional — Insufficient Guidelines for Delegation of Legislative Authority: In 1994, the respondents, individuals residing in both Rosebud and Big Horn Counties but outside of the Northern Cheyenne Indian Reservation, petitioned their respective County Superintendents of Schools requesting a territory transfer from the Lame Deer High School District (LDHSD—created in 1993) back to the Colstrip and Hardin High School Districts. The requests were granted. LDHSD appealed the decisions to the State Superintendent of Public Instruction, who reversed the decisions. The respective District Courts reversed the Superintendent of Public Instruction's decision. The Supreme Court reversed the District Courts' decisions on the grounds that the school territory transfer statute is an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power. The broad grant of discretion to a County Superintendent of Schools, unchecked by any standard, policy, or rule of decision, renders the statute unconstitutional. Hayes v. Lame Deer High School District, 2000 MT 342, 303 M 204, 15 P3d 447, 57 St. Rep. 1464 (2000). See also Belgrade Elementary & High School District No. 44 v. Morris, 2000 MT 347, 303 M 245, 15 P3d 482, 57 St. Rep. 1484 (2000), and In re Petitions to Transfer Territory, 2000 MT 348, 303 M 249, 16 P3d 1000, 57 St. Rep. 1486 (2000).

Submission of Constitutional Initiative Amending Three Parts of Constitution Violative of Separate Vote Requirement: Plaintiffs filed an original application for declaration of judgment and injunctive relief, challenging the validity of Constitutional Initiative No. 75 (CI-75), which was passed by the voters and stated that no new tax or tax increase could be enacted unless approved by a majority of the electorate. The initiative amended Art. VIII, Mont. Const., revising state revenue and finance provisions; amended Art. II, sec. 18, Mont. Const., providing that sovereign immunity did not shield public officials or employees from appropriate civil liability for violating CI-75; and provided that notwithstanding the referendum provisions of Art. VI, sec. 10, Mont. Const., before a bill imposing new or increased taxes is referred to the people, the Governor had veto power. The dispositive issue was that CI-75 had two or more constitutional amendments, in violation of Art. XIV, sec. 11, Mont. Const., which is a cogent constitutional recognition of the circumstances under which Montana voters receive constitutional initiatives, namely that a separate vote is required for each proposed constitutional amendment. Citing Armatta v. Kitzhaber, 959 P2d 49 (Oreg. 1998), the Supreme Court held that the separate vote requirement is distinguishable as different and narrower than the single subject requirement in this section, and that to the extent that a constitutional amendment may be valid under the single subject rule but fail under the separate vote rule, holdings to the contrary in State ex rel. Teague v. Bd. of Comm'rs, 34 M 426, 87 P 450 (1906), State ex rel. Hay v. Alderson, 49 M 387, 142 P 210 (1914), and State ex rel. Corry v. Cooney, 70 M 355, 225 P 1007 (1924), were overruled. Because CI-75 expressly amended three parts of the Montana Constitution without allowing a separate vote on each amendment, CI-75 was unconstitutional under Art. XIV, sec. 11, Mont. Const. Marshall v. St., 1999 MT 33, 293 M 274, 975 P2d 325, 56 St. Rep. 142 (1999), following State ex rel. Hinz v. Moody, 71 M 473, 230 P 575 (1924), and Sawyer Stores, Inc. v. Mitchell, 103 M 148, 62 P2d 342 (1936). However, see Mont. Ass'n of Counties v. St., 2017 MT 267, 389 Mont. 183, 404 P.3d 733, clarifying that the single-subject requirement does not apply to constitutional initiatives.

Supreme Court Power to Review Legislative Act for Constitutional Conformity Not Violative of Separation of Powers Doctrine: Although the Montana Constitution confers upon the Legislature the exclusive power to set appropriate punishments for criminal acts, the Supreme Court is constitutionally vested with the exclusive power to review whether a particular legislative act conforms to the constitution. Thus, the court's holding that the Montana weapon enhancement statute was violative of state constitutional double jeopardy protections was not a violation of the separation of powers doctrine. St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999). See also In re License Revocation of Gildersleeve, 283 M 479, 942 P2d 705, 54 St. Rep. 735 (1997), and St. v. Walker, 2001 MT 170, 306 M 159, 30 P3d 1099 (2001).

Sufficiency of Title of 1988 Welfare Referendum — Applicable Standard: The title of a referendum "allowing the legislature greater discretion to determine the eligibility, duration, and level of economic assistance and social services to those in need" was found by the Supreme Court to be legally sufficient after applying the constitutional requirement of clarity of title set out in Art. V, sec. 11, Mont. Const., and employing the rules of construction developed under State ex rel. Wenzel v. Murray, 178 M 441, 585 P2d 633 (1978), and St. v. McKinney, 29 M 375, 74 P 1095 (1904). The court refused to intervene to remove the referendum from the ballot prior to a vote of the people so as not to violate the constitutional rights of popular sovereignty and self-government. Recognizing important distinctions between the processes of referendum and initiative, the standard applied to the referendum was the same applied to examination of the title of other products of the Legislature. The court affirmed the District Court finding of no statutory authority for preelection nullification of a legislative referendum and noted a strong presumption in favor of the constitutionality of legislative enactments. The ballot language was not purposely misleading and sufficiently identified the measure to provide for an informed vote. Harper v. Greely, 234 M 259, 763 P2d 650, 45 St. Rep. 1889 (1988), distinguishing State ex rel. Steen v. Murray, 144 M 61, 394 P2d 761 (1964), and State ex rel. Harper v. Waltermire, 213 M 425, 691 P2d 826, 41 St. Rep. 2212 (1984). See also State ex rel. Boese v. Waltermire, 224 M 230, 730 P2d 375, 43 St. Rep. 2156 (1986), and T&W Chevrolet v. Darvial, 196 M 287, 641 P2d 1368 (1982).

Unconstitutionality of Seed Capital Bond Act — Private Appropriations — Insufficiency of Title: The Science and Technology Development Board Seed Capital Bond Act (Ch. 461, L. 1987, codified in large part as Title 90, ch. 3, part 4, now repealed) was declared unconstitutional under subsection (5) of this section because the Act empowered the Montana Science and Technology Development Board to improperly funnel bond proceeds into private business ventures through technology investments. The bill, in effect, unconstitutionally pledges the credit of the state to secure the bonds issued by the Board, the proceeds of which are to be used for the benefit of private businesses. The Act also violated subsection (3) of this section because the title of the enacting legislation, HB 700, failed to mention the fact that the bill pledges the credit of the state to secure the bonds to be issued, a subject of importance to legislators preparing to vote on the bill. White v. St., 233 M 81, 759 P2d 971, 45 St. Rep. 1310 (1988), followed in Hayes v. Lame Deer High School District, 2000 MT 342, 303 M 204, 15 P3d 447, 57 St. Rep. 1464 (2000). See also Belgrade Elementary & High School District No. 44 v. Morris, 2000 MT 347, 303 M 245, 15 P3d 482, 57 St. Rep. 1484 (2000), and In re Petitions to Transfer Territory, 2000 MT 348, 303 M 249, 16 P3d 1000, 57 St. Rep. 1486 (2000).

Law Enforcement Academy Purchase as Ordinary Expense: A 1987 budgetary direction, included as part of the 1987 general appropriations act, directed the Department of Justice to purchase the previously leased modular facilities of the Montana Law Enforcement Academy. The District Court determined that this constitutional provision was offended because the budgetary provision was not for an ordinary expense. The Supreme Court found the budgetary direction to be on the same footing as other state statutes and a further indication of legislative intent. Under the terms of the academy lease, the expense of purchase was certain to occur during the biennium, and the Legislature has power to provide for biennial expenses through appropriation whether incurred through purchase or lease. The budgetary direction was not an unconstitutional appropriation beyond ordinary expense. Cornwall v. St., 231 M 58, 752 P2d 135, 45 St. Rep. 429 (1988).

Challenge of Multiplicitous Initiative Subjects — Procedural Review Requirements to Be Met: An opponent who challenges an initiative on the grounds that the title contains more than one subject, in violation of Art. V, sec. 11, Mont. Const., must meet the procedural review requirements of 13-27-316. State ex rel. Boese v. Waltermire, 224 M 230, 730 P2d 375, 43 St. Rep. 2156 (1986). See also State ex rel. Mont. Citizens for the Preservation of Citizens' Rights v. Waltermire, 224 M 273, 729 P2d 1283, 43 St. Rep. 2192 (1986).

Reasonableness of Time Periods: Under 13-27-316(2), certification by the Secretary of State to the Governor of qualification for the ballot triggers the time in which opponents to the measure may act. The opponents have 10 days following certification to file a challenge in District Court. The opponent has the time from the petition's initiation until its certification to prepare the action but is not required to act until it qualifies for the ballot. The statutes then provide for immediate access to the courts. This is a reasonable procedure for challenging the sufficiency of the title of an initiative. State ex rel. Boese v. Waltermire, 224 M 230, 730 P2d 375, 43 St. Rep. 2156 (1986).

Use of In-State Investment Fund to Guarantee Private Loans or Bonds Unconstitutional: The provisions of 17-6-308, which permit the use of in-state investment fund money derived from taxation to guarantee loans or bonds of private individuals or private entities either directly or through the capital reserve account or through the economic development guaranty fund, are unconstitutional under subsection (5) of this section, which provides that no appropriation shall be made for industrial or benevolent purposes to any private individual or private corporation not under the control of the state. Hollow v. St., 222 M 478, 723 P2d 227, 43 St. Rep. 1435 (1986).

Private Appropriations — Control by State Required: Plaintiff filed a complaint for declaratory judgment in the Supreme Court seeking to determine the validity of several acts of the Legislature allowing the issuance of state revenue bonds. Section 2 of Ch. 705, L. 1983, authorized the creation of state debt for development of hydroelectric power at three state-owned dams. Under Title 85, ch. 1, part 5, the Department of Natural Resources and Conservation and Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now abolished) are mandated to make the completed projects available for lease to utilities, electric cooperatives, or a state corporation proposing to use a substantial portion of the generated power. Plaintiff contended that this scheme violated Art. V, sec. 11, Mont. Const., by benefiting the public utilities, electric cooperatives, or a private corporation. The court stated that as long as the provisions relating to the expenditure of the funds derived from the proceeds of the bonds are under the control of the State, the constitutional mandate is satisfied. In this case, the proceeds of the coal severance tax bonds will be expended by a state agency under the control of the State for construction of hydroelectric projects. The appropriations therefore are made for an agency of the State. The fact that the State may afterwards lease the projects to a private association or corporation is no more offensive constitutionally than is the power of the State to lease its state-held lands to private parties. Grossman v. St., 209 M 427, 682 P2d 1319, 41 St. Rep. 804 (1984).

Title Indicative of Purpose of Statute: First step in determining the purpose of a statute is an examination of the title of the act through which the statute was introduced. Dept. of Natural Resources and Conservation v. Clark Fork Logging Co., Inc., 198 M 494, 646 P2d 1207, 39 St. Rep. 1146 (1982).

Title Not Embracing a Bill Section as Rendering Section Void: Subsection (5)(d) of 5-7-208, enacted by Initiative 85 (voter information pamphlet version), is not embraced in the title of Initiative 85 and is therefore void. There is insufficient substantive relationship between the title and the section. The lobbyist disclosure laws were not being transformed into a general campaign finances act. Mont. Auto. Ass'n v. Greely, 193 M 378, 632 P2d 300, 38 St. Rep. 1174 (1981). However, see St. v. Morgan, 1998 MT 268, 291 M 347, 968 P2d 1120, 55 St. Rep. 1112 (1998).

Private Appropriation — Use of Bond Money: The use of the bond money authorized by Title 90, ch. 2, for the purpose of lending money to private individuals is not violative of this section as authorizing an appropriation to a private individual not under control of the state. Douglas v. Judge, 174 M 32, 568 P2d 530 (1977).

Montana Housing Board Under State Control: The Montana Board of Housing is a public corporation under the control of the state, and appropriations to it do not violate this section. Huber v. Groff, 171 M 442, 558 P2d 1124 (1976).

Limitation on Challenges to Statutes: When an action to challenge a statute for violation of this section was commenced more than 3 years following the effective date of the enactment challenged, a constitutional challenge was precluded under this section. Reeves v. Ille Elec. Co., 170 M 104, 551 P2d 647 (1976).

Delegation of Power: Those parts of 5-12-102, 5-12-401, and 5-12-402 (now repealed) empowering Legislative Finance Committee to approve budget amendments are declared invalid as unconstitutional delegations of legislative power, since this power is properly exercisable only by either entire Legislature or executive officer or agency, not by interim committee. State ex rel. Judge v. Legislative Fin. Comm., 168 M 470, 543 P2d 1317 (1975).

Separation of Powers: Sections 5-12-302 and 5-12-303 do not impose unconstitutional burden upon state government, since power to approve appropriation bills and budget is in legislative branch, and committee may require such information from other branches as is reasonably necessary to form rational basis for budget determinations. State ex rel. Judge v. Legislative Fin. Comm., 168 M 470, 543 P2d 1317 (1975).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

AMENDMENT TO CHANGE ORIGINAL PURPOSE

Movie Theater Licensing Laws: Laws providing for the licensing of moving picture theaters were not open to the constitutional objection that as finally passed they were so altered or amended as to change their original purpose. State ex rel. Griffin v. Greene, 104 M 460, 67 P2d 995 (1937).

Operation and Effect: No act of legislation has the force of law, even though unanimously passed and approved by the Governor, unless the requirements of Art. V, sec. 19, 20, and 23, 1889 Mont. Const., that every law shall be passed by bill and that it must have an enacting clause and a title clearly expressing the subject of the enactment, are met. A resolution, in the passing of which neither of these essentials has been observed, is not an authoritative expression of the legislative will upon the subject with which it deals. State ex rel. Payton v. Cunningham, 39 M 197, 103 P 497 (1909).

ENTRY OF LEGISLATIVE VOTE

What Court May Consider: Under the rule that when the constitutionality of an act is questioned on the ground of irregularity in its passage, the only purpose for which courts may go behind the enrolled bill is to ascertain whether the aye and no vote was entered in the journals of the Legislative Assembly, it is not permissible to determine whether an amendment to a bill made by a joint conference committee was considered by either house before passage upon third reading. State ex rel. Woodward v. Moulton, 57 M 414, 189 P 59 (1920).

Role of Court: The courts will not go behind the duly authenticated enrolled bill except to determine whether on its final passage the names of those voting were entered on the journal. Barth v. Pock, 51 M 418, 155 P 282 (1915); State ex rel. Gregg v. Erickson, 39 M 280, 102 P 336 (1909); Palatine Ins. Co. v. N. Pac. Ry., 34 M 268, 85 P 1032 (1906).

Vote on Amendment: After a bill has passed the house in which it originated, the vote being taken by ayes and noes and the names of those voting entered on the journal, as required by Art. V, sec. 24, 1889 Mont. Const., and is amended in the other house of the Legislative Assembly and then returned to the first for action on the amendments, it is not necessary that the vote on the adoption of the amendments thus made be again taken by ayes and noes and the names entered on the journal. Johnson v. Great Falls, 38 M 369, 99 P 1059 (1909).

Journal — Purpose and Operation: The journal of either house of the Legislature imports verity and may be looked to to determine whether or not a bill, valid on its face, signed by the presiding officer of each house, approved by the Governor, and deposited in the office of the Secretary of State was in fact passed in compliance with the requirements of Art. V., sec. 24, 1889 Mont. Const. Palatine Ins. Co. v. N. Pac. Ry., 34 M 268, 85 P 1032 (1906).

Necessity That Names Be Entered on the Journal: Under Art. V, sec. 24, 1889 Mont. Const., an act relating to the limitation of time within which actions may be brought did not become a law, because it appeared from the journal of the Senate that the names of the members of that branch of the Legislature voting on the measure were not entered on the journal. Palatine Ins. Co. v. N. Pac. Ry., 34 M 268, 85 P 1032 (1906).

ONE SUBJECT CLEARLY EXPRESSED

Exclusion of Bidding Requirements: The 1971 amendment of Title 7, ch. 5, part 43, was void insofar as it appeared to delete a final paragraph excluding certain types of contracts from the bidding requirements of that section, because the title described the amendment as only an "Increase of Dollar Limitations on Bid Requirements". Morrison-Maierle, Inc. v. Forsyth, 160 M 69, 500 P2d 395 (1972).

Minimum Wage Act: The title of the minimum wage act (Title 39, ch. 3, part 4) conforms to Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const. Billings v. Smith, 158 M 197, 490 P2d 221 (1971).

Incomplete Title: Dredge mining regulation and land preservation act (sections 50-1101 through 50-1114, R.C.M. 1947, now repealed) was repugnant to Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., in that it purported to regulate sluice washing without mentioning sluice washing in its title. Sigety v. St. Bd. of Health, 157 M 48, 482 P2d 574 (1971), distinguished in Billings v. Smith, 158 M 197, 490 P2d 221 (1971).

Deceptive Title: Where title to appropriation bill described an appropriation to carry out provision of specific statutory law and then proceeded to nullify and defeat mandatory and all-inclusive character of that specific statutory law without reference thereto in title, latter provision was deceptive and misleading in violation of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., and therefore void. Helena v. Omholt, 155 M 212, 468 P2d 764 (1970).

Penalty Assessment on Bail: Insofar as statute provided for penalty assessment on forfeited bail and on fines, it was void as a violation of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., that no bill shall be passed containing more than one subject which shall be clearly expressed in its title. State ex rel. Sanders v. Butte, 151 M 171, 441 P2d 190 (1968).

Initiative Measure Unconstitutional: Proposed Initiative Measure No. 63, which would legalize lotteries and repeal statutes pertaining to lotteries, containing more than one subject, violated Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Steen v. Murray, 144 M 61, 394 P2d 761 (1964).

County Water District Act: The title of the county water district act (sections 16-4501 through 16-4534, R.C.M. 1947; now Title 7, ch. 13, parts 22 and 23, MCA) does not violate Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const. Parker v. Yellowstone County, 140 M 538, 374 P2d 328 (1962).

Tax Recovery: Chapter 204, L. 1955, amending 15-1-402 and carrying a title which is practically identical with the heading of this section as stated in the 1947 Codes and properly including additional requirements for bringing actions to recover taxes paid under protest, does not violate Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const. Van Tighem v. Linnane, 136 M 547, 349 P2d 569 (1960).

Effect of Subsequent Codification on Defect:

Section 91-4321, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), was enacted in 1943 and was carried forward in the Codes of 1947 without change. The 1947 Codes were regularly adopted by the Legislature with this act incorporated therein without reference to its original title. Any defect in title was cured by its adoption into the 1947 Code. St. v. Rice, 134 M 265, 329 P2d 451 (1958).

Alleged defect in the title to the original act relating to the handling of explosives, of which 45-8-333 and 50-38-106 (now repealed) were a part, and which act was carried forward in three subsequent codifications of the laws, held cured by the adoption of such codes by the Legislature. Cashin v. N. Pac. Ry., 96 M 92, 28 P2d 862 (1934).

Purpose — Guard Against Fraud: The purposes of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., are to restrict the Legislature to the enactment of laws, the objects of which legislators and the public as well may be advised, to the end that any who are interested, whether as representatives or those represented, may be intelligently watchful of the course of the pending bill. The limitation is likewise designed to prevent legislators and the people from being misled by false or deceptive titles and to guard against fraud in legislation by way of incorporating into a law provisions concerning which neither legislators nor the public have any intimation through the title read or published. Johnson v. Meagher County, 116 M 565, 155 P2d 750 (1945); Hale v. Belgrade Co., Ltd., 74 M 308, 240 P 371 (1925); State ex rel. Foot v. Burr, 73 M 586, 238 P 585 (1925); St. v. Hopkins, 54 M 52, 166 P 304 (1917); State ex rel. Holliday v. O'Leary, 43 M 157, 115 P 204 (1911); Russell v. Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Ry., 37 M 1, 94 P 501 (1908); Yegen v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 34 M 79, 85 P 740 (1906); St. v. Brown, 29 M 179, 74 P 366 (1903); St. v. Anaconda Copper Min. Co., 23 M 498, 59 P 854 (1900).

General Appropriation: House Bill 151, pp. 534 and 547, L. 1943, the general appropriation bill for 1944-45 biennium, which in addition to making the appropriation allegedly amends Ch. 105, L. 1919, creating the Veterans Welfare Commission, requiring claims to be paid by the state Board of Examiners (now Department of Administration) instead of the Commission, held not to violate Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., as containing more than one subject not clearly expressed in its title. State ex rel. Davidson v. Ford, 115 M 165, 141 P2d 373 (1943).

When Title Would Offend Under Different Interpretation: The term "engaged in", as used in the title of the motor carrier act, meant one who has "embarked in" the business of "transportation by motor vehicles of persons and property for hire". To hold that persons engaged in carrying on other businesses and employing motor vehicles for transporting their own goods included within its meaning, the act would offend against Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., the title not having given notice to the public or Legislature of intent to regulate such other persons and their use of the highways. Bd. of R.R. Comm'rs v. Gamble-Robinson Co., 111 M 441, 111 P2d 306 (1941).

No Justification for Finding Implied Amendment of Other Statutes: As applied, laws in the enactment of which the Legislature carefully omitted from the title and body all elements of a moratorium in the matter of payment of taxes in violation of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., do not justify a finding that an implied amendment of other statutes (prior moratorium acts) must be construed into the body of the chapter simply to fill out the purpose expressed in the act. In construing a new statute, all the applicable laws must be read together, which construction is not equivalent to reading into the new statute something not placed there by the Legislature. State ex rel. Jensen Livestock Co. v. Hyslop, 111 M 122, 107 P2d 1088 (1940).

Apportionment of Trial Costs: Held, that the title of Ch. 21, L. 1937, amending section 94-5610, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), authorizing District Courts to apportion costs of prosecution and trial between counties where personal property was stolen in one county and taken into another county where trial was had, is not open to the objection that it violates Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const. Rosebud County v. Flinn, 109 M 537, 98 P2d 330 (1940).

Embracing Incongruous Matters Prohibited: The purpose of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., prohibiting more than one subject in a legislative bill and requiring that it be expressed in its title, is to prevent the practice of embracing incongruous matters having no relation to each other or to the subject specified in the title; infraction thereof must be plain and obvious to be recognized as fatal, sound policy and legislative convenience dictating a liberal construction of the title and subject matter of statutes to maintain their validity. Rosebud County v. Flinn, 109 M 537, 98 P2d 330 (1940), followed in St. v. Morgan, 1998 MT 268, 291 M 347, 968 P2d 1120, 55 St. Rep. 1112 (1998).

Methods of Procedure — Not Required: Held, that the title of Ch. 133, L. 1939 (omitted), is sufficient under Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., as all that is required to meet the provision that the subject of a statute must be clearly expressed in its title is that the act shall be germane to the subject expressed in its title, and where the general object is plainly expressed, it is not necessary that the title should embody the exact methods of application or procedure. Lodge v. Ayers, 108 M 527, 91 P2d 691 (1939).

Debenture Act: Initiative Measure No. 41, the 1938 debenture act (omitted), authorizing issuance of state highway treasury anticipation debentures, held sufficient to meet the requirements of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., all the provisions of the act having a natural connection relating directly or indirectly to its one object and purpose. Martin v. St. Highway Comm'n, 107 M 603, 88 P2d 41 (1939).

County Election Recount — Extended to Others: Section 23-2301, et seq., R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), authorizing a recount of ballots cast at any election by boards of county canvassers, held not so deficient as to be condemned under Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., if its scope be held to extend to others than county officers. State ex rel. Riley v. District Court, 103 M 576, 64 P2d 115 (1937).

Continuation of Emergency Relief Program: Held, that the title to Ch. 135, L. 1935 (omitted), the purpose of which is to continue in force Ch. 24, L. Extra Session 1933-34, having to do with the public works emergency relief program, is not open to the charge that the matter of the chapter is not clearly expressed therein. State ex rel. Berthot v. Gallatin County High School District, 102 M 356, 58 P2d 264 (1936).

Tax Certificates: The title to Ch. 31, L. 1929, held sufficient as against the contention that it offends against Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., in that it does not clearly express the legislative intent to deal therein with tax certificates. Martin v. Glacier County, 102 M 213, 56 P2d 742 (1936).

Liquor Control Act: Title to the State Liquor Control Act of Montana, regulating the sale of intoxicating liquor and creating the Liquor Control Board (now Department of Revenue), held not to offend against the provisions of this section that the subjects of the act must be clearly expressed in its title. St. v. Driscoll, 101 M 348, 54 P2d 571 (1936).

Title Misleading: The test is, did the title mislead the public or members of the Legislature as to the subjects expressed in the act? St. v. Driscoll, 101 M 348, 54 P2d 571 (1936); Arps v. St. Highway Comm'n, 90 M 152, 300 P 549 (1931), overruled on other grounds in Burgan & Walker v. St. Highway Comm'n, 114 M 459, 137 P2d 663 (1943).

Natural Connection of Parts of Statute: Title 85, ch. 1, based on three various chapters all pertinent to one general subject of water conservation, held, where all of the different parts of a statute have a natural connection and relate directly or indirectly to one legitimate subject of legislation or are germane thereto, the act is not invalid as containing more than one subject not clearly expressed in its title. State ex rel. Normile v. Cooney, 100 M 391, 47 P2d 637 (1935).

Failure to Include "Witnesses": Chapter 16, L. 1933, purporting to amend 2-18-503, was invalid insofar as it attempted to reduce mileage of witnesses, as its title was misleading in failing to include word "witnesses" and did not direct attention of public and Legislature to this subject. Coolidge v. Meagher, 100 M 172, 46 P2d 684 (1935).

Germaneness: The question as to what is "germane" to a subject is one of fact rather than of law. There can be no clear line of demarcation between those matters which fall within and those which fall without the inhibition of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const. Durland v. Prickett, 98 M 399, 39 P2d 652 (1935).

Subject of Amendment: Held, as against the contention that Ch. 176, L. 1929, offends against Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., in that the subject of the amendment is not clearly expressed in its title and that therefore section 32-314, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), as it was before the attempted amendment is still the law, is without merit. Durland v. Prickett, 98 M 399, 39 P2d 652 (1935).

Regulation of Motor Carriers: Held, that Ch. 184, L. 1931, the motor carrier act, is not violative of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., as against the contentions that, instead of dealing with the regulation of the public highways, as set forth in the title of the act, it regulates the business of the public and private carriers and prevents competition between motor carriers and railroads and that therefore its provisions are not germane to the subject expressed in the title. St. v. Healow, 98 M 177, 38 P2d 285 (1934).

Broad Phraseology: The fact the title of an act in setting forth its subject employs a phrase somewhat broader than that appearing in the act does not affect its constitutionality. State ex rel. Nagle v. The Leader Co., 97 M 586, 37 P2d 561 (1934).

Life of Corporations: Held, on application for Writ of Quo Warranto, that the title to Ch. 7, L. 1931, prescribing the method whereby corporations "whose terms of corporate existence have expired, or may hereafter expire," may in the one case revive and in the other extend their existence, deals with but one subject, the life of corporations, and therefore does not offend against the mandate of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., that no bill, other than those excepted, shall contain more than one subject clearly expressed in its title. State ex rel. Nagle v. The Leader Co., 97 M 586, 37 P2d 561 (1934).

Effect of Failure to Argue Defect in Title: When a statute is attacked as unconstitutional on appeal on the grounds that it embraces a subject not expressed in its title but counsel in his brief fails to present argument in support of the contention, the Supreme Court will proceed upon the presumption that the act is constitutional until its invalidity is shown beyond a reasonable doubt. Fulmer v. Bd. of R.R. Comm'rs, 96 M 22, 28 P2d 849 (1934); Fulton Oil Co. v. Toole County, 86 M 367, 283 P 769 (1930).

Fire Insurance — Germane to Operation of Institution: The purpose of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., prohibiting the inclusion of more than one subject in a bill, is subserved if its provisions are germane to the general subject expressed in its title; and under that rule, held, that the title to House Bill No. 222, L. 1931, making appropriations for the operation and maintenance of the state educational institutions and for the payment of fire insurance premiums thereon, does not offend against Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., fire insurance being essential and germane to the proper operation and maintenance of such institutions, the main subject of the act. Miller Ins. Agency v. Porter, 93 M 567, 20 P2d 643 (1933).

Relation to Subjects: Where all the different parts of a statute have a natural connection and relate directly or indirectly to one legitimate subject of legislation, the act is not invalid as offending against this provision. Merchants' Nat'l Bank v. Dawson County, 93 M 310, 19 P2d 892 (1933).

Taxable Product — Not in Title: Under this case, held, that the assertion that Initiative Measure No. 28 is unconstitutional if the contention that arsenic or arsenious oxide is taxable under Initiative Measure No. 28 be upheld, in that that product is not mentioned in its title, may not be sustained. State ex rel. Snidow v. St. Bd. of Equalization, 93 M 19, 17 P2d 68 (1932).

Complete List Not Required: The title is generally sufficient if the body of the act treats only, directly or indirectly, of the subjects mentioned in the title and of other subjects germane thereto or of matters in furtherance of or necessary to accomplish the general objects of the bill, as mentioned in the title. Details need not be mentioned. The title need not contain a complete list of all matters covered by the act. Barbour v. St. Bd. of Educ., 92 M 321, 13 P2d 225 (1932); Yegen v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 34 M 79, 85 P 740 (1906); St. v. McKinney, 29 M 375, 74 P 1095 (1904).

Interest and Penalties Germane to Taxation: Held, that Ch. 85, L. 1927, does not offend against the requirements of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., relative to the contents of the title to an act, in that the provision for a deposit of taxes, interest, and penalties is germane to the matters expressed in the title and therefore sufficient to meet the constitutional requirement. State ex rel. Souders v. District Court, 92 M 272, 12 P2d 852 (1932).

Gasoline Tax: Under the rules set forth in this case, held that the title to Ch. 95, L. 1931 (omitted), is not fatally defective in declaring, inter alia, the act to be one providing for an excise tax on gasoline, etc., whereas in the body of the act the tax is imposed on distributors and dealers. Arps v. St. Highway Comm'n, 90 M 152, 300 P 549 (1931), overruled on other grounds in Burgan & Walker v. St. Highway Comm'n, 114 M 459, 137 P2d 663 (1943).

Power of Court to Determine Title of Act Limited: The Legislature is the judge, to a great extent, of the title which it will prefix to a bill; and the court has no right to hold a title void because, in its opinion, a better one might have been used. Arps v. St. Highway Comm'n, 90 M 152, 300 P 549 (1931), overruled on other grounds in Burgan & Walker v. St. Highway Comm'n, 114 M 459, 137 P2d 663 (1943); St. v. McKinney, 29 M 375, 74 P 1095 (1904).

Ceding Jurisdiction Over Park Land: An act of the Montana Legislature passed Feb. 14, 1891 (L. 1891, p. 262), entitled "An act ceding to the United States jurisdiction over certain lands", held to state subject of act to cede exclusive jurisdiction to United States over all lands within state which were or might be embraced within Yellowstone National Park and certain other lands sufficiently within requirement of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const. Yellowstone Park Transp. Co. v. Gallatin County, 31 F2d 644 (9th Cir. 1929).

Abolition of Appeal: Held, that Ch. 225, L. 1921, abolishing the appeal from an order denying a new trial, does not offend against the provision of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., that an act containing a subject not embraced in the title shall be void as to that subject. Kline v. Murray, 79 M 530, 257 P 465 (1927).

Purpose to Amend: Setting forth a purpose to amend the section relating to the given subject is sufficient, stating the nature of the proposed amendment. St. v. Silver Bow Ref. Co., 78 M 1, 252 P 301 (1926).

State Assumption of Liability: Held, that House Bill 398, p. 416, L. 1925, assuming, on behalf of the state, liability for injuries sustained by a student in the University of Montana (now University of Montana-Missoula) through the negligence of one of the state's agents and making an appropriation to discharge that liability, is not open to the objection that it contains a plurality of subjects in violation of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const. Mills v. Stewart, 76 M 429, 247 P 332 (1926).

Parts of Single Plan: When two or more propositions are contained in the title of an act that may be logically viewed as parts or aspects of a single plan, the constitutional requirement of unity of subject is met. State ex rel. Jones v. Erickson, 75 M 429, 244 P 287 (1926).

Increase of Punishment Not Indicated: Chapter 116, L. 1923, amending sections 11071, 11075, and 11079, R.C.M. 1921 (since repealed), and increasing the punishment for the unlawful transportation or possession of intoxicating liquor, held not open to the attack that it contravenes the provisions of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., in that the purpose to increase the punishment is not indicated in its title. St. v. Duncan, 74 M 428, 240 P 978 (1925).

Section of Code: When the title of an amendatory act refers to the number of the section of the Code to be amended and indicates its subject matter with sufficient particularity to identify it to a reasonable degree of certainty, it is sufficient to withstand constitutional attack. St. v. Duncan, 74 M 428, 240 P 978 (1925).

Change of Supreme Court Rules: Held, that so much of sec. 1, Ch. 19, L. 1925, as assumes to amend section 9746, R.C.M. 1921 (section 93-8018, R.C.M. 1947, now repealed), by the addition of a provision declaring within what time transcripts on appeal shall be filed in the Supreme Court and repealing by implication section 9732 (93-8004, R.C.M. 1947, now repealed), prescribing the time within which an appeal from a judgment may be taken, is void as in contravention of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., in that the title of the chapter does not disclose the purpose of the Legislature to effectuate a change in the time within which transcripts must be filed as fixed by subdivision 2 of Rule V of the Supreme Court rules. Hale v. Belgrade Co., Ltd., 74 M 308, 240 P 371 (1925).

Boundary Change — Abolition of County: Held, that the title to Ch. 93, L. 1925: "An act to amend sections 4318 and 4327 of the Revised Codes of 1921, relating to changing the boundaries of Fergus and Judith Basin counties", the effect of section 1 of which act (omitted) was to include within the boundaries of Fergus County the entire county of Petroleum created in February, 1925, thus abolishing the latter county, is insufficient to meet the requirements of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., rendering the section invalid. State ex rel. Foot v. Burr, 73 M 586, 238 P 585 (1925).

Habeas Corpus Attack: Held, on habeas corpus, that the bank act (Ch. 89, L. 1915), as amended by Ch. 90, L. 1923 (section 6081, R.C.M. 1921, since repealed), under which complainant was convicted of accepting deposits when his bank was insolvent, is not open to the charge of unconstitutionality on the ground that the titles of both the original and the amendatory acts are insufficient to meet the requirements of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const. Held, further, that by the enactment of Ch. 90, L. 1923 (section 6078, R.C.M. 1921, since repealed), providing the method of determining the insolvency of a bank, was not repealed by implication. State ex rel. Boone v. Tullock, 72 M 482, 234 P 277 (1925).

Provisions Germane to Subject: Chapter 75, L. 1917, is not invalid so far as it assumes to impose a license fee upon owners of motor vehicles, for failure to indicate in its title a purpose to impose a charge of any kind, the unity of title to an act required by Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., being observed if the various provisions of the act are germane to the general subjects expressed in the title. St. v. Pepper, 70 M 596, 226 P 1108 (1924).

Tax Collection: Held, that the title to Ch. 96, L. 1923 (Title 15, ch. 16), "An act to fix the time and method of collecting taxes and interest thereon", sufficiently expresses the subject of the act, authorizing the semiannual payment of taxes, to meet the requirements of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const. Thomas v. Missoula, 70 M 478, 226 P 213 (1924).

Initiatives: Held, that Initiative Measure No. 19 does not contravene the 1889 constitutional provision (Art. V, sec. 23), forbidding the enactment of any law containing more than one subject which shall be clearly expressed in its title. State ex rel. Bonner v. Dixon, 59 M 58, 195 P 841 (1921), overruled on other grounds in Bd. of Regents v. Judge, 168 M 433, 543 P2d 1323 (1975). See also St. v. Pippi, 59 M 116, 195 P 556 (1921).

War Defense Act: Chapter 21, Ex. L. 1918 (omitted), known as the war defense act, has to do with but one subject, which is clearly expressed in its title, namely, "to assist the United States in carrying on and prosecuting the war now existing between the United States and the German and Austrian empires" and does not contravene the provisions of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Campbell v. Stewart, 54 M 504, 171 P 755 (1918).

Chiropractic Within Definition of Osteopathy: The act regulating the practice of osteopathy, approved March 1, 1905 (Title 37, ch. 5), and the act amendatory thereof, approved March 6, 1907, are not repugnant to Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., on the ground that there is nothing in the titles of the acts indicating an intention to include "chiropractic"; the latter, like the former, having to do with the art of healing by the use of the hands, falls within the definition of "osteopathy" and must be held to have been intended as included within it. St. v. Hopkins, 54 M 52, 166 P 304 (1917).

Workmen's Compensation Act: The title of Ch. 96, L. 1915 (Title 39, ch. 71), known as the Workmen's Compensation Act (now Workers' Compensation Act), fairly indicates the general subject of the act, is comprehensive enough in its scope reasonably to cover all the provisions thereof, and is not calculated to mislead either the Legislature or the public and is therefore sufficient to meet the requirements of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const. Lewis & Clark County v. Indus. Accident Bd., 52 M 6, 155 P 268 (1916).

Reason for Excepting Appropriation Bills and Bills for Codification: The obvious reason for the exception of appropriation bills and bills for the codification and general revision of the laws is that the first are necessary for the maintenance of the government and hence their validity ought not to be open to question for informality. The latter are so extraordinary in their character that both the members of the legislative body and the public are presumed to know what is being done. It would be impracticable to formulate a title that would cover every subject embraced in such a bill, and a bill of either class does not fall within the prohibition of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Cotter v. District Court, 49 M 146, 140 P 732 (1914).

Nonpartisan Judiciary — Prohibition of Nomination by Political Party: The so-called "non-partisan judiciary act", Ch. 113, L. 1909, is not in harmony with the constitutional requirement that the purpose of a statute shall be clearly expressed in the title. The title of the enactment was "An act to provide for non-partisan nominations for judicial offices", whereas the body of it disclosed the purpose of the legislation was not to provide for nonpartisan nominations, for which provision was already made, but to prohibit judicial nominations by partisan political organizations. State ex rel. Holliday v. O'Leary, 43 M 157, 115 P 204 (1911).

Natural Connection: The object of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., is not to embarrass honest legislation but to prevent the vicious practice, which prevailed in states which did not have such inhibitions, of joining in one act incongruous and unrelated matters. The rule of interpretation now quite generally adopted is that if all parts of the statutes have a natural connection and can reasonably be said to relate, directly or indirectly, to one general and legitimate subject of legislation the act is not open to the charge that it violates Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const. This is true no matter how extensively or minutely it deals with the details looking to the accomplishment of the main legislative purpose; or stating the converse of the proposition, it may be said that if, after giving the act the benefit of all reasonable doubts, it is apparent that two or more independent and incongruous subjects are embraced in its provisions, the act will be held to transgress the constitutional provision and to be void by reason thereof. St. v. Ross, 38 M 319, 99 P 1056 (1909); Evers v. Hudson, 36 M 135, 92 P 462 (1907).

Prohibition of Forms of Gambling: Page 287, Ch. 115, L. 1907, prohibiting certain forms of gambling, is not open to the constitutional objection that it contains more than one subject. St. v. Ross, 38 M 319, 99 P 1056 (1909).

Bonds of Officers — Appeal Bonds: The act of March 7, 1899 (L. 1899, p. 79), "relating to bonds of officers and other bonds", insofar as it applies to undertakings on appeal, runs counter to the provisions of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., and is, to that extent, invalid. Russell v. Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Ry., 37 M 10, 94 P 501 (1908).

Exact Limitations Not Required: By Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., it is only intended that the subject of the bill shall be fairly expressed in the title. It is not necessary, for the Constitution has not so declared, that a title shall embody the exact limitations or qualifications contained in the bill itself which are germane to the purpose of the Legislature, if the general subject of the measure is clearly expressed in the title. Upon the highest authority it is held that, under constitutional provisions substantially like that referred to in Montana, where the degree of particularity necessary to be expressed in the title of a bill is not indicated by the Constitution itself, the courts ought not to "embarrass legislation by technical interpretations based upon mere form of phraseology. The objections should be grave, and the conflict between the statute and the constitution palpable before the judiciary should disregard a legislative enactment upon the sole ground that it embraced more than one object, or, if but one object, that it was not sufficiently expressed by that title". Evers v. Hudson, 36 M 135, 92 P 462 (1907); Yegen v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 34 M 79, 85 P 740 (1906); St. v. Anaconda Copper Min. Co., 23 M 498, 59 P 854 (1900).

Meaningless Words: Meaningless words or phrases in the title of an act may be discarded by construction, and if, after such elimination, the title clearly expresses the subject embraced in the act, it is not objectionable to Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const. Evers v. Hudson, 36 M 135, 92 P 462 (1907).

Object: In determining the question whether an act offends against this constitutional inhibition, the object sought to be accomplished by the legislation is a proper subject of inquiry. Evers v. Hudson, 36 M 135, 92 P 462 (1907).

Validation of Prior Acts: Page 50, Ch. 29, L. 1907, relating to the establishment and maintenance of county free high schools, does not contain more than one subject, namely provision for the establishment and maintenance of such schools, and for validating all acts done under enactments of the Legislature passed on the subject at prior sessions. Evers v. Hudson, 36 M 135, 92 P 462 (1907).

Direction to Subject: If the title of an act is single and directs the mind to the subject of the law in a way calculated to direct the attention truly to the matter which is proposed to be legislated upon, the object of the provision is satisfied. It is not satisfied unless the object of the legislation is clearly so expressed. St. v. Cunningham, 35 M 547, 90 P 755 (1907); St. v. Brown, 29 M 179, 74 P 366 (1903); W. Ranches v. Custer County, 28 M 278, 72 P 659 (1903).

Estray Law — Public Domain Not Synonymous With Range: The "estray law", p. 30 of L. 1903, entitled: "An act to define the word 'estray' and to provide a penalty for the taking up, using, or disposing of estrays upon the 'public domain'", section 1 of which defines an estray as an animal "which is away from its accustomed range", section 2 of which makes it a misdemeanor to take from the range any estray animal, and section 3 of which provides that one who, with intent to steal, disposes of or attempts to dispose of any estray shall be guilty of grand larceny, is void as violative of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., in that it embraces a subject not expressed in its title, the terms "public domain" and "range" not being synonymous. St. v. Cunningham, 35 M 547, 90 P 755 (1907).

Penalty Clause — Need Not Be Designated in the Title: A penalty clause may be incorporated in an act without being designated in its title. In re Terrett, 34 M 325, 86 P 266 (1906).

Creation of Board of Health — County Quarantine Power: Sections 11, 25, and 26 of the act approved March 15, 1901, the purpose of which was to create a State Board of Health (now abolished), define its powers and duties, and provide for the compensation of its officers and for the enforcement of its rules, while the body of the statute, among other things, confers upon County Boards of Health power to declare quarantine against contagious diseases and confine persons affected with such diseases in suitable detention hospitals, for which power is also granted, is unconstitutional as in contravention of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const. Yegen v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 34 M 79, 85 P 740 (1906).

License on Sellers — Omitted: Section 15, Ch. 120, L. 1903, entitled: "An act to create the office of meat and milk inspector for the state of Montana, and prescribing his powers and duties and compensation therefor", imposing a license on persons selling milk, is not in violation of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const. St. v. McKinney, 29 M 375, 74 P 1095 (1904).

Intent Not Inferable: Chapter 58, L. 1903, approved March 4, 1903, amending the game laws, is in conflict with Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., and void. The subject of the act is not clearly expressed in the title, and the intent of the Legislature cannot be inferred therefrom. St. v. Brown, 29 M 179, 74 P 366 (1903).

"Unlawful Levy" Construed: The act approved March 18, 1895, entitled: "An act providing for unlawful levy and collection of public revenue", is not in violation of the provisions of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., requiring the subject matter of acts to be clearly expressed in their titles, the words "providing for unlawful levy", etc., being construed as meaning "providing a remedy for unlawful levy", etc. W. Ranches v. Custer County, 28 M 278, 72 P 659 (1903).

Act Void Only to Nonexpressed Subject: The subject was clearly expressed in the title. If any subject is embraced in an act, which is not expressed in its title, such act is void only as to so much as is not so expressed, as Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., should receive a liberal construction. St. v. Courtney, 27 M 378, 71 P 308 (1903).

Casing of Mining Cages: Laws of 1897, p. 245, entitled: "An act to amend section 705 of Title X, of the Penal Code of the state of Montana, to have the cages in all mines cased in", making it unlawful for any corporation to sink or work through any vertical shaft where mining cages are used to a greater depth than 300 feet unless such shaft shall be provided with an iron-bonneted safety cage, sufficiently expresses the subject matter of the act in the title within the meaning of Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const. St. v. Anaconda Copper Min. Co., 23 M 498, 59 P 854 (1900).

Reference to Statutes: The title of the act of March 7, 1895, entitled: "An act to amend sections 364 and 365 of the Fifth Division of the Compiled Statutes of Montana and the amendments thereto, approved September 14, 1887", relating to the qualifications of Mayors and Aldermen, does not conflict with Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const. Dowty v. Pittwood, 23 M 113, 57 P 727 (1899).

Exemption of Existing Institutions: The act of March 4, 1897, entitled: "An act to provide for the organization . . . of building and loan associations . . ." is a general revision of the laws relating to one subject embraced therein and provides that corporations then existing should not be affected by the law unless they elected to come within its provisions. The omission in the title of this proviso did not nullify the act. Home Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Nolan, 21 M 205, 53 P 738 (1898).

Compensation of County Officers: The act of March 9, 1893, amending the act of 1891, concerning the compensation of county officers and providing for the payment of Sheriffs by salary and that the Commissioners shall fix the number of Deputy Sheriffs, is not repugnant to Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const. Jobb v. Meagher County, 20 M 424, 51 P 1034 (1898).

Use of "Repeal" — Meaning "Amend": An act approved March 4, 1897, was entitled: "An act repealing sections 470 and 472, Article IX, chapter III, part III, of the Political Code, relating to the appointment of the state land agent and his annual salary." These sections were amended and not repealed. The misuse of the word "repealing" instead of "amending" in the title of such act does not violate Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., since the other words of the title clearly point out the sections, chapter, title, and code and subject to be affected by the provisions of the bill. State ex rel. Neill v. Page, 20 M 238, 50 P 719 (1897).

Damage to Livestock: The act approved March 2, 1891, entitled: "An act requiring railroad companies to pay for damages to stock", which provides that railroad companies must fence their track or respond in damages, is not void because the title does not refer to fences or penalties. Snook v. Clark, 20 M 230, 50 P 718 (1897). See St. v. McKinney, 29 M 375, 74 P 1095 (1904); In re Terrett, 34 M 325, 86 P 266 (1906).

Effect on Bills to Revise or Harmonize Sections of Law: When the purpose of a bill is manifestly to harmonize and revise generally sections of the law referring to the same subject, it is not necessary to mention specifically in the title of the bill the several sections proposed to be amended or repealed. In re Ryan, 20 M 64, 50 P 129 (1897). See State ex rel. Cotter v. District Court, 49 M 146, 140 P 732 (1914).

Penalty as Incidental: The act entitled: "An act to regulate the sale and redemption of transportation tickets of common carriers", passed in 1893, provides for the appointment of agents to sell tickets and the issuance of a license and prescribes penalties for the violation of parts of the act. The subject of the act is clearly expressed in the title, since the penalty imposed is merely an incident to the regulation of the sale and redemption of transportation tickets, which is the subject of the law. St. v. Bernheim, 19 M 512, 49 P 441 (1897). See Snook v. Clark, 20 M 230, 50 P 718 (1897); St. v. McKinney, 29 M 375, 74 P 1095 (1904); In re Terrett, 34 M 325, 86 P 266 (1906); St. v. Ross, 38 M 319, 99 P 1056 (1909).

Amendment of Nonexisting Chapter: Chapter IX of the proposed Penal Code of 1895, entitled: "Gaming", and prohibiting the same, having been stricken out by the Legislature, and prior laws authorizing certain gambling games reenacted in lieu thereof, which were annexed to chapter VIII of the Penal Code, entitled "Lotteries", the act of February 28, 1895, entitled: "An act to amend chapter IX of the Penal Code of the state of Montana", and prohibiting all gambling, is in conflict with Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., since, at the time of the passage of said act of February 28 there was no chapter IX concerning gaming in the Penal Code to be amended, and as the other chapters numbered IX in said Code pertained to other subjects, there was nothing in the title of the bill to indicate to which one, if any, of the three existing chapters it was an amendment. St. v. Mitchell, 17 M 67, 42 P 100 (1895).

Amendment: The act of March 4, 1891, p. 225, L. 1891, entitled: "An act to amend sections 790, 795, 796, and 808, Fifth Division of the Compiled Statutes of Montana", relates to one general subject and is not obnoxious to Art. V, sec. 23, 1889 Mont. Const., prohibiting the passage of a law containing more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title. Hotchkiss v. Marion, 12 M 218, 29 P 821 (1892).

APPROPRIATION BY SEPARATE BILL

Single Subject: Upon the assumption that chapter contained an appropriation, it is but an incident to the single subject of the legislation and therefore is not violative of Art. V, sec. 33, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Hawkins v. Bd. of Examiners, 97 M 441, 35 P2d 116 (1934); State ex rel. Veeder v. Bd. of Educ., 97 M 121, 33 P2d 516 (1934).

Emergency Act: An emergency act, authorizing the erection of buildings, providing for the issuance of bonds, the pledging of the earnings of a school as well as of one-half of the income derived from the federal land grant, and empowering the State Board of Education to contract with the federal government under the National Recovery Act for repayment of the money borrowed, did not violate the provisions of Art. V, sec. 33, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Blume v. St. Bd. of Educ., 97 M 371, 34 P2d 515 (1934).

"Ordinary Expense": Any expense which recurs from time to time and is reasonably to be anticipated as likely to recur in the proper operation and maintenance of the departments of the state government is an "ordinary expense". Miller Ins. Agency v. Porter, 93 M 567, 20 P2d 643 (1933).

War Defense Act: The war defense act, Ch. 21, Ex. L. 1918 (omitted), was not subject to the constitutional objection that while it appropriates money, such appropriation is not made by a separate bill embracing one subject, as required by Art. V, sec. 33, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Campbell v. Stewart, 54 M 504, 171 P 755 (1918).

Appropriation Incidental: When an appropriation is a mere incident to a larger but single subject of legislation, it need not be made by separate bill as otherwise required by Art. V, sec. 33, 1889 Mont. Const. Hill v. Rae, 52 M 378, 158 P 826 (1916).

"Public Debt": The term "public debt" includes warrants as well as bonds. State ex rel. Palmer v. Hickman, 11 M 541, 29 P 92 (1892).

PURPOSE OF APPROPRIATION

Voter Education: Any power and authority a constitutional convention may possess to receive and expend public funds for voter education purposes must be exercised by the convention itself and may not be delegated to a committee. State ex rel. Kvaalen v. Graybill, 159 M 190, 496 P2d 1127 (1972).

Funds for Indigent Mothers: Payment of public funds to persons providing medical, hospitalization, and foster home care to indigent mothers who have sought or received assistance from private rather than public adoptive agencies does not violate Art. V, sec. 35, 1889 Mont. Const. Welfare Bd. v. Lutheran Social Serv., 156 M 381, 480 P2d 181 (1971).

Veterans' Organizations: An appropriation made to pay for secretarial services of two private veterans' organizations maintaining service offices in Montana, which were not under the control of the state, was prohibited by Art. V, sec. 35, 1889 Mont. Const., although the legislation was for a public purpose. Veterans' Welfare Comm'n v. VFW, 141 M 500, 379 P2d 107 (1963).

Appropriation for Water Conservation Board: Appropriations of state money made relative to the creation of the Montana Water Conservation Board (now Division of Water Resources), being for a public use, are not governed by provision that no appropriations shall be made for charitable, industrial, educational, or benevolent purposes to any person or corporation. State ex rel. Normile v. Cooney, 100 M 391, 47 P2d 637 (1935).

War Defense Act: Law known as the war defense act, Ch. 21, Ex. L. 1918 (omitted), was not objectionable as appropriating money for charitable, industrial, or benevolent purposes within the meaning of Art. V, sec. 35, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Campbell v. Stewart, 54 M 504, 171 P 755 (1918).

Seed-Grain Law: Article V, sec. 35, 1889 Mont. Const., was not offended by the seed-grain law (now repealed), designed to furnish aid to persons engaged in agriculture who, because they are so reduced in circumstances by natural or other conditions beyond their control, have no means wherewith to purchase seed, since the Legislature made no appropriation for the purpose sought to be served by the act. State ex rel. Cryderman v. Wienrich, 54 M 390, 170 P 942 (1918).

Guaranty Fund: The provision (since repealed), appropriating $20,000 to serve as a guaranty fund to assure prompt payment of interest on farm loan bonds, was void under Art. V, sec. 35, 1889 Mont. Const., because the funds thus appropriated are "not under the absolute control of the state". Hill v. Rae, 52 M 378, 158 P 826 (1916).

Attorney General's Opinions

County Authorized to Appropriate Money for Museum — City Authorized to Appropriate Money for Public Purpose — Constitutionality Analyzed: Pursuant to 7-16-2202 (now repealed), a county, but not a city, is authorized to create a program to provide grants to private, nonprofit museums. However, pursuant to 7-1-4124, a city is allowed to grant money to public or private entities as long as the grant is for a public purpose, such as a museum that would enhance the education and enjoyment of the general public, but that would not be merely for the gain of a private entity. The Attorney General declined to opine regarding the constitutionality of 7-1-4124 or 7-16-2202 (now repealed), in light of the prohibition in subsection (5) of this section, against the appropriation of public funds for any private individual, private association, or private corporation not under control of the state, but did analyze that constitutional provision as it related to the question of county or city expenditures for grants to private museum programs, concluding that the constitutional prohibition applies only to the appropriation of public funds by the Legislature, not by local governmental entities. 48 A.G. Op. 12 (2000), overruling prior opinions to the contrary in 37 A.G. Op. 25 (1977), 37 A.G. Op. 105 (1978), and 39 A.G. Op. 25 (1981).

Three-Fourths Vote Required to Appropriate Severance Tax Trust Fund Income: Income deposited in the coal severance tax permanent fund under 17-5-704 becomes part of the principal of the trust. As such, the Legislature may not appropriate by a simple majority the income and interest earned on the trust fund since July 1, 1983; rather, a three-fourths vote of each house is required. 42 A.G. Op. 110 (1988).

Statement of Intent Not Part of Bill or Law: Laws must be enacted by bills. A Statement of Intent is not part of the bill to which it is attached. Therefore, the Statement of Intent cannot be used in the interpretation of a clearly written statute. 39 A.G. Op. 68 (1982).

Restrictions in Appropriation Bill Subservient to Statutory Power to Provide Assistance to Counties: Section 7-6-2352 (now repealed) reflects legislative intent to make financial assistance grants for the purpose of offsetting virtually all excess costs associated with the operation of a District Court except those for building, capital, and library maintenance, replacement, and acquisition. Restrictive language in the general appropriation bill of the 1981 legislative session limited the appropriation to emergency funding and only when extraordinary expenses are incurred, expressly conflicting with 7-6-2352 (now repealed). The Attorney General noted that the courts have considered such restrictions with disfavor, that the appropriation bill title did not refer to restrictions on the appropriation, and that the language of Art. V, sec. 11, Mont. Const., limits a general appropriation bill to appropriations. Rejecting the repeal by implication of 7-6-2352 (now repealed) by the restrictions in the appropriation bill, it was concluded that the Department of Administration should follow the provisions of 7-6-2352 (now repealed) in providing financial assistance to counties for District Court expenses. 39 A.G. Op. 25 (1981).

Role of Montana Wheat Research and Marketing Committee in Political Action and Legal Action: "Marketing" is to be interpreted in its broadest sense to include the transportation of goods, including transportation rates. The Committee may take action to assure reasonable transportation rates if it is in the best interest of the wheat and barley growers of Montana as a whole. Political action, not legal action, is prohibited. Although in some situations, lawsuits against purchasers or growers of wheat or barley for violation of the wheat research and marketing statutes must be brought by the Department of Agriculture, that requirement did not govern a situation when the litigation in question was brought not merely to enforce the procedural requirements of the wheat research and marketing statutes but also to assure reasonable transportation rates. Actual use of Committee funds for permissible legal action is impermissible if the use of the funds is not under state control. The Committee also is prohibited from contributing to a legal fund over which it has no control; however, the Committee is not prohibited from engaging indirectly in litigation by funding research if it controls the expenditure of the funds for the studies by way of contract or agreement. 39 A.G. Op. 8 (1981).

Federal Revenue Sharing Funds — Allocation by Board of County Commissioners: The Board of County Commissioners of a county which had not adopted a self-government form of local government may not make a grant of federal revenue sharing funds to individual county residents for the purpose of creating a water district under Title 7, ch. 13, parts 22 and 23, because there is no express or necessarily implied authority under which such a grant could be made and because the statutes provide a different mechanism for the creation and funding of a water district. 39 A.G. Op. 6 (1981).

Appropriations — Legislative Control Over Marketing Assessment Funds: Although the control of the Legislature over appropriations to state agencies is based upon broad constitutional provisions, certain money may either be exempt from the appropriation process or the purposes for which that money may be appropriated may be limited by statute. Thus, the Legislature may control appropriations from the wheat marketing and research account but those appropriations are subject to the statutorily stated purposes of the account. Any attempt by the Legislature in an appropriation bill to alter the purposes for which appropriations from the account are made is subject to the constitutional restriction that the purpose of legislation must be clearly stated in the title of the bill. 39 A.G. Op. 3 (1981).

Gift to Private Nonprofit Corporation: Under 20-8-111, the Board of Public Education, in its discretion, may give money that has been donated for the use and benefit of the Montana School for the Deaf and Blind to a private nonprofit corporation created and controlled by the Board and operated for the benefit of that school. However, the Board remains accountable for the money until it is used directly for the general support, maintenance, or improvement of the Montana School for the Deaf and Blind. 38 A.G. Op. 111 (1980).

Attendance Unit on Hutterite Colony Premises — Establishment — Closure — Finance: A school district board of trustees may establish a separate attendance unit on the premises of a Hutterite colony located in the district. Closure of an attendance unit on the premises of a Hutterite colony is a matter within the discretion of the board of trustees of the school district involved, and the trustees have no authority to make an agreement to the contrary. The colony may effectively close an attendance unit by failing to renew the lease agreement if no similar space is available for its continued operation. Operational costs of an attendance unit must be budgeted and financed in the manner provided by law. Any agreement between the school district and the colony for private financing would be unenforceable. 38 A.G. Op. 26 (1979).

State Grants to Regional Mental Health Centers — Conditions: State grants to regional mental health centers are properly conditioned upon each recipient center accounting for all of its funds through the state treasury and the Statewide Budget and Accounting System (SBAS). 37 A.G. Op. 127 (1978).

County Powers — Revenue Funds: Unless a specific mode or manner of action is mandated by statute, counties may contract with individuals or private organizations, including nonprofit service organizations, for the purchase of services or materials the counties are authorized by statute to provide their constituents if the contracts are reasonable and appropriate methods of furnishing services or materials. Counties may use federal revenue sharing funds to purchase any services or materials they could use county tax revenues to purchase. 37 A.G. Op. 105 (1978).

Entire Student Body of Hutterite Faith: An elementary school district composed entirely of property belonging to North Harlem Hutterite Colony would be eligible to receive public money for school purposes without violating any provision of the Montana Constitution provided the school remains under the authority, control, and operation of the public school system by public school personnel and open to all persons eligible to attend this public school. 36 A.G. Op. 5 (1975).

Bill Title Held Sufficient to Identify Subject Matter: Senate Bill 254 of the 1973 Legislative Session, as codified in 23-2-616, sufficiently identifies the subject matter embraced within sections 2 and 3 of the bill, as codified in 23-2-617 and 23-2-619 (now repealed), respectively, because the codified sections have a natural and logical connection and can reasonably be said to relate, directly or indirectly, to one general subject of legislation (i.e., snowmobile decals). Thus, the title to Senate Bill 254, as codified, meets the requirements of Art. V, sec. 11(3), Mont. Const., requiring each bill contain only one subject. 35 A.G. Op. 64 (1974).

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

No Demonstration Beyond a Reasonable Doubt That the Statute is Unconstitutional: Plaintiffs argued that 39-71-413 of the Workers' Compensation Act violated various Montana constitutional provisions including the right to equal protection, the prohibition against legislation conferring any irrevocable grant of special privileges, franchises, or immunities, and the prohibition against special legislation. Statutes are presumed to be constitutional, and the court concluded that the plaintiffs failed to meet their burden of demonstrating beyond a reasonable doubt that 39-71-413 is unconstitutional. Alexander v. Bozeman Motors, Inc., 2010 MT 135, 356 Mont. 439, 234 P.3d 880.

Constitutionality of Notice Requirement of Dram Shop Law — Not Violative of Equal Protection — Not Considered Unlawful Special Legislation: A little over 1 year after being injured in an accident involving an intoxicated bar patron, plaintiffs brought an action against the bar to recover damages incurred as a result of the accident. The bar moved to dismiss the action under 27-1-710, which requires that a person who wishes to commence a dram shop action must notify the person who furnished alcohol by certified mail within 180 days from the date of sale or service. Plaintiffs admitted that they did not meet the notice requirement but argued that the notice provision was unenforceable because it was unconstitutional special legislation and violated plaintiffs' right to equal protection. The District Court dismissed the action as untimely and plaintiffs appealed the constitutional issues, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The notice requirement is rationally related to a legitimate government purpose, and while those who make a claim under the dram shop law must take an additional step before bringing suit, they are still in a situation similar to that of others who allege injury by the wrongful act or omission of another, so the notice requirement does not create an unreasonable classification in violation of equal protection. Additionally, the notice requirement does not constitute special legislation because it operates in the same manner upon all persons in like circumstances without conferring particular privileges or disabilities upon a class of persons arbitrarily selected from a larger group of persons, all of whom stand in the same relation to the privileges or disabilities. Rohlfs v. Klemenhagen, LLC, 2009 MT 440, 354 M 133, 227 P3d 42 (2009). See also State ex rel. Fisher v. School District, 97 M 358, 34 P2d 522 (1934), Lowery v. Garfield County, 122 M 571, 208 P2d 478 (1949), and Linder v. Smith, 193 M 20, 629 P2d 1187, 38 St. Rep. 912 (1981).

County Allowed Choice Whether to Issue Bonds Secured by Revolving Fund — County Not Relieved of Obligation to Make Loans to Deficient Rural Special Improvement Districts: The plain meaning of statutes regarding revolving funds, as well as the legislative history, supports the legislative intent to allow counties to choose whether to finance a rural special improvement district by issuing bonds secured by the revolving fund. Nothing in the statutes voids the commitment to loan from the revolving fund if the district becomes deficient. In this case, County Commissioners agreed to a revolving fund obligation and issued bonds secured by the revolving fund. The District Court reasoned that this was a violation of the constitutional prohibition against indebtedness beyond a certain percent, holding that the county was thus relieved of its obligation to make such loans. However, special improvement bond obligations are limited to the district funds and, if necessary, receive loans from the revolving fund. If both funds are insufficient to meet bond payments, there is no other source to pay the bonds. Under 7-12-2182, revolving fund levies are limited to an amount that would increase the balance in the fund to no more than 5% of the principal amount of the outstanding bonds. The District Court erred in its decision that the county was not obligated to make loans to the special improvement districts. Having exercised the discretion to institute a revolving fund and freely enter into an agreement with the bondholders and the underwriters, under both the terms of the agreement and applicable statutes, a county is obliged to carry out that contractual obligation. Loans from the revolving fund and subsequent tax levies are within the constitutional mandates of Art. VIII, sec. 1, Mont. Const., which requires that state funds be used for public purposes. Further, a county's obligation to make such loans and levy taxes to fund the revolving fund is mandatory, rather than discretionary, and is not an unconstitutional pledge of credit. Carbon County v. Dain Bosworth, Inc., 265 M 75, 874 P2d 718, 51 St. Rep. 436 (1994), distinguishing Stanley v. Jeffries, 86 M 114, 284 P 134 (1929), and Hansen v. Havre, 112 M 207, 114 P2d 1053 (1941).

Law Enforcement Academy Purchase Not Special or Local Act: A 1987 budgetary direction, included as part of the 1987 general appropriations act, directed the Department of Justice to purchase the previously leased modular facilities of the Montana Law Enforcement Academy. The District Court determined that this constitutional provision was offended because the budgetary direction was a special or local act. The Supreme Court found that the direction to purchase was regarded by the Legislature as an expense to be incurred in the coming biennium. The Legislature could have set out the budgetary direction in a separate statute or law instead of including it in the general law; however, the method used was not a violation of the constitutional prohibition against special or local acts. Cornwall v. St. 231 M 58, 752 P2d 135, 45 St. Rep. 429 (1988).

Annexation — Preservation of Existing Garbage Service — Constitutionality: The city of Billings contended that 7-2-4736 was a special or local act which violated Art. V, sec. 12, Mont. Const. The Supreme Court in State ex rel. Redman v. Meyers, 65 M 124, 210 P 1064 (1922), set out the test for a special law: "Does it operate equally upon all of a group of objects which, having regard to the purpose of the legislature, are distinguished by characteristics sufficiently marked and important to make them a class by themselves?" In the present case, the court determined that the legislative purpose to encourage private garbage service to unannexed areas was a sufficiently important governmental interest to justify the classification; hence, 7-2-4736 was held to be a general law which does not violate Art. V, sec. 12, Mont. Const. D & F Sanitation Serv. v. Billings, 219 M 437, 713 P2d 977, 43 St. Rep. 74 (1986).

Special Legislation — Permissible When General Act Cannot Be Provided: Plaintiff filed a complaint for declaratory judgment in the Supreme Court seeking to determine the validity of several acts of the Legislature allowing the issuance of state revenue bonds. The bonds would be financed by coal severance taxes to provide proceeds for development of state water resources. Plaintiff contended that the appropriation of funds for favorable loans to a score of small municipalities, water districts, and portions of counties constituted special legislation and was unconstitutional. The court noted that Art. V, sec. 12, Mont. Const., is not absolutely prohibitory. The court noted that the Legislature cannot draft a general act of statewide application providing for the issuance and sale of revenue bonds and at the same time keep a handle on the way the proceeds are to be spent or loaned except through its direct authorization of projects. The court held that the passage of Ch. 705, L. 1983, was an implementation of Title 85, ch. 1, part 6, and excluded no class of governmental entity. Therefore, those enactments were "general" legislation within the meaning of Art. V, sec. 12, Mont. Const. The court also held sections 5 and 6 of Ch. 705, L. 1983, were valid in any event because even though local in effect, these were provisions for which a general act could not be provided. Grossman v. St., 209 M 427, 682 P2d 1319, 41 St. Rep. 804 (1984).

Panel Act Not Special Legislation: The panel act does not constitute special legislation violative of equal protection guarantees because the medical profession as a group of potential tort defendants is getting special treatment not accorded to other tort defendants and medically injured plaintiffs are being subjected to barriers to the judicial system not put in the way of other tort plaintiffs. A law which operates in the same manner upon all persons in like circumstances is not "special" in the constitutional sense. The classifications rest on distinctions between the groups of tort plaintiffs and tort defendants involved that have a fair and rational relationship to the object of the legislation. Linder v. Smith, 193 M 20, 629 P2d 1187, 38 St. Rep. 912 (1981).

Card Games — Statute Constitutional: A declaratory judgment action yielded a District Court order declaring 23-5-311 constitutional. That order was appealed. The Supreme Court on review held the statute did not deny equal protection, was not special legislation, and was not void for vagueness. A criminal statute need not apply to all areas that may be injurious to public health to comply with equal protection requirements. Mere classification of the subjects of legislation does not deny equal protection. If all persons in the same class are treated alike, there is no violation of equal protection requirements. The statute was general and operated uniformly and equally on all persons in Montana and thus was a general law, not local or special legislation in the constitutional sense. The claim the term "poker" was vague was rejected because the appellant lacked standing to challenge the constitutionality of the statute because he was not injured or jeopardized by the alleged vagueness of the word "poker". Palmer v. St., 191 M 534, 625 P2d 550, 38 St. Rep. 447 (1981).

GENERAL

Livestock Liens — Notice Required: Section 81-8-301 (now repealed), relating to the requirement that mortgage lienholders of livestock file their lien with the recorder of marks and brands in order to give notice to livestock markets, does not constitute a special law in violation of Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const. The classification is legitimate and reasonable and operates equally upon every person or thing in the class. Mont. Meat Co. v. Missoula Livestock Auction Co., 125 M 66, 230 P2d 955 (1951).

Low-Income Housing: The state housing law, Title 7, ch. 15, part 44, held not invalid as special or class legislation in violation of Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., as singling out persons of low income for special treatment. Rutherford v. Great Falls, 107 M 512, 86 P2d 656 (1939).

Regulation of Trade — Special or Class Legislation: An act regulating a trade or profession that permits those engaged therein on the effective date of the act to continue without passing an examination as prescribed therein is not "special" or class legislation prohibited by Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const. St. v. Bays, 100 M 125, 47 P2d 50 (1935).

Classification Based on Natural Distinction: A law is general and uniform in its operation when it applies equally to all persons embraced within the class to which it is addressed, provided such classification is made upon some natural intrinsic or constitutional distinction between the persons within the class and others not embraced within it. It is not "general" and makes an improper discrimination if it confers particular privileges or imposes peculiar disabilities upon a class of persons arbitrarily selected from a large number of persons all of whom stand in the same relation to the privileges conferred or the disabilities imposed. The difference on which the classification is based must be such as, in some reasonable degree, will account for and justify the particular legislation. Leuthold v. Brandjord, 100 M 96, 47 P2d 41 (1935).

Motor Carrier Act — Grandfather Clause: The motor carrier act (Title 69, ch. 12) is not rendered unconstitutional as special legislation (Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const.) by the fact that under it holders of certificates of convenience and necessity, issued under prior acts of like tenor, are entitled to operate thereunder and are relieved of the burden of making new applications and submitting evidence to establish their right to such certificates. St. v. Healow, 98 M 177, 38 P2d 285 (1934).

Limitation to Included Group at Passage: A statute that limits its operation to those who are within its provisions at the time of its passage or within a limited time thereafter is special legislation, forbidden by Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const. Roberts v. Hosking, 95 M 562, 28 P2d 199 (1933).

"Special Law" — Defined: A special statute within the meaning of Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., forbidding such legislation, is one which relates to particular persons or things of a class or one made for individual cases and for less than a class or one which relates and applies to particular members of a class either particularized by the express terms of the act or separated by any method of selection from the whole class to which the law might, but for such limitation, be applicable. State ex rel. Powell v. St. Bank of Moore, 90 M 539, 4 P2d 717 (1931); State ex rel. Redman v. Meyers, 65 M 124, 210 P 1064 (1922).

Purpose of Provision: The object of Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., against special or local laws is to prevent a diversity of laws relating to the same subject. Arps v. St. Highway Comm'n, 90 M 152, 300 P 549 (1931), overruled on other grounds in Burgan & Walker v. St. Highway Comm'n, 114 M 459, 137 P2d 663 (1943).

Curative Act: A curative act that is made applicable to all places within the state or all things or subjects affected by the conditions which are to be remedied is not a special act within the meaning of the Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., prohibition against the enactment of special statutes. Weber v. Helena, 89 M 128, 297 P 464 (1931).

Special Statute — How Determined: Determination of the question whether a statute is special depends not upon what it includes but upon what it excludes. State ex rel. Redman v. Meyers, 65 M 124, 210 P 1064 (1922). See also State ex rel. Roundup Coal Min. Co v. Indus. Accident Bd., 94 M 386, 23 P2d 253 (1933).

When Special Laws Are Permissible: The concluding sentence of Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., does not prohibit special legislation altogether but does seek to curtail it. It forbids special laws where general laws can be made applicable. State ex rel. Ford v. Schofield, 53 M 502, 165 P 594 (1917).

Person Charged — Cannot Challenge: One charged with having aided and abetted in recording, reporting, and registering a bet on a horserace held without the state, contrary to the provisions of Ch. 92, L. 1909, may not call the constitutionality of the act in question on the ground that its provisions having to do with speed contests within the state are a denial of the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the federal Constitution and local or special in their character. St. v. Rose, 40 M 66, 105 P 82 (1909).

Persons Who May Complain Under This Provision: A person who is not one of a class whose rights are said to have been discriminated against by an alleged special act of the Legislature, contrary to the provisions of Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., will not be heard to complain of its unconstitutionality on that account. Spratt v. Helena Power Transmission Co., 37 M 60, 94 P 631 (1908).

LOCAL GOVERNMENT

When City Ordinance Violates Section: A city ordinance that prohibits the installation of plumbing called "Durham work", made of certain material, in one- or two-story buildings and permits its installation in all others over two stories high is arbitrary and unreasonable class legislation and therefore invalid as in conflict with Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., in the absence of evidence showing that the prohibited kind of material is detrimental to the health and safety of the people of the municipality. Practically the same rules apply to the validity of an ordinance as to enactment of a binding statute. Missoula v. Swanberg, 116 M 232, 149 P2d 248 (1944).

Special Improvement District — Revolving Funds: Contention that 7-12-4221 through 7-12-4228, referring to the matter of special improvement district revolving funds, contravene Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., as being special laws, held groundless under authority of the case of Stanley v. Jeffries, 86 M 114, 284 P 134 (1929). Hansen v. Havre, 112 M 207, 114 P2d 1053 (1941).

Constitutional Amendment Allowing Consolidation of Cities and Counties Not in Conflict With This Provision: Amendment to Art. XVI, 1889 Mont. Const., by adding thereto section 7, providing for the consolidation of county and city governments, held not open to the objection that it violates Art. V, sec. 26, of that instrument prohibiting the Legislature from passing a local or special act regulating county affairs, creating offices or prescribing the powers and duties of officers in counties and cities, or of section 31 thereof prohibiting the extension of terms of public officers or the increasing or diminishing of their salaries. State ex rel. Corry v. Cooney, 70 M 355, 225 P 1007 (1924), overruled, to the extent that a constitutional amendment may be valid under the single subject rule but fail under the separate vote rule, in Marshall v. St., 1999 MT 33, 293 M 274, 975 P2d 325, 56 St. Rep. 142 (1999).

County Printing: On the authority of Hersey v. Neilson, 47 M 132, 131 P 30 (1913), and Stange v. Esval, 67 M 301, 215 P 807 (1923), held that section 4482, R.C.M. 1921 (since repealed), requiring the contract for county printing to be let to a newspaper published in the particular county continuously for a period of 1 year immediately preceding its letting, is not void as in violation of the 5th and 14th amendments to the federal Constitution, as depriving the county of the right to contract and granting a person a privilege or immunity not granted to another or of Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., prohibiting the enactment of special or class legislation, or of Art. III, sec. 2 and 27 thereof, as denying the county the right to contract and depriving it of property without due process of law. State ex rel. Woare v. Bd. of Comm'rs, 70 M 252, 225 P 389 (1924).

Creation of County — Legislative Determination: Chapter 56, L. 1917 (omitted), creating Carter County, is not invalid as violative of Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., forbidding special legislation where a general law can be made applicable. The act creating the county is an implied legislative determination that the general law providing for the creation of new counties is no longer applicable under present conditions. State ex rel. Ford v. Schofield, 53 M 502, 165 P 594 (1917).

"Changing" and "Removing" Defined: The words "changing" and "removing" found in the 1889 Constitution and the statute laws refer to the act of changing or removing a county seat that has been definitely located and have no reference to a so-called temporary or provisional county seat. State ex rel. Geiger v. Long, 43 M 401, 117 P 104 (1911).

Changing the Names of Persons or Places: The provision of Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., prohibiting the Legislature from passing local or special laws changing the names of persons or "places", applies to the names of counties, notwithstanding Art. VI, sec. 4, and Art. XVI, sec. 1 and 3, 1889 Mont. Const., recognizing the power of the Legislature to create new counties and to change those already established. State ex rel. Sackett v. Thomas, 25 M 226, 64 P 503 (1901).

Counties — Not to Be Disturbed: Under the Constitution, the Legislature has the power to create counties and give them names or to destroy them, but after they are created, they may not be disturbed by special or local legislation, except incidentally in the exercise of the creative power or in cases where a general law cannot be made applicable. State ex rel. Sackett v. Thomas, 25 M 226, 64 P 503 (1901).

Creation of a New County by Special Act Not Forbidden by This Provision: The creation of a new county by special act is not forbidden by Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., and matters necessarily incidental to the creation of a new county which are provided for in the act creating it, solely for the purpose of organizing the new county and setting it in motion as one of the governmental subdivisions of the state, do not come within either the letter or the spirit of its inhibitions. Holliday v. Sweet Grass County, 19 M 364, 48 P 553 (1897).

Regulating County Affairs: The proviso to section 794, Fifth Division, of the Compiled Statutes of 1887, enacted by the Territorial Legislature, which excepts the county of Missoula from the provisions of the law fixing the rate of interest on county warrants, is in conflict with the provisions of Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., prohibiting the passage of local or special laws regulating county affairs and the rate of interest on money. Hotchkiss v. Marion, 12 M 218, 29 P 821 (1892).

SCHOOLS

Classification — Reasonable in Light of Purpose: Section 75-4601, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), was not violative of Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const. It was general in its application and the classification made by it was reasonable in the light of the purpose, which was limited to the construction, repair, improvement, and equipment of school buildings. Lorang v. High School District "C" of Cascade County, 126 M 204, 247 P2d 477 (1952).

Workmen Employed by School Districts: Chapter 79, L. 1939, amending 39-71-602 (unconstitutional portion omitted), excepting workmen employed by school districts from the prescribed limitation of time within which claims for injuries must be presented to the party liable or from the filing of claims with the Industrial Accident Board (now Division of Workers' Compensation) under the Workmen's Compensation Act (now Workers' Compensation Act), held unconstitutional as being a special act in the nature of class legislation in contravention of Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const. Kerruish v. Indus. Accident Bd., 112 M 556, 118 P2d 1049 (1941).

Application Based on Population: Held, that sections 75-4601 through 75-4606, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), not a "special law" within the meaning of Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., on contention that by providing that said sections shall not apply to any high school district in a county having a population of 45,000 or over, based on the 1930 federal census, thereby not reaching all counties falling within that class. State ex rel. Berthot v. Gallatin County High School District, 102 M 356, 58 P2d 264 (1936).

County Bonds for High Schools: Held, that Ch. 29, L. 1929 (since repealed), authorizing the issuance of county bonds for high school purposes is not violative of the provisions of Art. XIII, sec. 3, 1889 Mont. Const., prohibiting the use of borrowed funds for any purpose other than that specified in the law authorizing the loan, or of Art. XII, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const., declaring that taxes shall be levied and collected by general laws and for public purposes only, or Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., providing that local or special laws regulating county affairs for the management of common schools and the assessment and collection of taxes shall not be passed; held, further, that the act is not open to the objection that it fails to provide a workable plan. State ex rel. Henderson v. Dawson County, 87 M 122, 286 P 125 (1930).

Creation of Joint School Districts: Section 1038, R.C.M. 1921 (omitted), relating to the creation of joint school districts, is invalid as special legislation upon a subject covered by a general statute (section 75-1814, R.C.M. 1947, now repealed), in that it operates only upon existing districts divided by the creation of new counties under the new counties act and excludes from its operation all existing districts which may have been or may be divided by the creation of new counties by direct legislative acts. State ex rel. Redman v. Meyers, 65 M 124, 210 P 1064 (1922).

Classification on Population: A law which classifies school districts according to population and provides a system for the election of trustees which is uniform for all districts within the same class is not a local or special law within the meaning of Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., although the law provides that the elections in the different classes shall be held under different supervision. State ex rel. Bray v. Long, 21 M 26, 52 P 645 (1898), overruled on other grounds in Palatine Ins. Co. v. N. Pac. Ry. Co., 34 M 268, 85 P 1032 (1906).

REAL PROPERTY

Small Tract Financing Act: Small Tract Financing Act of Montana's 3-acre classification was not special legislation favoring rural landowners; it was reasonable in that it fostered development of state, added to its prosperity, and treated all those within class equally. Great Falls Nat'l Bank v. McCormick, 152 M 319, 448 P2d 991 (1968).

Grazing Districts: Title 76, ch. 16, relating to grazing districts, does not constitute a local or special law in violation of Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const. Thompson v. Tobacco Root Co-op St. Grazing District, 121 M 445, 193 P2d 811 (1948).

Repurchase of Tax Delinquent Property — Conditions: Section 2235, R.C.M. 1935 (since repealed), authorizing the former owner of real property held by a county under tax deed to repurchase it under certain conditions, held not in violation of Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., relating, as it does, to all instances coming within a general class of situations, i.e., those in which real estate has been taken by tax deed and is held by the county after the effective date of the act. Blackford v. Judith Basin County, 109 M 578, 98 P2d 872 (1940).

Lease Extension: Chapter 61, L. 1935 (omitted), directing the State Board of Land Commissioners to extend for 3 years all grazing leases previously issued for 2 years or less under earlier statute, without requiring open bidding, was "general" and not "special" in that it related to all members in the class of short-term leasers. Leuthold v. Brandjord, 100 M 96, 47 P2d 41 (1935).

Application to All Persons in Like Circumstances: Article V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., prohibiting the enactment of a special statute, does not extend to a reasonable classification of persons, and one which operates in the same manner upon all persons in like circumstances is not "special" in the constitutional sense. Chapter 88, L. 1935 (omitted), granting the privilege of redemption of property sold for taxes without the exaction of penalty and interest to all persons in the same situation is a general and not a special act. State ex rel. Sparling v. Hitsman, 99 M 521, 44 P2d 747 (1935).

CORPORATIONS

Public Corporation — Agency of State: Chapter 95, L. 1935, found under Title 85, ch. 1, is not a special or local law granting to a corporation special or exclusive privileges, immunities, or franchises prescribed in Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const. The board, being a public corporation, is an agency of the state and as such not included in the prohibition of Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Normile v. Cooney, 100 M 391, 47 P2d 637 (1935).

Bank Reports: Chapter 64, L. 1929 (Title 15, ch. 8, part 1), and Ch. 64, L. 1927 (15-24-505, now repealed), so far as they relate to taxation of moneyed capital and shares of stock of state banks, in requiring reports for purposes of assessment by a banking corporation, though none is required from owners of competing capital, are not special laws in contravention of Art. V, sec.

26, 1889 Mont. Const. The taxing officers under other provisions of law have authority to call for such reports. Bank of Miles City v. Custer County, 93 M 291, 19 P2d 885 (1933).

Confidential Financial Information: Section 108, Ch. 89, L. 1927 (32-1-339), which, by denying to a stockholder in a state bank the right to inspect certain of its books, in effect prohibits bank officials from divulging semiconfidential information they receive as to the financial standing of the bank's customers, is not a special law (Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const.) or one making an unreasonable classification in making the act applicable only to state banks. State ex rel. Powell v. St. Bank of Moore, 90 M 539, 4 P2d 717 (1931).

Creating a Private Corporation: The 1889 Constitution makes it impossible for a private corporation to be created in this state by a special act of the Legislature. In re Beck's Estate, 44 M 561, 121 P 784 (1912).

Incorporation for Guaranteeing Bonds: The act of March 9, 1893, which by sections 1 and 2 (33-26-101 and 33-26-102) authorizes any corporation incorporated in the state for guaranteeing or becoming a surety on bonds to become a sole surety, without an affidavit showing qualifications, is not a special law regulating the practice in courts of justice or granting to a corporation a special or exclusive privilege. King v. Pony Gold Min. Co., 24 M 470, 62 P 783 (1900).

Exemption of Existing Institutions: A proviso that an act, approved March 4, 1897, shall not affect any building and loan association heretofore organized under the laws of Montana, unless such association elects to come under its provisions, operates alike on all corporations and is valid. The proviso is neither local nor special and does not purport to charter an association. Home Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Nolan, 21 M 205, 53 P 738 (1898).

PUBLIC EMPLOYEES

Retirement Pay — Deduction of Workers' Compensation Benefits: The provision in section 68-901(h), R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), requiring the deduction of workmen's compensation benefits in determining the retirement pay of a public employee who is receiving workmen's compensation for a total disability is unconstitutionally discriminatory in treating totally disabled employees less favorably than those only partially disabled. State ex rel. Morgan v. White, 136 M 470, 348 P2d 991 (1960).

County Attorneys — Salary Increase: Chapter 87, L. 1943, amending 7-4-2505, relating to and increasing salaries of deputy and assistant county officials by permitting a 12½% increase in their maximum salaries, held not to offend against Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., since it is not a special law but a law of general operation. Adami v. Lewis & Clark County, 114 M 557, 138 P2d 969 (1943).

"Public Officers": The term "public officers" as used in Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., in prohibiting the enactment of special laws increasing "allowances of public officers", was held to mean officers having a fixed and definite term and not appointive officers who hold at the pleasure of the appointing power. Adami v. Lewis & Clark County, 114 M 557, 138 P2d 969 (1943).

Exemption of Certain State Employees From Necessity of Taking Examination: Subsection (3) of sec. 2, Ch. 46, L. 1933 (sections 66-1801 through 66-1812, R.C.M. 1947, now repealed), which chapter regulates the practice of the profession of public accounting, exempting certain state employees who shall have been continuously engaged in their several employments for at least 4 years prior to making application for a certificate entitling them to engage in the profession of public accounting from examination as to their qualifications to which others not so employed must submit, is unconstitutional as special legislation. Roberts v. Hosking, 95 M 562, 28 P2d 199 (1933).

Teachers' Pensions: Chapter 95, L. 1915 (sections 1113 through 1132, R.C.M. 1935, since repealed), providing for teachers' pensions, is not invalid as in contravention of Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const. Trumper v. School District, 55 M 90, 173 P 946 (1918).

LEGISLATURE

Creation of Legislative Council: Chapter 34, L. 1957 (Title 5, ch. 11, part 1), creating the Legislative Council, did not violate Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. James v. Aronson, 132 M 120, 314 P2d 849 (1957), overruling State ex rel. Mitchell v. Holmes, 128 M 275, 274 P2d 611 (1954).

Legislature to Decide Whether General Law Would Be Applicable: Where the Legislature passes a special act, the question whether or not a general law on the subject could have been made applicable is one, broadly speaking, for that body alone. Arps v. St. Highway Comm'n, 90 M 152, 300 P 549 (1931), overruled on other grounds in Burgan & Walker v. St. Highway Comm'n, 114 M 459, 137 P2d 663 (1943).

Determination by Legislature — General Statute Inadequate: Courts will not generally interfere with the determination of the Legislature evinced by enacting a special statute, that the general law covering the subject is inapplicable because of extrinsic facts and circumstances or that the general statute has spent its force with the passing of time and has become inadequate. They will hold the special act invalid under Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., where there are not and cannot be such facts or circumstances which can militate against the operation of the general law. State ex rel. Redman v. Meyers, 65 M 124, 210 P 1064 (1922).

Express Restriction: Article V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., embodies an express restriction upon the powers of the Legislative Assembly. Lloyd v. Silver Bow County, 11 M 408, 28 P 453 (1891).

COURTS

Divorce Proceedings: Proceedings for divorce undoubtedly are statutory, but jurisdiction in matters of divorce is constitutional and may not be abridged. Trudgen v. Trudgen, 134 M 174, 329 P2d 225 (1958).

Shortening Period of Limitation: Section 84-4159, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), was a special law shortening the period of the Statute of Limitations with respect to certain persons and individuals and was invalid. Mitchell v. Garfield County, 123 M 115, 208 P2d 497 (1949); Ross v. First Trust & Sav. Bank, 123 M 81, 208 P2d 490 (1949); Lowery v. Garfield County, 122 M 571, 208 P2d 478 (1949).

Reopening of Claim for Workmen's Compensation: Chapter 85, L. 1933 (omitted), in effect authorizing the reopening of a claim for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act (now Workers' Compensation Act) of one designated by name, after denial thereof by the board for failure to follow the statutory directions with reference to filing notice of accident and after the matter had become res judicata, and directing the board to investigate the claim as though all necessary steps had been taken by the claimant, is a special statute and as such invalid. State ex rel. Roundup Coal Min. Co. v. Indus. Accident Bd., 94 M 386, 23 P2d 253 (1933).

INTEREST RATES

Retail Installment Sales Act: The Montana Retail Installment Sales Act is constitutional both before and after the 1971 amendments, making it applicable to revolving charge accounts. The act was not a special or local law regulating the rate of interest on money in violation of Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., since the finance charges imposed pursuant to the act are time price differentials rather than interest and since there is a reasonable basis for the classification and different treatment of those involved in revolving charge transactions. The act did not grant special or exclusive privileges as prohibited by Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., since the legislative classifications in the act are constitutionally permissible. Cecil v. Allied Stores Corp., 162 M 491, 513 P2d 704 (1973).

Interest on Retail Installment Sales Contracts: In a diversity action to recover the balance due on a note and conditional sales contract executed and delivered by defendants to a North Dakota corporation and assigned by it to plaintiff, where defendants contended that the rate of interest charged them pursuant to the Montana Retail Installment Sales Act, 31-1-241 (prior to amendment), was 16.3%, which exceeded the maximum rate of 10% permitted by 31-1-107 and constituted a special law regulating the rate of interest on money, proscribed by Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., the federal court applied the abstention doctrine and postponed further action until the issue was determined by the Supreme Court of Montana. B-W Acceptance Corp. v. Torgerson, 234 F. Supp. 214 (D.C. Mont. 1964).

ELECTIONS

Shortening of Registration Time: Chapter 95, L. 1931 (omitted), was not obnoxious to the provision of Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., that the Legislative Assembly shall not pass local or special laws for the opening or conducting of any election or designating the place of voting. The act provided that the election at which the proposition was to be submitted to the people should be held under the general election laws, with certain provisions relative to the shortening of time of registration and notice, made necessary by the exigencies of the case, neither of which had anything to do with the opening or conducting of the election. Arps v. St. Highway Comm'n, 90 M 152, 300 P 549 (1931), overruled on other grounds in Burgan & Walker v. St. Highway Comm'n, 114 M 459, 137 P2d 663 (1943).

Election Contests — Attorney Fees: Sections 94-1467 and 94-1468, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), awarding the successful party in an election contest attorney's fees, etc., are not open to constitutional objections that they deny to the unsuccessful one the equal protection of the laws, grant to the former a special privilege not enjoyed by successful litigants in other cases, violate the provision that justice shall be administered without sale, denial, or delay, and constitute an attempt to delegate legislative power to the courts. Doty v. Reece, 53 M 404, 164 P 542 (1917).

TAXATION

Revolving Fund: Held, in a taxpayer's suit, that Ch. 24, L. 1929 (7-12-4221 through 7-12-4228), creating a revolving fund to be raised by transfers from the general fund of the city or town which shall be deemed loans, and in addition to or in lieu of such transfers, from a tax levy, to secure prompt payment of special improvement district bonds or warrants, is not invalid as violative of either sec. 1 of the 14th amendment to the federal Constitution, guaranteeing the equal protection of the laws, or Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., prohibiting the passage of special laws. Stanley v. Jeffries, 86 M 114, 284 P 134 (1929).

License Tax on Gas Distributors: Chapter 186, L. 1925 (since repealed), imposing a license tax upon dealers and distributors of gasoline (superseded by Initiative Measure No. 31, p. 604, L. 1927, since repealed), under which a dealer sought to recover a tax paid under protest on the grounds that the act was unconstitutional as offending against the Equal Protection of the Law Clause of the federal Constitution, as well as against the provisions of Art. XII, sec. 11; Art. XV, sec. 11; and Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., to the effect that taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, that foreign corporations engaged in business in the state shall not have any greater rights or privileges than domestic corporations, and that the Legislative Assembly shall not pass local or special laws where a general law can be made to apply, is not open to the attacks made upon it. Hart Refineries v. Harmon, 81 M 423, 263 P 687 (1928).

ROADS AND HIGHWAYS

Toll Bridges: Chapter 51, L. 1949 (section 32-1621, R.C.M. 1947, now repealed), which authorized the expenditure of state highway funds on "All toll bridges crossing any river in the state of Montana", was a local and special law since the only bridge crossing any river in the state where tolls are collected for its use is the Great Northern Railway bridge at Snowden. Sjostrum v. St. Highway Comm'n, 124 M 562, 228 P2d 238 (1951).

Parking Meters: The installation and use of parking meters by a city is not in violation of Art. V, sec. 26, 1889 Mont. Const., prohibiting local or special laws chartering or licensing toll roads. Glodt v. Missoula, 121 M 178, 190 P2d 545 (1948).

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

Necessity of Verified Complaint: The Judicial Standards Commission initiated an investigation upon receipt of a letter from a retired District Judge, contrary to its own rules and the statute requiring that such investigations be initiated by a verified complaint. It argued that because the Constitution prescribed its investigative authority and granted rulemaking power to implement its authority, the Legislature was without power to specify the procedure by which it exercised such authority. The court disagreed, finding that under Art. V, sec. 13(1), Mont. Const., the Legislature has broad powers relating to removal of public officers and that there can be no inhibition of the legislative power, irrespective of rulemaking authority granted to the Commission, to make suitable provision not in conflict with the constitutionally granted powers of the Commission, including the requirement that the Commission may act only upon a verified complaint. State ex rel. Shea v. Judicial Standards Comm'n, 198 M 15, 643 P2d 210, 39 St. Rep. 521 (1982).

Judicial Nomination Procedure: The established procedures for filling judicial vacancies in Montana are constitutional and not repugnant to applicable provisions of the Montana Constitution. Jones v. Judge, 176 M 251, 577 P2d 846 (1978).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Removal of State Officer: The provisions of 2-16-213(1), that when the term of office is not fixed by law the office is held at the pleasure of the appointing power, did not violate Art. V, sec. 18, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. MacGilvra v. District Court, 148 M 182, 418 P2d 874 (1966).

Police Judge — Not Judicial Officer: A police judge is not a "judicial officer" as that term is used in Art. V, sec. 18, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Ryan v. Norby, 118 M 283, 165 P2d 302 (1946).

Resignation of Office to Run for Another: Chapter 116, L. 1937 (since repealed), providing that the holder of a public office must tender his resignation upon becoming a candidate for another office, etc., held not open to the contention that it adds causes of removal of public officers to those provided for by Art. V, sec. 17, 1889 Mont. Const., it simply providing a method whereby a public officer may voluntarily abandon his office; nor may the act be held arbitrary or capricious. Mulholland v. Ayers, 109 M 558, 99 P2d 234 (1940).

Governor Not Disqualified by Estoppel or Res Judicata in Hearing Removal Charges: Proceeding under Art. V, sec. 18, 1889 Mont. Const., to remove members of Highway Commission (now Transportation Commission) for collection of illegal fees and per diem, Governor not barred from passing upon accusation by doctrines of estoppel or res judicata because he had passed upon and approved the alleged illegal claims as a member of the State Board of Examiners (now Department of Administration). State ex rel. Matson v. O'Hern, 104 M 126, 65 P2d 619 (1937).

Misconduct — Need Not Be Willful: The word "misconduct" as used in Art. V, sec. 18, 1889 Mont. Const., includes any act involving moral turpitude or which is contrary to justice, honesty, principle, or good morals; it need not be willful, nor does it necessarily imply corruption or criminal neglect. State ex rel. Matson v. O'Hern, 104 M 126, 65 P2d 619 (1937).

Corrupt Practices: Held, that section 94-1450, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), known as corrupt practices act, does not contravene the provisions of Art. V, sec. 17, 1889 Mont. Const., and District Court has jurisdiction to entertain a proceeding for removal of state officer for violation thereof and to test the validity of his election. Tipton v. Sands, 103 M 1, 60 P2d 662 (1936).

Enactment of Removal Statutes — Legislative Power: Article V, sec. 17, 1889 Mont. Const., provides for the removal of certain officers by impeachment, and sec. 18 of the same article declares that officers not liable to impeachment are subject to removal for misconduct or malfeasance in office, in such manner as may be provided by law. Recalling that our Constitution is a limitation and not a grant of power, it will be seen at once that the provisions of sec. 18 added nothing to the power which the Legislature would have had in the absence of such provisions. In other words, the Legislature was left entirely free to enact such statutes as it might see fit providing for the removal of officers other than those enumerated in sec. 17. State ex rel. Bullock v. District Court, 62 M 600, 205 P 955 (1922).

Legislative Power: Article V, sec. 18, 1889 Mont. Const., added nothing to the power which the Legislature would have had in the absence of the provisions therein contained. In other words, the Legislature was left entirely free to enact such statutes as it might see fit providing for the removal of officers other than those enumerated in Art. V, sec. 17, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Bullock v. District Court, 62 M 600, 205 P 955 (1922); State ex rel. Payne v. District Court, 53 M 350, 165 P 294 (1917).

"Misconduct in Office": Any act involving moral turpitude, or any act which is contrary to justice, honesty, principle, or good morals, if performed by virtue of office or by authority of office, is included in the term "misconduct in office". State ex rel. Ryan v. Bd. of Aldermen, 45 M 188, 122 P 569 (1912); State ex rel. Wynne v. Examining & Trial Bd., 43 M 389, 117 P 77 (1911).

Official Misconduct: In pursuance of Art. V, sec. 18, 1889 Mont. Const., the Legislature enacted 45-7-401. It appears that the section was intended to apply to those cases in which the accused has been guilty of willful or corrupt misconduct or malfeasance, and to those derelictions which are the result of incompetency or inattention to official duties. State ex rel. Rowe v. District Court, 44 M 318, 119 P 1103 (1911).

Constitutional Officers Only: Article V, sec. 17, 1889 Mont. Const., is only applicable to constitutional officers and does not cover a city police judge, whose office is statutory only. State ex rel. Working v. Mayor, 43 M 61, 114 P 777 (1911).

Removal of City Officers: Section 7-4-4113, authorizing the City Council to remove any officer on written charges after notice by a two-thirds vote of all the members elect, is in consonance with Art. V, sec. 18, 1889 Mont. Const.; the statute is a proper exercise of the legislative authority granted, and a police judge of a city may be removed in a proper case by the City Council. State ex rel. Working v. Mayor, 43 M 61, 114 P 777 (1911).

Constitution Exclusive: The framers of the Constitution did not regard a Senator as either a state or judicial officer, within the meaning of those terms as employed in Art. V, sec. 17, 1889 Mont. Const. He cannot be a judicial officer because the Constitution expressly provides that a judicial officer may be removed by impeachment, and a Senator cannot be so removed. The Governor and other state and judicial officers can be removed only by impeachment. The constitutional provision is exclusive. State ex rel. Haviland v. Beadle, 42 M 174, 111 P 720 (1910).

Impeachment Power — Vested in Legislature: Article V, sec. 16, 1889 Mont. Const., provided that the sole power of impeachment is vested in the House of Representatives and that impeachment shall be tried by the Senate sitting for that purpose. The Senate cannot initiate the proceedings; the House must perform that function, whereupon the Senate tries the impeachment. It will thus be seen that it is the Legislative Assembly, constituting the legislative department of the state government, to which is delegated by the Constitution the sole power of impeachment from its initiatory step to the final judgment. In other words, the jurisdiction to conduct and determine impeachments is by the Constitution lodged solely in the legislative department. A Senator or Representative, by virtue of the fact that he may act in impeachment proceedings, does not thereby lose his character or status as a member of the Legislative Assembly. It is only because of the fact that he is such Senator or Representative that he may act in such proceedings. State ex rel. Haviland v. Beadle, 42 M 174, 111 P 720 (1910).

Judicial Officers: "Judicial officers", as used in Art. V, sec. 17, 1889 Mont. Const., was adopted by the Legislative Assembly in passing 5-5-401, both provisions using the phrase in the same sense. State ex rel. Haviland v. Beadle, 42 M 174, 111 P 720 (1910).

Legislators Not State Officers: The words "state officers", as employed in Art. V, sec. 17, 1889 Mont. Const., do not include members of the Legislative Assembly. Members of the Legislative Assembly are not liable to impeachment. State ex rel. Haviland v. Beadle, 42 M 174, 111 P 720 (1910).

State and Judicial Officers — Who Are: A policeman is not a state officer subject to removal by impeachment in accordance with the provisions of Art. V, sec. 17, 1889 Mont. Const. He is a public officer in the sense that he has certain duties to perform other than those strictly pertaining to the government of the municipality for which he is acting. State ex rel. Quintin v. Edwards, 38 M 250, 99 P 940 (1908).

Section 14. Districting and apportionment.

(1) New provision for single-member house districts. Two house districts constitute a senatorial district. (2) and (3) new provision which establishes a five member commission to recommend a reapportionment plan after each U.S. census. 1984 Amendment by Referendum: Constitutional Amendment No. 14, proposed by Ch. 421, L. 1983, and approved at the general election held November 6, 1984, in (2) near end of first sentence after "legislative" substituted "districts and a plan for redistricting the state into congressional districts" for "and congressional districts"; inserted (3) relating to deadline for congressional districts; in (4) in first sentence and last sentence after "plan" inserted "for legislative districts"; and in (5) substituted existing text relating to dissolution of commission upon filing of both plans for "The commission is then dissolved." Amendment effective October 1, 1985. (See text of referendum in final volume of 1985 Laws of Montana.)

Accelerated Effective Date: Section 1 of the Transition Schedule for implementing the 1972 Montana Constitution provided: "Section 1. Accelerated effective date. Section 6 (SESSIONS) and section 14 (DISTRICTING AND APPORTIONMENT) of Article V, THE LEGISLATURE, shall be effective January 1, 1973."

The convention note for section 1 of the Transition Schedule provided: "Proposed section on annual legislative sessions and reapportionment of the legislature would be effective January 1, 1973. The reapportionment commission could then be appointed by the 1973 legislature and report its plan to the 1974 legislature."

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

Districting and Apportionment Commission Part of Legislative Branch: The Districting and Apportionment Commission is exempt from the public participation requirements of Art. II, sec. 8, Mont. Const., and statutes regarding participation in government because the Commission is attached to the Legislative Branch and is not an agency and thus not a part of the Executive Branch. Willems v. St., 2014 MT 82, 374 Mont. 343, 325 P.3d 1204.

No Authority of Legislature to Assign Holdover Senators Following Redistricting: The 2003 Districting and Apportionment Commission plan for redistricting House and Senate districts assigned holdover Senators who were elected under the old districting system to redrawn districts under the new system, and the Commission submitted the plan to the 2003 Legislature for recommendations. In response, the Legislature passed 5-1-116, granting to itself the power to assign holdover Senators to districts for the remainder of their terms and prohibiting the Commission from making those assignments. The Legislature then passed further legislation implementing its recommendations. Three of the holdover Senators challenged the legislative assignments. The District Court declared 5-1-116 and the implementing legislation unconstitutional, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Under this section, the mandate that the Districting and Apportionment Commission effect redistricting is self-executing, and the power to assign districts for holdover Senators is historically an inherent part of the redistricting process. The constitutional grant of redistricting power to the Commission constitutes a denial of any latitude to the Legislature to invoke its plenary powers. Thus, the 2003 legislation designed to transfer the power to assign holdover Senators from the Commission to the Legislature was unconstitutional and of no force and effect. Wheat v. Brown, 2004 MT 33, 320 M 15, 85 P3d 765 (2004). See also Cargo v. Paulus, 635 P2d 367 (Oreg. 1981).

Dilution of Voting Strength: Plaintiffs contended that the 1992 redistricting plan for the Montana House of Representatives and Senate diluted the voting strength of American Indians in violation of section 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 42 U.S.C. 1973. The plaintiffs also alleged that the redistricting plan was adopted with a discriminatory purpose in violation of section 2 of the Voting Rights Act. The federal District Court rejected both claims. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals determined that the District Court's finding that the plan did not dilute the voting strength of American Indians was based upon two errors. The errors were that white bloc voting in majority-white House districts was not legally significant and that American Indians were proportionally represented under the 1992 redistricting plan. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed and remanded with instruction to determine whether, in light of the totality of the circumstances, vote dilution had occurred. Old Person v. Cooney, 230 F3d 1113 (2000). On remand, the District Court held that the plaintiffs had limited standing and to prevail had to show, but did not show, vote dilution in the specific legislative districts where they resided. Also, the District Court held that even if the plaintiffs had shown vote dilution, their claim failed because of the unavailability of an adequate remedy. The District Court reasoned that the state would be redistricting in 2003, and the 2002 elections (the last elections to be conducted under the 1992 plan) were fast approaching. The plaintiffs appealed. The Ninth Circuit Court held that under the totality of the circumstances, it was not clearly erroneous for the District Court to determine that there was no vote dilution. The District Court's ruling dismissing the Voting Rights Act of 1965 claim based on the conclusion that there was no vote dilution was affirmed. Old Person v. Brown, 312 F3d 1036 (2002).

Application of 1983 Reapportionment Commission Criteria — Balancing of Criteria: The 1983 Reapportionment Commission established five criteria to follow in redistricting that addressed governmental boundaries, geographic boundaries, communities of interest, consideration of existing district boundaries, and an attempt to stay within a 5% plus or minus deviation from the ideal district population. The court held that these criteria were considerations and that conflicts between them as they existed within a district or between districts must be balanced in arriving at a plan embracing the entire state. The Commission interprets its own criteria, such as what constitutes a community of interest and the possible ripple effects of any particular change; thus when the Commission made a good faith effort to balance the criteria, the reapportionment plan could not be struck down on the contention that it failed to exactly follow its own criteria. McBride v. Mahoney, 573 F. Supp. 913, 40 St. Rep. 1907 (D.C. Mont. 1983).

1983 Reapportionment Plan — Total Population Deviation Over Ten Percent Upheld — Legitimate State Interests: In the 1983 reapportionment plan, the population deviation between the largest and smallest House districts was 10.94% and between the largest and smallest

Senate districts was 10.18%, which created a prima facie case of discrimination because the totals exceeded 10%. To be upheld, the deviations must be justified by legitimate state objectives. The court determined that legitimate state objectives were stated in criteria established by the Reapportionment Commission. The criteria addressed governmental boundaries, geographic boundaries, communities of interest, consideration of existing district boundaries, and an attempt to stay within a 5% plus or minus deviation from the ideal population. McBride v. Mahoney, 573 F. Supp. 913, 40 St. Rep. 1907 (D.C. Mont. 1983).

Projected Population as Basis for Reapportionment: A reapportionment plan will not be struck down for failure to consider projected population growth when the Reapportionment Commission did not consider population projections and it was not presented with data that would have enabled it to apply population projections in a systematic manner. McBride v. Mahoney, 573 F. Supp. 913, 40 St. Rep. 1907 (D.C. Mont. 1983).

Timing of Plan Submission: After the 1980 census, the Attorney General sought a writ of mandamus to compel the Districting and Apportionment Commission to submit its plan to the 1981 Legislature. The District Court determined that the Commission must submit its plan to the first regular session of the Legislature following the Commission's appointment or to the first regular session of the Legislature following the availability of census figure, whichever came later. In this case, the Commission was required to submit its plan to the 1983 Legislature meeting in regular session. State ex rel. Greely v. Mont. Districting & Apportionment Comm'n, First Judicial District, No. 46873 (Aug. 12, 1981).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Constitutional Convention: The 1972 Constitutional Convention had to be apportioned on basis of 1970 census applicable to apportionment of House of Representatives to be elected in November 1972. Legislative Assembly v. Lennon, 156 M 416, 481 P2d 330 (1971).

Constitutionality of 1889 Provision Under United States Constitution: The portion of Art. V, sec. 4, 1889 Mont. Const., which stated that "there shall be no more than one senator from each county" was void and unconstitutional in that it violated the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Herweg v. Thirty Ninth Legislative Assembly of Mont., 246 F. Supp. 454 (D.C. Mont. 1965).

Failure to Reapportion: When Legislature failed to reapportion congressional districts in three successive sessions following the 1960 census in conformity with Art. VI, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const., and districts had a disparity in population of 126,332, Governor and Secretary of State were enjoined from proclaiming, certifying, or conducting election of members of the House of Representatives, and court established new districts for future elections. Roberts v. Babcock, 246 F. Supp. 396 (D.C. Mont. 1965).

One Senator From Each County: Contention that it is competent for the Legislative Assembly to provide for a proxy or substitute to perform the duties of a duly elected member in the event of temporary disability, such as is created by absence in the military service under 10-2-221 through 10-2-228 (all now repealed), may not be sustained since to act, vote, and participate in the proceedings of the Assembly, the Legislator must function in person and not by proxy. A county may not, at one time, have one duly elected, qualified living Senator and one duly acting Senator. The duties are purely personal in nature, and during a legislative session his presence is required at the seat of government. State ex rel. Grant v. Eaton, 114 M 199, 133 P2d 588 (1943).

Attorney General's Opinions

Reapportionment — Holdover Senators: Article V, sec. 3, Mont. Const., provides that state Senators be elected to 4-year terms on a staggered basis. The constitution and statutes provide no authority for changing Senators' terms after reapportionment. The reapportionment plan is the responsibility of the Montana Districting and Apportionment Commission. The Commission has the inherent authority under Art. V, sec. 14, Mont. Const., to do what is necessary to implement a plan that complies with the state's laws. How to deal with holdover Senators is the responsibility of the Commission. The terms of office of members of the Montana State Senate who were elected in 1982 may not be shortened as a result of reapportionment and redistricting. 40 A.G. Op. 2 (1983).

When Plan to Be Submitted — Recess and Reconvening: The Commission to Redistrict and Reapportion is required under 5-1-109 to submit its plan to the 47th Legislature if census data is available in December 1980. The Legislature may recess and reconvene at a later date and still be within its regular session to receive and make recommendations, according to 5-1-110, on the Commission's plan. 38 A.G. Op. 99 (1980).

Procedure for Submitting Reapportionment Plan: The reapportionment plan should be submitted, with a cover letter signed by each commission member, to each house of the Legislature by the 10th day of the legislative session; and within 30 days of the return of the reapportionment plan from the Legislature, the final plan should be submitted, with a cover letter signed by each commission member, to the Secretary of State for filing. 35 A.G. Op. 50 (1973).

Constitutional Grant of Power to Apportion — Historical and Current: Prior to the adoption of the 1972 Montana Constitution, the apportionment power was granted to the Legislature. (See Art. VI, 1889 Mont. Const.) However, with the adoption of the new Constitution, the people of this state divested the Legislature of all power concerning apportionment of the Legislature, except for the power of recommendation in Art. V, sec. 14, 1972 Mont. Const. 35 A.G. Op. 12 (1973).

Legislative Determination of Size of Legislative Assembly — Not Controlling: The Commission to Redistrict and Reapportion was not bound by a legislative determination of the size of the Legislative Assembly, and sections 43-106.6 and 43-106.7, R.C.M. 1947 (repealed by sec. 1, Ch. 14, L. 1975), enacted prior to the adoption of the 1972 Montana Constitution, are not controlling. 35 A.G. Op. 12 (1973).

Reapportionment Commission — Exclusive Power to Apportion Legislative and Congressional Districts: The Commission to Redistrict and Reapportion has the exclusive power to determine the size of the legislative houses and the geographical makeup of the legislative and congressional districts, subject only to the restrictions of Art. V, Mont. Const. 35 A.G. Op. 12 (1973).

Reapportionment Plan Becomes Law: Upon submission of the apportionment plan, proposed by the Commission to Redistrict and Reapportion, to the Secretary of State, the plan becomes law and all previous statutory provisions in conflict with that plan are, in effect, repealed. 35 A.G. Op. 12 (1973).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Effect of Joint Resolutions: A joint legislative resolution is not a general law and cannot be used to control the discretion of the Governor. Gildroy v. Anderson, 162 M 26, 507 P2d 1069 (1973).

Attorney General — Employment of Outside Counsel by Agency: Resolution adopted by Highway Commission (now Transportation Commission) authorizing chief counsel thereof "to employ and engage such outside fee counsel as he, in his discretion shall deem reasonable and necessary, to represent the Highway Commission (now Transportation Commission) in whatever type of case arises" was proper and did not infringe on any powers, duties, or responsibilities of Attorney General. Woodahl v. Highway Comm'n, 155 M 32, 465 P2d 818 (1970).

Attorney General — Common-Law Powers and Duties:

The Attorney General has common-law powers and duties. State ex rel. Olsen v. P.S.C., 129 M 106, 283 P2d 594 (1955).

The office of the Attorney General, as it existed in England under the common law, was adopted as a part of the governmental machinery of this state, and in the absence of express restrictions, the common-law duties of that officer attach themselves to the office insofar as they are applicable and in harmony with our system of government. State ex rel. Ford v. Young, 54 M 401, 170 P 947 (1918).

Residence of Temporary Appointee During Military Service of Elected Officer: Since, by law, the temporary appointee became the Attorney General for all purposes during the leave of absence, relief from duty, or suspension granted the duly elected officer during active military service, it is the temporary appointee's residence under Art. VII, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., that must be at the seat of government. That of the temporarily supplanted Attorney General thereafter becomes immaterial. Gullickson v. Mitchell, 113 M 359, 126 P2d 1106 (1942).

Auditor — Duties and Powers:

The State Auditor and ex officio Commissioner of Insurance has general jurisdiction, under Art. VII, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., and by law, of matters relating to insurance and has the power, under certain circumstances enumerated in the statutes, to revoke certificates of authority of insurance companies to do business in the state. State ex rel. Pearl Assurance Co. v. Holmes, 113 M 144, 124 P2d 700 (1942).

The fact that the State Auditor is a member of the Industrial Accident Board (now Division of Workers' Compensation) did not render the Workers' Compensation Act unconstitutional on the ground that he thus holds two offices. The only limitation upon the Legislature in imposing duties upon that officer, under the Constitution, prohibits the imposition of duties appertaining to the legislative or judiciary, not the executive, departments of government. Shea v. N. Butte Min. Co., 55 M 522, 179 P 499 (1919).

"Term" Refers to Office: The word "term", referring to the terms of office of Governor and Lieutenant Governor fixed at 4 years by Art. VII, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., applied to the office and not to the person holding it. State ex rel. Lamey v. Mitchell, 97 M 252, 34 P2d 369 (1934).

Limitation on Term of Office: Article VII, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., regulated the terms of state executive officers. State ex rel. Jones v. Foster, 39 M 583, 104 P 860 (1909).

Attorney General — Duties and Powers: The Attorney General is required to perform such duties as are prescribed in the Constitution and laws of the state. Inasmuch, however, as there appear to be by the Constitution no powers or duties specifically delegated to that officer whereby he is clothed with supervisory powers over other or inferior legal officers of the state or any subordinate government therein or directing him to assist other and inferior officers in the performance of their duties, the laws must be consulted to ascertain what, if any, such duties are prescribed and what are the extent and limitations of his official authority. State ex rel. Nolan v. District Court, 22 M 25, 55 P 916 (1899).

Convention Notes

Revises 1889 constitution. Sets 25 as age requirement for governor, lieutenant governor, superintendent of public instruction and attorney general. Age requirement for secretary of state unchanged. DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

Request to Overturn Attorney General Opinion — Governor and Agency Director Have Standing: The Governor directed the Department of Fish, Wildlife, and Parks (FWP) to finalize a conservation easement without the approval of the State Land Board. The Attorney General subsequently issued a legal opinion that the easement required the approval of the State Land Board under 87-1-209. The Governor and the FWP Director filed a petition to the Supreme Court, asking it to hold the Attorney General's opinion incorrect as a matter of law. The Attorney General argued that neither had standing to challenge his legal opinion. The Supreme Court disagreed, ruling that because only the Governor and the FWP Director had the authority to sign the paperwork to close the transaction to purchase the easement, their injuries were personal, concrete, and redressable. Bullock v. Fox, 2019 MT 50, 395 Mont. 35, 435 P.3d 1187.

Legislative Employee's Fiscal Assumptions Cannot Trigger Tax Credits — Unlawful Delegation of Power — Invasion of Executive Branch Power Impermissible: Legislative Referendum 123 (LR-123) provided a potential tax credit, tax refund, or payment to individuals when a certain level of surplus revenue was in the state treasury at the close of the fiscal year. As part of the process of determining whether there was surplus revenue, the Legislative Fiscal Analyst (LFA) was required to perform two dozen steps or calculations, including discretionary projections of balances, revenues, transfers, appropriations, and reversions. The Supreme Court held that the delegation of authority to the LFA violated Article V, section 1, of the Montana Constitution as an unlawful delegation of legislative power, similar to the unlawful delegation of authority to a legislative interim committee in State ex rel. Judge v. Legislative Fin. Comm., 168 Mont. 470, 543 P.2d 1317 (1975). Moreover, the requirement that the LFA exercise judgment and interpretations regarding the law violated the separation of powers under Article III, section 1, of the Montana Constitution, since these are Executive Branch functions. MEA-MFT v. McCulloch, 2012 MT 211, 366 Mont. 266, 291 P.3d 1075.

Standing of Attorney General to Appeal P.S.C. Order — P.S.C. Appeal Untimely: The Montana Power Company (M.P.C.) applied to the Public Service Commission (P.S.C.) for a rate increase of over $96.3 million. The P.S.C. granted only $4.1 million and denied in toto M.P.C.'s request to recover costs associated with Colstrip Unit 3. The M.P.C. appealed to District Court for review under 2-4-701. The judge reversed the P.S.C. order. The Attorney General filed notice of appeal. More than 60 days after the judge's order was entered, the P.S.C. also filed notice of appeal. The M.P.C. filed a motion to dismiss the appeal of the Attorney General for lack of standing and the appeal of the P.S.C. as untimely. The Supreme Court granted the motion, holding that the Attorney General had no standing to represent the state on appeal since it was not an aggrieved party or a party to the proceedings before the District Court and because, in his official capacity, the Attorney General may not appeal a decision that is within the discretion of the P.S.C. as a party to the action. The appeal of the P.S.C. was untimely, although within 7 days of the notice of appeal filed by the Attorney General. The latter appeal being invalid, the P.S.C. appeal would have to fall within the 60-day rule. Mont. Power Co. v. Dept. of Pub. Serv. Regulation, 218 M 471, 709 P2d 995, 42 St. Rep. 1750 (1985).

State Auditor as Member of Hail Board — Not Dual Office Holding: The State Auditor is a constitutional office with "such duties as are provided by law" (Art. VI, sec. 4, Mont. Const.). One of these prescribed duties is being a member of the Board of Hail Insurance established under 2-15-3003. The State Auditor does not hold dual offices by carrying out legislatively imposed duties. The only limitation on the Legislature in prescribing such duties is that the duties may not pertain to the legislative or judicial department of government. Mtn. States Ins. Co. v. St., 218 M 365, 708 P2d 564, 42 St. Rep. 1657 (1985).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Casting Deciding Vote: The Lieutenant Governor of Montana, while presiding as President of the Senate, possessed the requisite power to enable or entitle him to cast the deciding vote on third reading of House Bill No. 342, as amended (1961 amendment, 61-5-111), at a time when the Senators then present and voting were equally divided. State ex rel. Easbey v. Highway Patrol Bd., 140 M 383, 372 P2d 930 (1962).

Common-Law Powers and Duties:

The Attorney General has common-law powers and duties. State ex rel. Olsen v. P.S.C., 129 M 106, 283 P2d 594 (1955).

State ex rel. Ford v. Young, 54 M 401, 170 P 947 (1918).

Governor — Authority Over Judiciary Restricted: The Governor is not empowered to exclude or remove from office the duly elected, qualified, and acting judge of a judicial district or to order the judge of another district into his district. State ex rel. Bennett v. Bonner, 123 M 414, 214 P2d 747 (1950).

Auditor — Duties and Powers:

The State Auditor and ex officio Commissioner of Insurance has general jurisdiction, under Art. VII, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Shea v. N. Butte Min. Co., 55 M 522, 179 P 499 (1919).

Governor — Power to Remove Commission Members: The powers reposed in the Governor by constitutional and statutory provisions to remove the members of a commission for cause are discretionary in character. His action is reviewable by the courts only when it appears that he acted without facts to move his discretion and, therefore, in an arbitrary and capricious manner. State ex rel. Matson v. O'Hern, 104 M 126, 65 P2d 619 (1937).

Governor — Veto Power: The power of the Governor over legislation by the exercise of the veto can only be exercised when clearly authorized by specific provision of the Constitution. Mills v. Porter, 69 M 325, 222 P 428 (1924).

Attorney General — Duties and Powers: The Attorney General is required to perform such duties as are prescribed in the Constitution and laws of the state. Inasmuch, however, as there appear to be no powers or duties specifically delegated by the Constitution to that officer whereby he is clothed with supervisory powers over other or inferior legal officers of the state or any subordinate government therein or directing him to assist other and inferior officers in the performance of their duties, the laws must be consulted to ascertain what, if any, such duties are prescribed and what are the extent and limitations of his official authority. State ex rel. Nolan v. District Court, 22 M 25, 55 P 916 (1899).

Attorney General's Opinions

Authority of Auditor to Recover Unauthorized Compensation: The State Auditor has the authority to compel an elected member of the Public Service Commission to repay unauthorized compensation received from the state for service in the Montana Army National Guard. 43 A.G. Op. 43 (1989).

Collective Bargaining — Representation of Executive Agencies: The Governor or his designee has the statutory authority to represent all agencies of the executive branch for purposes of collective bargaining with public employee unions. 37 A.G. Op. 168 (1978).

Authority to Issue Legal Opinions and Weight to Be Given: Only the Attorney General has specific authority to issue legal opinions to County Attorneys or other agencies of state and county government. Opinions issued by state officers or agencies that conflict with the Attorney General's opinion on the same question must yield to the Attorney General's opinion. 35 A.G. Op. 68 (1974).

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

State Auditor as Member of Hail Board — Not Dual Office Holding: The State Auditor is a constitutional office with "such duties as are provided by law" (Art. VI, sec. 4, Mont. Const.). One of these prescribed duties is being a member of the Board of Hail Insurance established under 2-15-3003. The State Auditor does not hold dual offices by carrying out legislatively imposed duties. The only limitation on the Legislature in prescribing such duties is that the duties may not pertain to the legislative or judicial department of government. Mtn. States Ins. Co. v. DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Constitutional Convention Delegates: State officers named in Art. VII, sec. 5, 1889 Mont. Const., could not serve as delegates to state Constitutional Convention. A delegate holds public office. Legislative Assembly v. Lennon, 156 M 416, 481 P2d 330 (1971), distinguished in Mahoney v. Murray, 159 M 176, 496 P2d 1120 (1972).

Effect of Induction Into Military: Against the contention that induction of the Attorney General into the military service of the United States vacated the office, while it is doubtful that a military officer holds a public office, if he does, the constitutional provisions would only serve to negate his right to hold the federal office and not to vacate that of Attorney General. Gullickson v. Mitchell, 113 M 359, 126 P2d 1106 (1942).

Salary — Claimed on Basis of Title: The language of Art. VII, sec. 4, 1889 Mont. Const., appeared to indicate that the officer may claim his salary whether he serves or not, provided he has title to the office. Peterson v. Butte, 44 M 401, 120 P 483 (1912).

Restriction of Legislative Power: Article VII, sec. 4, 1889 Mont. Const., embodied an express restriction upon the powers of the Legislative Assembly. Lloyd v. Silver Bow County, 11 M 408, 28 P 453 (1891).

Attorney General's Opinions

Sheriff Authorized to Accept Compensation From Federal Agency for Performance of Services Outside Official Duties: A Sheriff may receive compensation from a federal agency under the terms of a cooperative law enforcement agreement without violating any Montana statutory or constitutional provision, so long as the services rendered by the Sheriff fall outside the scope of the Sheriff's official duties. 49 A.G. Op. 12 (2001).

Absence of Public Service Commissioner From State on Military Duty — Vacancy in Office Not Created — No Additional Compensation:

When asked to clarify his opinion in 43 A.G. Op. 32 (1989), the Attorney General looked to the nature of service and the source of payment as affecting the right of a state officer to receive additional compensation, noting that a National Guard member engaged in federal service and thus compensated by the federal government is subject to the duties and may receive the benefits of federal law, while a member engaged in purely state-oriented service and thus compensated by the state is subject to state regulation. Therefore, this section prohibits an elected member of the Executive Branch from accepting compensation from the state for service in the Montana Army National Guard, beginning with the first instance of dual compensation. Further, a public officer has a duty to repay unauthorized compensation and the state, through the State Auditor, has a corresponding right to compel repayment of the unauthorized compensation. 43 A.G. Op. 43 (1989).

Absence from the state attributable to active military duty does not result in a vacancy in the office of Public Service Commissioner. However, elected members of the Public Service Commission may not receive additional compensation for simultaneous service in the Montana Army National Guard. 43 A.G. Op. 32 (1989).

VII, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., that, while it is doubtful that a military officer holds a public office, if he does, the constitutional provisions would only serve to negate his right to hold the federal office and not to vacate that of Attorney General. Case Notes

Recess Appointments: Article VII, sec. 7, 1889 Mont. Const., authorizing recess appointments, has reference only to such vacancies which leave the office without anyone to discharge the duties and does not apply to a case where the incumbent holds until his successor is elected or appointed and qualified and is discharging the duties of his office. Hence an appointment to the Industrial Accident Board (now Division of Workers' Compensation) on May 1, 1955, which was during a time when the Senate was not in session, was not effective since it was not "by and with the consent of the senate" as required by section 92-104, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed). The incumbent, whose term expired May 1, 1955, would continue to hold the office and discharge its duties. State ex rel. Olsen v. Swanberg, 130 M 202, 299 P2d 466 (1956).

Meaning of "Or Otherwise": Under the doctrine of ejusdem generis, held, that the words "or otherwise" contained in Art. VII, sec. 7, 1889 Mont. Const., imported circumstances of the same permanent nature as "death" and "resignation" modifying the word "vacated" which itself imports finality or permanency and therefore do not relate to situations in the nature of leave of absence, suspension, or relief from duty resulting in temporary vacancies, such as contemplated by laws providing for appointments of "acting officers" during military service of elected incumbents and their restoration to office upon their return before expiration of their term. Gullickson v. Mitchell, 113 M 359, 126 P2d 1106 (1942).

Vacancy — Term of Appointees: As soon as a vacancy occurs, the appointing power may act, but since the Constitution does not distinguish vacancies into different classes on account of the exigencies which occasion them, the term for which the appointment holds good is governed by the limitations upon the appointing power therein prescribed. State ex rel. Patterson v. Lentz, 50 M 322, 146 P 932 (1915).

Term of Officers: There is no limit to the term of officers whose offices are established by the Constitution or which may be created by law, except as provided in the various portions of the Constitution which deal with particular officers. State ex rel. Quintin v. Edwards, 38 M 250, 99 P 940 (1908).

Appointment Power Reserved to People — Bounty Inspectors: The power to appoint or delegate the appointing power is reserved to the people, acting through the Legislature, in every instance, excepting those enumerated in the Constitution. Bounty inspectors were not officers whose appointment is "otherwise provided for" in Art. VII, sec. 7, 1889 Mont. Const., and the Legislature had the power to delegate the selection of three stockgrowers in each county to appoint bounty inspectors to the District Judges. In re Terrett, 34 M 325, 86 P 266 (1906).

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

Department of Revenue's Activity in Proposing Tax Legislation Not Violation of Separation of Powers: In 1994 and 1995, the Department of Revenue engaged in a project to build a consensus between various parties on how best to achieve a simplification of oil and natural gas taxes. The Department proposed legislation to the 1995 Legislature, and it was passed as the Montana Oil and Natural Gas Production Tax Act. Certain counties and taxpayers challenged the law on the basis that neither the Legislature nor the Governor had granted the Department any power to conduct the project and that the Department's actions violated the doctrine of separation of powers. The Supreme Court upheld the tax law on the basis that the constitution requires the Governor to provide the Legislature with information and to recommend measures that the Governor considers necessary and further that 15-1-203 is an enabling statute allowing the Department to formulate and recommend legislation. Powder River County v. St., 2002 MT 259, 312 M 198, 60 P3d 357 (2002).

Legislative Mandate of Budget Inclusion: The mandatory language in the Housing Act of 1975 that the Governor include the Board of Housing's appropriation request in his budget creates no constitutionally prohibited invasion of the executive's power. Huber v. Groff, 171 M 442, 558 P2d 1124 (1976).

Separation of Powers — Budget a Legislative Function: Notwithstanding Art. VI, sec. 9, Mont. Const., the Montana budget is a legislative budget, not an executive budget. Article V, sec. 1 and 11, and Art. VIII, sec. 9, 12, and 14, Mont. Const., vest the power not only to approve appropriation bills and a budget in the legislative branch but to create an interim committee to gather information from other branches of government necessary to form a rational basis for its budget determinations. State ex rel. Judge v. Legislative Fin. Comm., 168 M 470, 543 P2d 1317, (1975).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Extent of Governor's Authority: Under Art. VII, sec. 10, 1889 Mont. Const., the utmost extent of the Governor's authority, so far as constructive legislative work was concerned, was to recommend such measures as he considered expedient. State ex rel. Anaconda Copper Min. Co. v. Clancy, 30 M 529, 77 P 312 (1904).

Section 10. Veto power.

Convention Notes

Subsection (1) revises 1889 constitution. Amendments to U.S. and Montana constitutions and legislative resolutions may be passed without governor's signature. Pocket veto after adjournment eliminated. Subsection (2) new provision. "Amendatory veto" enables governor to return bills with suggestions for changes. No change in subsection (3) except for grammar. Provision in subsection (4) for reconvening to consider vetoed bills is new.

1994 Amendment by Referendum: Constitutional Amendment No. 26, proposed by Ch. 94, L. 1993, and approved at the general election held November 8, 1994, in (1) in second sentence increased time from 5 days to 10 days and after "delivery to him" deleted "if the legislature is in session or within 25 days if the legislature is adjourned". Amendment effective July 1, 1995. (See text of referendum in final volume of 1995 Laws of Montana.)

1982 Amendment by Referendum: Constitutional Amendment No. 12, proposed by Ch. 611, L. 1981, and approved at the general election held November 2, 1982, in (3) after "the members" inserted "of each house"; in (4)(a) after "vetoes a bill" inserted "approved by two-thirds of the members present" and after "reasons therefor to the" substituted language relating to polling by the secretary of state for "legislature as provided by law"; in (4)(b) after "reconvene" inserted "as provided by law" and after "any bill" substituted "vetoed by the governor when the legislature is not in session" for "so vetoed"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective November 2, 1982. (See text of referendum in final volume of 1983 Laws of Montana.)

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

Submission of Constitutional Initiative Amending Three Parts of Constitution Violative of Separate Vote Requirement: Plaintiffs filed an original application for declaration of judgment and injunctive relief, challenging the validity of Constitutional Initiative No. 75 (CI-75), which was passed by the voters and stated that no new tax or tax increase could be enacted unless approved by a majority of the electorate. The initiative amended Art. VIII, Mont. Const., revising state revenue and finance provisions; amended Art. II, sec. 18, Mont. Const., providing that sovereign immunity did not shield public officials or employees from appropriate civil liability for violating CI-75; and provided that notwithstanding the referendum provisions of this section, before a bill imposing new or increased taxes is referred to the people, the Governor had veto power. The dispositive issue was that CI-75 had two or more constitutional amendments, in violation of Art. XIV, sec. 11, Mont. Const., which is a cogent constitutional recognition of the circumstances under which Montana voters receive constitutional initiatives, namely that a separate vote is required for each proposed constitutional amendment. Citing Armatta v. Kitzhaber, 959 P2d 49 (Oreg. 1998), the Supreme Court held that the separate vote requirement is distinguishable as different and narrower than the single subject requirement in Art. V, sec. 11, Mont. Const., and that to the extent that a constitutional amendment may be valid under the single subject rule but fail under the separate vote rule, holdings to the contrary in State ex rel. Teague v. Bd. of Comm'rs, 34 M 426, 87 P 450 (1906), State ex rel. Hay v. Alderson, 49 M 387, 142 P 210 (1914), and State ex rel. Corry v. Cooney, 70 M 355, 225 P 1007 (1924), were overruled. Because CI-75 expressly amended three parts of the Montana Constitution without allowing a separate vote on each amendment, CI-75 was unconstitutional under Art. XIV, sec. 11, Mont. Const. Marshall v. St., 1999 MT 33, 293 M 274, 975 P2d 325, 56 St. Rep. 142 (1999), following State ex rel. Hinz v. Moody, 71 M 473, 230 P 575 (1924), and Sawyer Stores, Inc. v. Mitchell, 103 M 148, 62 P2d 342 (1936). However, see Mont. Ass'n of Counties v. St., 2017 MT 267, 389 Mont. 183, 404 P.3d 733, clarifying that the single-subject requirement does not apply to constitutional initiatives.

Governor's Signature Not Required on Legislative Referendum: As used in the Montana Constitution, the term "referendum measures" means both legislative and initiative referendums.

The plain language of Art. III, sec. 5, Mont. Const., and this section makes it clear that legislation calling for a referendum measure is not required to be signed by the Governor. State ex rel. Gould v. Cooney, 253 M 90, 831 P2d 593, 49 St. Rep. 410 (1992).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Failure to Submit Constitutional Amendments: It was a fatal defect for the Legislature to ignore the Governor, in neglecting and refusing to present proposed constitutional amendments to the Governor in full as passed by the House and Senate for the Governor's approval or disapproval. State ex rel. Livingstone v. Murray, 137 M 557, 354 P2d 552 (1960).

Legislature Alone — Cannot Enact a Law: The Legislature alone cannot enact a law; it has the power to pass bills that may become laws when signed by the presiding officers of both houses and when approved and signed by the Governor, these officers being an indispensable part of the machinery set up by the Constitution to make laws. Vaughn & Ragsdale Co., Inc. v. St. Bd. of Equalization, 109 M 52, 96 P2d 420 (1939).

Governor's Approval: Since the Governor in the approval of laws is a component part of the Legislature and no bill can become a law (with certain exceptions) without his approval, his approval fixes the time when it becomes a law, the order in which bills are passed in the two houses being immaterial. State ex rel. Toomey v. St. Bd. of Examiners, 74 M 1, 238 P 316 (1925).

Appropriation Bill — Scaling of Items: Since under Art. VII, sec. 12, 1889 Mont. Const., no bill shall become a law after adjournment of the Legislative Assembly unless approved by the Governor, where, instead of approving or disapproving a general appropriation bill as a whole or approving some of the items therein and disapproving others, he scaled certain items and approved them as scaled, which he was without power to do, his action was neither an approval nor a disapproval, resulting in no appropriations as to such items. Mills v. Porter, 69 M 325, 222 P 428 (1924).

Veto Power — Reduction of Appropriation by Governor: Under Art. VII, sec. 13, 1889 Mont. Const., empowering the Governor "to disapprove of any item or items of any bill making appropriations of money, embracing distinct items", he may not scale any particular item or items by deducting a certain percent of the amount appropriated by the Legislature in a bill which because of adjournment could not be returned to it for further action, since by so doing he would be exercising creative legislative power and usurping the function of the Legislative Assembly. Mills v. Porter, 69 M 325, 222 P 428 (1924).

Creation of County: Chapter 56, L. 1917 (omitted), creating Carter County, became a law without the approval of the Governor, pursuant to Art. VII, sec. 12, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Ford v. Schofield, 53 M 502, 165 P 594 (1917).

Passage on Last Day of Session: A measure having been passed on the last day of a legislative session and not acted upon by the executive until after final adjournment would require the Governor's signature to make it operative. State ex rel. Hay v. Hindson, 40 M 353, 106 P 362 (1910).

Passage and Approval Effective Date — Failure of Governor to Sign: Law (now repealed) relating to the establishment of county free high schools provides that it "shall take effect and be in full force from and after its passage and approval by the governor". It was never expressly approved by the Governor but became a law pursuant to Art. VII, sec. 12, 1889 Mont. Const. The provision that if any bill be not returned by the Governor within 5 days after presentment to him, it shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, being binding upon the Legislature, the act in question became a law notwithstanding the above provision therein contained. Evers v. Hudson, 36 M 135, 92 P 462 (1907).

Attorney General's Opinions

Vote to Override Gubernatorial Veto: A gubernatorial veto may be overridden only upon a vote of two-thirds of the members present in each house of the Legislature, not merely two-thirds of the members present of the whole Legislature. 36 A.G. Op. 8 (1975).

Section 11. Special session.

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Repurchase of Tax Lien Property: Chapter 33, Ex. L. 1933-34, amending section 2235, R.C.M. 1935 (since repealed), so as to authorize the former owner of real property held by a county under tax deed to repurchase it under certain conditions, held constitutional under the rules that courts must uphold a statute unless its invalidity is made manifest beyond a reasonable doubt, and any enactment which will meet the ends sought to be accomplished by the Governor's call must be deemed embraced within the limits of the subjects under consideration. Blackford v. Judith Basin County, 109 M 578, 98 P2d 872 (1940).

Aiding Federal Works Program: Chapter 47, Ex. L. 1933-34 (sections 75-4601 through 75-4606, R.C.M. 1947, now repealed), an act to provide emergency relief by the creation of high school districts, authorizing the borrowing of money for the construction of buildings, etc., held not invalid as not authorized by the Governor's proclamation calling the Legislature into special session, where by special message he recommended consideration of the general subject of consolidating school districts, since the effect of such consolidation would be the creation of new districts, with resultant accomplishment of the main purpose of the call: aiding in the federal public works program and thus to a certain extent reducing unemployment and relieving distress. Pierson v. Hendricksen, 98 M 244, 38 P2d 991 (1934).

Liberal Construction: Legislation incidental or germane to the subjects expressed in the Governor's proclamation calling the Legislature into special session must be upheld as within his call, and the proclamation must be liberally construed, to the end that the legislation enacted pursuant thereto becomes operative. Pierson v. Hendricksen, 98 M 244, 38 P2d 991 (1934).

Special Message: Under the rule that a subject submitted to the Legislative Assembly by special message while in extraordinary session is before it for consideration to the same extent as if specifically mentioned in the Governor's proclamation calling it, held that Ch. 9, Ex. L. 1921 (repealed), relating to the suppression of illegal traffic in intoxicating liquor, is not invalid as in contravention of Art. VII, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const. St. v. Dishman, 64 M 530, 210 P 604 (1922).

Police Salaries: Held, that Ch. 11, Ex. L. 1919 (7-32-4121), providing that actions by police officers for the recovery of salaries must be commenced within 6 months after the cause of action shall have accrued, etc., is not open to the objection that it did not come within the purview of the Governor's proclamation calling the session, his reference therein to certain conditions prevailing in the "department of police" in a named city covering the subject of the legislation. Sweeney v. Butte, 64 M 230, 208 P 943 (1922).

Extraordinary Purposes: Although, for ordinary purposes, the Legislature may convene only once in every 2 years, the Governor may call it into extra session at other times for extraordinary purposes. State ex rel. Bennett v. St. Bd. of Examiners, 40 M 59, 104 P 1055 (1909).

Extraordinary Sessions — Powers of Legislature: When convened in extraordinary session, the power of the Legislature is as absolute as when convened in regular session, except that it is then limited to enacting laws affecting those subjects only that are enumerated in the Governor's call or in his message. In order to determine whether legislation passed at an extraordinary session of the Legislature is germane to the subject specified in the proclamation, it is incumbent on the court to examine the proclamation as a whole, giving to the language used its ordinary meaning, and a rule of liberal interpretation should be applied, to the end that the legislation be operative. State ex rel. Anaconda Copper Min. Co. v. Clancy, 30 M 529, 77 P 312 (1904).

Legislation Germane to Governor's Call: Where a proclamation of the Governor convened the Legislature in extra session for the purpose of enacting general legislation by which the bias and prejudice of District Judges should be made a disqualification of such Judges to try any case that may come before them, as well as legislation making suitable provision for the trial of such case or cases in such event, and the Legislature met and passed the act of December 10, 1903, amending section 180 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1895 (section 93-901, R.C.M. 1947, now repealed) so as to provide that, on the filing of an affidavit of prejudice against a District Judge, he should no longer act, and also amending section 615 of the same Code (25-2-201) so as to provide that in such case, if a qualified Judge should be called to try the cause within 30 days after such disqualification, no change of venue therefor should be had, such legislation was germane to the Governor's call, as required by Art. VII, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Anaconda Copper Min. Co. v. Clancy, 30 M 529, 77 P 312 (1904).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Parole Not a Pardon or Commutation of Sentence: The state Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) has no power to pardon or commute a sentence, and when it grants a parole, the effect is not to extinguish the sentence but merely to change the conditions of custody. State ex rel. Herman v. Powell, 139 M 583, 367 P2d 553 (1961).

Conditional Suspension of Sentence Void: Provision in judgment of a Justice of the Peace that jail sentence would be suspended if defendant leave and remain out of the county is in the nature of a conditional pardon and therefore void as an attempted exercise of the pardoning powers reposed in the Governor. Ex parte Sheehan, 100 M 244, 49 P2d 438 (1935).

Court — May Suspend Sentence: The suspended sentence law as construed in this case to the effect that the court may order a sentence suspended after entry of judgment does not infringe the pardoning power of the Governor. State ex rel. Bottomly v. District Court, 73 M 541, 237 P 525 (1925).

District Court — May Not Reduce Sentence After Judgment: The power given the District Court to reduce the extent of punishment fixed by the jury in a criminal prosecution must be exercised prior to or at the time judgment is pronounced, and therefore an order reducing a fine and jail sentence after the judgment had been in process of execution for a number of days was void as in excess of jurisdiction and an encroachment upon the pardoning power reposed by the Constitution in the Governor and the state Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole). State ex rel. Reid v. District Court, 68 M 309, 218 P 558 (1923).

Governor — May Impose Restrictions on Pardon: In the exercise of the pardoning power, the Governor is authorized to impose conditions without restriction so long as they are not illegal, immoral, or impossible of performance. In re Sutton, 50 M 88, 145 P 6 (1914).

Attorney General's Opinions

Consecutive Sentences Commuted: Consecutive sentences may be commuted either individually or aggregately. 37 A.G. Op. 43 (1977).

Executive Clemency — Exhaustion of Other Remedies: Under its present rules, the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) may not postpone consideration of an application for executive clemency until the applicant has exhausted the appeal and sentence review processes. 37 A.G. Op. 43 (1977).

Nature of National Guard Service — State Court Jurisdiction: Members of the National Guard serve a dual responsibility, both to the State of Montana and to the United States of America. While Guard units consist of members enlisted in the United States Army, they are also a Montana military unit consisting of Montana citizens. The District Court improperly dismissed a suit brought by members of the Montana Army National Guard on grounds that the court did not have jurisdiction, absent proof that the members were on federal active duty as opposed to state active duty. The case was remanded for further findings. Grove v. Mont. Army Nat'l Guard, 264 M 498, 872 P2d 791, 51 St. Rep. 366 (1994), distinguishing Evans v. Mont. Nat'l Guard, 223 M 482, 726 P2d 1160 (1986).

National Guardsman Injured on Weekend Drill, Not During State of Emergency — No Remedy: A National Guardsman alleged that 10-1-504 (repealed 1983) provided a remedy for an injury he received while on routine weekend drill since the section allowed the same benefits to a member of the organized militia "who is wounded, disabled, or dies while on duty in the service of this state" that would have been received if the member had been in federal service. The Supreme Court held that within the context of Title 10, ch. 1, part 5, the words "in the service of this state" clearly referred to active duty during times of state emergency declared by the Governor pursuant to Art. VI, sec. 13, Mont. Const. Since the Guard was not called to emergency service in this case, summary judgment against the guardsman was proper. Evans v. Mont. Nat'l Guard, 223 M 482, 726 P2d 1160, 43 St. Rep. 1930 (1986), distinguished in Grove v. Mont. Army Nat'l Guard, 264 M 498, 872 P2d 791, 51 St. Rep. 366 (1994), overruled in Trankel v. St., 282 M 348, 938 P2d 614, 54 St. Rep. 380 (1997). Trankel was followed in Lake v. St., 282 M 484, 938 P2d 698, 54 St. Rep. 442 (1997).

Source of Governor's Powers: The Constitution and laws of the state are the charters of the Governor's powers, and in them he must find the authority for his official acts. Herlihy v. Donohue, 52 M 601, 161 P 164 (1916).

Section 14. Succession.

Convention Notes

New provision based on 25th amendment to U.S. Constitution. If governor dies, is disqualified, or resigns, the lieutenant governor takes his place. If governor is gone from the state more than 45 days or is temporarily disabled the lieutenant governor becomes acting governor. If the lieutenant governor and the attorney general think the governor is unable to perform his duties they may send notice to the legislature. By a two-thirds vote the legislature can decide that the lieutenant governor shall serve as acting governor because the governor is unable to act.

Resignation of Governor — Immediate Transfer of Power: There can be no vacancy in an office when there is a person clothed with authority to perform its duties. When the Governor resigns, there is no vacancy in the office in the sense that there is no one left with power to discharge the duties imposed upon the Governor. The powers, duties, and emoluments of the office are immediately transferred to the Lieutenant Governor, who must discharge the duties of the office for the residue of the term for which the Governor was elected. He, as Lieutenant Governor, then acts as Governor. State ex rel. Lamey v. Mitchell, 97 M 252, 34 P2d 369 (1934).

Nature of Right of Lieutenant Governor: The only instance in the 1889 Montana Constitution in which authority was given to one called upon to fill vacancy to hold for the residue of the term was in case of a vacancy in the office of Governor, and in that instance the Lieutenant Governor became Governor by right of succession and not of appointment. DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

Challenge to Alleged Improper Certification by Secretary of State — Not Political Question Excluding Consideration by Court: After the Secretary of State certified the Montana Green Party for the 2018 ballot, the plaintiff, the Montana Democratic Party, sought a declaratory judgment that the certification was invalid due to noncompliance with 13-10-601. The plaintiff also sought an injunction to prevent the Secretary of State from giving any effect to the Green Party's petition. The Secretary of State argued that the plaintiff's claim involved a nonjusticiable political question. After the District Court ruled that a number of signatures were invalid, the Secretary of State appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that the courts have the exclusive authority to adjudicate a defendant's compliance with well-defined statutorily prescribed processes and standards. Larson v. St., 2019 MT 28, 394 Mont. 167, 434 P.3d 241.

Case Rendered Moot by Board's Removal of Position Statement — Specific Relief Achieved: The plaintiff, a nonprofit that opposes assisted suicide and euthanasia, filed a petition seeking to have the board of medical examiners remove a position statement related to Baxter v. State, 2009 MT 449, 354 Mont. 234, 224 P.3d 1211, concerning aid in dying. During the proceeding, the board rescinded its position statements and moved for dismissal. The District Court granted summary judgment because the issue was rendered moot. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed, holding that the issue was not a justiciable controversy, the specific remedy sought by the plaintiff had been achieved, and there was no evidence to suspect that the same wrong would occur. Montanans Against Assisted Suicide v. Bd. of Medical Examiners, 2015 MT 112, 379 Mont. 11, 347 P.3d 1244.

Public Service Commission Not Vested With Judicial Powers — No Authority in Negligence Action: An electric service customer filed an action in District Court alleging property damage based on a power company's negligence and negligence per se in terminating the customer's electric service. The District Court dismissed the action, reasoning that the customer did not exhaust administrative remedies before the Public Service Commission (PSC). On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed the dismissal on the grounds that the PSC is not vested with judicial powers and does not have the authority to adjudicate a negligence action seeking damages. Schuster v. NW. Energy Co., 2013 MT 364, 373 Mont. 54, 314 P.3d 650.

Challenge to Protest Provision Mooted by County Inaction: Individuals residing within the boundary of a proposed zoning district sought an injunction against Gallatin County, claiming the protest provision of 76-2-205 was unconstitutional. While the parties awaited the injunction hearing, the 30-day postprotest deadline passed without the county taking action. An intervening party moved for summary judgment, which the District Court granted on the basis of mootness because the county had not acted within the statutory deadlines. The Supreme Court affirmed and declined to consider the constitutional challenge under the "capable of repetition" exception. The challenge never ripened because the zoning district did not fail due to the protest provision, but failed because of county inaction. Gateway Opencut Min. Action Group v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 2011 MT 198, 361 Mont. 398, 260 P.3d 133.

No Constitutional Prohibition Against Justices' Courts of Record: Hernandez asserted that 3-10-101, allowing the creation of Justices' Courts of Record, violated the provisions of Art. VII, sec. 1, Mont. Const., by abolishing constitutionally created Justices' Courts. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under 3-10-101, counties are given the option but are not required to create Justices' Courts of Record, so constitutionally created Justices' Courts are not abolished. Article VII, sec. 1, Mont. Const., allows the Legislature to create inferior courts by law, and the Legislature properly exercised that authority in adopting 3-10-101 and provided operating rules for Justices' Courts of Record in 3-10-115 to govern operation of the inferior courts of record. Nothing in the constitutional provision prohibits the creation of Justices' Courts of Record, and 3-10-101 is not unconstitutional. Hernandez v. Yellowstone County Comm'rs, 2008 MT 251, 345 M 1, 189 P3d 638 (2008).

Statutes Granting Child Support Enforcement Division Judicial Power to Make and Enforce Child Support Orders Violative of Constitutional Separation of Powers: As part of a marriage dissolution, the District Court ordered that the husband pay monthly child support in a specific amount. The Child Support Enforcement Division (CSED) subsequently notified the court that it intended to modify the order pursuant to its authority in 40-5-272 and 40-5-273. The court, sua sponte, then enjoined CSED from modifying any child support orders issued by a Montana District Court, asserting that CSED's actions in modifying a court order violated the constitutional separation of powers clause. On appeal, CSED maintained that the statutes did not violate the separation of powers clause because: (1) the statutory scheme was merely a quasi-judicial function that did not threaten the institutional integrity of the Judicial Branch; (2) the statutes in question were a reasonable response to both the federal legal requirements for expedited child support modification and the sheer magnitude of child support collection in Montana; (3) CSED was empowered to modify a support order only if the facts changed; (4) every contested modification was subject to a hearing before an administrative law judge; (5) all modifications were subject to judicial review; and (6) the Legislature's grant of jurisdictional authority to CSED was not exclusive. The District Court responded that the statutes were an unconstitutional violation of separation of powers because: (1) they gave CSED judicial power that is exclusively reserved to the judiciary; (2) they gave CSED statutory authority to modify a child support order, file it with the District Court, and then enforce the order as a District Court judgment; and (3) the procedure for judicial review of a CSED modification was not automatic and was limited by the scope of the Montana Administrative Procedure Act. The Supreme Court concluded that 40-5-272 and 40-5-273 are an unconstitutional violation of the separation of powers clause to the extent that they grant CSED the judicial power to make and enforce child support orders without automatic and mandatory judicial review. Although appreciative of the magnitude of the agency's modification and enforcement tasks, the court found that that fact did not justify unbridled departure from constitutional norms respecting the autonomy of the individual branches of government. Gocha, 555 NW 2d 683 (Iowa 1996).

Appeal From Extension of Temporary Investigative Authority Held Moot — Permanent Custody Transferred to Father: When A.E.'s mother, Teresa, filed a pro se appeal from the District Court's extension of temporary custody and temporary investigative authority of the Department of Public Health and Human Services (Department), Teresa's ex-husband, who was the natural father of A.E., sought and received an amendment to the previous dissolution decree by which his marriage to Teresa was dissolved. The amendment transferred permanent custody of A.E. from Teresa to A.E.'s father. Upon the transfer of custody, the Department sought and received dismissal of its petition for extension of temporary custody and to vacate the District Court's order awarding it temporary legal custody for the purposes of the investigation. On appeal of the award of the extension of temporary investigative authority, the Supreme Court held that the appeal had been rendered moot because the Department no longer had temporary custody of A.E. and because the Department no longer possessed the authority to investigate. For this reason, the Supreme Court dismissed the appeal. In re A.E., 1998 MT 159, 289 M 340, 961 P2d 1265, 55 St. Rep. 638 (1998).

Taxpayer Properly Held in Contempt for Refusal to File Income Tax Returns — Privilege Against Self-Incrimination No Defense: Gillispie failed to file an income tax return for 4 years. The District Court ordered her to file the returns or to show cause why she should not be required to file them. At the hearing, the Department of Revenue introduced Gillispie's W-2 forms, which showed that she had made the minimum income necessary to require her to file returns. The District Court ordered her to file the returns or be found in contempt. When Gillispie failed to file the returns, the District Court held her in contempt, and Gillispie filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus with the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court held that the District Court had jurisdiction to order Gillispie to file the returns and jurisdiction to hold Gillispie in contempt and that the District Court also had sufficient evidence to do so. The Supreme Court also held that Gillispie's privilege against self-incrimination does not justify the outright refusal to file a return and cannot be used as a method of evading payment of lawful taxes. The Supreme Court held that she must demonstrate the specific parts of the returns that would result in self-incrimination. Gillispie v. Sherlock, 279 M 21, 929 P2d 199, 53 St. Rep. 507 (1996).

Power of State to Enact and Courts to Enforce Laws Regulating Motor Vehicles: Appellant, appearing pro se, challenged as unconstitutional laws requiring driver's license, mandatory insurance, and vehicle registration. The Supreme Court held that the issues raised by the appellant were frivolous, unreasonable, and groundless in that the court had previously recognized the state's power to regulate motor vehicles in the interests of public safety at the expense of individual rights. Whitefish v. Hansen, 237 M 105, 771 P2d 976, 46 St. Rep. 657 (1989).

Mandatory Transfer of Prosecution of Older Youth to District Court — Not Violation of Doctrine of Separation of Powers: The automatic transfer provisions of 41-5-206(3), providing for the prosecution of older youth for certain offenses in District Court rather than Youth Court, are not a usurpation of the judiciary's power to hear and decide motions and is not in violation of the Montana Constitution's requirement for separation of powers. The transfer provision is within the Legislature's inherent power to create other courts under this section. The 1987 amendment providing for transfer without hearing on mitigating factors was merely a revision of protection afforded youth under earlier legislative action and not a violation of the separation of powers doctrine. In re Wood, 236 M 118, 768 P2d 1370, 46 St. Rep. 228 (1989).

Court Decisions as Binding Authority: Supreme Court decisions are binding authority even when the majority opinion is signed by only three justices, with one justice specially concurring and three justices dissenting. Kaiser v. Whitehall, 221 M 322, 718 P2d 1341, 43 St. Rep. 846 (1986).

Dismissal of Appeal for Mootness: Under the former version of this section before its amendment in 1985, a petition of 60% of the freeholders affected was required for the establishment of a rural special improvement district (RSID). Appellants filed an application for a Writ of Prohibition under the former law to prohibit the County Commissioners from building a swimming pool pursuant to creation of an RSID, alleging that the petition to create the RSID was not in compliance with the law. The District Court denied their application. The Supreme Court affirmed the denial, ruling the question moot because of the 1985 amendment. Porch v. Powder River Bd. of County Comm'rs, 219 M 179, 710 P2d 1364, 42 St. Rep. 1936 (1985).

District Court's Power to Order Payment of Expenditures Beyond Budget: District Court's fiscal year budget was overrun, and this stopped or threatened to stop the efficient and orderly administration of justice and court business, creating an emergency. As a court of competent jurisdiction, the District Court may issue orders for the payment of out-of-budget expenditures that are reasonable and necessary. Compliance with the orders by the members of the Board of County Commissioners or by any other officer in the exercise of his official duties is within the exception to personal liability of the officers provided in 7-6-2323 (now repealed). The officers may pass on the propriety of the claims but may not deny them on the basis that they are outside the budget if the court has duly ordered them paid. State ex rel. District Court v. Whitaker, 210 M 363, 681 P2d 1097, 41 St. Rep. 1104 (1984).

Criminal Contempt and Contempt of Court Distinguished — District Court Without Jurisdiction to Try Criminal Contempt: Criminal contempt, a misdemeanor crime defined in 45-7-309, is an offense against society prosecuted by the state, whereas contempt of court is a judicial power arising out of Art. VII, sec. 1, Mont. Const., and Title 3 that allows a court to enforce its own judgments and maintain decorum in its proceedings. Thus, while only the District Court could have found the defendant in contempt of court for failure to pay a fine from a criminal proceeding of that court, it lacked jurisdiction to try a misdemeanor criminal contempt action for failure to pay the fine because criminal contempt, like most other misdemeanors, must be brought in Justice's Court. St. v. Abrams, 209 M 508, 680 P2d 585, 41 St. Rep. 871 (1984).

Valid Reason for Mandatory Retirement — Legislative, Not Judicial Task: Since compulsory game warden (now game wardens' and peace officers') retirement statute contained no qualifications or justification, it would be in excess of the authority of a court hearing a warden's suit challenging the statute's validity to hold a factfinding hearing to determine whether there was a basis for the age discrimination grounded in the reasonable demands of the position. That is a legislative function; the effort would be great; and the Legislature, not the courts, has the resources for such an undertaking. Taylor v. Dept. of Fish, Wildlife, & Parks, 202 M 85, 666 P2d 1228, 40 St. Rep. 1112 (1983).

Separation of Powers Argument Rejected: The Supreme Court rejected plaintiff's contention that the panel act violates the prohibitions against unlawful delegation of judicial and legislative power and infringes on the doctrine of separation of powers. The decision of the panel is not enforceable, and unlike the panel decisions in most states, it is not even admissible at trial. Consequently, there are no constitutional violations under the Montana act. Linder v. Smith, 193 M 20, 629 P2d 1187, 38 St. Rep. 912 (1981).

Standing to Challenge Constitutionality of Statute — Death Penalty: One who is neither injured nor jeopardized by the operation of a statute cannot challenge its constitutionality. Since the prosecutor did not ask for the death penalty, the defendant had no standing to contend that the statute is unconstitutional. St. v. Booke, 178 M 225, 583 P2d 405 (1978).

Standing of Environmental Groups: Unlawful environmental degradation is within the judicial cognizance of the state, and environmental groups alleging injury to their members have standing to seek injunctive relief. Mont. Wilderness Ass'n v. Bd. of Health & Environmental Sciences, 171 M 477, 559 P2d 1157 (1976).

Justice of the Peace — Authority to Issue Search Warrants Relating to Illegal Possession of Dangerous Drugs: Justices' Courts are constitutionally created, and where the Legislature has had the opportunity to limit their jurisdiction and has not seen fit to do so, a legislative intent to authorize the practice of Justices' Courts issuing search warrants is presumed, as a Justice of the Peace meets the standard of "a neutral and detached magistrate" to examine the application for a search warrant and determine whether reasonable cause exists for its issuance. St. v. Snider, 168 M 220, 541 P2d 1204 (1975).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Judicial Power: "Judicial power", within the meaning of Art. VIII, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., was the power of a court to decide and pronounce a judgment and carry it into effect between persons and parties who bring a case before it for decision. Shea v. North-Butte Min. Co., 55 M 522, 179 P 499 (1919).

Senator Not Judicial Officer During Impeachment: A state Senator is a member of the legislative department, though the Senate, when sitting as a Court of Impeachment, is a court exercising judicial functions, with power to judge the law and the evidence. The term "judicial officers" does not include a Senator. The term is limited to Judges of the Supreme and District Courts, Justices of the Peace, and judges of other inferior courts. State ex rel. Haviland v. Beadle, 42 M 174, 111 P 720 (1910).

Distinction Between Court and Judge — Justices' Courts: There is a well-defined distinction between a particular court and the judges of that court, but the authority of the Justice of the Peace and of the Justice's Court, so far as judicial matters are concerned, is identical. State ex rel. Grissom v. Justice Court, 31 M 258, 78 P 498 (1904).

Transfer of Causes Between District Courts: The courts of this state are distinct entities, and the transfer of a cause from one district to another would amount to a change of venue. State ex rel. Boston & Mont. Consol. Copper & Silver Min. Co. v. Clancy, 30 M 193, 76 P 10 (1904).

Authority of Clerk — Letters of Guardianship: The act conferring on clerks of the courts the power in vacation to grant letters of guardianship when no protests or objections are filed thereto cannot be construed to clothe the clerk of a court with authority to hear evidence and adjudicate a person mentally incompetent to care for himself or to manage his property. Such authority would involve the exercise of judicial power, which under the Constitution and law of the state is vested in the judge of the court. In re Kane's Estate, 12 M 197, 29 P 424 (1892).

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION
APPELLATE AND ORIGINAL JURISDICTION

Appeal From District Court's Denial of Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus Prohibited: After the District Court denied a criminal defendant's petition for a writ of habeas corpus, the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court held it will no longer consider as an original petition a party's appeal from a District Court's denial of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. A petitioner must file an original petition for a writ of habeas corpus in the Supreme Court in order for the court to consider it. Thomas v. Doe, 2011 MT 283, 362 Mont. 454, 266 P.3d 1255.

No District Court Subject Matter Jurisdiction Over Attorney Disciplinary Matters: The Supreme Court suspended a Yellowstone County Deputy City Attorney, publicly censured her, and placed her on probation for 2 years. Plaintiff newspaper requested that the District Court provide the documents related to the attorney's disciplinary proceedings, but the District Court declined to release the documents on grounds that it lacked subject matter jurisdiction. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The Supreme Court, not the District Court, possesses original and exclusive jurisdiction and responsibility in all matters involving the conduct and disciplining of Montana attorneys, and court disciplinary rules provide for the confidentiality of disciplinary procedures. Billings Gazette v. St., 2008 MT 287, 345 M 385, 190 P3d 1126 (2008). See also Boe v. Court Administrator, 2007 MT 7, 335 M 228, 150 P3d 927 (2007).

Statutory Time Period for Filing Appeal of Petition for Adding Lands to Irrigation District Superseded by Rules of Appellate Procedure: The District Court dismissed a petition to extend the boundaries of an irrigation district. One of the parties appealed, but the other party contended that the appeal should be dismissed because it was not filed within the 10-day statutory period set out in 85-7-1810. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under Art. VII, sec. 2, Mont. Const., the Supreme Court has rulemaking authority to govern the appellate process. The court established a 30-day period for filing civil appeals in Rule 4, M.R.App.P. (Title 25, ch. 21), so the statutory timeframe in 85-7-1810 has been superseded. Because the appeal in this case was filed within the 30-day period, the appeal was timely. In re Formation of E. Bench Irrigation District, 2008 MT 210, 344 M 184, 186 P3d 1266 (2008).

Nonjusticiable Ballot Measure Controversy Dismissed: Proponents for a 2006 ballot measure petitioned the Supreme Court to reverse the District Court's invalidation of the legal sufficiency of the ballot measure to allow the measure to be placed on the ballot. However, the Supreme Court previously held in Montanans for Justice: Vote No on CI-98 v. St., 2006 MT 277, 334 M 237, 146 P3d 759 (2006), that the ballot measure was invalid and that no votes for the measure would be counted. Lacking jurisdiction over nonjusticiable matters, the Supreme Court may raise questions of justiciability sua sponte, but moot questions and advisory opinions are among matters that exceed the court's jurisdiction. A question becomes moot when effective relief can no longer be granted, and a justiciable controversy is one upon which the judgment of the court may effectively operate. In this case, even if the Supreme Court determined that the District Court erred when it overruled the Attorney General's determination of legal sufficiency, votes for the initiative could not be counted because the Secretary of State's certification of the ballot measure was invalidated in Montanans for Justice. Additionally, the decision in Montanans for Justice ensured that any judgment in the present case would have no effect on the rights of the parties, so this appeal was reduced to a request for an advisory opinion that exceeded the court's jurisdiction. Thus, this nonjusticiable appeal was dismissed. Not in Montana: Citizens Against CI-97 v. St., 2006 MT 278, 334 M 265, 147 P3d 174 (2006).

Interpretation of Wyoming Arbitration Law by Montana Supreme Court: Plaintiff brought a case in Montana against a limited liability company, of which plaintiff was a member, and against six other members. The District Court ordered the parties to arbitrate the disagreement pursuant to the company's operating agreement, which stipulated that Wyoming law would govern the arbitration. The arbitrator ordered a transfer of units to plaintiff and found that plaintiff was liable for $2.5 million in nominal and exemplary damages for defaulting on his obligations. Plaintiff moved to vacate the arbitration award, but the motion was denied, and defendants' motion to confirm the award was granted. On appeal, the Montana Supreme Court decided to interpret Wyoming arbitration laws, including several issues of first impression. The Supreme Court held that: (1) issues on appeal should be addressed under Wyoming law; (2) plaintiff's motion to vacate was timely filed; (3) sufficient findings supported the arbitrator's award under Wyoming law; (4) the District Court did not abuse its discretion in finding that, under Wyoming law, plaintiff had defaulted and was liable for damages; (5) the amended judgment correctly reflected relative ownership interests in the company following the transfer of shares to plaintiff; and (6) the District Court did not abuse its discretion in confirming the arbitrator's awards pursuant to Wyoming law. Wallace v. Hayes, 2005 MT 253, 329 M 23, 124 P3d 110 (2005).

Out-of-Time Appeal in Criminal Matters — Exclusive Jurisdiction With Supreme Court: Under 46-20-101, the only method for review in criminal cases is by notice of appeal. Time limits for filing an appeal are mandatory and jurisdictional. If a defendant takes no action to perfect an appeal within 90 days of judgment, the District Court loses its jurisdiction and the appeal is out-of-time. However, an out-of-time appeal is a remedy that may be available to a criminal defendant who, through no fault of the defendant, misses a deadline for filing an appeal. Although former Rule 21(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), precludes an out-of-time appeal in a civil case, the Supreme Court is not precluded from addressing a motion for an out-of-time appeal in a criminal case. Further, a District Court lacks jurisdiction to grant an out-of-time appeal. The Supreme Court has exclusive jurisdiction to grant a motion for an out-of-time appeal, and the motion is considered an original proceeding subject to the provisions of former Rule 17, M.R.App.P. (now superseded). Upon a showing that the failure to timely notice a criminal appeal was excusable under the circumstances, the Supreme Court may conclude that an out-of-time appeal is the appropriate remedy pursuant to former Rule 21(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded). In that event, the matter will be remanded to the District Court with instructions to vacate and reenter judgment to afford the defendant a second opportunity to act within the statutory timeframes for filing notice of appeal. St. v. Tweed, 2002 MT 286, 312 M 482, 59 P3d 1105 (2002).

Exercise of Original Supreme Court Jurisdiction Based on Statewide Importance of Tribal Water Rights: The Confederated Salish and Kootenai Tribes petitioned the Supreme Court to exercise original jurisdiction in a case involving the use of ground water on the Flathead Indian Reservation. The Supreme Court found this to be an appropriate case in which to exercise original jurisdiction because: (1) the petition implicated constitutional water rights issues under Art. IX, sec. 3, Mont. Const.; (2) tribal water rights are of statewide importance; (3) the decisive issue was purely legal or constitutional; and (4) the normal litigation process was inadequate. Confederated Salish & Kootenai Tribes v. Stults, 2002 MT 280, 312 M 420, 59 P3d 1093 (2002), following In re Application for Beneficial Water Use Permit, 278 M 50, 923 P2d 1073 (1996), and Confederated Salish & Kootenai Tribes v. Clinch, 1999 MT 342, 297 M 448, 992 P2d 244 (1999).

Acceptance of Original Jurisdiction to Address Insurer-Imposed Billing Rules and Procedures: Several attorneys petitioned the Supreme Court for a determination whether insurer-imposed billing and practice rules conflicted with the Rules of Professional Conduct for Montana attorneys. The court accepted original jurisdiction but denied a request from the respondent insurers for an evidentiary hearing. Insurers contended that the court erred in doing so, on grounds that there was no justiciable case, the petitioners lacked standing, and there was no issue of statewide importance. The court found the insurers' arguments to be wholly without merit. The Supreme Court has a constitutional mandate to fashion and interpret rules for the professional conduct of attorneys. Whether the insurer-imposed billing and practice rules conflicted with the Rules of Professional Conduct was a question of law that required no evidentiary hearing. The tension between the two rules created an appearance of impropriety that formed a sufficient basis for the court to exercise its inherent powers and constitutional mandate to address the issue. Petitioners clearly had a personal stake in the issue and thus did not lack standing. Insurers' contention that the issue was not of statewide importance and that they did not have notice and opportunity to respond was belied by the more than 1,000 pages of affidavits, expert opinions, billing and practice rules, and amici briefs submitted by the insurers. In re Rules of Professional Conduct & Insurer Imposed Billing Rules & Procedures, 2000 MT 110, 299 M 321, 2 P3d 806, 57 St. Rep. 433 (2000).

Question of Issuance of Water Use Permits on Reservation Appropriate for Exercise of Supreme Court Original Jurisdiction: The Confederated Salish and Kootenai Tribes petitioned the Supreme Court to accept original jurisdiction and enjoin the state from issuing water use permits on the Flathead Indian Reservation until such time as the tribes' water rights were quantified. The state contended that this was not an appropriate case for the exercise of original jurisdiction because a factual record was necessary in order to determine whether the tribes' rights had been affected and that the appeal process was adequate for development of the factual and legal issues presented by the tribes' petition. The Supreme Court concluded that this was an appropriate case in which to exercise original jurisdiction and entertain the tribes' petition because: (1) the petition implicated Art. IX, sec. 3, Mont. Const.; (2) tribal water rights are of statewide importance; (3) the decisive issue was purely legal or constitutional; and (4) the normal litigation process was inadequate because in the time that it might take for the case to proceed through the courts, any number of water use permits could be issued and water appropriated unlawfully pursuant to those permits. Confederated Salish & Kootenai Tribes v. Clinch, 1999 MT 342, 297 M 448, 992 P2d 244, 56 St. Rep. 1356 (1999). See also Grossman v. St., 209 M 427, 682 P2d 1319, 41 St. Rep. 804 (1984), and Stuart v. Supreme Court Power to Review Legislative Act for Constitutional Conformity Not Violative of Separation of Powers Doctrine: Although the Montana Constitution confers upon the Legislature the exclusive power to set appropriate punishments for criminal acts, the Supreme Court is constitutionally vested with the exclusive power to review whether a particular legislative act conforms to the constitution. Thus, the court's holding that the Montana weapon enhancement statute was violative of state constitutional double jeopardy protections was not a violation of the separation of powers doctrine. St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999). See also In re License Revocation of Gildersleeve, 283 M 479, 942 P2d 705, 54 St. Rep. 735 (1997), and St. v. Walker, 2001 MT 170, 306 M 159, 30 P3d 1099 (2001).

Denial of Bond Pending Appeal — Method of Supreme Court Review — Jurisdiction: After conviction for negligent homicide and on related charges, Ingraham moved the District Court to continue bond pending appeal. The District Court denied the motion, finding that Ingraham was a danger to the community and therefore did not meet the requirements of 46-9-107. Ingraham then moved the Supreme Court, pursuant to former Rule 22, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), to continue bond pending appeal or, in the alternative, to accept appeal of the District Court's order denying bond, pursuant to former Rule 1, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), and 46-20-104.

The Attorney General moved to dismiss, contending that there was no provision in law for appeal from a District Court order denying bond pending appeal and that Ingraham should have brought an original habeas corpus proceeding. The Supreme Court agreed with the Attorney General and dismissed Ingraham's motion or appeal, holding that Ingraham should have brought a petition for a writ of habeas corpus pursuant to 46-22-103. Ingraham then filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, which was filed with Justice Trieweiler pursuant to 3-2-212. Justice Trieweiler granted the petition to the extent necessary for the District Court to hold an evidentiary hearing as provided by statute, under the theory that the District Court was the more appropriate court for the hearing than was the Supreme Court. The Attorney General opposed the order by applying to the full Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control, arguing, contrary to the state's previous position, that 46-22-103 does not really apply to persons convicted in a criminal case and that the more appropriate procedure was an original proceeding "in the nature of habeas corpus" before the full Supreme Court. The application for a writ of supervisory control was denied, was treated by the Supreme Court as a late-filed response to Ingraham's petition for a writ of habeas corpus, and was referred to Justice Trieweiler. Justice Trieweiler determined that it was inappropriate for him alone to determine the form of review of the District Court's denial of bond. Justice Trieweiler also determined that: (1) Ingraham had no constitutional right to bond pending appeal; (2) Ingraham did have a right to the proper exercise of the District Court's discretion in the application of 46-9-107; and (3) that right was a substantial right for the purposes of 46-20-104. For these reasons, Justice Trieweiler vacated his previous order granting Ingraham's petition for a writ of habeas corpus and referred the matter to the full Supreme Court for review of the District Court's order denying bond pending appeal. St. v. Ingraham, 284 M 77, 945 P2d 16, 54 St. Rep. 614 (1997).

Section 1983 Action — Denial of Summary Judgment on Qualified Immunity Held Not Appealable — Lack of Supreme Court Jurisdiction — Sanctions Awarded: After a riot at the Montana State Prison (MSP) in which several prison inmates were killed or injured, inmates brought a negligence and section 1983 action against MSP officials. The MSP officials moved for summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity from the Section 1983 action. The District Court denied the motion, and the MSP officials appealed the denial. The Supreme Court held that the Supreme Court had no jurisdiction over the appeal from the District Court's denial of the summary judgment motion because the District Court order is not a final judgment within the meaning of former Rule 1(b)(1), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), and that the appeal was likewise not authorized by former Rule 1(b)(2) or (3), M.R.App.P. (now superseded). The Supreme Court noted that this result is not changed by the state's allegation that the record in "ripe for appeal" and is "easily reviewable". The Supreme Court also held that the case law of the federal courts interpreting 28 U.S.C. 1291, especially Mitchell v. Forsyth, 472 US 511 (1985), and Johnson v. Jones, 515 US 304, 132 L Ed 2d 238 (1995), 115 S Ct 2151 (1995), was not relevant because the Montana Supreme Court derives its authority over appeals from the state constitution and the Montana Rules of Appellate Procedure and not from 28 U.S.C. 1291. Because the appellants had not made any arguments in favor of their appeal, the Supreme Court determined that it was frivolous and, pursuant to former Rule 32, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), awarded the respondents their attorney fees on appeal. In re Litigation Relating to Riot, 283 M 277, 939 P2d 1013, 54 St. Rep. 598 (1997).

Factors Necessary for Acceptance of Original Jurisdiction:

Although it is correct that prior to the decision in State ex rel. Racicot v. District Court, 244 M 521, 798 P2d 1004 (1990), the Supreme Court had exercised supervisory control under all three circumstances set forth in the Racicot test, subsequent decisions interpreted Racicot to mean that all three circumstances must be present before supervisory control will be accepted. However, the Supreme Court recognizes that there will be circumstances that are appropriate for the exercise of supervisory control that do not satisfy the three-part test. To the extent that Racicot suggests that all three elements must be established and to the extent that subsequent decisions have applied the test in that fashion, they are reversed. Plumb v. District Court, 279 M 363, 927 P2d 1011, 53 St. Rep. 1187 (1996).

Once standing to bring an action is established, the question shifts to whether the action meets the necessary factors for the Supreme Court to accept original jurisdiction. Assumption of original jurisdiction is proper when: (1) constitutional issues of major statewide importance are involved; (2) the case involves purely legal questions of statutory and constitutional construction; and (3) urgency and emergency factors exist, making the normal appeal process inadequate. Butte-Silver Bow Local Gov't v. St., 235 M 398, 768 P2d 327, 46 St. Rep. 87 (1989), followed in State ex rel. Racicot v. District Court, 244 M 521, 798 P2d 1004, 47 St. Rep. 1785 (1990). See also State ex rel. Greely v. Water Court, 214 M 143, 691 P2d 833 (1984), State ex rel. Nelson v. District Court, 262 M 70, 863 P2d 1027, 50 St. Rep. 1447 (1993), and Craig v. District Court, 262 M 201, 864 P2d 791, 50 St. Rep. 1515 (1993).

Dismissal of "Friendly Suit" as Nonjusticiable Controversy: Relator applied to the Supreme Court to commence an original proceeding for declaratory judgment, writ of mandate, and other appropriate relief. He sought a court requirement of the Secretary of State to commence the administrative process for inclusion of two constitutional initiatives in the next regular statewide election. The court found no justiciable controversy existed because the Secretary of State had already advised county election officials that he intended to place the initiatives on the ballot, which was essentially the same relief relator sought through the court by his "friendly suit". A declaratory judgment and writ of mandate are inappropriate in the absence of a justiciable controversy; therefore, relator's application for an original proceeding was dismissed. Marbut v. Secretary of St., 231 M 131, 752 P2d 148, 45 St. Rep. 487 (1988).

Declaratory Judgment on Requiring Prepayment of Jury Fees by Party Demanding Jury: The Supreme Court took original jurisdiction of, and heard, a petition for a declaratory judgment that it was unconstitutional to require prepayment, by a party requesting a civil jury trial, of each day's jury fees at or before the end of the prior day. The requirement was contained in Rule 14F, M.J.C.R.Civ.P. (Title 25, ch. 22, superseded 1990). There was a justiciable controversy of statewide impact in that the rule applied to all justice courts; delay could abridge vital constitutional rights of litigants; the purpose of the declaratory judgment would serve the office of a writ, and the court has jurisdiction to issue, hear, and determine writs; and it would promote judicial economy to accept jurisdiction rather than force piecemeal litigation on the constitutionality of the rule. The court said that the prepayment requirement was contained in the rule and 3-15-203, which provided that "In civil actions, the jurors' fees must be paid by the party demanding the jury and taxed as costs against the losing party", and declared both the statute and rule unconstitutional. Hammer v. Justice Court, 222 M 35, 720 P2d 281, 43 St. Rep. 1040 (1986).

Supreme Court Original Jurisdiction Over Declaratory Action Concerning Statewide Water Adjudication: The Supreme Court had power to determine an action for declaratory judgment involving the constitutionality of the requirement in 85-2-234 that final water decrees state "the amount of water, rate, and volume, included in the right". The issue affects all rights in the statewide adjudication process. Determination of the issue by the Supreme Court: (1) will provide guidance to the water court; (2) is in the interests of judicial economy; and (3) would serve the public policy of the state by expediting the determination of existing water rights. McDonald v. St., 220 M 519, 722 P2d 598, 43 St. Rep. 576 (1986), rehearing denied, 220 M 519, 722 P2d 598, 43 St. Rep. 1397 (1986).

Original Jurisdiction — Declaratory Judgments: Plaintiff filed a complaint for declaratory judgment in the Supreme Court seeking to determine the validity of several acts of the Legislature allowing the issuance of state revenue bonds. The bonds would be financed by coal severance taxes to provide proceeds for development of state water resources. The Supreme Court accepted original jurisdiction of the declaratory judgment action. The court relied on Forty-Second Legislative Assembly v. Lennon, 156 M 416, 481 P2d 330 (1971), and the transcripts of the 1972 Constitutional Convention proceedings to determine that the original jurisdiction of the court as contained in the 1889 Montana Constitution was intended to be continued in the 1972 Montana Constitution. The court held that it does have original jurisdiction to accept declaratory judgment proceedings when the issues have impact of major importance on a statewide basis or upon a major segment of the state and when the purpose of the declaratory judgment proceedings will serve the office of a writ provided by law in accordance with Art. VII, sec. 2(1), Mont. Const. Grossman v. St., 209 M 427, 682 P2d 1319, 41 St. Rep. 804 (1984).

Starting Point for Running of Period for Filing Appeal — Workers' Compensation: For an appeal from a final decision of the Workers' Compensation Judge to be filed in the manner provided by law for appeals from the District Court in civil cases, there must be a date that is the starting point for the running of the period for filing notice of appeal under former Rule 5, M.R.App.Civ.P. (now Montana Rules of Appellate Procedure, now superseded). In that there is no judgment book in the Workers' Compensation Court in which to enter the judgment and therefore there can be no notice of entry of judgment, the court established, under the powers granted by Art. VII, sec. 2, Mont. Const., that the date on which a decision becomes final under ARM 2.52.222 (now repealed) shall be the starting point for the running of the period for filing the notice of appeal. McMahon v. The Anaconda Co., 194 M 546, 828 P2d 374, 38 St. Rep. 1233 (1981).

Closure of Voir Dire Examination to Public and Press Vacated: At the commencement of Gene Austad's trial, the District Court directed that the individual voir dire examination of prospective jurors be closed to the press and public. The Great Falls Tribune filed an original proceeding in the Supreme Court seeking a Writ of Supervisory Control. The Supreme Court directed the District Court to allow the press and public to attend the voir dire examination. The court found that there is nothing in subjecting the prospective jurors to an open and public voir dire examination that would deny or impair Austad's right to a speedy trial. The Montana Constitution imposes a stricter standard in order to authorize closure of a trial than does the United States Constitution. Great Falls Tribune v. District Court, 186 M 433, 608 P2d 116 (1980).

Habeas Corpus — Exhaustion of Remedies — Procedures — Interstate Corrections: Petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus was denied prisoner convicted in Montana but imprisoned in Nevada because state remedies had not been exhausted. Evans v. Wolff, 427 F. Supp. 400 (D.C. Mont. 1977).

Original Jurisdiction — Malicious Prosecution: Appeal by Attorney General from denial of motion to dismiss suit based upon malicious prosecution is a proper case for Supreme Court to exercise its original jurisdiction. State ex rel. Dept. of Justice v. District Court, 172 M 88, 560 P2d 1328 (1976).

Habeas Corpus — Absence of New Facts: Where petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus shows no new facts not previously considered by Supreme Court, the Writ will be denied. Gallagher v. Crist, 172 M 51, 560 P2d 538 (1976).

Habeas Corpus — Exhaustion of Remedies in Neglect Proceeding: In child neglect proceeding a writ will not be granted if adequate remedies have not been exhausted notwithstanding petitioner's loss of remedy by not making timely appeal. Stubben v. Flathead County Dept. of Public Welfare, 171 M 111, 556 P2d 904 (1976).

Writ of Certiorari Will Not Lie — Police Commission Hearing in Progress: A Writ of Certiorari is not proper where the proceedings to be reviewed are pending or undetermined because before a Writ of Certiorari will lie there must be an absence of the right of appeal, which cannot arise while proceeding is in progress but only after a decision or judgment is rendered. In re DeWar, 169 M 437, 548 P2d 149 (1976).

SUPERVISORY CONTROL

Supervisory Control Exercised — Personal Jurisdiction Question Urgent, Purely Legal, Constitutional, and of Statewide and National Importance: The District Court denied a car manufacturer's motion to dismiss for lack of specific personal jurisdiction. The manufacturer petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control and the Supreme Court granted it because (1) urgency makes the normal appeal process inadequate when there is a question of personal jurisdiction, (2) the manufacturer's constitutional right to due process was at issue, (3) the question of whether personal jurisdiction existed was purely legal, and (4) the question was of statewide and national importance. Ford Motor Co. v. 8th Judicial District Court, 2019 MT 115, 395 Mont. 478, 443 P.3d 407.

Order Requiring Public Defender Overturned — Supervisory Control — Nonjailable Offenses: The Justice Court ordered the Office of State Public Defender (OPD) to appoint a public defender to represent a defendant in a misdemeanor theft case. The OPD appealed on a writ of supervisory control, arguing that the Justice Court had no authority to compel it to provide a public defender in a case involving a nonjailable misdemeanor offense, pursuant to 46-8-101. In response, the Justice Court argued that the defendant had a right to government-provided counsel under the federal and state constitutions in all cases. The Supreme Court overruled the Justice Court, holding that supervisory control was necessary and proper, 46-8-101 did not require a public defender in the underlying case because it did not involve a jailable offense, and there was no authority suggesting that this statutory restriction of public defenders to felonies and misdemeanors involving jailable offenses was unconstitutional. Office of St. Pub. Defender v. Fagenstrom, 2019 MT 104, 395 Mont. 397, 439 P.3d 1285.

Scheduled Arraignment With No Personal Appearance by Defendant — Hearing Not Considered Actual Arraignment — Writ of Supervisory Control Granted to Allow for Substitution of Judge: The defendant was arrested after he failed to appear for his scheduled arraignment on assault charges. Six days after he attended the second scheduled arraignment, the defendant filed a motion to substitute the judge pursuant to 3-1-804. The District Court denied his motion because it was not filed within 10 days of the first scheduled arraignment. The defendant filed a writ of supervisory control with the Supreme Court, arguing that the District Court had erred in considering the first scheduled arraignment as his arraignment because he had not attended it. The Supreme Court agreed and granted the writ, holding that an arraignment at which the defendant does not appear, whether voluntary or not, cannot be considered an arraignment for purposes of a motion to substitute. Collins v. 8th Judicial District Court, 2018 MT 125, 391 Mont. 378, 418 P.3d 672.

Supervisory Control Granted — Appeal Cannot Undo Damage to Privacy Right for Unwarranted Psychological Evaluation: After being hit by a vehicle that left the scene, the plaintiff sought compensation from her insurer under her uninsured motorist coverage for past and future medical expenses and for physical and emotional pain, suffering, and anxiety associated with the physical injuries. The District Court issued an order for an independent psychological examination for the purpose of determining whether the plaintiff's chronic pain was caused or exacerbated by preexisting mental health issues. Subsequently, the Supreme Court granted the plaintiff's request for supervisory control based on the factors in Rule 14(3), M.R.App.P. (Title 25, ch. 21), reasoning that an appeal of a final judgment could not undo the damage to the plaintiff's privacy right caused by an unwarranted psychological evaluation. Lewis v. District Court, 2012 MT 200, 366 Mont. 217, 286 P.3d 577.

Writ of Supervisory Control Appropriate — Remedy by Appeal Inadequate: In a proceeding regarding the interpretation of the Securities Act of Montana in which the District Court ruled that certain tenants-in-common investments were not securities, supervisory control was appropriate because the ruling would cause a significant injustice that could not be remedied by appeal. Redding v. District Court, 2012 MT 144, 365 Mont. 316, 281 P.3d 189.

Letter Written by Insurer's Counsel and Disclosed to Employer in Workers' Compensation Claim — No Application of Attorney-Client Privilege — Protection of Work-Product Doctrine Waived by Disclosure — Supervisory Control Granted: An employee was injured at Roscoe Steel and filed a workers' compensation claim. Zurich, which insured Roscoe Steel, accepted liability for the claim and contracted with a third party to adjust the claim. Over time, the employee and Zurich disagreed about the employee's level of impairment. Eventually, Zurich had an attorney prepare an opinion and evaluation letter regarding the employee's case. The letter was given to Zurich as well as to the claims adjuster, who, without the knowledge of Zurich or the attorney, gave a copy of it to Roscoe Steel. Ultimately, the employee filed an action for unfair claims settlement practices against Zurich and the claims adjuster. As a part of discovery, the employee served a subpoena duces tecum on Roscoe Steel requesting all correspondence with Zurich, the adjuster, and the attorney's law firm. Counsel for Roscoe Steel filed an action to quash the subpoena, citing the attorney-client privilege and the attorney work-product doctrine. After the District Court denied the motion, Zurich petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control, which was granted. The Supreme Court agreed that the attorney-client privilege did not apply because Roscoe Steel and Zurich did not share a common legal interest in the adjustment of the employee's claim and that Roscoe Steel was not protected by Zurich's privilege with its counsel. Similarly, because Roscoe Steel and Zurich did not share common litigation interests, there was no reasonable expectation that Roscoe Steel would keep Zurich's work product confidential, and the privilege had been waived by the letter's disclosure to Roscoe Steel. American Zurich Ins. Co. v. 13th Judicial District Court, 2012 MT 61, 364 Mont. 299, 280 P.3d 240.

Supervisory Control Exercised to Clarify Standard of Review of Sentences by Sentence Review Division: Several defendants who intended to have their sentences reviewed moved that the Sentence Review Division clarify the standard applied to sentences submitted for review. The Division had applied the "clearly inadequate or excessive" standard in Rule 17 of the Division's rules, but defendants asked that the Division instead review cases for equity. Defendants petitioned for supervisory control by the Supreme Court, and the petition was granted pursuant to the court's authority to ensure that the Division complies with applicable constitutional and statutory rules. The court noted that the Legislature did not articulate a specific standard of review, but instead granted the Division authority to adopt rules to expedite sentence review. The court concluded that the Division's rules provide for an appropriately broad review of the totality of the facts and circumstances of each case, including review for equity, disparity, or considerations of justice. Under 46-18-904, the sentence imposed by the District Court is presumed correct, and after a hearing, the Division then decides if this presumption has been overcome and whether a new sentence should be imposed, after determining whether the original sentence was clearly inadequate or excessive. This standard is a valid application of the Division's statutory duty and is the standard to be applied to sentence review. Driver v. Sentence Review Div., 2010 MT 43, 355 Mont. 273, 227 P.3d 1018, clarifying In re Jones, 176 Mont. 412, 578 P.2d 1150 (1978).

Supervisory Control Appropriate to Address Constitutionality of Statute Requiring Person to Remain at Site of Fatal Accident: Steglich was charged with failure to remain at the scene of a fatal accident pursuant to 61-7-103. Steglich moved to dismiss on grounds that the statute was unconstitutionally vague. The District Court held that the statute was vague both facially and as applied to Steglich and granted the dismissal motion. The state filed a petition for supervisory control. The Supreme Court held that urgency or emergency factors existed that made the normal appeal process inadequate and that because the case involved purely legal questions as well as constitutional issues of statewide importance and because the District Court was proceeding under a mistake of law causing a gross injustice, supervisory control was appropriate. St. v. District Court, 2009 MT 163, 350 M 465, 208 P3d 408 (2009).

Mistake of Law — Aunt and Uncle Lack Standing to Petition for Termination of Parental Rights: J.C. is the sole surviving parent of 8-year-old J.R. J.R.'s birth father was killed in 1999 when J.C. crashed the vehicle in which she, J.R.'s father, and another of J.C.'s children were riding. J.C. was pregnant with J.R. at the time. The wreck killed all but J.C. and her unborn child, J.R. J.C. married M.W. M.W. and J.C. have lived together since J.R. was 1 month old. In 2005, J.C. drove the getaway car in a botched armed robbery. J.R. and his half-brother were unrestrained in the back seat of the vehicle when J.C. crashed the car into a tree. J.C. was taken to jail and the children were placed in foster care by the Department of Public Health and Human Services. J.C. pleaded guilty to felony criminal endangerment for her role in the armed robbery and received a 10-year suspended sentence. The sentencing court warned J.C. that if she violated her probation, she would serve the entire 10 years. J.C. ultimately agreed to allow J.R.'s half-brother to move with his father to South Dakota, but J.C. declined to relinquish J.R. to his aunt and uncle despite their offers to assist her. Less than a year after J.C. received her suspended sentence, she admitted to violating her probation by drinking and driving. Her suspended sentence was revoked and she was transported to the women's prison to serve her full sentence. Before she went to prison, J.C. executed a durable power of attorney enabling M.W. to handle her financial affairs. Although J.C. made no provision for J.R. in the power of attorney, she left J.R. in M.W.'s care. M.W. is on probation for failing to register in Montana as a violent offender. On November 21, 2007, G.R. and P.R. filed a petition for termination of parental rights requesting that the court permanently terminate J.C.'s parental rights to J.R. and order the adoption of J.R. by G.R. and P.R. G.R. and P.R. also filed a motion for temporary care pending the disposition of their petition. That same day, the judge issued an order removing J.R. from M.W.'s care and placing him in the temporary care of G.R. and P.R., who reside in Idaho. On December 11, 2007, J.C. filed a motion to dismiss the petition to terminate her parental rights alleging that G.R. and P.R. do not qualify as persons entitled by the adoption statutes to file such a petition as they do not meet any of the standing requirements. However, the following day, J.C. signed an agreement wherein she voluntarily and unequivocally relinquished her parental rights to J.R. and consented to both the permanent transfer of legal and physical custody to and the adoption of J.R. by G.R. and P.R. J.C. was represented by counsel at the time she entered into this agreement. Eight days later, on December 20, 2007, J.C. revoked her consent and moved to dismiss the order for temporary care. She also requested that the court impose sanctions against G.R., P.R., and their counsel on the grounds that the motion for temporary care was not warranted by existing law and was filed for the improper purpose of depriving a parent of her constitutionally protected right to parent her child. That same day, M.W. filed a cross-petition for stepparent adoption. A hearing on the issue of temporary care took place on March 25, 2008. J.C. testified from prison via videoconference. G.R., P.R., and M.W. testified as well. At the time of the hearing, G.R. and P.R. filed a motion to amend their petition for termination of parental rights to add a reference to 40-6-233, giving relatives within the third degree the right to bring an action alleging abuse of parental authority. The court allowed the filing of the amended petition. On May 5, 2008, J.C. filed a motion to dismiss the amended petition, arguing that a parental abuse action is a distinct and separate action that does not confer standing under the adoption statutes. The District Court issued its findings of fact, conclusions of law, and an order on June 11, 2008, in which the court determined that G.R. and P.R. had standing to bring the petition. The court ordered that J.R. remain in the temporary care of G.R. and P.R. pending a hearing on the termination of J.C.'s parental rights. The court also denied J.C.'s motion for sanctions. Thereafter, J.C. filed her petition for writ of supervisory control with the Supreme Court. A hearing on the termination of J.C.'s parental rights was to be conducted by the District Court on September 10, 2008, but that action was stayed pending the outcome of J.C.'s petition. The Supreme Court assumed supervisory control to determine whether G.R. and P.R. had standing to bring the amended petition to terminate parental rights and for adoption. A child's aunt and uncle are not parties authorized by 42-1-107 to place a child for adoption. A child may not be placed for adoption until the parental rights of the birth parents have been terminated by a court as provided in Title 41, ch. 3, or Title 42. G.R. and P.R. did not have standing to file a petition for termination of parental rights under 42-2-603(2). Under Title 41, ch. 3, a petition for the termination of parental right based upon abuse or neglect of a child may only be brought by the County Attorney, the Attorney General, or an attorney hired by the county. Section 40-6-233 refers to the abuse of parental authority for making decisions regarding the support and education of a child and is not the basis for terminating parental rights. Therefore, G.R. and P.R. do not have standing to petition for the termination of parental rights based upon abuse or neglect. J.C. v. Eleventh Judicial District Court, 2008 MT 358, 346 M 357, 197 P3d 907 (2008).

No Mistake of Law in City Court's Failure to Appoint Counsel Given Defendant's Prior Refusal of Appointed Counsel or Appropriate Request: Compton was arrested in Flathead County and charged with first offense DUI. At both Compton's initial appearance in City Court and at the subsequent arraignment hearing, Compton refused appointed counsel. However, a few days later, Compton submitted a whimsical, handwritten document to the Office of State Public Defender (OSPD) in Whitefish requesting appointment of counsel. The OSPD then appeared in court and requested permission to file a notice of appearance on behalf of Compton, but the judge refused to enter the OSPD's appearance because of the absence of documents demonstrating an attorney-client relationship. The OSPD then faxed the handwritten document to the court, but the judge declined to appoint counsel absent a request from Compton, either in person or by an appropriate written request. The OSPD then filed a petition for supervisory control with the Supreme Court requesting that the court order the City Judge to appoint the OSPD to represent counsel. The Supreme Court noted that a writ of supervisory control is appropriate only in extraordinary circumstances when a court is proceeding under a mistake of law that will result in significant injustice if not corrected. Here, the OSPD was unable to demonstrate a mistake of law. Under 47-1-111, it is assumed that a court's initial order for appointment of counsel will follow an appropriate request by a defendant. Compton had twice refused appointed counsel, and the handwritten request lacked credibility and was inappropriate, so refusal to appoint counsel absent a request from Compton, either in person or by an appropriate written request, was not a mistake of law. The Supreme Court denied the petition for supervisory control, noting that if Compton desired appointed counsel, he could submit an appropriate request and that his eligibility could then be determined in accordance with statute. Office of St. Pub. Defender v. Whitefish City Court, 2008 MT 79, 342 M 141, 188 P3d 43 (2008), distinguishing Rios v. Justice's Court, 2006 MT 256, 334 M 111, 148 P3d 602 (2006).

No Exception to Sixty-Day Rule for Prosecutor's Filing of Notice to Seek Death Penalty — Lack of Prejudice to Defendants Irrelevant: The defendants petitioned the Supreme Court to take supervisory control and reverse the trial court's decision that the prosecutor's failure to file the notice to seek the death penalty within the 60 days required by rule was acceptable because the late filing did not prejudice the defendants. The defendants argued that the late filing was a violation of their rights to due process under the federal and state constitutions. The Supreme Court held that it did not have to resort to a due process analysis but that the issue could be decided on the basis of subsection (3) of this section granting the Supreme Court its rulemaking authority. The Supreme Court noted that it had amended Standard 1.1.a. in 2002 to include the 60-day notice rule and that the Legislature had not exercised its right to disapprove the rule in the two following legislative sessions. The state argued that the 60-day rule was subject to exceptions, stating that in the present case, the defendants and their counsel were well aware that the death penalty was a potential punishment and that the notice was filed sufficiently in advance of the trial to afford the defendants ample opportunity to defend against a capital case. The Supreme Court stated that the state's reliance on St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307 (1997), for the proposition that the defendants were entitled only to adequate notice was misplaced. The Supreme Court held that even if the defendants' rights to due process were met by adequate notice, that did not nullify their argument that the 60-day notice rule is a mandate. The defendants argued that the plain language of the 60-day rule was clear and left no room for the trial court to inject the concept of allowing a late notice if a defendant is not prejudiced by the delay. The Supreme Court agreed and held that the court rules were subject to the same rules of interpretation as statutory law and the notice rule was clear on its face that a prosecutor has only 60 days after arraignment to file the notice of intent to seek the death penalty. The Supreme Court pointed out that the rule states that the prosecutor "shall" not "should" or "may" file the notice within 60 days and that the use of shall creates a mandate for when the notice must be filed. Miller v. District Court., 2007 MT 149, 337 M 488, 162 P3d 121 (2007).

Writ of Supervisory Control Proper in Case of Late Filing of Notice to Seek Death Penalty: The defendants petitioned the Supreme Court to take supervisory control and reverse the trial court's decision that the prosecutor's late filing of the notice to seek the death penalty was acceptable because the late filing did not prejudice the defendants. The Supreme Court ruled that it was proper to exercise supervisory control because appealing the ruling was not an adequate remedy because if the prosecutor should have been barred from seeking the death penalty, then the defendants would be subjected to defending themselves from that penalty when they would not have been subject to the penalty in the first place. The Supreme Court stated that if the trial court's ruling was incorrect, then the defendants would be subjected to a gross injustice for which appeal was not an adequate remedy. Miller v. District Court, 2007 MT 149, 337 M 488, 162 P3d 121 (2007).

Probability of Mootness — Writ of Supervisory Control Appropriate When Issue Likely to Arise Again — Appeal Inadequate Remedy: Defendant Courville was charged in Justice's Court with speeding, DUI, and possession of an open container. Courville requested a waiver of a jury trial, and the state objected. The Justice's Court granted the waiver, finding that the statute violated Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const. The state filed an application for a writ of supervisory control and a motion for stay of proceedings pending the Supreme Court's review of the application. Courville argued that the case was likely to be dismissed under 46-13-401(2), which requires dismissal of misdemeanor prosecutions if not brought to trial within a certain time period, thus making the issue of waiver of a jury trial moot. The Supreme Court found that there was a justiciable controversy because the issue would very likely arise in future proceedings. The court further concluded that the case was appropriate for the exercise of supervisory control, an extraordinary remedy exercised when a court is proceeding under a mistake of law that, if uncorrected, would cause significant injustice and the remedy of appeal is inadequate. The appeal process in this matter would have provided an inadequate remedy for the state because, upon appeal, the state would have already lost its right to consent or object to waiver of a jury trial. The Supreme Court vacated the waiver of a jury trial, holding that Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const., provides a right of a jury trial to the state and that both parties in a criminal trial must consent to waiver. State ex rel. Long v. Justice's Court, 2007 MT 3, 335 M 219, 156 P3d 5 (2007).

Discovery of Corporate Communications Conducted During Former Director's Tenure — No Violation of Attorney-Client Privilege: Plaintiff corporation sought a writ of supervisory control on grounds that the District Court was proceeding under a mistake of law by controlling a discovery attempt by the former director of a corporation to discover communications between the corporation's current directors and corporate counsel that occurred while the former director was a director. Plaintiff contended that allowing discovery violated the attorney-client privilege. The Supreme Court concluded that although the corporation was the client, the directors were jointly responsible for the management of the corporation and that, consistent with this responsibility, the directors must be treated as joint clients with the corporation when legal advice is rendered to the corporation through its officers or directors. When the former director was a corporate officer, he was entitled to access attorney-client communications, and the fact that he was no longer a director was not sufficient cause to render those communications privileged against him. The confidentiality of the attorney-client privilege is not violated when a former director of a closely held corporation who brings claims against the corporation is allowed to discover communication between corporate counsel and other directors that occurred during the former director's tenure as a director. Thus, the Supreme Court declined to accept supervisory control. Inter-Fluve v. District Court, 2005 MT 103, 327 M 14, 112 P3d 258 (2005).

Punishment for Contempt by Judge Who Issues Order Not Erroneous Absent Showing of Impartiality — No Due Process Violation: Drew was appointed to represent a criminal defendant but failed to file an amended petition for postconviction relief as ordered. Following several months of missed deadlines, the District Court held that Drew had failed to provide any plausible explanation for the failure to comply with the court's orders. Drew was then removed from the case, charged with contempt, and sentenced to jail time and a fine. The day before the jail term was to begin, Drew filed a writ of certiorari and a motion for an emergency stay order, contending that the District Court's action constituted a deprivation of Drew's due process right, including the right to allocution, a hearing before a neutral magistrate, and the opportunity to present testimony through witnesses by way of defense or explanation. The stay was issued, but in an original proceeding, the Supreme Court disagreed, denied the writ, and lifted the stay. Under 3-1-518, the judge who issues a contempt order is authorized to punish the contempt, and the only proviso against the court's punishment authority is if it is shown that the judge would not be impartial. The statute itself provides that the charged person is entitled to a hearing and to examine witnesses and also takes into account the issue of partiality by allowing the charged person to demonstrate that the sitting judge could not be impartial, in which case the neutral magistrate requirement will be imposed. Section 3-1-518 contains its own due process safeguards. Thus, due process is not offended by allowing a District Court Judge to preside over a contempt hearing when the contempt arose from violation of an order of that court issued after a hearing on the merits on the subject of the order. In these situations, the judge who conducted the hearing and issued the order retains the authority to punish that violation by contempt proceedings, as long as the other due process protections in the statute and enunciated by the Montana and U.S. Supreme Courts are met and honored, unless it is shown that the judge could not be impartial. Drew v. District Court, 2004 MT 154, 321 M 520, 92 P3d 1195 (2004).

Supervisory Control Accepted When District Court Proceeding Under Mistake of Law Regarding Time Period for Substitution of Judge: The exercise of supervisory control was appropriate when the District Court was proceeding under a mistake of law regarding the period of time within which a motion must be filed for substitution of a judge pursuant to 3-1-804. State ex rel. Dusek v. District Court, 2003 MT 303, 318 M 166, 79 P3d 292 (2003).

Supervisory Control Denied to Address Discovery Issues: Petitioner sought a writ of supervisory control to address a District Court order directing petitioner to submit to discovery through an independent medical examination in an automobile accident negligence case. The Supreme Court declined to exercise supervisory control. Typically, orders pertaining to discovery are interlocutory in nature and are not generally reviewable in an original proceeding. Original jurisdiction will be exercised when an order places a party at a significant disadvantage in litigating a case. Supervisory control should issue when a District Court proceeds under a mistake of law, causing a gross injustice for which an appeal is not an adequate remedy, but supervisory control is an extraordinary remedy exercised only in extraordinary circumstances. Absent a showing that procedural protections were inadequate to control discovery in an independent medical examination, supervisory control was inappropriate. Hegwood v. District Court, 2003 MT 200, 317 M 30, 75 P3d 308 (2003).

Supervisory Control Appropriate to Address Res Judicata Claim: Following a dispute over the sale of irrigation equipment, H-D Irrigating and Lane sued Kimble Properties and Kimble for false representation of the irrigation equipment and damages. Kimble Properties and Kimble counterclaimed for the balance due on the equipment, alleging that H-D Irrigating was a sham and the alter ego of Lane. The alter ego claim was never pursued. The Supreme Court eventually decided the case in H-D Irrigating, Inc. v. Kimble Properties, Inc., 2000 MT 212, 301 M 34, 8 P3d 95 (2000), and remanded for judgment in favor of Kimble. In an effort to collect, Kimble sought to compel Lane to testify regarding the assets of H-D Irrigating, but rather than appear, Lane filed bankruptcy and received a stay on further proceedings. Kimble then filed an action to collect from Lane personally, again raising the alter ego issue. Lane asserted that the issue had been already decided in the prior litigation and sought supervisory control on res judicata grounds. The Supreme Court held that the case was appropriate for supervisory control because if the res judicata claim was correct, Lane was entitled to summary judgment, but if denial of the summary judgment motion was in error, Lane would be required to defend against the same claim a second time and incur the attendant delay and expense, resulting in a gross injustice. The case was remanded for further proceedings on the alter ego claim. Lane v. District Court, 2003 MT 130, 316 M 55, 68 P3d 819 (2003), following Plumb v. District Court, 279 M 363, 927 P2d 1011 (1996).

Dual Insurance Claims — Supervisory Control Proper to Facilitate Convenience and Judicial Economy: Following a vehicle accident, a couple sought recovery for injuries and loss of consortium and also alleged that the damages exceeded the limits of defendants' coverage, entitling them to recover from their own policy. The District Court bifurcated the claims, and the couple sought relief from the order on grounds that they would be prejudiced by having to prosecute two separate trials. The Supreme Court concurred with the couple and, in the interests of the convenience of the parties and judicial economy, agreed to exercise supervisory control. State ex rel. Gadbaw v. District Court, 2003 MT 127, 316 M 25, 75 P3d 1238 (2003), following Malta Pub. School District A & 14 v. District Court, 283 M 46, 938 P2d 1238 (1997).

Supervisory Control Proper to Determine Whether Admission of Evidence of Subsequent Accidents With Nonparties Admissible to Disprove Liability for Damages: Following Truman's injury in an automobile accident, she was involved in a second automobile accident and in an accident involving an ultralight aircraft. The District Court held that evidence of Truman's injuries in the second automobile accident and the aircraft accident would be admissible in a trial related to the first automobile accident to disprove causation. Truman requested that the Supreme Court exercise supervisory control because the District Court made a mistake of law that would place Truman at a significant disadvantage in litigating the case. If the District Court's conclusion, that evidence of subsequent accidents with nonparties was admissible, proved incorrect, that conclusion would impact all aspects of the trial, render the trial results unreliable, and substantially increase the cost to Truman in both time and finances. Therefore, the Supreme Court acceded to the request and exercised supervisory control to determine whether the District Court was proceeding based upon a mistake of law. Truman v. District Court, 2003 MT 91, 315 M 165, 68 P3d 654 (2003), following Plumb v. District Court, 279 M 363, 927 P2d 1011 (1996).

Supervisory Control Proper to Determine Scope of Court-Ordered Medical Examination: Pursuant to former Rule 35, M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), the District Court ordered plaintiff to undergo an extensive independent medical examination by an expert 750 miles away. The examination would have subjected plaintiff to burdensome, painful, invasive, elective, and potentially harmful procedures. Plaintiff requested that the Supreme Court assume supervisory control, asserting that the District Court was proceeding on a mistake of law that posed a risk of gross injustice to plaintiff. The Supreme Court agreed. The extent to which former Rule 35 permits an individual to be subjected to extensive and potentially harmful procedures is an issue of statewide importance, and an appeal from a mistake of law compelled by the rule would be an inadequate remedy. Therefore, the Supreme Court determined that supervisory control was appropriate to determine whether the District Court was proceeding under a mistake of law in ordering the examination. Simms v. District Court, 2003 MT 89, 315 M 135, 68 P3d 678 (2003). See also Winslow v. Mont. Rail Link, Inc., 2001 MT 269, 307 M 269, 38 P3d 148 (2001).

Supervisory Control of Issue Related to Wrongful Death and Survival Action and Evidence of Economic Consumption: Plaintiff sought supervisory control of an action related to evidence of economic consumption as it pertained to a survival action and wrongful death. The Supreme Court found that allowing the District Court to permit the jury to consider evidence of economic consumption in this case would be a mistake of law constituting a deviation from well-established jurisprudence that would alter the cost of and preparation for trial, affect settlement negotiations, and call into question the value of any potential verdict, resulting in additional time and expense for appellate resolution and subsequent litigation. Any remedy available to plaintiff on direct appeal would thus prove inadequate, resulting in a gross injustice. Therefore, the Supreme Court held that this was an appropriate case in which to exercise supervisory control. Payne v. District Court, 2002 MT 313, 313 M 118, 60 P3d 469 (2002).

Exercise of Supervisory Control of Legal Issues Regarding Water Rights: The Water Court accepted a master's report concerning the adjudication of certain Missouri River basin water rights without objection from the Department of Fish, Wildlife, and Parks, ruling that five pre-1973 water rights claims based on diversions for fish, wildlife, or recreation were potentially invalid based on the holding in In re Water Rights in Dearborn Drainage, 234 M 331, 766 P2d 228 (1988), commonly known as the Bean Lake decision. The state appealed, but the Water Court asserted that the appeal should be dismissed or converted to a petition for declaratory relief or supervisory control. The Supreme Court agreed that compliance with claim examination rules is critical to effective appellate review, but determined that because the Bean Lake decision was the genesis of the alleged confusion over the present matter, the issue should be treated as a continuation of the Bean Lake decision in which the Supreme Court accepted supervisory control. Therefore, the court accepted supervisory control here as well in order to resolve the confusion, promote judicial economy, expedite determination of existing water rights, and assist in avoiding protracted litigation. In re Adjudication of Existing Water Rights of Basin 41I, 2002 MT 216, 311 M 327, 55 P3d 396 (2002).

Right of Substitution in Cases Involving Multiple Parties — Supervisory Control Appropriate: The question of whether a District Court properly interpreted 3-1-804, to require a defendant to demonstrate its adversity to another defendant that had already exercised its right of substitution in order to invoke an independent right of substitution, was an issue of both first impression and statewide importance. Based on these extraordinary circumstances and a particular need to keep an injustice from occurring, the Supreme Court accepted supervisory control to address the issue. The District Court's interpretation was held to be proper. Goldman Sachs Group, Inc. v. District Court, 2002 MT 83, 309 M 287, 46 P3d 606 (2002).

Denial of Motion to Intervene — Supreme Court Use of Supervisory Control for Immediate Review of Interlocutory Order: Two sporting groups sought to intervene in an action challenging the enforcement of a ballot initiative that prohibited the shooting of alternative livestock for a fee. The District Court denied the motion, so the groups sought a writ of supervisory control, claiming that a direct appeal after a final judgment would be a wholly inadequate remedy. The Supreme Court noted that although an order denying a motion to intervene is not separately appealable under former Rule 1, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), the proper appeal from such an interlocutory order lies after entry of final judgment. However, supervisory control may be used to immediately review an interlocutory order when: (1) there is no remedy by appeal or other remedial procedure and extraordinary circumstances are present; (2) an appeal from a final judgment would impose undue hardship on an applicant and be wholly inadequate as a remedy; and (3) necessary to prevent extended and needless litigation. This case presented the purely legal issue of whether the primary proponents of a ballot issue have a legally protectable interest sufficient to allow intervention in a case challenging the resulting statute. The Supreme Court considered this case to be extraordinary and of statewide importance, noting that appeal following a final judgment would come too late and would not allow the groups to participate in the defense of the initiative that they actively supported, and that if the groups successfully appealed the denial of their motion to intervene after final judgment, extended and needless litigation would result. Thus, the Supreme Court accepted supervisory control because appeal from a final judgment would be a wholly inadequate remedy. Sportsmen for I-143 v. District Court, 2002 MT 18, 308 M 189, 40 P3d 400 (2002).

Order Signed During Judge's Term of Office, but Not Filed Until After Expiration of Judge's Term, Considered Binding: One day before the expiration of her legal term of office, a District Court Judge signed an order affirming an administrative decision in a labor dispute, but the order was not filed until 3 days after the judge's term of office expired. The judge's successor struck the order and directed further proceedings. The union then petitioned the Supreme Court for supervisory control, contending that striking the original order was a mistake of law. The Supreme Court agreed, applying Plumb v. District Court, 279 M 363, 927 P2d 1011 (1996), and accepted supervisory control because of the absence of a plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law. The court noted that states generally recognize that judgments undergo three phases of final development, including rendition, reduction to writing, and entry, but that states vary in their determination of the stage at which a judgment binds the parties before the court. The court determined that the case most directly on point to the facts in the present case was Cirro Wrecking Co. v. Roppolo, 605 NE 2d 544 (Ill. 1992). The filing of the District Court's order was merely a ministerial function performed by the Clerk of the District Court. The judgment was otherwise properly rendered during the pendency of the judge's term and was binding on the parties at that point, even though it was entered by the clerk after the judge's vacation of office. Further, for purposes of commencing time periods, judgments continue to take effect from the date on which they are filed with the clerk, so that a fixed date is established and known to the parties. Int'l Ass'n of Firefighters, Local No. 8 v. District Court, 2002 MT 17, 308 M 183, 40 P3d 396 (2002).

District Court Proceeding Under Mistake of Law in Determining Whether Implied Consent Statute Applicable to Blood Drawn for Medical Reasons — Supervisory Control Accepted: The District Court suppressed the results of a blood test taken for medical reasons after a DUI suspect declined to give consent for a blood test following a car accident in which the use of alcohol was suspected. The Supreme Court concluded that the District Court was proceeding under a mistake of law, and that if the mistake was left uncorrected, the state would be without an adequate remedy on appeal. Given the state's limited ability to appeal an evidentiary ruling, the Supreme Court accepted original jurisdiction in the matter to prevent the introduction of evidence when correction of the ruling by a later court decision would be ineffective. State ex rel. McGrath v. District Court, 2001 MT 305, 307 M 491, 38 P3d 820 (2001), following State ex rel. Mazurek v. District Court, 277 M 349, 922 P2d 474 (1996), and Park v. District Court, 1998 MT 164, 289 M 367, 961 P2d 1267 (1998).

Time Bar on Writ of Certiorari to Review Contempt Proceedings: In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court was asked to establish a timeframe within which a petition for review of a contempt order must be filed. The issue was whether the time limitation should come from Title 25, which includes the Montana Rules of Civil Procedure and the Montana Rules of Appellate Procedure, or from Title 27, which prescribes the various statutes of limitation for the commencement of actions. The court noted that there is no appeal, as such, from an order of contempt in a civil proceeding and that the exclusive method of review of civil contempt orders (with certain exceptions) is through a writ of certiorari or writ of review. That review is generally limited to jurisdictional questions and whether evidence supports the contempt. Therefore, the issue of timeliness for filing a petition for a writ of certiorari or review is not a statute of limitations issue, and to mechanically characterize those writs for the review of contempt proceedings as original proceedings governed by the 5-year statute of limitations in 27-2-231 would be to deny the basic nature of appellate review. Further, petitions for writs of certiorari to review contempt proceedings are fundamentally different from other original proceedings commenced in the Supreme Court and from petitions for writs of supervisory control, which do not so much involve appellate review of and a decision on the underlying proceedings as they involve the court dealing with discreet questions of law during the pendency of the underlying proceedings. Because the timeframe in which to file petitions for writs of certiorari to review contempt proceedings is a procedural issue analogous to the procedure for filing a notice of appeal, the Supreme Court held that former Rule 72, M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), former Rule 1, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), former Rule 17, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), and 27-25-103 require that the timeframe for those petitions be determined by the Montana Rules of Appellate Procedure. Specifically, pursuant to former Rule 5, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), a petition for a writ of certiorari to review contempt proceedings must be filed with the Clerk of the District Court within 30 days of the date on which the District Court enters the contempt finding, unless the state is a party, in which case the petition must be filed within 60 days of the date on which the District Court enters the contempt finding. This may not be construed to limit the Supreme Court's power to grant writs of supervisory control or to consider applications for other types of original proceedings. The Supreme Court chose not to establish a precedent that allows contempt proceedings to be delayed until the underlying cause is resolved. Jones v. District Court, 2001 MT 276, 307 M 305, 37 P3d 682 (2001), overruling Shaffroth v. Lamere, 104 M 175, 65 P2d 610 (1937), to the extent that Shaffroth holds that the general 5-year statute of limitations in 27-2-231 applies to all writs of review authorized in 27-25-102.

Writ of Supervisory Control Inappropriate in Appealing Department of Corrections' Decision Regarding Good Time Allowance — Writ of Habeas Corpus Granted: Inmate Eisenman applied to the Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control and moved to proceed in forma pauperis, requesting that the court order the Department of Corrections to direct the reduction of his sentence for good time served. Supervisory control is an extraordinary remedy that is appropriate only when a District Court is proceeding upon a mistake of law that, if not corrected, would cause significant injustice and when the remedy by appeal is inadequate. The Supreme Court held that a writ of supervisory control was inappropriate in this case because the court's power to issue that writ extends only to inferior courts, not to other governmental agencies. Eisenman's claims were more appropriately asserted by a writ of habeas corpus because habeas corpus relief is available to every imprisoned person. The state claimed that a writ of habeas corpus was not appropriate either because Eisenman failed to plead that he would be entitled to release if he received the good time credits as requested. However, under Peyton v. Rowe, 391 US 54 (1968), and Garlotte v. Fordice, 515 US 39 (1995), immediate physical release is not the only remedy available under a writ of habeas corpus, so it was not premature to consider a habeas corpus petition prior to Eisenman's release. The Supreme Court thus considered Eisenman's application for writ of supervisory control to be a petition for writ of habeas corpus and proceeded to consider the good time issue on that basis. Eisenman v. St., 2000 MT 170, 300 M 322, 5 P3d 542, 57 St. Rep. 704 (2000).

Supervisory Control Granted to Address Stay of Declaratory Judgment Until Settlement Reached or Judgment Entered: Hill was injured in a vehicle accident caused by the negligence of Bennett, an insured of Safeco Insurance Company of Illinois (Safeco). Although Safeco apparently paid some of Hill's initial medical bills, Safeco eventually disputed the causal relationship between the accident and the injuries, refusing to pay any further medical bills after a specific date. Hill sued Bennett for negligence and Safeco for nonpayment of medical expenses, seeking a declaratory judgment that he was entitled to advance payment of medical costs prior to settlement or final judgment and claiming that a declaratory judgment was proper under the Unfair Trade Practices Act and Ridley v. Guar. Nat'l Ins. Co., 286 M 325, 951 P2d 987 (1997). The District Court granted the declaratory judgment, and Safeco sought a writ of supervisory control because a direct appeal would be an inadequate remedy. The Supreme Court agreed and granted the writ. Safeco's application presented an appropriate legal issue for supervisory control because if the ordered payment of medical expenses was a mistake of law or incorrect, the delay in awaiting the outcome of the corollary litigation could create an unfair prejudice for Safeco, while any unnecessary delay in the payment of the medical costs would certainly prejudice Hill. Ultimately, the Supreme Court affirmed on grounds that the declaratory judgment did not constitute a money judgment for damages in the ordinary sense, but merely removed all uncertainty and controversy over the issue of when the inevitable policy proceeds were due. Safeco Ins. Co. of Ill. v. District Court, 2000 MT 153, 300 M 123, 2 P3d 834, 57 St. Rep. 604 (2000).

Youth Considered in Custody — Supervisory Control Appropriate When Lower Court Proceeding Under Mistake of Law: Fourteen-year-old Evans was taken by his mother to the Flathead County Sheriff's office, upon request of the Deputy Sheriff, because he had been observed talking to a child on the day of her disappearance. Evans and his mother were separated upon arrival at the office, and Evans was taken to a 9-by-9-foot windowless interrogation room with a shut door where he was questioned for 2½ hours by two officers wearing badges and weapons. Evans waived his Miranda rights outside the presence and without the consent of his mother and without an opportunity to discuss his rights or the waiver with counsel. The officers did not tell Evans that he could leave the interrogation room or consult with his mother, and during the course of the interview, Evans' mother was denied contact with Evans. Although initially adamantly denying involvement, the officers repeatedly suggested that Evans had "more to tell them" and misled him into believing that the police had fingerprints from the girl's body that could be matched to his. Toward the end of the interrogation, Evans confessed that he drowned the child and was charged with her death, arrested, handcuffed, and escorted to juvenile detention without an opportunity to speak to his mother. Evans filed a motion to suppress the confession on grounds that his waiver of rights while in custody was invalid under 41-5-331. The District Court denied the motion, concluding that Evans was not in custody during the interview and that the confession was voluntary. Accepting supervisory control because the District Court was proceeding under a mistake of law, the Supreme Court, finding it difficult to imagine a more "custodial" setting, applied the factors in St. v. Staat, 251 M 1, 822 P2d 643, 48 St. Rep.

1041 (1991), and concluded that Evans was in custody during the interview, that his waiver of rights without the consent of a parent or advice of counsel was invalid under 41-5-331, and that the confession was not voluntary under the totality of the circumstances. Although the record on appeal was not sufficient to determine whether the state had other evidence sufficient to charge Evans, the case was nevertheless remanded for consideration of the evidence without the confession. Evans v. District Court, 2000 MT 38, 298 M 279, 995 P2d 455, 57 St. Rep. 175 (2000), followed, with regard to applicability of the totality of circumstances test for determining voluntariness of a juvenile's waiver and consent, in In re C.T.P., 2004 MT 63, 320 M 279, 87 P3d 399 (2004). See also State ex rel. D.M.B. v. District Court, 2004 MT 335, 324 M 190, 103 P3d 514 (2004).

Negligent Homicide Charges After DUI Guilty Plea — Supervisory Control to Avoid Double Jeopardy Trial: If the District Court's conclusion that the Justice's Court plea of guilty to DUI did not bar subsequent prosecution of two negligent homicide charges arising out of the same auto accident as the DUI charge is proved, on appeal, to be incorrect, the defendant will have been subjected to prosecution even though double jeopardy entitled him to avoid prosecution altogether. Thus, it is clear that an appeal would not be an adequate remedy, and the defendant's application to the Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control presented legal issues appropriate for the Supreme Court's consideration and would be accepted and decided. State ex rel. Booth v. District Court, 1998 MT 344, 292 M 371, 972 P2d 325, 55 St. Rep. 1395 (1998).

Examination of Defendant by State Psychiatrist — Supervisory Control Granted to Prevent Denial of Defendant's Fifth Amendment Right Against Self-Incrimination: Park, who was charged with forgery and deliberate homicide, filed notice of his intent to use the affirmative defense that extreme mental and emotional stress caused him to commit the offenses and gave notice of his intent to use expert psychological testimony in the course of his defense. The state requested an examination of Park by its own psychological expert, but Park objected to the oral part of the requested examination on the grounds that, first, his defense was not reliance upon a mental disease or defect and the state therefore had no right to a psychological examination, and, second, he did not want to discuss his offenses with the psychological expert for fear of waiving his constitutional right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court, citing Mapes v. District Court, 250 M 524, 822 P2d 91 (1991), held that the case was appropriate for supervisory control because Park was faced with the loss of a constitutional right as part of the psychological interview and appeal could not prevent the loss of that right. Park v. District Court, 1998 MT 164, 289 M 367, 961 P2d 1267, 55 St. Rep. 657 (1998).

Denial of Bond Pending Appeal — Method of Supreme Court Review — Jurisdiction: After conviction for negligent homicide and on related charges, Ingraham moved the District Court to continue bond pending appeal. The District Court denied the motion, finding that Ingraham was a danger to the community and therefore did not meet the requirements of 46-9-107. Ingraham then moved the Supreme Court, pursuant to former Rule 22, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), to continue bond pending appeal or, in the alternative, to accept appeal of the District Court's order denying bond, pursuant to former Rule 1, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), and 46-20-104. The Attorney General moved to dismiss, contending that there was no provision in law for appeal from a District Court order denying bond pending appeal and that Ingraham should have brought an original habeas corpus proceeding. The Supreme Court agreed with the Attorney General and dismissed Ingraham's motion or appeal, holding that Ingraham should have brought a petition for a writ of habeas corpus pursuant to 46-22-103. Ingraham then filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, which was filed with Justice Trieweiler pursuant to 3-2-212. Justice Trieweiler granted the petition to the extent necessary for the District Court to hold an evidentiary hearing as provided by statute, under the theory that the District Court was the more appropriate court for the hearing than was the Supreme Court. The Attorney General opposed the order by applying to the full Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control, arguing, contrary to the state's previous position, that 46-22-103 does not really apply to persons convicted in a criminal case and that the more appropriate procedure was an original proceeding "in the nature of habeas corpus" before the full Supreme Court. The application for a writ of supervisory control was denied, was treated by the Supreme Court as a late-filed response to Ingraham's petition for a writ of habeas corpus, and was referred to Justice Trieweiler. Justice Trieweiler determined that it was inappropriate for him alone to determine the form of review of the District Court's denial of bond. Justice Trieweiler also determined that: (1) Ingraham had no constitutional right to bond pending appeal; (2) Ingraham did have a right to the proper exercise of the District Court's discretion in the application of 46-9-107; and (3) that right was a substantial right for the purposes of 46-20-104. For these reasons, Justice Trieweiler vacated his previous order granting Ingraham's petition for a writ of habeas corpus and referred the matter to the full Supreme Court for review of the District Court's order denying bond pending appeal. St. v. Ingraham, 284 M 77, 945 P2d 16, 54 St. Rep. 614 (1997).

Bifurcation of Breach of Insurance Contract and Bad Faith Claims — Use of Supervisory Control to Require That Both Claims Be Tried to Same Jury: After the District Court bifurcated the Malta school district's insurance contract and bad faith claims, the school district requested by motion that both claims be tried to the same jury, one claim immediately following the other. The District Court denied the motion, and the school district sought a writ of supervisory control. The Supreme Court granted the writ and directed the District Court to try the contract claim and the bad faith claim to the same jury. Because 33-18-242 contains no standards governing whether a bifurcated case should be tried to the same jury, the Supreme Court looked to cases decided under former Rule 42(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), for guidance and, after finding the state and federal versions of the same rule sufficiently similar, relied upon Martin v. Bell Helicopter Co., 85 FRD 654 (1980). The Supreme Court held that a two-step process should be used; it should first be determined whether bifurcation is appropriate and then whether the interests of judicial economy, fairness to the parties, clarity of the issues, and convenience require trial of the issues to the same or a different jury. In determining whether to grant the writ of supervisory control, the Supreme Court weighed the same or similar considerations also weighed by the Supreme Court pursuant to Martin v. Bell Helicopter Co. to determine whether separate juries should be used. The Supreme Court reviewed the circumstances of the case and found that the writ of supervisory control should be granted and that the District Court abused its discretion in refusing to try the two claims to the same jury. Malta Pub. School District A & 14 v. District Court, 283 M 46, 938 P2d 1335, 54 St. Rep. 486 (1997), followed in State ex rel. Gadbaw v. District Court, 2003 MT 127, 316 M 25, 75 P3d 1238 (2003).

Exercise of Supervisory Control in Cases Involving Media Challenge to Court-Imposed Restrictions on Access to Information: The District Court issued a restrictive order requiring that any filings referencing evidence in a criminal case be submitted under seal. A newspaper filed for writ of supervisory control, asking the Supreme Court to assume original jurisdiction to correct the District Court's mistake of law in issuing the order. In determining to exercise supervisory control, the Supreme Court cited State ex rel. Mazurek v. District Court, 277 M 349, 922 P2d 474 (1996), holding that legal issues existed that were appropriate for resolution through the writ in order to address a gross injustice resulting from the District Court's mistake of law. State ex rel. The Missoulian v. District Court, 281 M 285, 933 P2d 829, 54 St. Rep. 175 (1997).

Court Order for Suitable Jury Room — Supervisory Control Properly Used — Inherent Powers Not Implicated — Findings Not Clearly Erroneous: Judge Moran issued an order pursuant to 3-5-404 (now repealed) for the Gallatin County Sheriff to provide a specific space in the Gallatin County courthouse for use as a jury room and to have the room remodeled and for the expenses to be paid from the Gallatin County general fund. Gallatin County requested the Supreme Court to take supervisory control to prevent protracted litigation, a request with which Judge Moran joined. However, Judge Moran asked that a District Court Judge be appointed to make findings and conclusions. The Supreme Court accepted jurisdiction in order to prevent protracted litigation of the issues and appointed a neutral District Court Judge, Judge Wilson, to hold a hearing and make findings and conclusions. The Supreme Court held that Judge Moran had the authority under 3-5-404 (now repealed) to issue an order to the Sheriff to provide a suitable jury room; that the space provided by the Sheriff pursuant to the order was "suitable", within the dictionary definition of that word; that because the Legislature provided the authority under which Judge Moran acted, the implied powers of the District Court and the separation of powers doctrine were not implicated by Judge Moran's action; and that the findings of fact concerning the suitability of the room provided by the Sheriff and the suitability of another alternative jury room designated by the County Commissioners were not clearly erroneous. Gallatin County v. District Court, 281 M 33, 930 P2d 680, 54 St. Rep. 46 (1997).

Consideration of Moot Issue of Right to Reasonable Bail: Although a petition to the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus was moot because petitioner was no longer in custody, the issue was the petitioner's right to reasonable bail, and the court accepted jurisdiction to address the substantive issues by writ of supervisory control in order to address a constitutional issue capable of repetition. Wier v. Lincoln County Sheriff's Dept., 278 M 473, 925 P2d 1172, 53 St. Rep. 1013 (1996).

Constitutionality of Statute Regarding Multiple Defendants Proper Issue for Supervisory Control: Although all three circumstances for the exercise of supervisory control in State ex rel. Racicot v. District Court, 244 M 521, 798 P2d 1004 (1990), were not present, the Supreme Court nevertheless concluded that the constitutionality of 27-1-703(6) was an appropriate issue to decide by supervisory control after finding that any remedy available to plaintiffs by appeal was inadequate and that denial of a speedy remedy by supervisory control would be a denial of justice. Plumb v. District Court, 279 M 363, 927 P2d 1011, 53 St. Rep. 1187 (1996), following State ex rel. Deere & Co. v. District Court, 224 M 384, 730 P2d 396 (1986), and followed in Preston v. District Court, 282 M 200, 936 P2d 814, 54 St. Rep. 312 (1997), and Park v. District Court, 1998 MT 164, 289 M 367, 961 P2d 1267, 55 St. Rep. 657 (1998).

Admission of Evidence Under Rape Shield Law — Proper Use of Supervisory Control: The Attorney General petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control in a case in which the District Court had ruled that certain evidence of prior sexual conduct by the victim was admissible in a case charging sexual intercourse without consent. The Supreme Court accepted original jurisdiction of the case, holding that it was a proper case for supervisory control because: (1) once the testimony on prior sexual conduct is given in open court, the injury that the rape shield law was intended to prevent has already occurred; and (2) under 46-20-103, evidentiary rulings under the rape shield law may not be appealed. State ex rel. Mazurek v. District Court, 277 M 349, 922 P2d 474, 53 St. Rep. 678 (1996), cited in Park v. District Court, 1998 MT 164, 289 M 367, 961 P2d 1267, 55 St. Rep. 657 (1998).

Search Warrant Issued by Unqualified Substitute Judge Invalid — Supervisory Control Necessary to Preclude Further Proceedings: In a case in which a search warrant issued by a previously qualified but legally unauthorized substitute judge was held to be void ab initio, the Supreme Court accepted supervisory control and assumed jurisdiction in order to forestall further needless and expensive litigation. The court determined that it would be fundamentally unfair and prejudicial, not to mention a waste of time and a waste of the limited resources of the court and counsel, to proceed further. Potter v. District Court, 266 M 384, 880 P2d 1319, 51 St. Rep. 853 (1994).

Disqualification Unwarranted but Writ of Supervisory Control Granted Because of Aura of Possible Bias: Defendant mining company sought a writ of supervisory control disqualifying a presiding judge based on the fact that: (1) the judge's son was employed by plaintiff's counsel of record as a legal intern; and (2) the judge knew and associated with the partners of that counsel's law firm on a social basis, in particular at a university football game where he was invited to the firm's stadium box for a drink and conversed only about football. The Supreme Court found these facts insufficient to disqualify the judge under the criteria of 3-1-803. However, the court exercised its power of supervisory control under this section to disqualify the judge because the facts when viewed in light of other circumstances, including the appearance of another attorney from the law firm as a witness and a newspaper article describing the meeting at the football game, rendered the realization of the standard that a judge's conduct should be free from the appearance of impropriety a virtual impossibility. Washington v. Mont. Min. Properties, Inc., 243 M 509, 795 P2d 460, 47 St. Rep. 1366 (1990).

Writ Proper to Clarify Law and Provide Judicial Economy: In a negligence action against a school district and its employees, the District Court granted summary judgment dismissing the school district defendant pursuant to the immunity provisions of 2-9-111 and allowed plaintiffs to amend their complaint to name particular school district employees, namely school janitors, as defendants. This is a proper case for a writ of supervisory control to clarify the law and promote judicial economy. The lack of any issue of material fact renders the case appropriate for disposition upon summary judgment. The problem confronting the District Court is whether 2-9-111 provides immunity to school district employees, thereby entitling them to summary judgment. State ex rel. Eccleston v. District Court, 240 M 44, 783 P2d 363, 46 St. Rep. 1929 (1989).

Criminal Trial Pending — No Emergency Shown — Writ Denied: In 1980, defendant was convicted of the deliberate homicide of his wife. The conviction was reversed in 1982 (St. v. Forsyth, 197 M 248, 642 P2d 1035). Upon his retrial, the jury was deadlocked and a mistrial was declared. Upon the scheduling of the third trial, defendant moved to dismiss: first, for double jeopardy and lack of due process predicated upon a claim of jury tampering and prosecutorial misconduct in the second trial; and second, for lack of a speedy trial. Defendant also moved for a change of venue. The motions were denied by the District Court. Defendant then petitioned the Supreme Court for a Writ of Supervisory Control. The Supreme Court refused to issue the Writ, ruling that, with respect to all four issues, defendant had failed to demonstrate that any emergency exists which renders appeal an inadequate remedy. State ex rel. Forsyth v. District Court, 216 M 480, 701 P2d 1346, 42 St. Rep. 65 (1985).

Supervisory Control of Water Court Accepted — Federal Reserved Water Rights: Following the U.S. Supreme Court decision in Ariz. v. San Carlos Apache Tribe, 463 US 545, 77 L Ed 2d 837, 103 S Ct 3201 (1983), that to the extent state courts have taken jurisdiction over Indian water rights, such jurisdiction is proper, the State requested that the Montana Supreme Court exercise its powers of supervisory control over the state Water Court concerning the adjudication of federal reserved water rights. In assuming jurisdiction, the Supreme Court concluded that factors of urgency and emergency argued for acceptance of original jurisdiction. The request is not barred by the suspension provisions of 85-2-217, as the proceeding will not generally adjudicate an Indian reserved water right or any federal reserved water right. The issues before the court are limited to a determination of the effect of the so-called disclaimer clause of Art. I of the Montana Constitution on subject matter jurisdiction by the Water Court, and whether the Water Use Act is adequate to adjudicate Indian reserved water rights. State ex rel. Greely v. Water Court, 214 M 143, 691 P2d 833, 41 St. Rep. 2373 (1984).

Abuse of Discretion by Denial of Venue: If, upon presentation of a matter to the Montana Supreme Court by means of a writ, it is apparent from the record that a relator will be deprived of a fundamental right, both justice and judicial economy require the court to then resolve the issue in favor of relator. Court's assumption of jurisdiction upon a petition for a Writ of Supervisory Control in which the issue was whether District Court abused its discretion in denying motion for a change of venue was not premature, and the Writ was granted. State ex rel. Coburn v. Bennett, 202 M 20, 655 P2d 502, 39 St. Rep. 2300 (1982), followed, as to the grant of a writ to preserve a fundamental right, in Woirhaye v. District Court, 1998 MT 320, 292 M 185, 972 P2d 800, 55 St. Rep. 1298 (1998).

No Supervisory Control Power in District Court: Relator was arrested for driving while intoxicated. He refused to take a blood alcohol test and subsequently applied to the District Court for a Writ of Supervisory Control on the issue of the admissibility of evidence of the refusal, arguing that the nonlawyer Justice of the Peace was ill equipped to handle the constitutional aspects of his case. Relator appealed from the District Court's ruling against him after hearing the Writ on the merits. The Supreme Court found no power in the District Courts to exercise supervisory control and stated that a Writ of Supervisory Control was not to be used as a means to circumvent the appeal process. Only in the most extenuating circumstances will a Writ be granted. State ex rel. Ward v. Schmall, 190 M 1, 617 P2d 140, 37 St. Rep. 1720 (1980).

Writ of Certiorari Not Proper — Writ of Supervisory Control Proper: Because the Supreme Court did not have a fully certified transcript of the record and proceedings pursuant to 27-25-202, a Writ of Certiorari was not a proper remedy to review a contempt order. But under Art. VII, sec. 2, Mont. Const., the Supreme Court may exercise supervisory power since the relator is barred from using a Writ of Certiorari. State ex rel. Anderson v. District Court, 188 M 77, 610 P2d 1183 (1980). See also Jones v. District Court, 2001 MT 276, 307 M 305, 37 P3d 682 (2001).

Immediate Appeal From Partial Judgment: This is a proper case for a Writ of Supervisory Control because relator wife has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law by appeal. Neither 40-4-108 nor former Rule 1, M.R.App.Civ.P. (now Montana Rules of Appellate Procedure, now superseded), provide for immediate appeal from a partial judgment. Instead, the right of immediate appeal from a judgment on part but not all of the claims for relief in a single action is governed by former Rule 54(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded). State ex rel. Marlenee v. District Court, 181 M 59, 592 P2d 153 (1979).

Constitutionality of Statute: Because the Supreme Court wished to reexamine the constitutionality of 45-9-101, it exercised its discretion to do so by supervisory control prior to trial rather than limiting defendant to his remedy by appeal in the event of his conviction. State ex rel. Zander v. District Court, 180 M 548, 591 P2d 656 (1979).

Speedy Criminal Trials: Under an application for supervisory control to insure prompt and speedy trials in criminal cases and seeking specific remedial action in various particulars relating thereto, the Supreme Court directed the appointment of a chief District Judge in each multiple judge judicial district. The Supreme Court declined to eliminate peremptory disqualification of District Judges or to limit disqualification of District Judges for cause. Each District Court was directed to establish by rule an omnibus hearing in all criminal cases and to provide a formalized practice and procedure relating thereto. St. v. District Court, 180 M 317, 590 P2d 1104 (1979).

Order by Lower Court to Seek Writ: The Writ of Supervisory Control was denied even though petitioner was ordered by the lower court to seek the Writ to determine jurisdiction in a child custody case. State ex rel. Jennings v. District Court, 178 M 187, 582 P2d 1260 (1978).

Review in Criminal Cases: The Supreme Court, under the constitutionally granted power of general supervisory control over all other courts, suspended rules relating to review in criminal cases which would allow review only by appeal or by postconviction relief and ordered a Justice's Court to grant a stay of proceedings with respect to a charge filed against defendant, conditioned upon a filing by either party in a court of record of an action to promptly terminate the litigation. State ex rel. Turk v. District Court, 177 M 245, 581 P2d 433 (1978).

Standard of Proof Improperly Applied in Pretrial Hearing: It was error for the court in a pretrial evidentiary hearing to acquit defendant by reason of mental disease or defect excluding responsibility when the judge failed to apply the proper standard for measuring the proof required to satisfy the court; thus, review by Writ of Supervisory Control was appropriate. St. v. Hagerud, 174 M 361, 570 P2d 1131 (1977).

Supervisory Control — Remedy for Procedural Morass: Appeal is not an adequate remedy for a case mired in procedural entanglements, and the Supreme Court will accept a Writ of Supervisory Control. State ex rel. Leavitt v. District Court, 172 M 12, 560 P2d 517 (1977). See also State ex rel. Eccleston v. District Court, 240 M 44, 783 P2d 363, 46 St. Rep. 1929 (1989).

Supervisory Writ Not Equivalent to Appeal: An original proceeding under subsections (1) and (2) of this section for a Writ of Supervisory Control is not equivalent to an appeal. Fisher v. District Court, 424 US 382, 47 L Ed 2d 106, 96 S Ct 943 (1976).

Lack of Remedy — Abuse of Discretion: While there is no statutory means provided for an appeal from an order denying a request by the Attorney General to impanel a grand jury, when the facts clearly show that a party has no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law and when there is no right of appeal from the order, a Writ of Supervisory Control may issue so that the decision may be reviewed by the Supreme Court. However, when a court abuses its discretionary functions, the Supreme Court may review the abuse by means of supervisory control. State ex rel. Woodahl v. District Court, 166 M 31, 530 P2d 780 (1975).

SUPERVISION OF THE BAR

Commission on Practice — Authority to Request Citation of Contempt — Commission Findings Adopted: As part of an investigation by the Commission on Practice of another attorney, the Commission requested documents from the respondent. She refused to produce the documents, claiming that the documents were privileged. The Commission then ordered her to produce the documents within 10 days, which she did not do. The respondent also failed to appear at hearings before the Commission and unsuccessfully attempted to remove the matter from the Commission to federal court. Ultimately, the Commission issued written findings recommending that the respondent be found in contempt and pay costs. On appeal, the respondent claimed the Commission did not have authority to make a request for a citation of contempt by the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court disagreed and adopted the recommendations of the Commission. In re McCann, 2018 MT 140, 391 Mont. 443, 421 P.3d 265.

Constitutional Referendum Void — Separate Vote Requirement — Substantive Changes Not Closely Related: The separate vote requirement for constitutional initiatives prohibits a proposal that makes two or more changes to the Montana Constitution that are substantive and not closely related. Furthermore, if a proposed constitutional amendment adds new matter to the Constitution, that proposition is at least one change in and of itself. Modifying an existing constitutional provision is considered at least one change, whether that effect is express or implicit. Although the text of CI-116, also known as "Marsy's Law", was contained in a new section, the constitutional initiative implicitly modified Art. II, secs. 2(3), 9, 10, 17, 20, 21, and 24. Because these changes were substantive and not closely related, CI-116 violated the separate-vote requirement, and it was void in its entirety. Mont. Ass'n of Counties v. St., 2017 MT 267, 389 Mont. 183, 404 P.3d 733.

Disciplinary Proceeding — Allowance of Party to File Objections to Commission on Practice Recommendations: The attorney subject to a disciplinary proceeding argued that the Office of Disciplinary Counsel was not entitled to file objections to recommendations by the Commission on Practice, but the Supreme Court found that the Commission was a party and was therefore entitled to file written objections pursuant to Rule 16 of the Montana Rules for Lawyer Disciplinary Enforcement. In re Tennant, 2017 MT 66, 387 Mont. 105, 392 P.3d 143.

Disciplinary Proceedings — Attorney's Liens — Public Censure: An attorney foreclosed on an attorney's lien against former clients' real property, which the attorney assigned to a collection agency. At the subsequent Sheriff's sale, the collection agency was the successful bidder. The Supreme Court found that the Commission on Practice erred in finding that the attorney did not violate Rule 1.9 of the Montana Rules of Professional Conduct because he undisputedly learned of the property as part of his representation of the clients and used that knowledge to his former clients' disadvantage. In re Tennant, 2017 MT 66, 387 Mont. 105, 392 P.3d 143.

Disciplinary Proceeding — No Objective Indicators of Current Client Relationship Beyond Client: The Office of Disciplinary Counsel (ODC) argued that the Commission on Practice should have found that an attorney violated Rule 1.16 of the Rules of Professional Conduct by failing to withdraw from representation of a client because the continued representation violated other provisions of the Montana Rules of Professional Conduct. Although the existence of an attorney-client relationship hinges on the client's reasonable belief that it exists, the attorney testified that he thought he had informally ended the attorney-client relationship through his words and actions and there were no additional objective indicators of a current client relationship; therefore the Supreme Court deferred to the Commission's finding that the ODC failed to meet its burden establishing that the attorney violated Rule 1.16. In re Tennant, 2017 MT 66, 387 Mont. 105, 392 P.3d 143.

Prohibition on Judicial Endorsements — Narrowly Tailored — Summary Judgment for Defendants Proper: A judicial candidate brought an action alleging that Rule 4.1(A)(7) of the Code of Judicial Conduct violated the first amendment to the U.S. Constitution by prohibiting judicial candidates from seeking, accepting, or using endorsements from a political organization or a partisan or independent nonjudicial officeholder or candidate. The Ninth Circuit Court affirmed the District Court's order entering summary judgment for the defendants because the prohibition was narrowly tailored to achieve the compelling state interests of actual and perceived judicial impartiality and a structurally sound judiciary by striking an appropriate balance between those interests and a candidate's speech. French v. Jones, 876 F.3d 1228 (9th Cir. 2017), following Williams-Yulee v. Florida Bar, 575 US __, 135 S Ct 1656 (2015), and Wolfson v. Concannon, 811 F.3d 1176 (9th Cir. 2016).

Disqualification of Defendants' Local and Out-of-State Counsel for Violating Duty to Plaintiffs as Potential Clients — Disqualification Not Abuse of District Court's Discretion: The Supreme Court upheld the District Court's order to disqualify the defendants' local counsel and out-of-state counsel. The plaintiffs had a potential client consultation with the defendants' local counsel in their initial search for representation, but the local counsel declined to represent the plaintiffs. During a deposition of one of the plaintiffs, the defendants' out-of-state counsel used the fact that the consultation occurred and that the local counsel declined their case to intimidate the plaintiffs and to create an impression that the plaintiffs had a bad case. The Supreme Court, holding that the tactical use by the defendants' out-of-state counsel of the fact that the plaintiffs had potential client consultation but were turned down by the defendants' local counsel violated Montana Rule of Professional Conduct 1.20(b), concluded that disqualification was not an abuse of discretion by the District Court. Keuffer v. O.F. Mossberg & Sons, Inc., 2016 MT 127, 383 Mont. 439, 373 P.3d 14, following Schuff v. A.T. Klemens & Son, 2000 MT 357, 303 Mont. 274, 16 P.3d 1002.

Dual Representation During Federal Criminal Investigation Violative of Rules of Professional Conduct: The Office of Disciplinary Counsel (ODC) filed a formal disciplinary complaint against an attorney for the attorney's representation of both a husband and wife, without obtaining an informed waiver of any actual or potential conflict, during a federal criminal investigation of the husband and, after the attorney no longer represented the husband, for the attorney's continued representation of the wife in the federal investigation and in divorce proceedings initiated against the husband. The Supreme Court upheld the Commission on Practice's decision to strike an ODC witness's testimony on the basis that the ODC improperly withheld new information from the attorney's counsel. The attorney violated Rule 1.7, Montana Rules of Professional Conduct, by concurrently representing the husband and wife during the federal investigation, regardless of whether the husband's defense was actually prejudiced, and violated Rule 1.9, Montana Rules of Professional Conduct, by subsequently representing the wife, whose position was materially adverse to her husband, the attorney's former client. In re Neuhardt, 2014 MT 88, 374 Mont. 379, 321 P.3d 833.

Motion to Disqualify Properly Denied — No Violation of Rules of Professional Conduct: The wife in a dissolution proceeding moved to disqualify and enjoin the husband's attorney on the basis that the wife had consulted the same attorney years before the dissolution was filed about representing the wife in a dissolution proceeding against the husband. The District Court denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that disqualification was improper under Rule 1.20 of the Rules of Professional Conduct because the wife did not establish that any of the information she divulged to the attorney could have any impact on the current dissolution proceeding and that it was permissible for the attorney to testify at the disqualification hearing pursuant to Rule 3.7 of the Rules of Professional Conduct and, pursuant to Rules 1.6 and 1.9 of the Rules of Professional Conduct, to use information about her previous contact with the wife to respond to the wife's allegations. In re Marriage of Perry, 2013 MT 6, 368 Mont. 211, 293 P.3d 170.

Former or Current Client — Plaintiffs' Attorney Joins Law Firm Representing Defendants — Motion to Disqualify Firm — Denial of Motion Reversed: The plaintiffs sued a lender for breach of contract, breach of the covenants of good faith and fair dealing, and fraud. Early in the case, the plaintiffs' attorney hired a tax attorney to advise them on certain issues related to their case. The plaintiffs and both attorneys met to discuss the case against the lender. Following the meeting, the plaintiffs received from the tax attorney an engagement letter and a bill, which the plaintiffs paid. A few weeks before the trial date, the plaintiffs received a letter from the tax attorney notifying them that he had taken a position with the law firm representing the lender. This was the plaintiffs' first notice that the tax attorney intended to join the opposing law firm. The plaintiffs moved to disqualify the firm from representing the lender. The lender claimed that the plaintiffs were former clients of the tax attorney and therefore, under the Rules of Professional Conduct, the firm could continue to represent the lender as long as there was a screen in place. The District Court agreed that the plaintiffs were former clients and denied the motion to disqualify. The plaintiffs appealed to the Supreme Court, which reversed the District Court. The Supreme Court concluded that the plaintiffs reasonably believed they were current clients of the tax attorney based on the engagement letter, the fact the bill did not indicate it was a final bill, and the lack of notice. Because the plaintiffs were current clients at the time the tax attorney joined the other law firm, the Supreme Court held that the firm was disqualified from representing the lender. Krutzfeldt Ranch, LLC v. Pinnacle Bank, 2012 MT 15, 363 Mont. 366, 272 P.3d 635.

Commission on Unauthorized Practice of Law Dissolved: Following extensive public comment, the Supreme Court concluded that a petition by the Commission on the Unauthorized Practice of Law to dissolve the Commission should be granted. The court will continue to address cases of unauthorized practice that are properly before the court and will continue to regulate the practice of law by Montana attorneys, but the Attorney General's Office of Consumer Protection will receive, process, evaluate, and address complaints of unauthorized practice of law by nonattorneys. In re Dissolving Comm'n on Unauthorized Practice of Law, 2010 MT 82, 356 Mont. 109, 242 P.3d 1282.

Failure of Commission on Practice to Notify Attorney of Charge — Due Process Violation: The Commission on Practice attempted to discipline attorney Best with a private admonition without notifying Best of the rule that was allegedly violated. The Supreme Court, following In re Ruffalo, 390 US 544 (1968), held that punishing Best for a violation of that rule without giving Best an opportunity to respond to the charge would be a violation of Best's right to fair and due process. The disciplinary proceeding was dismissed with prejudice. In re Best, 2010 MT 59, 355 Mont. 365, 229 P.3d 1201.

Defense Attorney's Retention of Physical Evidence in Ongoing Case — No Violation of Professional Conduct: Olson acted as defense counsel in a child pornography case. While investigating, Olson recovered 13 photographs of children in suggestive poses but came to a good faith belief that the photos were not child pornography or contraband. Olson also believed he was under no compulsion to turn the photos over to authorities absent a court order or applicable discovery statute. Olson then received a protective order from the District Court authorizing him to retain the items. Olson eventually left the case when it was pursued by federal authorities, and the Office of Disciplinary Counsel (ODC) subsequently filed a complaint against Olson for misconduct and obstructing access to evidence. The Commission on Practice determined that Olson did not violate the rules of professional conduct, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. The ODC failed to demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence that Olson violated the rules by unlawfully concealing or obstructing another's access to evidence, tampering with or fabricating evidence, or engaging in dishonest or deceitful misconduct. In re Olson, 2009 MT 455, 354 M 358, 222 P3d 632 (2009).

Transfer to Disability/Inactive Status Upon Request of Lawyer Facing Disciplinary Proceedings: Pursuant to Rule 28A, Montana Rules for Lawyer Disciplinary Enforcement, upon request by a lawyer who is facing disciplinary proceedings in Montana, the lawyer must be transferred to disability/inactive status. In re Shontz, 2009 MT 298, 352 M 300, 224 P3d 603 (2009).

Costs in Attorney Disciplinary Action Governed by Montana Rules for Lawyer Disciplinary Enforcement: Attorney Potts objected to the statement of costs filed by the Office of Disciplinary Counsel stemming from disciplinary proceedings against Potts before the Commission on Practice, asserted that the Office violated several statutes and former Rule 33, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), in assigning costs as directed in In re Potts, 2007 MT 81, 336 M 517, 158 P3d 418 (2007), and requested a hearing before an adjudicatory panel regarding reasonableness of the costs. The Supreme Court held that, in accord with the court's authority to regulate and discipline attorneys, the Montana Rules for Lawyer Disciplinary Enforcement (MRLDE), not the statutes and rules applicable to civil actions generally, govern costs imposed by the Office as discipline or sanctions against attorneys. Under Rule 9(A)(8), MRLDE, the attorney must pay reasonable costs of any professional services employed by the Commission, and the case was remanded for a hearing before an adjudicatory panel for consideration of the reasonableness of the amount requested by the Office for each category of costs. In re Potts, 2007 MT 236, 339 M 186, 171 P3d 286 (2007).

Charging Unreasonable Fee and Improper Handling of Client's Trust Funds Grounds for Attorney's Sanction: Although the Commission on Practice found that attorney Engel violated no rules of practice and recommended no sanctions, the Supreme Court weighed the Commission's findings and disagreed. Engel violated Rule 1.5 of the Rules of Professional Conduct by charging an unreasonable fee of $121,545 for handling an uncontested trust termination proceeding for which an attorney customarily would have received between $1,500 and $2,500. Engel also improperly commingled hundreds of thousands of dollars of trust funds with his personal operating account rather than depositing the client funds into a trust account, in violation of Rules 1.15 and 1.18 of the Rules of Professional Conduct. The court remanded the case to the Commission for recommendation of an appropriate sanction for the rules violations. In re Engel, 2007 MT 172, 338 M 179, 169 P3d 345 (2007). Following the 2007 Engel decision (Engel II), Engel filed an objection, alleging that the process by which the Supreme Court reviewed the disciplinary proceeding deprived the court of jurisdiction over the formal complaint filed by the Office of Disciplinary Counsel against Engel. The Supreme Court vacated the public censure and accepted briefs on the jurisdiction issue. After a review of the proceedings in Engel I and Engel II, the court concluded that nothing in the process by which the court came to review Engel's disciplinary proceeding deprived the court of its constitutionally endowed authority to regulate lawyer conduct, so the court maintained subject matter jurisdiction throughout. Engel enjoyed the full panoply of rights afforded to lawyers facing disciplinary proceedings, and no procedural due process rights were violated. Engel's public censure was reinstated, and he was assessed with costs of the proceedings and suspended from practice for 60 days. In re Engel, 2008 MT 215, 344 M 219, 194 P3d 613 (2008).

Following remand, the Commission on Practice, citing several mitigating factors, recommended that Engel be subjected to public censure and be required to pay the costs of the disciplinary proceedings, but that no harsher sanctions be imposed. The Supreme Court examined each cited mitigating factor, but failed to find any of the factors persuasive. Engel was therefore not only publicly censured and required to pay the costs of the disciplinary proceedings, but was also suspended from the practice of law for 60 days. In re Engel, 2008 MT 42, 341 M 360, 177 P3d 502 (2008).

Supreme Court Jurisdiction and Standard of Review of Decisions of Commission on Practice: The Supreme Court possesses original and exclusive jurisdiction and responsibility in all matters involving the disciplining of lawyers in Montana. Thus, the court reviews de novo the findings of fact, conclusions of law, and recommendations of the court's Commission on Practice and weighs the evidence upon which the Commission's findings rest. In re Engel, 2007 MT 172, 338 M 179, 169 P3d 345 (2007). See also In re Potts, 2007 MT 81, 336 M 517, 158 P3d 418 (2007).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Alleging Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Filed in District Court — Immunity of Attorney Assisting in Proceedings — Gillham Clarified: At the time of the decision in In re Gillham, 218 M 187, 707 P2d 1100 (1985), petitions for postconviction relief were addressed to the Supreme Court. Because the postconviction procedure has changed, pursuant to 46-21-105, petitions for postconviction relief are now initially filed in District Court. Thus, the Supreme Court clarified that petitions for postconviction relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel may now be filed in the District Court where the postconviction proceeding is pending. The court affirmed that an attorney ordered to respond to a Gillham order issued by a District Court is not subject to a disciplinary proceeding before the Commission on Practice or subject to charges of malpractice. The immunity extends to all information, testimony, or documents necessarily provided in response to the allegations of ineffective assistance of counsel. Marble v. St., 2007 MT 98, 337 M 99, 169 P3d 1148 (2007).

Fraud Substantiated in Attorney's Handling of Probate Case — Violation of Attorney's Duty of Truthfulness — Public Censure Warranted: Attorney Potts represented parties in a will contest. Two of the parties knew that some joint tenancy accounts were not included in the value of the estate and, in an attempt to secure the funds in the accounts, directed Potts to remain silent as to whether the settlement agreement prepared by Potts included the accounts. Potts failed to notify the court and counsel for the estate that one of his clients intended to obtain the jointly held property regardless of the outcome of any settlement. The Supreme Court subsequently determined in In re Estate of Stukey, 2004, MT 279, 323 M 241, 100 P3d 114 (2004), that the parties intended that the total estate value, including the joint tenancy accounts, be included in the settlement. A professional misconduct complaint was later filed against Potts, alleging that Potts engaged in or assisted in client fraud by failing to disclose material information to opposing counsel and that Potts breached the duty of candor to the tribunal by failing to disclose material information to the court. The Commission on Practice found that Potts knew that his clients were using Potts' services to perpetuate fraud in violation of Rules 1.2(d) and 3.3(a)(2) of the Montana Rules of Professional Conduct (MRPC), that Potts failed to fulfill his ethical obligation to inform the clients that he would not participate in the fraudulent conduct, a violation of Rule 1.2(d), MRPC, and that Potts violated the duty of candor to the tribunal in violation of Rule 3.3(a)(2), MRPC. The Commission recommended that Potts be publicly censured and suspended from the practice of law for 30 days. Potts appealed, raising issues of client confidentiality, asserting that his clients did not engage in fraud because the accounts passed to his client as a matter of law and thus could not have been included as part of the settlement basis, contending that he had no duty to correct opposing counsel's erroneous understanding of the settlement, and arguing that the Commission's proposed sanctions were inappropriate. The Supreme Court held that, by definition, Potts' clients were engaged in fraudulent conduct, that Potts assisted in the conduct by not disclosing the conduct to the court and to opposing counsel in violation of the duty of truthfulness and by drafting a stipulation stating that all disputes had been settled when he knew that the parties relied on a misrepresentation in drafting a settlement, and that Potts could have avoided the situation by withdrawing from representation. Potts' conduct resulted in considerable injury to the parties, requiring one District Court proceeding and two appeals to determine the meaning and scope of the stipulation. The Commission's findings were affirmed. However, the court reversed the suspension of Potts' practice in light of mitigating factors of Potts' history of compliance with the rules of professional conduct and his good character and reputation to this point and held that public censure sufficed to apprise Potts of the gravity of the misconduct. Dual Representation of Two Adverse Clients Violative of Rules of Professional Conduct — Censure and Costs Appropriate: Johnson's firm agreed to represent a woman in a wrongful death action and, a few months later, determined that a second client was a potentially responsible party and filed a complaint against the second client while still representing that client on other matters. The Commission on Practice concluded that Johnson violated the Rules of Professional Conduct by undertaking dual representation of two directly adverse clients and recommended Johnson's public censure and required Johnson to pay a pro rata share of costs. Johnson appealed, asserting: (1) a reasonable belief that dual representation would not adversely affect the relationship with the second client; (2) no intentional or negligent violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct; (3) an absence of selfish or dishonest motive; (4) that both clients actively sought representation from Johnson's firm; (5) the desire to serve the needs of both clients; (6) a reputation for good character and high competence as an attorney, including practicing law for over 30 years without any prior Commission disciplinary record; and (7) a delay in bringing and processing disciplinary proceedings. The Supreme Court affirmed. It was untenable for Johnson to contend that no conflict of interest existed in asserting on the woman's behalf that the second client negligently caused the death of the woman's husband. Johnson also failed to obtain the informed consent of the second client regarding representation of the woman. The court also noted that nothing in the Rules of Professional Conduct implies that a lawyer has to knowingly violate the rules to be subject to discipline. After considering the mitigating factors, the court agreed that censure and payment of costs were appropriate. Implied Attorney-Client Relationship — Motion for Disqualification of Attorney — Client's Burden of Showing Reasonable Belief That Attorney-Client Relationship Exists: Defendant telephoned attorney Penwell's office and spoke to the legal secretary regarding possible representation in this action, but never spoke personally to Penwell. Defendant was informed that Penwell was accepting no new cases and was referred to another attorney. Penwell ultimately appeared as counsel for plaintiff, and defendant moved to disqualify Penwell, asserting that confidential information was disclosed during the telephone conversation with the secretary and that the information was imputed to Penwell, creating an attorney-client relationship. At the hearing on the motion, defendant did not disclose what type of information was allegedly disclosed, relying on the conclusory statement that what was disclosed was confidential. The District Court denied the motion, holding that defendant had failed to meet the burden of conclusively establishing the existence of an attorney-client relationship. Defendant appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Although an alleged client should not be required to reveal actual confidences at a disqualification hearing, the alleged client must at least inform the court of the nature of the information disclosed so that the court can make a reasoned judgment. Under the circumstances, defendant could not have reasonably believed that an attorney-client relationship was formed with Penwell, based upon two telephone conversations with the secretary, when defendant never spoke or met with Penwell, and was advised that Penwell would not take the case. Creation of Office of Discipline Counsel: By an order dated December 11, 2001, the Supreme Court created the Office of Discipline Counsel, adopted structural changes to the Commission on Practice, and adopted changes to Montana's system of disciplining lawyers. Annual State Bar Membership Dues to Be Set by Supreme Court: In its 1974 order creating a unified State Bar of Montana, the Supreme Court provided that membership dues would be as approved by the court in order to protect the State Bar membership's right to register its say as to the dues structure. The court reiterated its intention to retain the authority to approve or disapprove annual dues increases in Douglas v. St. Bar of Mont., 183 M 155, 598 P2d 1080 (1979). In the years after 1974, the State Bar adopted and amended its bylaws to provide that all changes in dues and fees could be amended or repealed only through a referendum procedure by a majority vote of the voting active members, subject to approval of the court. However, this structure of shared control over dues revenue did not comport with this section, which places the governance and control of the practice of law solely with the Supreme Court. Putting the State Bar membership effectively in control of the dues structure hampered the court's ability to govern and control the practice of law. When presented with a petition by the State Bar for a dues increase, following disapproval by the membership of a dues increase referendum by a 2-to-1 margin, the court noted that under the 1974 order, it could not unilaterally approve an increase in dues that was not first adopted pursuant to the referendum process set out in the bylaws, nor did the 1974 order grant the court leeway to unilaterally amend the bylaws. Therefore, the petition was denied. Instead, the court held its own 1974 order to be unworkable and possibly even unconstitutional and exercised its authority under Douglas and this section to amend the 1974 order to provide that annual membership dues will henceforth be set at the sole discretion of the Supreme Court. The court then increased the annual dues by 50% and directed the State Bar to amend the bylaws to conform to these amendments. Applicability to Attorney of Ordinance Requiring Safety Inspection Certificate: A city ordinance requiring a business to obtain an annual safety inspection certificate to ensure that the place of business is safe for the public did not carry a penalty that would prohibit an attorney from practicing law. The penalty for a violation is a fine or jail time. In addition, the Supreme Court's exclusive authority to regulate the practice of law does not prohibit certain limited legislative actions in the area. The amount of the certificate fee, which is determined by the square footage of the business, is reasonable in relation to the safety inspection services. The certificate requirement is a minimal and inoffensive intrusion on the Supreme Court's constitutional authority to regulate attorneys, and the defendant attorney could be convicted for nonpayment. St. v. Radford, 2001 MT 36, 304 M 198, 19 P3d 809 (2001).

Negotiating Settlement With Party Without Consent of Party's Attorney: Settlement between two parties is not voided merely by the fact that an attorney for one party negotiates the settlement with the other party without the consent of the other party's attorney. A client has an absolute right to settle a case without the consent of counsel. In re Estate of Netzorg, 2000 MT 358, 303 M 327, 15 P3d 926, 57 St. Rep. 1525 (2000).

Attorney Failure to Consult Client on Possible Conflict of Interest — Opposing Attorney Failure to Further Pursue Motion to Disqualify: In February 1992, Klemens was served with an amended complaint bringing Klemens into a case. In September 1993, Klemens' motion to disqualify the law firm representing plaintiffs, on grounds of conflict of interest, because the firm had represented Klemens in another matter was denied. Judgment in the case was issued in January 1999, and Klemens appealed denial of the motion to disqualify. Klemens never renewed its conflict of interest objection and did not request from the trial court the relief that Klemens requested on appeal—a new trial. Klemens could have requested an injunction under irreparable harm theory, sought a writ of supervisory control, sought certification of the order denying its motion to disqualify, or reported the alleged conflict of interest to the Commission on Practice. Instead, Klemens did nothing for 6 years. A party may not request relief on appeal that was not requested of the trial court. Denial of the motion to disqualify is affirmed. However, conduct of counsel for both sides must be referred by the Supreme Court to the Commission on Practice, which can pursue appropriate proceedings and any appropriate discipline. Plaintiffs' counsel did not consult with Klemens and obtain Klemens' consent to represent plaintiffs, as required by a professional conduct rule. Klemens' counsel failed to follow up on its disqualification motion. Schuff v. A.T. Klemens & Son, 2000 MT 357, 303 M 274, 16 P3d 1002, 57 St. Rep. 1499 (2000). The decision in Schuff to refer the attorneys involved to the Commission on Practice was held to constitute sufficient notice to preclude claims of delay in disciplinary proceedings in In re Wenz, 2004 MT 7, 319 M 200, 87 P3d 376 (2004), and In re Marra, 2004 MT 8, 319 M 213, 87 P3d 384 (2004). Jurisdiction Over and Authority to Sanction Conduct of Attorney — Motion to Disqualify: It is beyond argument that the Supreme Court has original and exclusive jurisdiction in all matters involving the conduct of attorneys practicing law in Montana. Accordingly, the court and the agency to which the court has delegated disciplinary authority have the exclusive authority to discipline or sanction unprofessional conduct of an attorney, and a lower court cannot give a party relief for misconduct of an attorney or a firm. Violation of a professional conduct rule should not give rise to a cause of action or create a presumption that a legal duty has been breached. The professional conduct rules do not establish substantive legal duties. However, a lower court may consider an attorney's violation of a rule if the violation results in prejudice or adversely affects the rights of another party, as when an attorney is disqualified because of a conflict of interest, because the lower court has inherent authority to control trial administration in the interest of fairness and justice. The essence of a motion to disqualify is that the continued representation of one party by the attorney will prejudice or adversely impact the rights of another party, not that the attorney violated a professional conduct rule, and evidence of violation of a professional conduct rule merely adds additional weight that may tip the scales in favor of disqualification. The rule violation is not prima facie grounds for disqualification or for any other relief. Prejudice must be proved. Schuff v. A.T. In-House Counsel Not Precluded From Bringing Wrongful Discharge From Employment Claim Even if Proof of Claim Requires Disclosure of Confidential Information: Burkhart was hired as in-house counsel for Semitool, Inc. (Semitool). Following his discharge from employment, Burkhart sued Semitool for wrongful discharge. The District Court concluded that even though Burkhart had a right to protection against wrongful discharge, Semitool also had a right to protection of its trade secrets and that because the rights conflicted, the attorney-client privilege must prevail. The court dismissed Burkhart's claim on grounds that he was precluded from bringing an employment claim because, as staff counsel hired to provide legal advice or services, proof of the claim would require disclosure of confidential matters. Burkhart maintained on appeal that the Wrongful Discharge From Employment Act applied to any employee and that there was no exclusion for attorneys. Semitool argued that because this section gives the Supreme Court sole authority to regulate the conduct of lawyers, the Act is unconstitutional to the extent that it interferes with that authority. Semitool also cited Campbell v. Bozeman Investors of Duluth, 1998 MT 204, 290 M 374, 964 P2d 41 (1998), for the "universal rule" that clients may fire lawyers at any time, for any reason, with or without cause and that for that reason, application of the Act to the employment relationship of staff attorneys and the client employer was not proper. In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court examined two lines of cases from other jurisdictions that appeared to support either conclusion. The court then concluded that the reasoning and analysis in Gen. Dynamics Corp. v. Superior Court, 876 P2d 487 (Calif. 1994), and its progeny were the more sound and realistic approach. The holding in Campbell does not create an absolute right to discharge an attorney with complete impunity no matter the form of the attorney-client relationship. The universal rule does not apply in an attorney-client relationship in which the attorney is the employee of the client because in that context, the client has avoided the traditional relationship and granted the attorney protections that do not apply to independent contractors, but do apply to employees, including the Wrongful Discharge From Employment Act.

Further, although this section gives the Supreme Court sole authority to regulate the conduct of lawyers, the court does not have sole authority to regulate employer conduct. The Act pertains solely to employer conduct and does not implicate the conduct of lawyers in the practice of law, and thus, it is not an unconstitutional encroachment on the court's authority for the Act to apply to lawyers as employees or employers. Further, Rule 1.6 of the Montana Rules of Professional Conduct contemplates that a lawyer may reveal confidential attorney-client information to the extent that the lawyer reasonably believes necessary to establish an employment-related claim against an employer who is also a client. Thus, the plain language of the Wrongful Discharge From Employment Act requires courts to recognize an in-house counsel's right to pursue and maintain an action for wrongful discharge, and those claims are within the contemplation of the rules of professional conduct for attorneys. A lawyer does not forfeit rights simply because confidential information must be used to prove them, nor may a client gain the right to cheat the lawyer by imparting confidences. Burkhart v. Semitool, Inc., 2000 MT 201, 300 M 480, 5 P3d 1031, 57 St. Rep. 785 (2000). See also Doe v. A Corp., 709 F2d 1043 (5th Cir. 1983).

Insurer-Imposed Billing Rules and Procedures Violative of Rules of Professional Conduct: When presented with the question of whether an attorney licensed to practice in Montana or admitted pro hac vice may agree to abide by an insurer's billing and practice rules that impose conditions limiting or directing the scope and extent of representation of the attorney's client, the insured, the Supreme Court considered the requirement imposed by some insurers that defense counsel secure the consent of the insurer's claim professional before proceeding with the case, in order to ensure adequate consultation. Insurers cited Jessen v. O'Daniel, 210 F. Supp. 317 (D.C. Mont. 1962), for the proposition that under Montana law, in the absence of a real conflict, the insurer and the insured are dual clients of defense counsel, arguing that as co-client of defense counsel, the insurer may require preapproval of attorney activities. The Supreme Court noted that although decisions subsequent to Jessen recognized the conclusion that an insurance contract may place absolute control of litigation in the hands of the insurer, the dual representation doctrine is not recognized under the Rules of Professional Conduct, but applies only in determining whether the communications between an insurer and its attorneys are subject to the attorney-client privilege. The contractual relationship between insurer and insured does not supersede or waive defense counsels' obligations under the Rules of Professional Conduct. Rather, the Rules of Professional Conduct have application in all cases involving attorneys and clients, and under the rules, the insured is the sole client of defense counsel. The court concluded that defense counsel in Montana who submit to the requirement of prior approval from the insurer violate the Rules of Professional Conduct by fundamentally interfering with their duties to exercise independent judgment and to give their undivided loyalty to insureds. The court noted that the prior approval requirement also creates a substantial appearance of impropriety by suggesting that the insurer, rather than defense counsel, controls the day-to-day details of the defense. In re Rules of Professional Conduct & Insurer Imposed Billing Rules & Procedures, 2000 MT 110, 299 M 321, 2 P3d 806, 57 St. Rep. 433 (2000).

Requirement That Attorney Submit Detailed Descriptions of Services Violative of Client Confidentiality: When presented with the question of whether an attorney licensed to practice in Montana or admitted pro hac vice may be required by an insurer's billing and practice rules to submit detailed descriptions of professional services to outside persons or entities, such as third-party insurance auditors, without first obtaining the informed consent of the client, insurers cited U.S. v. Mass. Institute of Technology, 129 F3d 681 (1st Cir. 1997), in claiming that as agents of insurers, third-party auditors are part of a privileged community or magic circle within which confidential information may be shared without waiver of attorney-client privilege or work product doctrine. The insurers also cited Indian Law Resource Center v. Dept. of Interior, 477 F. Supp. 144 (D. D.C. 1979), for the proposition that an auditor is a confidential agent of a privileged party, so disclosure of attorney fee information did not waive any privilege. The Supreme Court found neither case persuasive, concluding that third-party auditors are not confidential agents of insureds, but function rather as agents of insurers, and thus are not within the magic circle of confidentiality. Rather, disclosure of detailed billing statements to third-party auditors constitutes disclosure to a potential adversary because there is always the possibility of disputes between auditors and defense counsel and their clients that could result in litigation. As possible adversaries, auditors stand in potential conflict with the interests of insureds in competent representation by defense counsel who exercise their independent professional judgment. The court looked to Rule 1.6 of the Rules of Professional Conduct, which extends to all communications between insureds and defense counsel, making it broader in both scope and protection than the attorney-client privilege and the work product doctrine. Although disclosures of billing information to insurers are permissible because insurers are impliedly authorized to carry out representation, disclosure to third-party auditors is not impliedly authorized. The court also rejected the insurers' argument that insureds' consent by contract to disclosure of billing statements comports with Rule 1.6. An insured executing a liability policy with an insurer cannot know at that time what kind of claim will be brought against that insured, what the issues will be, what kind of services will be undertaken by defense counsel, or the legal consequences that might result from the disclosure of billing information to a third-party auditor. Under Rule 1.6, for an insured to make a fully informed consent to disclosure of detailed billing statements, the consent must be contemporaneous with the facts and circumstances of which the insured should be aware. Thus, disclosure by defense counsel of detailed descriptions of professional services to third-party auditors without first obtaining the informed consent of the insured violates confidentiality under the Rules of Professional Conduct. In re Rules of Professional Conduct & Insurer Imposed Billing Rules & Procedures, 2000 MT 110, 299 M 321, 2 P3d 806, 57 St. Rep. 433 (2000), distinguishing U.S. v. Schwimmer, 892 F2d 237 (2nd Cir. 1989).

Constitutional Due Process and Equal Protection Rights Not Violated by Procedure in Rule 9 Regulating Practice of Attorneys: Formal complaints against two attorneys were filed with the State Bar Commission on Practice, which recommended disciplinary actions against the attorneys. In their appeal, the attorneys contended that Rule 9 of the Rules on Lawyer Disciplinary Enforcement, which sets forth the procedure relied on by the Commission, unconstitutionally violated their rights to due process, to an impartial tribunal, and to equal protection, because the procedure improperly vested both investigatory and adjudicatory functions in one body—the Commission. The Supreme Court disagreed. Applying Withrow v. Larkin, 421 US 35, 43 L Ed 2d 712, 95 S Ct 1456 (1975), the court noted that bias in a decisionmaker is not presumed and must be proved and that state and federal case law generally rejects the idea that the combination of judging and investigation functions is a denial of due process. Although attorneys who are confronted with proceedings that may result in the loss of their licenses to practice law are entitled to the same due process considerations as any other professionals faced with such proceedings, the attorneys in this case cited no authority stating that either equal protection or due process requires that identical procedures must be followed in all types of disciplinary proceedings, nor did they establish that the procedure for handling disciplinary complaints under Rule 9 denied them their constitutional rights. In re Goldstein & Albers v. Comm'n on Practice, 2000 MT 8, 297 M 493, 995 P2d 923, 57 St. Rep. 31 (2000), following In re Wyse, 212 M 339, 688 P2d 758, 41 St. Rep. 1780 (1984).

Constitutional Right to Due Process Not Violated by Confidentiality Provisions in Rule 13 Regulating Complaints Against Attorneys: Formal complaints against two attorneys were filed with the State Bar Commission on Practice, which recommended disciplinary actions against the attorneys. In their appeal, the attorneys contended that Rule 13 of the Rules on Lawyer Disciplinary Enforcement violated their rights to due process, based on their alleged inability to prepare for their cases before the Commission because of the prohibition against reviewing documents in the Commission's files that were filed prior to the filing of the formal complaints against them. Although agreeing that any exculpatory evidence obtained by the Commission prior to filing of the formal complaints that is related to the matters eventually included in the formal complaints must be disclosed to the respondent attorneys, the Supreme Court's examination of the files and records in the present case revealed no such exculpatory evidence. Thus, the attorneys failed to demonstrate any due process violation. In re Goldstein & Albers v. Comm'n on Practice, 2000 MT 8, 297 M 493, 995 P2d 923, 57 St. Rep. 31 (2000), following In re Wyse, 212 M 339, 688 P2d 758, 41 St. Rep. 1780 (1984).

Constitutional Right to Equal Protection Not Violated by Confidentiality Provisions in Rule 13 Regulating Complaints Against Attorneys: Formal complaints against two attorneys were filed with the State Bar Commission on Practice, which recommended disciplinary actions against the attorneys. In their appeal, the attorneys contended that Rule 13 of the Rules on Lawyer Disciplinary Enforcement violated their rights to equal protection under the law, making a comparison with the constitutional provision in section 11 of this article and statutes concerning the Judicial Standards Commission under which a judge responding to a disciplinary complaint may waive confidentiality. The Supreme Court found the argument inscrutable and unworthy of consideration. The attorneys failed to establish that they were treated differently under the Rules on Lawyer Disciplinary Enforcement from than any other attorney facing disciplinary charges. In re Goldstein & Albers v. Comm'n on Practice, 2000 MT 8, 297 M 493, 995 P2d 923, 57 St. Rep. 31 (2000), following In re Wyse, 212 M 339, 688 P2d 758, 41 St. Rep. 1780 (1984).

Constitutional Right to Free Speech Not Violated by Confidentiality Provisions in Rule 13 Regulating Complaints Against Attorneys: Formal complaints against two attorneys were filed with the State Bar Commission on Practice, which recommended disciplinary actions against the attorneys. In their appeal, the attorneys contended that Rule 13 of the Rules on Lawyer Disciplinary Enforcement violated their rights to free speech by placing a blanket gag order on all freedom of expression relating to ethical charges against an attorney, citing Doe v. Supreme Court of Fla., 734 F. Supp. 981 (S.D. Fla. 1990). The Supreme Court distinguished Doe based on totally different facts and circumstances. The attorneys failed to establish that their free speech rights were violated. In re Goldstein & Albers v. Comm'n on Practice, 2000 MT 8, 297 M 493, 995 P2d 923, 57 St. Rep. 31 (2000), following In re Wyse, 212 M 339, 688 P2d 758, 41 St. Rep. 1780 (1984).

Disqualification of Attorney's Firm Upon Disqualification of Attorney: Once an attorney is found to be disqualified, such as for previous representation of an adverse party, the attorney's firm is also disqualified. Attorney's Disclosure of Information Without Client's Consent — Presumption of Prejudice: Prior to defendant's trial for felony assault (now assault with a weapon), a court-appointed attorney moved to withdraw as counsel based on Rule 1.16, Montana Rules of Professional Conduct, which requires an attorney to withdraw when continued representation would result in a violation of the rules of professional conduct. The attorney informed the court that the defendant, against the advice of counsel, had communicated an intent to testify falsely at trial. The District Court denied the attorney's motion to withdraw, and the defendant was subsequently convicted of assault. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded, ruling that the attorney's disclosure of confidential information implicated the attorney's duty of loyalty and the defendant's constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel. St. v. Jones, 278 M 121, 923 P2d 560, 53 St. Rep. 864 (1996).

Failure to File Tax Returns — Committee's Refusal to Certify Bar Admission Upheld: Petitioner, a law student and certified public accountant licensed in Montana, applied for admission to the State Bar of Montana. After reviewing the application, the Committee on Character and Fitness (Committee) refused to certify the petitioner to take the bar examination, citing concern over the petitioner's driving under the influence convictions and tax liens for unpaid back taxes. At an informal hearing, the petitioner submitted documents demonstrating petitioner's membership in the Golden Means Society, which advocated violation of tax laws, but failed to inform the Committee of criminal investigations of his activities by the Internal Revenue Service. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the Committee's decision, ruling that the petitioner's lack of candor with the Committee concerning civil and criminal investigations for failure to file tax returns constituted neglect of financial and professional responsibilities and rendered the petitioner unfit to practice law. Petition of Steele, 262 M 481, 865 P2d 285, 50 St. Rep. 1649 (1993).

Committee Error in Initially Placing Burden on Applicant to Prove Good Moral Character: Pedersen argued that the State Bar of Montana's Committee on Character and Fitness had erred in initially placing the burden on him to prove that he was of good moral character. The Supreme Court held that the Committee was in error in not presuming good character but that Pedersen's past questionable conduct justified the Committee's determination that he was unfit to be a member of the State Bar of Montana. In re Petition of Pedersen, 250 M 325, 820 P2d 1288, 48 St. Rep. 988 (1991), distinguished in In re Matt, 252 M 345, 829 P2d 625, 49 St. Rep. 279 (1992).

Independent Review of Entire Record: The Supreme Court held that while the State Bar of Montana's Committee on Character and Fitness had the opportunity to observe the demeanor and credibility of witnesses, the Supreme Court was ultimately responsible for determining fitness to practice law in the state and therefore it could conduct an independent review of the entire record of any proceeding before the Committee. In re Petition of Pedersen, 250 M 325, 820 P2d 1288, 48 St. Rep. 988 (1991), followed in In re Matt, 252 M 345, 829 P2d 625, 49 St. Rep. 279 (1992).

Rules to Provide Due Process: On the basis that he had been denied his right to due process, Pedersen appealed the finding of the State Bar of Montana's Committee on Character and Fitness that he was unfit for admission to the State Bar of Montana. The Supreme Court held that the Committee's rules included due process safeguards. The petitioner: (1) had been granted three hearings; (2) from the beginning, knew of the Committee's concerns; and (3) had an opportunity to present his case. In re Petition of Pedersen, 250 M 325, 820 P2d 1288, 48 St. Rep. 988 (1991), followed in In re Matt, 252 M 345, 829 P2d 625, 49 St. Rep. 279 (1992).

Commission Findings Adopted — Disbarment Ordered: Adopting the findings of the Commission on Practice, the Supreme Court ordered disbarment based on facts that the attorney: (1) had been temporarily suspended from practice in 1990 for conviction of the crime of issuing bad checks and for nonpayment of State Bar of Montana membership dues; (2) failed to respond orally or in writing to a complaint filed by the Commission; (3) failed to perfect an appeal in the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals on behalf of a client who paid him to do so; (4) was convicted of criminal contempt for failure to appear at the sentencing of his client before the U.S. District Court of Western Michigan and misrepresented to the District Court Judge the nature of the Montana bad check charge; (5) was suspended by the State Bar in 1986 for noncompliance with court rules for mandatory continuing legal education and for failure to pay State Bar dues; (6) represented a client in federal court in California while suspended from practice of law in Montana; and (7) was admonished by the Third Circuit Court of Appeals in 1988 for failure to diligently prosecute his client's cause. In re Shrom, 246 M 333, 806 P2d 23, 47 St. Rep. 2086 (1990).

Material Misrepresentation and Failure to Provide Adequate Representation — Public Censure: Public censure by the Supreme Court was the result of an attorney's violation of five Rules of Professional Conduct that occurred when he: (1) made a material misrepresentation to a third party and the party's attorney, promising payment if an insurance draft would be endorsed by that party and finally making payment 2 years later; and (2) failed to adequately represent a client in a child custody matter, causing great emotional and financial distress, including deprivation of child support for 1 year. In re Graveley, 246 M 58, 805 P2d 1263, 47 St. Rep. 1897 (1990).

Validity of Attorney License Tax: A $25 license tax on attorneys, along with the attendant penalty provision for nonpayment, has the effect of regulating the practice of law in that an attorney may not practice law in Montana without paying the tax. The tax is a minimal and inoffensive intrusion on the Supreme Court's constitutional prerogatives and is valid as a legislative enactment in aid of the power of the court to regulate the practice of law. In re Application of Kradolfer v. Smith, 246 M 210, 805 P2d 1266, 47 St. Rep. 1861 (1990).

Misconduct Warranting Disbarment Rather Than Suspension: Disbarment, rather than temporary suspension, was appropriate for an attorney charged with seven counts of misconduct in the practice of law, including the use of methods that serve only to embarrass and burden a third party, failure to provide competent representation, failure to exercise the degree of competency required of an attorney in prosecuting an action without a good faith basis, and the promotion of prostitution. In re Bechhold, 235 M 383, 771 P2d 563, 46 St. Rep. 74 (1989).

Indefinite Suspension Proper — Violation of Ethics Rules: The Supreme Court adopted the recommendations of the Commission on Practice that an attorney be indefinitely suspended from practice, be required to remit client fees, and pay Commission costs. The Commission found that Rules 1.16(d) and 8.4(c) of the Rules of Professional Conduct were violated by the attorney's failure to remit client fees and return his work product to the clients when he knew or should have known that he was going to leave the state and could not represent the clients. Also, Rules 8.4(c), 8.4(d), and 3.3(a)(1) were violated when the attorney set forth as one continuous quotation statements actually taken from two entirely different portions of a deposition, resulting in a misleading representation of testimony. In re Ziskind, 233 M 510, 766 P2d 218, 45 St. Rep. 1691 (1988).

Suspension and Censure Appropriate — Ethics Violations: The Supreme Court affirmed the recommendations of the Commission on Practice to censure and suspend an attorney after substantiating counts of filing frivolous and unfounded ethics violations claims against opposing counsel; disobedience of a judge's order; attempting to obstruct justice; physical assault; outrageous, undignified, and discourteous conduct; intimidation and threats to a public official; contacting a prospective client for private representation on a matter investigated by the County Attorney's office; conflict of interest; contacting an adverse party represented by counsel; and a continued pattern of misconduct. In re Belue, 232 M 365, 766 P2d 206, 45 St. Rep. 1119 (1988).

Practicing Law Without License: The court properly dismissed appellants' complaint on the Daly Ditch decision because appellants' spokesman, Bernie Swift, was practicing law without a license. He is not licensed to practice law in Montana and therefore cannot act as spokesman for others before the court. Swift v. St., 226 M 439, 736 P2d 117, 44 St. Rep. 786 (1987).

Censured Suspension — Violation of Rules of Professional Conduct: An attorney in an insurance claim served the local agent rather than the Commissioner of Insurance as required by 33-1-602 (now repealed). He then misrepresented to the District Court Clerk that he had obtained a default judgment. When given the opportunity by opposing counsel, he refused to stipulate to setting aside the void default judgment. The Commission on Practice and the Supreme Court found that the attorney had violated Canons 1 and 7 of the Canons of Professional Ethics and paralleling Rules of Professional Conduct. Public censure and suspension from the practice of law were the discipline imposed. In re LaFountain, 226 M 296, 738 P2d 472, 44 St. Rep. 668 (1987).

Serious Crime — Disbarment: Attorney was convicted in federal District Court of a felony for receiving federal Social Security disability benefits during the time that he was engaged in the practice of law. The Commission on Practice determined that the conviction was a "serious" crime within the meaning of Rule 16(B) of the Rules Governing the Commission on Practice. The Supreme Court agreed with the findings of the Commission on Practice concerning the seriousness of the crime and found that to be the overwhelming factor requiring disbarment. In re Gilbert, 226 M 279, 738 P2d 476, 44 St. Rep. 654 (1987).

Multistate Bar Examination: In response to a petition of students of the 1986 graduating class of the University of Montana (now University of Montana-Missoula) School of Law, the Supreme Court held that the petitioners did not establish compelling reasons for elimination of the multistate bar examination. The examination provides a practical and useful means of testing applicants' qualifications. In re Revision of Mont. Bar Exam., 222 M 25, 720 P2d 285, 43 St. Rep. 1158 (1986).

Attorney Fees in Divorce Actions — Contingency Fees Impermissible — Findings Required: The District Court order entered in a proceeding to enforce a decree of dissolution of marriage awarded attorney fees to the respondent. The court made findings as to the reasonableness of the amount of the award of attorney fees, but made no findings as to the wife's need for the award. The court awarded the respondent $6,506 for maintenance arrearages and then found that one-third of the recovery, or $2,146, was a reasonable attorney fee. Noting that the Rules of Professional Conduct prohibit contingency fees in domestic relations actions, the Supreme Court vacated the award for attorney fees and remanded the case for reconsideration and entry of findings by the District Court on the fee issue. In re Marriage of Jones, 218 M 441, 709 P2d 158, 42 St. Rep. 1722 (1985).

Filling In Preprinted Forms Not Practice of Law: When the bank filled in blanks on preprinted forms for a mortgage and deed of trust as a service to the buyer and the sellers and incident to a real estate transaction in which the bank was involved, this did not constitute the unauthorized practice of law. The Supreme Court listed three factors as most important in resolving the question of whether filling in preprinted real estate forms is the practice of law: (1) the real estate instruments must be prepared only incident to transactions in which the maker is interested; (2) the instruments must be prepared without a separate charge; and (3) the preparation must not go beyond the filling in of blank forms. Pulse v. N. Am. Land Title Co. of Mont., 218 M 275, 707 P2d 1105, 42 St. Rep. 1578 (1985).

No Conflict of Interest: There was no conflict of interest for an attorney appointed to represent the child in a proceeding for modification of custody when the attorney occupied an office that had formerly been shared by the attorney representing the father and the judge presiding over the case (before he became a judge). In re Marriage of Stout, 216 M 342, 701 P2d 729, 42 St. Rep. 856 (1985).

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim — Effect on Attorney-Client Privilege: When a convicted person files a petition for relief based on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel, the petitioner's comprehension of waiver of privilege or his knowledge and consent to waiver are irrelevant. The attorney in question has a duty to respond by affidavit or other sworn testimony to admit, deny, or qualify the allegations of fact made in the petition. In future cases, if a response from a defense attorney so charged is necessary, the Attorney General shall first apply to the Supreme Court for an order preserving the responding attorney from charges of discipline or malpractice for revealing necessary confidential information from such convicted person. Petition of Gillham, 216 M 279, 704 P2d 1019, 42 St. Rep. 806 (1985). Gillham was clarified in Marble v. St., 2007 MT 98, 337 M 99, 169 P3d 1148 (2007). See also Bone v. St., 284 M 293, 944 P2d 734, 54 St. Rep. 890 (1997), wherein it was held that failure to secure an order from the Supreme Court pursuant to Petition of Gillham did not constitute prejudice to defendant because the District Court that ruled on the petition did not rely on preliminary findings on the issue.

Censure of Attorney Disseminating Confidential Information Protected by Statute: A lawyer was publicly censured by the Montana Supreme Court for obtaining confidential information from his law firm's files and from the files of the County Attorney and for disseminating the information to parties not entitled to it, notwithstanding the confidentiality requirements of this section. Censure was changed from oral censure in the Supreme Court's courtroom to censure in writing by that court and placed in the court's records, because it would be a financial burden for him to appear in court as he lived out of state. In re Wyse, 215 M 82, 697 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 198 (1985).

Prosecutorial Discretion — Deputy's Prior Representation: The Lemmons were divorced after 20 years of marriage. Leroy was seeing Donna Myers, and Koralyn was seeing John Sweeting. Myers and Sweeting had just ended a personal and business relationship. Sweeting asked Koralyn to get a briefcase out of Leroy's truck. The briefcase actually belonged to Myers. Leroy and Myers returned to the truck and found the briefcase missing. They concluded Koralyn had taken it since the truck was not broken into. Leroy and Myers went to Koralyn's home. She heard them drive up and put a gun in the waistband of her pants. Leroy and Koralyn fought, and Leroy struck her in the head with the gun. Leroy and Myers put Koralyn on the floor of the truck and went to the Sheriff's department. The Sheriff was not immediately available, so Leroy and Myers left, with Koralyn still on the floor of the truck, to find Sweeting. A high speed chase ensued in which the cars rammed together and gunshots were exchanged. The chase ended when Leroy's transmission caught fire. The charges arising from the pursuit were dropped. Leroy was charged with aggravated assault and kidnapping. He was convicted of assault and unlawful restraint. Leroy contended the County Attorney abused his discretion in not acting on his complaints against Koralyn and for not disqualifying the office since a deputy had represented Koralyn in the divorce. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the abuse of discretion issue had not been raised at trial and could not be raised on appeal. The court also stated that selectivity in enforcement is not a violation of the U. S. Constitution if the selection is not based on an unjustifiable or arbitrary classification. The court construed DR 5-105(D) to concern conflicts in representation, not prosecution. Also, the court stated that it was not established that the County Attorney would have been disqualified from the prosecution for representing Koralyn, let alone a deputy. St. v. Lemmon, 214 M 121, 692 P2d 455, 41 St. Rep. 2359 (1984), followed, with regard to the broad applicability of prosecutorial discretion, in St. v. Harris, 1999 MT 115, 294 M 397, 983 P2d 881, 56 St. Rep. 481 (1999). See also Helena Parents Comm'n v. Lewis & Clark County Comm'rs, 277 M 367, 922 P2d 1140, 53 St. Rep. 687 (1996).

Disciplinary Rules for Attorneys in Remarks on Criminal Cases — Violation of Attorney's Freedom of Speech: Disciplinary Rules 7-107(B) and (H) of the Canons of Professional Ethics, adopted in Montana to govern the conduct of attorneys, restrict the use of extrajudicial statements in criminal actions on various subjects to protect the accused's right to a fair trial. The Supreme Court voided the Rules because, read literally, the Rules invaded an attorney's right of free speech; thus, a standard for interpretation of the Rules would be necessary to balance an attorney's right to free speech and the accused's right to a fair trial. The court declined to adopt such a standard and instead provided that new disciplinary rules be drafted incorporating such a standard. In re Keller, 213 M 196, 693 P2d 1211, 41 St. Rep. 2045 (1984).

Commission on Practice and Disciplinary Proceedings — Not Violative of Due Process: The Commission on Practice, a body appointed by the Supreme Court, undertakes proceedings relating to the discipline of members of the bar. The proceedings are designed to establish a record upon which the Supreme Court may act, the Supreme Court having retained exclusive jurisdiction over disciplinary matters. The accused member of the bar retains full rights of representation, confrontation, production of evidence, and argument before the Commission. The report of the Commission is not binding on the Supreme Court, and the accused may again make denials and argue defenses before the Supreme Court. This process does not constitute any deprivation of due process rights but rather provides an orderly process preserving in the accused the widest latitude of due process. In re Wyse, 212 M 339, 688 P2d 758, 41 St. Rep. 1780 (1984), followed in In re Goldstein & Albers v. Comm'n on Practice, 2000 MT 8, 297 M 493, 995 P2d 923, 57 St. Rep. 31 (2000).

Preservation of Confidences and Secrets of Client — Disciplinary Rule 4-101: Disciplinary Rule 4-101 relates to the preservation of confidences and secrets of a client. As the term "secret" is used in the rule, the rule prohibits the unconsented-to disclosure of information that would be embarrassing or detrimental to the client even though the information related to the client's child rather than to the client herself. In re Wyse, 212 M 339, 688 P2d 758, 41 St. Rep. 1780 (1984).

Regulatory Municipal Business License Applicable to Attorneys — Unconstitutional: A business license ordinance enacted by a self-governing municipality requiring municipal licensure of attorneys and that provided for regulation was an unconstitutional encroachment on the Supreme Court's authority to regulate the bar as provided in Art. VII, sec. 2, Mont. Const., because the ordinance conditions attorneys' access to the practice of law. The ordinance included police provisions that could conceivably cover standards of practice, prohibited attorneys from carrying on their occupation without procuring a municipal license, required municipal licensure of nonresident attorneys practicing in the municipality, and provided for fines and incarceration for failing to comply with the ordinance. Harlen v. Helena, 208 M 45, 676 P2d 191, 41 St. Rep. 162 (1984).

Lobbying by State Bar: The State Bar of Montana may not use funds derived from compulsory dues for lobbying purposes unless the State Bar makes provision to refund to members dissenting to such lobbying an aliquot portion of compulsory dues paid by said members. Reynolds v. St. Bar of Mont., 660 P2d 581, 40 St. Rep. 415 (1983) (apparently not reported in Montana Reports).

Permanent Disbarment Not Mandated for Felony: Permanent disbarment is not mandated upon conviction of a felony. In re McKeon, 201 M 515, 656 P2d 179, 39 St. Rep. 2270 (1982).

Reinstatement Following Disbarment for Multiple Felonies: On the record, petitioner showed by clear and convincing evidence that he was entitled to reinstatement to the State Bar of Montana. Petitioner had pleaded guilty to the felonies of offering false evidence, obtaining money by false pretenses, grand larceny by bailee, and forgery. Eight years had passed, and he had served his prison time and was making restitution on schedule. He had lived an exemplary life during the 8 years and had a record of immense service to the public prior to the commission of the felonies. The evidence against reinstatement consisted of a letter stating that felons should be denied reinstatement and a statement from a businessman that reinstatement should be denied in view of the severity of the crimes. Reinstatement was supported by 20 letters and by petitions with approximately 250 signatures, 48 of them those of lawyers. No person requested an opportunity to appear at a hearing in opposition to the application for reinstatement. An investigation into the application had been made. The evidence uniformly showed that applicant had reformed and that the public believed he had reformed. In re McKeon, 201 M 515, 656 P2d 179, 39 St. Rep. 2270 (1982).

Lobbying — Initiative 85 — Attorneys — Constitutionality: Initiative 85, as emended in Mont. Auto. Ass'n v. Greely, 193 M 378, 632 P2d 300, 38 St. Rep. 1174 (1981), is not so vague as to be unconstitutionally uncertain, nor does it intrude on the power of the Supreme Court to regulate the conduct of attorneys. The act applies equally to attorneys and nonattorneys acting in the nonlegislative lobbying field. The right of the court to supervise the conduct of the members of the bar is undiminished by any provision of the Initiative. St. Bar of Mont. v. Krivec, 193 M 477, 632 P2d 707, 38 St. Rep. 1322 (1981).

Duty of State Agency to Compensate Lead Counsel in Consolidated Cases Upheld: In an action against the defendant for damages caused by a range fire in which numerous cases were consolidated and lead counsel appointed for all consolidated cases, the District Court did not err in requiring the plaintiff state agency to compensate lead counsel. There is no basis either in Disciplinary Rule 2-107 of the Canons of Ethics or elsewhere for treating the plaintiff differently from any other beneficiary of the litigation because payment for the litigation is founded upon principles of equity and equity demands that all parties receiving a benefit contribute to payment of the expenses. Disciplinary Rule 2-107, regarding the splitting of fees between two lawyers, has no application to court-appointed lead counsel who is paid under the supervision of the court. Means v. Mont. Power Co., 191 M 395, 625 P2d 32, 38 St. Rep. 351 (1981).

Lawyer Advertising — Categorical Listing in Telephone Directory: The proposal of Mountain Bell to publish in the yellow pages a lawyers' guide containing 33 categories of practice under which lawyers, for a fee, could be listed under one or more fields of law has significant potential for misrepresentation and overreaching by lawyers and resulting harm to the public. The court would hope that Mountain Bell, in the spirit of cooperation, would withdraw its proposal in Montana. In re Mtn. Bell Directory Advertising, 185 M 68, 604 P2d 760 (1979).

Increase in Annual Dues of State Bar of Montana: The Supreme Court denied any relief from an increase because its order of January 23, 1975, gave control over Bar dues to the State Bar of Montana. It stated that the failure of the Bar to publish its financial statement prior to the annual meeting, as required by the Bar's bylaws, was not cause to nullify the action by the majority at the meeting increasing dues. The court stated its intention to issue an order to reinstate its authority to approve or disapprove of future dues increases. Douglas v. St. Bar of Mont., 183 M 155, 598 P2d 1080 (1979).

Public Censure of Attorney in Open Court: The attorney in this case was charged with several violations of the Canons of Professional Ethics and Disciplinary Rules adopted by the Supreme Court. Since he failed to carry the burden of showing the Supreme Court that the findings of the Commission on Practice were not supported by the evidence or that the recommendations were erroneous or unlawful, the Commission's recommendation of public censure in open court was concurred in. In re Johnson, 182 M 486, 597 P2d 740 (1979).

Disciplinary Action Against Attorney: The Supreme Court relied on the findings of fact of the Commission on Practice and concluded that the attorney who was the subject of the disciplinary action failed to shift the burden of demonstrating that the findings were not supported by the evidence or that the recommendations were erroneous or unlawful. However, the court rejected the Commission's recommendation that the attorney be disbarred. In re Goldman, 179 M 526, 588 P2d 964 (1978).

State Jurisdiction Over Indian Contract: One licensed to practice law in this state cannot make a contract as an attorney to be performed both on and off the reservation and then use his status as an Indian to defeat state jurisdiction when he is sued on the contract involved. Crawford v. Roy, 176 M 227, 577 P2d 392 (1978).

Petition Attacking Bar Unification: A petition to test the efficacy, constitutional legality, and beneficial application of the Supreme Court order and opinion of January 29, 1974, unifying the Montana bar was dismissed for failure to state a claim on which relief could be granted. In re Petition of Morris, 175 M 456, 575 P2d 37 (1978).

Authority to Impose Orders Restricting Public Statements by Counsel: The Supreme Court has the jurisdiction and authority to issue orders restricting counsel from making public statements regarding pending criminal cases. State ex rel. Angel v. Woodahl, 171 M 13, 555 P2d 501 (1976).

Legislative Veto Power — Not Extended to Admission to the Bar: Rules of appellate and civil procedure are subject to disapproval by the Legislature; however, as to rules promulgated by the court relative to practice, admission to the bar, and conduct of members of the bar, the Legislature has no such veto authority, as under the principle of separation of powers the Supreme Court was given exclusive authority to promulgate such rules. In re the Petitions of McCabe & Zeman, 168 M 334, 544 P2d 825 (1975).

Unification of Bar: Supreme Court has power under this section to order unification of the bar of the State of Montana. Application of President of Mont. Bar Ass'n, 163 M 523, 518 P2d 32 (1974).

MISCELLANEOUS

Constitutional Right to Know — Does Not Include Documents Protected by Attorney-Client or Attorney-Work-Product Privilege: A citizen filed a petition for release of documents with the District Court requesting "everything related to" a civil judgment paid on behalf of the city of Billings and its insurer. The city released all nonprivileged documents and provided privilege logs describing those documents withheld on the ground of attorney-client or attorney-work-product privilege. The District Court granted summary judgment to the city on the ground that the citizen had received all of the documents that he was entitled to examine. The citizen appealed, arguing that Montana's constitutional right to know foreclosed the city's privilege claims. The Supreme Court determined that, given this history of the 1972 Constitutional Convention proceedings and the Montana Constitution's own Transition Schedule, the framers' intent is manifest that the preexisting attorney-client and attorney-work-product privileges would carry forward inviolate as essential components of the preexisting legal system regardless of the broad, clear, and unambiguous language of Art. II, sec. 9, Mont. Const. The Supreme Court thus held that documents protected by the attorney-client or attorney-work-product privilege are not subject to disclosure under Art. II, sec. 9, Mont. Const., but the attorney-client and attorney-work-product privileges must be narrowly construed to effect their limited purposes. As applied, the District Court appropriately recognized that the citizen's position that the government cannot withhold privileged documents would be antithetical to the public interests the privileges serve and would render the attorney-client privilege and attorney-work-product privilege meaningless. Nelson v. Billings, 2018 MT 36, 390 Mont. 290, 412 P.3d 1058.

Disqualification of Judge Proper — Party in Similar, Ongoing Case: An insured person entered into a settlement agreement and stipulation for entry of judgment without the insurer's approval, although the insurer defended the insured person subject to a reservation of rights throughout the matter. The insurer filed a motion to intervene, but the judge concluded the stipulated settlement was reasonable. On appeal, the insurer argued that the judge had a conflict of interest stemming from a sexual harassment complaint in which the judge entered into a stipulated settlement without the authorization of the judge's insurer, which paid for his defense under a reservation of rights. On remand, the District Court correctly concluded that under Rule 2.12 of the Code of Judicial Conduct, the judge should have been disqualified because the judge was an active party in an unresolved and strikingly similar case, and the judge's participation reasonably raised concerns about his impartiality. In addition, the District Court did not improperly rely on statements from the Supreme Court's previous decision in the matter remanding the case to determine whether the disqualification was warranted because the District Court made specific findings concerning the case at hand, the case involving the judge, and overlap between the two cases. Draggin' Y Cattle Co., Inc. v. Junkermier, 2017 MT 125, 387 Mont. 430, 395 P.3d 497.

Legislative Referendum to Restructure Supreme Court Elections — Recusal of Nonretiring Judges Not Warranted — Potential for Bias Too Speculative: The Legislature passed a bill to put a referendum on the ballot to change elections for Supreme Court justices from statewide to regional. Prior to the election, citizens from each of the seven proposed regions filed an action against the Secretary of State, seeking a declaratory judgment that the proposed referendum was unconstitutional as well as an injunction to bar the Secretary of State from putting the measure on the ballot. The District Court granted the plaintiffs summary judgment and the state appealed. Seven legislators in favor of the bill, appearing as amici curiae, argued that those Supreme Court justices who were not retiring should recuse themselves from the case. The Supreme Court concluded that recusal was not warranted under Montana statutes, including the Montana Code of Judicial Conduct. Specifically, the Supreme Court ruled that the law presumes honesty and integrity of a justice and that in this case, the mere possibility of a justice running for reelection and being prevented from doing so by passage of the referendum did not constitute a "direct, personal, substantial, and pecuniary" interest that would obligate the justice to recuse himself. Reichert v. St., 2012 MT 111, 365 Mont. 92, 278 P.3d 455.

Disqualification of Chief Justice Who Was Formerly Attorney General From Certain Cases: Ellis moved to disqualify the Chief Justice from presiding over and participating in Ellis's appeal because the appeal was initiated while the Chief Justice was serving as Attorney General. The Supreme Court held that under Rule 2.12(A)(5)(b) of the Code of Judicial Conduct, a Chief Justice who previously served as Attorney General must be disqualified from cases in which the Chief Justice personally and substantially participated as Attorney General or expressed an opinion concerning the merits of the matter in controversy. However, the fact that the former Attorney General's name appeared on the state's answer brief did not, by itself, trigger a disqualification. In Ellis's case, as Attorney General, the Chief Justice oversaw and approved the filing of the criminal appeal by the state, which constituted personal and substantial participation under the Rule, so disqualification was appropriate. St. v. Ellis, 2009 MT 58, 349 M 317, 206 P3d 564 (2009).

Withdrawal of Counsel — No Requirement That Party Provide Written Notice of Hearing Until Notice of Withdrawal of Counsel Filed: Defendant moved for sanctions and dismissal based on discovery abuses. Notice was sent to plaintiffs' counsel regarding a hearing on the motion, but plaintiffs' counsel had decided to withdraw. Although counsel mentioned the hearing to plaintiffs, plaintiffs failed to appear at the hearing, so defendant's motion was granted. No notice was filed with the court formalizing withdrawal of counsel until after the hearing. Plaintiffs' new counsel moved to set aside the judgment on grounds of mistake, surprise, and excusable neglect, asserting that defendant was required to notify plaintiffs in writing before the hearing, but the motion was denied, and plaintiffs appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Defendant was not required to provide written notice to plaintiffs until their former counsel filed a notice of withdrawal, and the rules of professional conduct prohibited defendant from contacting plaintiffs in person. Until the notice of withdrawal was filed, defendant was entitled to presume that plaintiffs' former counsel continued to provide representation and that plaintiffs had been properly notified of the hearing by counsel. Under these circumstances, denial of the motion to set aside the judgment was not an abuse of discretion. Flesch v. McDonald's Restaurant, 2005 MT 235, 328 M 407, 121 P3d 527 (2005).

Failure to Show Excessiveness of Sanctions — Reasonableness of Fees and Costs: Defendant was awarded fees and costs from plaintiff's attorney Palmer, who complained that the sanctions were excessive, citing Rule 1.5 of the Rules of Professional Conduct for the proposition that fees customarily charged in a locality be considered in determining the reasonableness of fees. However, under Rule 1.5, fees customarily charged in a locale are not the sole factor that may be considered. Palmer did not assert specific objections to either the necessity of or the time spent on the work billed by defendant's counsel and thus failed to show that the sanctions were excessive. Dambrowski v. Champion Int'l Corp., 2000 MT 149, 300 M 76, 3 P3d 617, 57 St. Rep. 581 (2000).

Rebuttal of Testimony of Plaintiffs' Witness by Defendants' Attorney — Error Requiring Reversal: In a suit involving a complex three-way property exchange between defendants (developer and builders) and plaintiff purchasers, purchasers called as a witness the attorney for a person who had sued some of the defendants in another suit. The attorney testified that prior to the closing on the other deal, he advised his client not to pay defendants anything. Defendants' attorney in this appeal rebutted the testimony. The rebuttal testimony was an error requiring reversal. Defendants knew that the plaintiff's attorney in the other suit would testify for plaintiffs in this case but did not seek discovery from him, so they could not complain that they did not know what he would say. Rule 3.7 of the Rules of Professional Conduct prohibited the rebuttal testimony of a lawyer in this case. Vestre v. Lambert, 249 M 455, 817 P2d 219, 48 St. Rep. 769 (1991).

Rulemaking Power — Lower Court Procedure: The Supreme Court is authorized to promulgate rules of practice and procedure for all other courts. Uniform Rule II is binding on the practice before all District Courts in the state. McLaughlin v. Hart, 213 M 216, 690 P2d 431, 41 St. Rep. 2059 (1984).

Role of Branches Construed: In interpreting the role of the courts and the Legislature under Art. VII, sec. 2(3), Mont. Const., the Supreme Court stated that the provision vests in the Supreme Court the authority to adopt rules for appellate procedure and trial and appellate procedures for all other courts. Just as clearly, the Legislature is empowered to veto any such rules. However, once a legislative veto is exercised, the Legislature is not empowered to fill the vacuum by enacting its own legislation governing appellate procedure or lower court procedure; that is a sphere reserved expressly to the Supreme Court. Coate v. Omholt, 203 M 488, 662 P2d 591, 40 St. Rep. 586 (1983).

Supreme Court Finding of Improper Pretrial Prosecutorial Comment: In a well publicized and controversial case, defendant charged with rape had bail set at $100,000 by a Justice of the Peace and lowered to $15,000 by the District Court. The County Attorney and a Deputy County Attorney made statements to the press and various groups clearly indicating they believed defendant guilty and praising the description of defendant and his vehicle given by the 11-year-old victim. A disciplinary rule of Canons of Professional Ethics states that prosecutors shall not, in a pending case, make statements that a reasonable person would expect to be disseminated by means of public communication and that relate to the testimony or credibility of a prospective witness or to any opinion as to guilt or innocence of the accused or to the evidence or merits of the case. The failure of the County Attorney and a Deputy County Attorney to strictly adhere to the dictates of that rule jeopardized the impartial administration of justice to defendant by contributing to the establishment of prejudice against him, prejudice that the Supreme Court found to warrant a change of venue. State ex rel. Coburn v. Bennett, 202 M 20, 655 P2d 502, 39 St. Rep. 2300 (1982).

Authority of Judicial Standards Commission: Where the Judicial Standards Commission adopted in its rules power to investigate complaints on the basis that a judge had engaged in "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute", the court held the Commission in so acting would exceed its authority, since the Constitution and statute did not provide that such described conduct would be grounds for action by the Commission. Rather, the Constitution requires the more serious complaint of "misconduct in office" to provide a basis for action by the Commission. State ex rel. Shea v. Judicial Standards Comm'n, 198 M 15, 643 P2d 210, 39 St. Rep. 521 (1982).

Authority to Invalidate Labor Contract: Although a state court has the authority to construe and enforce collective bargaining agreements, it does not have the authority to invalidate a labor contract, proper on its face, because one of the parties has allegedly engaged in an unfair labor practice. Such a determination is exclusively a function of the federal system. Audit Serv., Inc. v. Elmo Rd. Corp., 175 M 533, 575 P2d 77 (1978).

Federal Courts — Reviewability of Montana Decisions: The U.S. District Court has no power to review the judgments of Montana courts. A litigant has no constitutional right to a correct result. Osburnsen v. Heller, 34 St. Rep. 193 (D.C. Mont. 1977) (apparently not reported in Federal Supplement).

Abstention: The Supreme Court will not decide constitutional questions when not at issue. Skrukrud v. Gallatin Laundry Co., Inc., 171 M 217, 557 P2d 278 (1976).

Rulemaking Power — Justice's Court Expenses: When a dispute arose between a Justice of the Peace and County Commissioners regarding expenditures for necessary expenses to bring Justice's Court within the provisions of 3-10-103 and 3-10-209, the Supreme Court exercised its powers under subsections (2) and (3) of this section to promulgate a rule for District Court Judges to review claims by Justices of the Peace for certification as to whether or not the claim was for an actual and necessary expense. State ex rel. Browman v. Wood, 168 M 341, 543 P2d 184 (1975).

Rulemaking Power — System for Juror Qualifications: Argument that since Legislature enacted different system for juror qualifications based on most recent list of registered electors rather than last assessment roll, without providing for jury selection commissions to meet after effective date of statute, and therefore no list of eligible jurors was available, failed because of Supreme Court's interpretation that various county jury selection commissions will meet as soon as possible after effective date of statute, invoking court's rulemaking power, under Art. VII, sec.

2(3), Mont. Const., by supplying a meeting and selection date. State ex rel. Bennick v. District Court, 167 M 389, 538 P2d 1369 (1975).

Disqualification of Judges: Statutory provisions regulating the disqualification of judges were not unconstitutional as being repealed by the Montana Constitution and not the subject of repromulgation under the rulemaking power of the Supreme Court. State ex rel. Lane v. District Court, 167 M 53, 535 P2d 174 (1975).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION
JURISDICTION

Scope of Power to Issue Writs in General — Stay of Writ of Mandate:

Despite the prohibition in former Rule 7(c), M.R.App.Civ.P. (now Montana Rules of Appellate Procedure, now superseded), the Supreme Court had power under Art. VIII, sec. 3, 1889 Mont. Const., to stay the execution of a peremptory Writ of Mandamus issued by the District Court when necessary to provide an effective appellate remedy. State ex rel. Bennett v. Dowdall, 157 M 11, 482 P2d 572 (1971).

Even if a stay, in a case where a Writ of Mandate is issued by a District Court to compel the issuance of a license, is not provided for in the Code, still the Supreme Court has power under this section to issue a Supersedeas or other appropriate Writ to effectuate its appellate jurisdiction, thus to insure the aggrieved board an appeal that otherwise might be of no value. Gill v. Rafn, 133 M 505, 326 P2d 974 (1958), distinguished in State ex rel. Ronish v. School District, 136 M 453, 348 P2d 797 (1960).

Original Jurisdiction — Constitutional Convention Questions: In view of necessity for 1971 Legislature to call a Constitutional Convention pursuant to the voters' mandate in the 1970 election and in order to prevent delays that might occur if the Legislature passed an unconstitutional act, Supreme Court would consider and answer questions arising during the legislative session with respect to the Constitutional Convention in an original proceeding for declaratory judgment authorized by act of the 1971 Legislature. Forty-Second Legislative Assembly v. Lennon, 156 M 416, 481 P2d 330 (1971), distinguished in Mahoney v. Murray, 159 M 176, 496 P2d 1120 (1972).

Factual Issues — Contempt Order: Order of contempt that failed to specify facts that constituted contempt before the court was deficient under 3-1-511 since it did not provide opportunity for appellate review. State ex rel. Shea v. District Court, 156 M 266, 479 P2d 281 (1971).

Review of Orders of Disqualified Judge: District Judge sitting for disqualified District Judge could not review validity of orders on the merits entered by disqualified judge since review amounted to attempt to exercise appellate jurisdiction in violation of Constitution. State ex rel. St. Highway Comm'n v. Kinman, 150 M 12, 430 P2d 110 (1967), distinguished in State ex rel. Stenberg v. Nelson, 157 M 310, 486 P2d 870 (1971).

Failure to File Notice of Appeal — Court-Appointed Counsel: Even though the Supreme Court dismissed an appeal in a criminal case because of failure to file timely notice of appeal, the court considered the questions raised, where the fault was that of court-appointed counsel in whose appointment defendant had no voice. St. v. Frodsham, 139 M 222, 362 P2d 413 (1961).

Exclusive Power of Interpretation: The Constitution vests in the courts the exclusive power to construe and interpret legislative acts as well as provisions of the Constitution. Cottingham v. St. Bd. of Examiners, 134 M 1, 328 P2d 907 (1958), overruled on other grounds in State ex rel. Ward v. Anderson, 158 M 279, 491 P2d 868 (1971).

"Cases" Construed: By "cases" and "controversies" is meant real controversies and not abstract differences of opinion or moot questions. Chovanak v. Matthews, 120 M 520, 188 P2d 582 (1948), distinguished in Helena Parents Comm'n v. Lewis & Clark County Comm'rs, 277 M 367, 922 P2d 1140, 53 St. Rep. 687 (1996).

Injunction: The Supreme Court may under Art. VIII, sec. 3, 1889 Mont. Const., and Rule IV, subdiv. 1, Rules of the Supreme Court of Montana, accept original jurisdiction of a cause (injunction in a matter pertaining to a general election) as necessary and proper to the complete exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, where it would have been impossible, under the ordinary procedure, to litigate the matter in the District Court and thereafter to bring it up by appeal in time to obtain a final decision before the election. State ex rel. Greene v. Anderson, 113 M 582, 129 P2d 874 (1942).

Declaratory Judgment: Where the importance and urgency of the questions presented (in a proceeding under the Uniform Declaratory Judgments Act) are apparent, the Supreme Court may accept original jurisdiction as necessary and proper to the complete exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, under Art. VIII, sec. 3, 1889 Mont. Const., and Rule IV, sec. 1, Rules of the Supreme Court of Montana. Gullickson v. Mitchell, 113 M 359, 126 P2d 1106 (1942).

Mandamus: Where time will not permit trial of a proceeding in mandamus in the District Court and final disposition of the cause on appeal and there are no disputed facts, the Supreme Court will take original jurisdiction when necessary and proper to the complete exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, under Art. VIII, sec. 3, 1889 Mont. Const., and under Rule IV, sec. 1, of its rules. State ex rel. Palagi v. Regan, 113 M 343, 126 P2d 818 (1942).

When Supreme Court Will Take Original Jurisdiction: Supreme Court may assume original jurisdiction and issue a Writ of Injunction under Art. VIII, sec. 3, 1889 Mont. Const., although private rights may be involved as well as those of the public. In protecting the public rights, private rights may incidentally be protected and enforced. Yet the rights of the public—that is, of the state—must be the paramount and moving consideration. Sawyer Stores, Inc. v. Mitchell, 103 M 148, 62 P2d 342 (1936).

After Original Jurisdiction Taken, Attack on Ground of Laches Too Late: After Supreme Court issues order to show cause on application for Writ of Injunction, intervenor may not object to its taking jurisdiction on ground applicant had ample time to obtain relief in District Court. Ford v. Mitchell, 103 M 99, 61 P2d 815 (1936).

Phrase "Necessary or Proper to Complete Exercise": Held, that Supreme Court has original jurisdiction to quo warranto proceeding by Attorney General to oust state Senator appointed during his term to "civil office under the state" (Art. V, sec. 7, 1889 Mont. Const.), the exercise of such jurisdiction not being limited to issuance of writs "necessary or proper to the complete exercise" of the Court's appellate jurisdiction under Art. VIII, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Nagle v. Kelsey, 102 M 8, 55 P2d 685 (1936).

Court to Interpret Legislation: Chapter 149, sec. 6, L. 1935, omitted (authorizing the payment of delinquent taxes in installments), declaring the act should not be construed as a release or postponement of taxes and prescribing the manner of its construction, violates Art. VIII, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const., making it the exclusive province of the courts to construe and interpret legislative acts. State ex rel. DuFresne v. Leslie, 100 M 449, 50 P2d 959 (1935), followed in In re License Revocation of Gildersleeve, 283 M 479, 942 P2d 705, 54 St. Rep. 735 (1997). See also St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999).

Appellate Jurisdiction Only: The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court was limited by Art. VIII, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const., to appellate matters. State ex rel. Lewis & Clark County v. District Court, 90 M 213, 300 P 544 (1931); Willis v. Pilot Butte Min. Co., 58 M 26, 190 P 124 (1920); Helena v. Helena Waterworks Co., 43 M 169, 115 P 200 (1911); Bordeaux v. Bordeaux, 29 M 478, 75 P 359 (1904); In re Weston, 28 M 207, 72 P 512 (1903); State ex rel. Sutton v. District Court, 27 M 128, 69 P 988 (1902); Finlen v. Heinze, 27 M 107, 69 P 829, 70 P 817 (1902); Bordeaux v. Bordeaux, 26 M 533, 69 P 103 (1902); State ex rel. Scharnikow v. Hogan, 24 M 379, 62 P 493 (1900).

Restrictions and Limitations: In the absence of constitutional restriction, the Legislature may grant or take away the right of appeal, and if it grants it, it may prescribe such restrictions and limitations as it may see fit to impose, and having prescribed that an appeal from a final judgment must be taken within 6 months after entry thereof (section 93-8004, R.C.M. 1947, now repealed), the Supreme Court does not acquire jurisdiction of such an appeal unless taken within that time. Kline v. Murray, 79 M 530, 257 P 465 (1927).

Power to Punish for Contempt: The framers of the Montana Constitution recognized, without limiting, the power of the courts to punish for contempt; but they understood the law of contempt to be a law of necessity and its exercise in any given instance to be measured and restricted by the necessity which calls it into existence. State ex rel. Metcalf v. District Court, 52 M 46, 155 P 278 (1916).

Statutory Limitation: While, under the provisions of Art. VIII, sec. 2 and 15, 1889 Mont. Const., all the decisions of District Courts are subject to review by the Supreme Court by some appropriate procedure, causes may be removed to it by appeal only under the limitations and regulations prescribed by statute. Pierson v. Daly, 49 M 478, 143 P 957 (1914).

Court of Review: The purpose of the state Constitution was to establish an exclusive court of review with all the auxiliary powers necessary to the exercise of this jurisdiction, except insofar as it expressly declared otherwise. State ex rel. Helena v. Helena Waterworks Co., 43 M 169, 115 P 200 (1911).

Effectuating Appellate Jurisdiction: Even if a stay, in a case where a Writ of Mandate is issued by the District Court to compel the transfer of a cause from a police to a Justice's Court, is not provided for in the code of civil procedure, still the Supreme Court has power, under Art. VIII, sec. 3, 1889 Mont. Const., to issue a Supersedeas or any other appropriate Writ, to effectuate its appellate jurisdiction, and thus to insure the aggrieved party an appeal which might otherwise be of no value. State ex rel. Brass v. Horn, 36 M 418, 93 P 351 (1908).

Legislative Guidelines: In pursuance of the grant of appellate jurisdiction to the Supreme Court and as furnishing methods for the exercise of the jurisdiction granted, the Legislature has enacted statutes providing how appeals may be taken, determining of what the record on such appeal shall consist, and how such records shall be certified to that court. Substantial compliance with these provisions is necessary to give the Supreme Court the right to exercise the jurisdiction granted. Emerson v. McNair, 28 M 578, 73 P 121 (1903).

Mode of Procedure: Under the last clause of Art. VIII, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const., the Legislature cannot decrease the power granted to the Supreme Court but has power to provide the mode of procedure to be employed, by which and the limitation as to time within which the power granted should be exercised. Featherman v. Granite County, 28 M 462, 72 P 972 (1903); State ex rel. Whiteside v. District Court, 24 M 539, 63 P 395 (1900).

Statutory Compliance Required: Under Art. VIII, sections 2, 3, and 15, 1889 Mont. Const., the Supreme Court had jurisdiction to entertain appeals or Writs of Error only when the statutory requirements have been complied with. Featherman v. Granite County, 28 M 462, 72 P 972 (1903).

Time and Mode of Appeal: The appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court may be exercised only under limitations and regulations prescribed by law touching the time within which and the mode by which appeals may be taken. Cornell v. Matthews, 28 M 457, 72 P 975 (1903).

Final Judgments: The power of limitation given the Legislature does not extend to the right of appeal from final judgments or to the power of the court on such appeals but merely to the time when and within which appeals may be taken, to matters of procedure, and to the extent of relief to be granted on appeals from interlocutory orders. Finlen v. Heinze, 27 M 107, 69 P 829, 70 P 517 (1902).

Certificate of Probable Cause: No appeal lies from a refusal of a District Judge to grant a certificate of probable cause in a criminal case, but a Justice of the Supreme Court can issue such certificate upon such refusal. St. v. Broadbent, 27 M 63, 69 P 323 (1902).

Legislative Power: The words "limitations" and "regulations", as used in Art. VIII, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const., mean restrictions of power and rules of conduct or proceeding. The Legislature has no power to regulate the physical form of the pleadings and instruments to be filed with the Supreme Court, and the act, approved March 9, 1901, providing that transcripts on appeal may be printed or typewritten, at the election of appellant, is invalid. Jordan v. Andrus, 26 M 37, 66 P 502 (1901).

Nature of Appellate and Supervisory Control Jurisdiction: The grant of appellate jurisdiction to the Supreme Court implies all the instrumentalities necessary to make it effective. The provision of Art. VIII, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const., that the Supreme Court "shall have a general supervisory control over all inferior courts", is a distinct and separate grant of jurisdiction, independent of any other power granted. State ex rel. Whiteside v. District Court, 24 M 539, 63 P 395 (1900). See State ex rel. Shores v. District Court, 27 M 349, 71 P 159 (1903).

Scope of Power to Issue Writs in General: The provision of Art. VIII, sec. 3, 1889 Mont. Const., authorizing the Supreme Court in its discretion to issue and to hear and determine the writs therein specified, is a grant of power without limitation or qualification, authorizing such court to issue these writs for whatever purposes they are suitable. State ex rel. Whiteside v. District Court, 24 M 539, 63 P 395 (1900).

SUPERVISORY CONTROL

Prevention of Needless Litigation: Writ of Supervisory Control was properly issued when resisting that action would have resulted in extended and needless litigation. Highway Comm'n v. District Court, 160 M 35, 499 P2d 1228 (1972), explained in Walker v. Tschache, 162 M 213, 510 P2d 9 (1973).

Scope of Power — Dismissal of Removal Petition: Writ of Supervisory Control was necessary and proper to compel District Court to dismiss removal petition that could not be granted even if facts alleged were proved. State ex rel. Arnot v. District Court, 155 M 344, 472 P2d 302 (1970).

Court Determines Requirements — Inappropriate When Appeal Adequate: There are no written laws promulgated or enacted by the lawmaking department of our government prescribing the regulations and limitations governing the issuance of so-called "Writs of Supervisory Control". There being no such provisions, the court has attempted to make its own regulations and limitations as to when such Writ may or may not issue, which regulations and limitations appear to change with each new petition for the "Writ". Supervisory control, invoking the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, is not a substitute for an appeal provided by statute. Original proceedings seeking supervisory control may not be employed to bypass the statutes allowing and requiring timely appeals to the Supreme Court. When the appeal is allowed, such remedy is exclusive and furnishes the only lawful means of review. State ex rel. Reid v. District Court, 126 M 489, 255 P2d 693 (1953).

Writ Issued Only in Extraordinary Circumstances: Supervisory control by Supreme Court is an extraordinary remedy to be exercised only in extraordinary circumstances. To justify such control, an emergency must be shown to exist or it must be shown that a gross injustice would result from a denial, absence of other relief must be shown, and mere inconvenience to a party or delay in final disposition of a cause is insufficient. State ex rel. O'Sullivan v. District Court, 119 M 429, 175 P2d 763 (1946), followed in Potter v. District Court, 266 M 384, 880 P2d 1319, 51 St. Rep. 853 (1994).

Remedy by Appeal Adequate: A Writ of Supervisory Control would not be issued to prevent court from continuing its hearing of quiet title action in which court allegedly made erroneous ruling on defendants' motion to strike when it did not appear that any injustice to defendants could not be corrected by an appeal from the final judgment. State ex rel. Barron v. District Court, 119 M 344, 174 P2d 809 (1946).

Moot Questions: In the exercise of its supervisory control powers the Supreme Court will deal only with such orders and acts of the court as are presently in force, not with moot questions. State ex rel. Gaspar v. District Court, 114 M 216, 133 P2d 767 (1943).

Not Mode of Piecemeal Review: The Writ of Supervisory Control should be seldom used and is not to be used as a convenient short route for consideration or as a means of piecemeal review. State ex rel. Hall v. District Court, 109 M 228, 95 P2d 438 (1939).

Effect of Motion to Quash Contempt Proceeding: When by Writ of Supervisory Control the Supreme Court orders the lower court to certify all the records, including the evidence, to it and relator makes the assertion that there was not evidence showing that he was guilty of contempt, the motion to quash, in effect a demurrer, admits such assertion, and failure to produce the evidence warrants the presumption that there was no evidence to support the finding of guilt. State ex rel. Floch v. District Court, 107 M 185, 81 P2d 692 (1938).

Emergency — Inability to Furnish Bond: Generally the extraordinary remedy by Writ of Supervisory Control is not available unless an emergency exists warranting immediate action under the Writ. Otherwise the remedy by appeal is adequate. State ex rel. Nelson v. District Court, 107 M 167, 81 P2d 699 (1938).

Properly Granted: Writ of Supervisory Control was properly granted. State ex rel. Duckworth v. District Court, 107 M 97, 80 P2d 367 (1938); State ex rel. Shores v. District Court, 27 M 349, 71 P 159 (1903); State ex rel. Anaconda Copper Min. Co. v. District Court, 25 M 504, 65 P 1020 (1901).

When Writ Does Not Lie: While an exigency may arise in the course of a proceeding which will justify the exercise of this extraordinary power to correct a manifest wrong resulting from an erroneous ruling upon an intermediate question arising in the course of litigation, the Writ does not lie to review every alleged erroneous ruling upon intermediate questions arising during the course of litigation and which may properly be reviewed on appeal from the final judgment. State ex rel. Haynes v. District Court, 105 M 89, 70 P2d 440 (1937).

Treated as Application for Writ of Prohibition: When a petition for a Writ of Supervisory Control (a Writ which lies only where the lower tribunal has committed error within jurisdiction) also prays for any other appropriate relief and it appears that the court has acted without or in excess of jurisdiction, the Supreme Court will treat the petition as one for a Writ of Prohibition. State ex rel. Stewart v. District Court, 103 M 487, 63 P2d 141 (1936).

Employed to Correct Error: The "supervisory writ" evolved by the Supreme Court as a necessary consequence of Art. VIII, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const., and 3-1-113 is employed to correct error within jurisdiction, independent of either the appellate or original jurisdiction declared in Art. VIII, and is not to be confused with the original writs therein authorized. State ex rel. Regis v. District Court, 102 M 74, 55 P2d 1295 (1936).

When Writ Appropriate:

The Writ of Supervisory Control lies to prevent a failure of justice through arbitrary and unlawful action by the court when there is no right of appeal or other adequate remedy and the case is exigent. State ex rel. Finley v. District Court, 99 M 200, 43 P2d 682 (1935); State ex rel. Thelen v. District Court, 93 M 149, 17 P2d 57 (1932).

The Supreme Court has jurisdiction to issue its supervisory writ to prevent a failure of justice where the court, while acting within jurisdiction, has committed manifest error and gross injustice is threatened by reason of action so arbitrary, unlawful, and in disregard of the rights of a litigant as to be tyrannical and no other adequate remedy is available to relator. State ex rel. Middleton v. District Court, 85 M 215, 278 P 122 (1929).

Time for Application: If application is made within a reasonable time, it should be considered timely against the objection of laches. The question of timeliness is determined case by case. State ex rel. Thelen v. District Court, 93 M 149, 17 P2d 57 (1932).

Litigant Not to Answer Writ: The Writ of Supervisory Control runs to inferior courts, not litigants or private individuals. Therefore, an answer by a party to the action of which the petition for the Writ arises, in addition to the return made by the respondent court, has no place in the proceeding. State ex rel. Spinazza v. District Court, 83 M 511, 273 P 638 (1929).

Review of Judgment in Contempt: The only way in which one adjudged guilty of contempt may have the proceedings reviewed by the Supreme Court under Art. VIII, sec. 3, 1889 Mont. Const., is by invoking the Writ of Review, or in a proper case, the Writ of Supervisory Control. State ex rel. Burns v. District Court, 83 M 200, 271 P 439 (1928).

Purpose: The supervisory power of the Supreme Court granted by Art. VIII, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const., was designed to control summarily the course of litigation in the inferior courts and prevent injustice being done through a mistake of law or a willful disregard of it. The power applies when there is no appeal from the erroneous action or, being an appeal, the relief obtained thereby would be inadequate. State ex rel. Helena v. Helena Waterworks Co., 43 M 169, 115 P 200 (1911).

Power Extends Only Over Inferior Courts: The power of supervisory control is lodged in the Supreme Court sitting as an organized judicial body, and such power operates only upon inferior courts. It cannot extend to or affect any other body or any individual or individuals. In re Weston, 28 M 207, 72 P 512 (1903).

Function of Supervisory Power: One of the functions of the supervisory power of the Supreme Court is to control the course of litigation in the inferior courts, where those courts are proceeding within their jurisdiction but by a mistake of law or willful disregard of it are doing a gross injustice and there is no appeal or the remedy by appeal is inadequate. State ex rel. Shores v. District Court, 27 M 349, 71 P 159 (1903); State ex rel. Whiteside v. District Court, 24 M 539, 63 P 395 (1900).

Contempt Judgment: If section provides that the judgment in a case of contempt is final and conclusive and there is no appeal, except that the action of a District Court can be reviewed on a Writ of Certiorari by the Supreme Court, it violates the provision of Art. VIII, sec. 2, 1889 Mont. Const., giving the Supreme Court a general supervisory control over all inferior courts under such regulations and limitations as may be prescribed by statute. A Writ of Supervisory Control was the only means by which the question whether there is evidence to support a judgment of contempt can be determined. State ex rel. Sutton v. District Court, 27 M 128, 69 P 988 (1902).

Nature of Power: The power of supervisory control is a distinct power and may be exercised to control the discretion of an inferior court in making an order from which no appeal would lie and for which the writs appertaining to the appellate jurisdiction furnish no remedy. State ex rel. Anaconda Copper Min. Co. v. District Court, 25 M 504, 65 P 1020 (1901).

Judgment on Pleadings: A Writ of Supervisory Control will not be granted to command a District Court to sustain a motion for judgment on the pleadings, since the party has a remedy if he should finally be defeated in the action. State ex rel. Moore v. District Court, 25 M 31, 63 P 686 (1901).

Power to Issue Writ of Prohibition: The fact that the Constitution gives the Supreme Court supervisory control over inferior courts does not authorize it to grant a Writ of Prohibition, prohibiting a District Court from appointing a receiver of a corporation, merely to avert probable injury to the applicants for the Writ. State ex rel. Boston & Mont. Consol. Copper & Silver Min. Co. v. District Court, 22 M 220, 56 P 219 (1899).

HABEAS CORPUS

Powers of Individual Justices: The different Justices are clothed with power to issue, hear, and determine Writs of Habeas Corpus and also Writs of Certiorari to review proceedings for contempt in the District Courts, but these powers are conferred upon the Justices individually. State ex rel. Helena v. Helena Waterworks Co., 43 M 169, 115 P 200 (1911).

Actual Custody Required: An application for a Writ of Habeas Corpus will be dismissed if it appears that the petitioner is not "held in actual custody". In re O'Brien, 29 M 530, 75 P 196 (1904).

CERTIORARI

Submission of Record: The only method by which a convicted contemnor may submit a record of conviction to the appellate court for review is by invoking the Writ of Certiorari, or in proper cases, under the general supervisory power vested in the Supreme Court. State ex rel. Rankin v. District Court, 58 M 276, 191 P 772 (1920).

Defined in Jurisprudence: The framers of the Montana Constitution, in referring to the Writ of Certiorari, contemplated that proceeding as defined in our jurisprudence, as to its office and the conditions under which it may be invoked. In re Finkelstein, 13 M 425, 34 P 847 (1893); In re MacKnight, 11 M 126, 27 P 336 (1891).

Scope: The scope of the Writ of Certiorari is not enlarged by Art. VIII, sec. 3, 1889 Mont. Const., so as to permit a review by the Supreme Court of an order of the District Court for the payment of alimony where imprisonment for contempt is involved, notwithstanding the relator had a remedy by appeal from such an order. In re Finkelstein, 13 M 425, 34 P 847 (1893).

No Restriction on Issuance: Article VIII, sec. 3, 1889 Mont. Const., cannot be construed to restrict the Supreme Court to the use of a Writ of Certiorari in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction only, as the clause "necessary and proper to complete exercise of its appellate jurisdiction" relates to "such other original and remedial writs" and not to the writs specifically named therein. In re MacKnight, 11 M 126, 27 P 336 (1891).

WRIT OF PROHIBITION

Nature of Writ: Among the devices prescribed for the exercise by the Supreme Court of its power and jurisdiction to superintend and control proceedings in the courts is the ancient Writ of Prohibition for which the Legislature has made provision. State ex rel. Middlemas v. District Court, 130 M 73, 295 P2d 233 (1956); State ex rel. Scharnikow v. Hogan, 24 M 379, 62 P 493 (1900).

End Litigation — Save Expense: The Writ of Prohibition may be issued to end litigation and save expense. Supreme Court had jurisdiction to grant Writ of Prohibition to prevent payment of grand jury illegally in session. State ex rel. Adami v. Lewis & Clark County, 124 M 282, 220 P2d 1052 (1950).

Authority to Review Action of District Court: Refusal of court to set aside indictments may be reviewed by Supreme Court on Writ of Prohibition. State ex rel. Porter v. District Court, 124 M 249, 220 P2d 1035 (1950).

INJUNCTIONS

Prerogative Writ: The Writ of Injunction is a jurisdictional, prerogative writ, correlative with the Writ of Mandamus; the Writ of Injunction, used as a judicial writ in aid of jurisdiction and not as a prerogative writ, is one of the writs classed with "other original and remedial writs". Finlen v. Heinze, 27 M 107, 69 P 829, 70 P 517 (1902).

Pending Appeal: The Supreme Court is not authorized to suspend the operation of, vacate, or set aside a prohibitory injunction order restraining parties from entering or mining in a lode claim during the pendency of an appeal therefrom. Maloney v. King, 26 M 487, 68 P 1012 (1902).

Equity Arm: Under the constitutional grant of original jurisdiction to the Supreme Court, the Writ of Injunction is the equity arm of the Court's original jurisdiction, and it, with the other writs granted, fully equip the Court as a court of first resort on all judicial questions affecting the sovereignty of the state, its franchises or prerogatives, or the liberties of the people. The Writ is made correlative with that of mandamus, and thus it may be resorted to to restrain excess, just as the Writ of Mandamus may be used in the same class of cases to compel action and supply defects. State ex rel. Clarke v. Moran, 24 M 433, 63 P 390 (1900).

Attorney General's Opinions

Chief Water Judge Not Subject to State Leave Policies — Executive Branch Not to Supervise Judicial Branch: Although the Chief Water Judge is appointed and not elected, the Chief Water Judge is a judicial officer and is not subject to the vacation leave policies of the Department of Administration. This interpretation of the statutes is also required by the application of the separation of powers clause of the Montana Constitution. To hold otherwise would subject a judicial officer to control by the Executive Branch of state government and not to the control of the Montana Supreme Court or the Judicial Standards Commission. 48 A.G. Op. 2 (1999).

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

Obligations of Trustee to Beneficiary: A prejudgment Writ of Attachment brought by an auto dealer against a property division settlement in a marital dissolution was vacated by the Supreme Court upon finding that the attorney for the auto dealer was also the attorney for the husband making payments. The court held that when the attorney received money as trustee in satisfaction of the husband's contractual obligations to the wife, the attorney was bound to act in good faith toward the wife as beneficiary. The attorney was prohibited from dealing with the trust property for any purpose not connected with the trust. Pursuant to his duty under Rule 1.15 of the Rules of Professional Conduct, the attorney was required to promptly deliver the money to the wife, even though he had fully disclosed his relationship to both the husband and the auto dealer. The attorney was directed to pay over the full trust amount, plus interest, to the wife. Wild W. Motors, Inc. v. Lingle, 224 M 76, 728 P2d 412, 43 St. Rep. 2030 (1986).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Reversal — Majority Need Not Agree as to Particular Errors: When three of the Justices of the Supreme Court, a majority, are of opinion that the trial court committed error resulting in denial of a fair trial to defendant but are unable to agree as to any one of the grounds urged by him in his assignment of errors being sufficient to warrant a reversal of the judgment, a retrial will be ordered. Under such circumstances it is immaterial that the majority do not agree as to any particular error set forth in his assignment. The real question was whether or not defendant had a fair trial. ORIGINAL JURISDICTION

Subject Matter Jurisdiction Challenged — Venue, Not Jurisdiction, Conferred by Cited Statute — Venue Proper: The defendant purchased a fifth-wheel trailer from an RV dealership located in Billings. The dealership's principal corporate office was located in Bozeman. The plaintiff, a financial company, financed the trailer's purchase. The RV dealership delivered the trailer to the defendant's home in Fort Benton, in Chouteau County. After the defendant later defaulted on her loan, the plaintiff filed a claim in Chouteau County. The defendant filed her answer, as well as a third-party complaint against the dealership for negligence and violations of the Montana Consumer Protection Act. The third-party defendant filed a motion for judgment on the pleadings because the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction over the consumer protection claim pursuant to 30-14-133. Following denial of the motion, the third-party defendant appealed to the Supreme Court, which affirmed. The court held that 30-14-133 confers not jurisdiction but venue and that venue was proper in Chouteau County. Ally Financial, Inc., v. Stevenson, 2017 MT 190, 388 Mont. 246, 399 P.3d 899.

Ohio Law Governs Employment Contract Claim — Subject Matter Jurisdiction Not Necessarily Precluded — Reversed to Consider Application of Doctrine Forum Non Conveniens: The plaintiff was an Ohio resident who worked for the defendant, a company whose principal place of business was Montana. After he was terminated, the plaintiff filed a wrongful discharge suit against the defendant in Montana. The defendant filed a motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, which the District Court granted. On appeal, the Supreme Court ruled that although the District Court correctly ruled that Ohio law governed the plaintiff's employment contract claim, it erred in concluding that it therefore lacked subject matter jurisdiction over the claim. The Supreme Court also concluded that, based on the record, it could not determine whether an alternative forum was available for the plaintiff's claim, and therefore vacated the District Court's dismissal and remanded for consideration of whether dismissal under the doctrine of forum non conveniens was appropriate. Harrington v. Energy West, Inc., 2015 MT 233, 380 Mont. 298, 356 P.3d 441.

Appeal in Commissioner of Political Practices Enforcement Action Premature — Dismissal for Lack of Subject Matter Jurisdiction Proper: In a Commissioner of Political Practices enforcement action, the defendant's motion to dismiss the enforcement action in the First Judicial District Court, Lewis and Clark County, for lack of subject matter jurisdiction was properly denied. Section 13-37-113, which allows for prosecutions in the county in which the violation occurred or in Lewis and Clark County, clearly conferred subject matter jurisdiction on the District Court. Because the issue at bar was not one of subject matter jurisdiction but, rather, was an issue of statutory interpretation, the Supreme Court determined that the defendant's appeal must be characterized as one seeking relief from the denial of a motion to dismiss, which is not appealable, and dismissed the appeal as premature. Comm'r of Political Practices v. Bannan, 2015 MT 220, 380 Mont. 194, 354 P.3d 601.

Mootness in Award of Attorney Fees: Plaintiffs sued the subdivision property owners over amendments to the covenants. Prior to trial, all but one of the subdivision property owners settled with the plaintiffs. The settlement included executing new covenants, making the remaining lawsuit moot. The District Court then ruled against the remaining defendant and awarded attorney fees. The Supreme Court held that because the issue was moot, it would not review the District Court's ruling and award of reasonable fees. Houden v. Todd, 2014 MT 113, 375 Mont. 1, 324 P.3d 1157.

Referendum — Issues Addressed Prior to Election Ballot — Justiciable Controversy: Legislative Referendum 123 (LR-123) was enacted by the Legislature in 2011 and was set to appear on the November 2012 general election ballot. The plaintiffs challenged the constitutionality of the referendum before it appeared on the ballot, and the Secretary of State claimed the challenge was not ripe and justiciable. The Supreme Court determined the constitutional issues could be raised and that a present case or controversy existed. In determining that the case could go forward, the Supreme Court reasoned that ripeness has both a constitutional dimension based on the case or controversy requirement and a prudential dimension that weighs the fitness of the issues for judicial decision and the hardship to the parties of withholding a decision. The issues were definite and concrete, and given the time and money involved, there was no prudential reason for allowing the election on LR-123 to proceed prior to addressing the constitutional issues. MEA-MFT v. McCulloch, 2012 MT 211, 366 Mont. 266, 291 P.3d 1075.

Personal Jurisdiction Over Nonresident Business — Exercise of Long-Arm Jurisdiction Proper: The nonresident defendant business conducted sufficient business in Montana to support the extension of long-arm jurisdiction over the defendant when the defendant knew that the plaintiff intended to use the defendant's product in its Montana business, the defendant had previously sold its product to the plaintiff, and the defendant had serviced its product through other Montana businesses. Further, because the defendant purposefully availed itself of the privilege of conducting business in Montana, resulting in the plaintiff's alleged injury in Montana, and because the defendant reasonably could have anticipated defending itself in Montana, Montana's exercise of personal jurisdiction over the defendant comported with due process. Grizzly Sec. Armored Express, Inc. v. The Armored Group, LLC, 2011 MT 128, 360 Mont. 517, 255 P.3d 143.

Jurisdiction Conferred on District Court When Acts of Stalking Committed Partly Within State: The District Court had jurisdiction over a petition for a temporary order of protection because the petition alleged that acts of stalking were committed partly within Montana. There is no statutory requirement under 40-15-102 or 45-5-220 that repeated acts of stalking must occur in Montana in order to confer jurisdiction on the District Court. Jordan v. Kalin, 2011 MT 142, 361 Mont. 50, 256 P.3d 909.

Analysis for Jurisdiction of District Court Over Tribal Member and Tribal Property: The correct analysis in both regulatory and adjudicatory actions involving tribal members or lands is whether the exercise of jurisdiction by a state court or regulatory body is preempted by federal law or, if not, whether it infringes on tribal self-government. If either element is met, a state may not assume civil jurisdiction or take regulatory action over Indian people or their territories within the boundaries of their reservations. In re Estate of Big Spring, 2011 MT 109, 360 Mont. 370, 255 P.3d 121, overruling Iron Bear v. District Court, 162 Mont. 335, 512 P.2d 1292 (1973), in its entirety and In re Marriage of Skillen, 1998 MT 43, 287 Mont. 399, 956 P.2d 1, in part and overruling numerous cases to the extent they followed the principles of Iron Bear or Skillen.

No Subject Matter Jurisdiction for District Court in Probate for Tribal Member — Jurisdiction Presumptively With Tribal Court — Proceedings Before District Court Void: The District Court erred when it assumed subject matter jurisdiction over the probate of an enrolled Blackfeet Tribal member's estate when all of the decedent's estate property was located within the exterior boundaries of the Blackfeet Reservation. The Supreme Court overruled Iron Bear and held that civil jurisdiction over non-Indians and Indians on reservation lands presumptively lies in the tribal court. Absent express congressional limitation, the tribe maintained sovereign power and exclusive jurisdiction over the probate of the decedent. A state court has an independent obligation to determine whether it has jurisdiction in a case involving an Indian person and Indian Country. The court declared void the 7 years of proceedings before the District Court with reference to the decedent's estate. In re Estate of Big Spring, 2011 MT 109, 360 Mont. 370, 255 P.3d 121, overruling Iron Bear v. District Court, 162 Mont. 335, 512 P.2d 1292 (1973), in its entirety and In re Marriage of Skillen, 1998 MT 43, 287 Mont. 399, 956 P.2d 1, in part and overruling numerous cases to the extent they followed the principles of Iron Bear or Skillen.

Jurisdiction of Montana Courts Over Tribal Member: Montana courts have jurisdiction over a tribal member whose actions involve significant contacts with the state outside reservation boundaries. The Judicial Standards Committee and state courts have jurisdiction over a tribal member who is a justice of the peace and who runs for tribal office. Judicial Standards Comm'n v. Not Afraid, 2010 MT 285, 358 Mont. 532, 245 P.3d 1116.

Medical Negligence — Right of Tribal Member to Pursue State Court Action Against Nontribal Member — State Court Jurisdiction: The plaintiff alleged medical negligence against a medical clinic that cared for the plaintiff's husband, who was a member of the Confederated Salish and Kootenai Tribes. The plaintiff was not a tribal member, the clinic was not affiliated with a tribe, and the acts took place both on and off the reservation. The District Court held that state courts do not have jurisdiction on the Confederated Salish and Kootenai Reservation over actions for medical negligence. The plaintiff appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. The court noted that it is well established under both state and federal law that tribal members may bring civil actions against nontribal members in state court, and that tribal autonomy and self-government are not impeded when a state allows an Indian to seek relief in state court against a non-Indian for a claim arising in Indian country. This right of access to courts applies to residents of each Montana Indian reservation. Therefore, the plaintiff was not precluded from bringing the medical negligence action in state court and the state court had jurisdiction to hear the case. Morigeau v. Gorman, 2010 MT 36, 355 Mont. 225, 225 P.3d 1260. See also State ex rel. Iron Bear v. District Court, 162 Mont. 335, 512 P.2d 1292 (1973), and Three Affiliated Tribes of the Fort Berthold Reservation v. Wold Eng'r, 476 US 877 (1986).

Original Court Jurisdiction Over Partner or Family Member Assault Charges, Misdemeanor or Felony: District Courts have original jurisdiction over felony partner or family member assault charges. District Courts and Justices' Courts have concurrent jurisdiction over misdemeanor partner or family member assault charges. St. v. Martz, 2008 MT 382, 347 M 47, 196 P3d 1239 (2008).

Change of Place of Trial — Jurisdiction Retained by Original Court: When the location of a criminal trial is changed, the court in which the proceeding is commenced ordinarily retains jurisdiction. However, a City Court Judge may call in a substitute judge to act in the original judge's place. Three Forks v. Schillinger, 2007 MT 331, 340 M 211, 173 P3d 681 (2007).

District Court's Subject Matter Jurisdiction Not Affected by Party's Lack of Standing — Appeal of Board of Adjustment Decision: Defendants asserted that the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction over them because plaintiffs failed to establish standing to challenge a boundary line relocation. The Supreme Court disagreed. Defendants mistakenly linked the requirement that a court have subject matter jurisdiction with the requirement that a plaintiff have standing to sue. Both are required, but they are not interdependent. Subject matter jurisdiction refers to a court's power to hear a particular type of case, while standing refers to the threshold justiciability requirement that a plaintiff have a personal stake in a particular case. If a plaintiff lacks standing, a court can grant no relief because a justiciable controversy does not exist, but a party's lack of standing does not deprive a District Court of subject matter jurisdiction. A court lacks the power to resolve a case brought by a party without standing because that party can present no actual case or controversy, not because the court has been stripped of subject matter jurisdiction. Here, the District Court had statutory subject matter jurisdiction under 76-2-327 to hear the boundary line appeal of the City Board of Adjustment decision and determined that plaintiffs had standing to challenge the boundary relocation. Even though defendants stylized the appeal as a subject matter jurisdiction issue, which may be appealed by interlocutory appeal prior to final judgment, the actual issue was the District Court's ruling on plaintiffs' standing, which the Supreme Court will not review prior to final judgment. Defendants' appeal was therefore premature, so the Supreme Court dismissed the appeal and remanded for further proceedings. Ballas v. Missoula City Bd. of Adjustment, 2007 MT 299, 340 M 56, 172 P3d 1232 (2007).

No Challenge to Legality of Sentence on Direct Appeal — Postconviction Relief Barred: Hardin claimed in a petition for postconviction relief that the District Court lacked jurisdiction to accept a nolo contendere plea to a sexual offense because such a plea is prohibited under 46-12-204. The petition was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Hardin failed to challenge the legality of the sentence on direct appeal, so the claim was procedurally barred by 46-21-105 from postconviction relief. Hardin v. St., 2006 MT 272, 334 M 204, 146 P3d 746 (2006).

Standing of Person in Zoning District to Bring Action Against Developer of Condominiums in Same District: To establish standing to bring suit, a complaining party must clearly allege past, present, or threatened injury to a property right or a civil right that is distinguishable from an injury to the public generally. Thus, a property owner who lived in the same zoning district as a proposed condominium development and who would be directly affected by a subdivision review or the lack of a subdivision review had standing to challenge the development. Shults v.

Liberty Cove, Inc., 2006 MT 247, 334 M 70, 146 P3d 710 (2006), following Fleenor v. Darby School District, 2006 MT 31, 331 M 124, 128 P3d 1048 (2006). Fleenor was overruled in Schoof v. Nesbit, 2014 MT 6, 373 Mont. 226, 316 P.3d 831, to the extent Fleenor requires a plaintiff in a right to know or right to participate case to allege an injury beyond failure to receive notice or to allege a personal stake in a particular governmental decision for purposes of establishing standing to pursue a claim.

District Court Jurisdiction Over Grandparent-Grandchild Contact Proceedings: In the case of a petition for grandparent-grandchild contact brought under Title 40, ch. 9, the District Court retains jurisdiction to hear the petition and to issue a ruling on it. In re Grandparent-Grandchild Contact of Stewart v. Evans, 2006 MT 102, 332 M 148, 136 P3d 524 (2006).

District Court Retention of Criminal Jurisdiction — State's Appeal of Order Granting Driving Privileges Not Timely: A condition of Jivelekas's sentence for felony DUI and misdemeanor driving with a revoked or suspended license provided that Jivelekas could not drive unless approval was granted by the sentencing court or Jivelekas's supervising officer. Nearly 2 years after Jivelekas completed all terms of his sentence, he asked the District Court for approval to operate a motor vehicle in order to maintain full-time employment. The state contended that because 61-8-731 required that Jivelekas's probation officer authorize motor vehicle operation, the District Court did not have jurisdiction to consider Jivelekas's motion. The Supreme Court disagreed. Even if the District Court exceeded its statutory authority in imposing the sentence condition, the court still retained jurisdiction to entertain Jivelekas's motion. Additionally, the Supreme Court was precluded from addressing the merits of the state's argument because the state failed to file a timely appeal pursuant to former Rule 5(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), so the appeal was time-barred. St. v. Jivelekas, 2005 MT 277, 329 M 204, 122 P3d 1248 (2005), following Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004).

Claim of Illegal Sentence Based on Lack of Jurisdiction to Be Raised on Direct Appeal, Not Postconviction Petition — Pena Applied: Camarillo was a minor when he was convicted in 1999 of deliberate homicide, robbery, and aggravated burglary and sentenced as an adult offender to 70 years in the state prison. The case was filed directly in District Court rather than Youth Court, as allowed under 41-5-206. Camarillo filed a petition for postconviction relief in 2003, claiming that the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction. The state responded that the claims could have been raised on direct appeal, and the District Court agreed and dismissed the petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that the District Court properly exercised jurisdiction under this section, so Camarillo's jurisdiction argument failed. The court then applied Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004), and held that the issues that Camarillo attempted to raise in the petition for postconviction relief could have been but were not raised on direct appeal and, pursuant to 46-21-105, could not be brought in the petition for postconviction relief. In addition, under 46-21-102, petitions for postconviction relief must be filed within 1 year of final judgment. Camarillo's petition was not filed until more than 3 years after judgment and thus was untimely. The District Court was affirmed. Camarillo v. St., 2005 MT 29, 326 M 35, 107 P3d 1265 (2005).

Lack of Membership in Homeowners' Association — Insufficient Standing to Sue Association — Lack of District Court Jurisdiction Affirmed: Edwards and other plaintiffs sued Burke and others for allegedly illegal fencing of tract 3, property commonly owned by a homeowners' association. The District Court dismissed the suit for lack of jurisdiction, ruling that Edwards was not a member of the homeowners' association, had no ownership interest in tract 3, and therefore had no standing to bring the action. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that in as much as Edwards was not a tenant in common with the members of Burke's homeowners' association, he had no standing to sue. The Supreme Court, citing Rehder v. Rankin, 91 NW 2d 399 (Iowa 1958), and in part following and in part distinguishing Winchell v. Dept. of State Lands, 262 M 328, 865 P2d 249 (1993), which held that because an unincorporated association cannot hold property, the members of the association hold the property in place of the association, said, in dicta, that the association could not hold title to the tract 3 common property. However, the Supreme Court said that whether the association or members of the association owned the property made no difference because Edwards was not even a member of the homeowners' association. Although Edwards argued that he now owns land that would have made him a member of the association, his ownership interest in the common property at issue in the case is, according to the Rehder decision, only one of beneficial ownership caused by his potential membership in the homeowners' association, and he still was not a member of the association or, if ever a member, was divested of his membership when the association's articles changed. Without a sufficient interest in the association's common property by virtue of association membership, Edwards had no standing to bring the action regarding fencing of the common property, and the District Court therefore had no jurisdiction over the action. Edwards v. Burke, 2004 MT 350, 324 M 358, 102 P3d 1271 (2004).

No Continuing District Court Jurisdiction to Review Original Sentence and Resentence on Original Charge: Evert was sentenced to 65 years in prison with 15 years suspended for sexual assault. About 5 years into the sentence, Evert petitioned pro se for postconviction relief, alleging numerous claims related to his guilty plea and sentencing, but no hearing was held. Following appointment of two different public defenders, the District Court was notified that the parties had reached an agreement on Evert's petition. In exchange for a new sentence, Evert agreed to withdraw the petition, waive the right to appeal the amended sentence, and waive the right to file any further postconviction petitions based on the new sentence. The District Court agreed to the stipulation, noted Evert's criminal history and progress in prison, and resentenced Evert to 60 years with 20 years suspended, with credit for time served. Evert then appealed the new sentence on grounds that the District Court mistakenly described Evert's eligibility for parole and that because the court did not correctly advise him, he did not fully understand the consequences of waiving his postconviction claims. The Supreme Court reversed because the District Court did not have continuing jurisdiction to resentence Evert after final judgment. Under 46-18-117, the District Court could modify or correct an erroneous sentence but had no authority to resentence Evert on the original charge. Therefore, Evert's original sentence was reinstated, the postconviction claims that Evert waived were also reinstated, and the case was remanded for consideration of the postconviction claims. St. v. Evert, 2004 MT 178, 322 M 105, 93 P3d 1254 (2004), following Gilbert v. St., 2002 MT 258, 312 M 189, 59 P3d 24 (2002), and Vannatta v. Boulds, 2003 MT 343, 318 M 472, 81 P3d 480 (2003).

Jurisdiction of Montana Courts Over Wrongful Discharge Case Involving Montana Citizen When Montana Law Applies — Dismissal for Lack of Jurisdiction Reversed: Plaintiff was a Montana resident hired by a Florida corporation, which was operated out of Oklahoma, to lay fiber optic cable throughout the country. While working in Indiana, plaintiff had a dispute with a supervisor and was fired. Plaintiff brought an action in Montana, claiming a violation of the Wrongful Discharge From Employment Act. The District Court held that under 39-2-912, the Montana courts lacked subject matter jurisdiction and dismissed the claim. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. Even though plaintiff never signed a written employment contract, the court held that a contract provision may be broad enough to indicate that an entire contract be governed by the laws of the state governing the particular provision. The fact that the defendant corporation paid income taxes, unemployment insurance premiums, and wages in Montana indicated an intent to be governed by Montana law. The court also concluded that under sections 187 and 188 of Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws (1971), the local law of the state with the most significant relationship to the transaction applies to questions of contract interpretation absent an effective choice of law by the parties. Plaintiff was considered a Montana resident despite the fact that employment required travel to other states, and the court concluded that it was appropriate to apply the Wrongful Discharge From Employment Act to the case even though the Act does not expressly provide for extraterritorial jurisdiction. Montana courts have subject matter jurisdiction in cases involving a Montana resident when Montana law applies, so plaintiff's case should not have been dismissed for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. No Authority of Courts to Expunge Criminal Records Absent Statutory Authorization: Montana courts have jurisdiction to expunge criminal records pursuant to statute, but absent explicit legislative authorization, courts have no inherent power to expunge criminal records. St. v. Chesley, 2004 MT 165, 322 M 26, 92 P3d 1212 (2004).

District Court Authority to Determine Constitutionality of Proposed County Ordinance: In 1994, Ravalli County voters passed three ordinances, seeking to control obscenity and the display and distribution of obscene material to minors. The ordinances were subsequently held unconstitutional, but in 2002, defendant again filed two proposed ordinances with the Ravalli County Clerk and Recorder, seeking to proscribe the same conduct. The county asked the District Court to rule on the constitutionality of the proposed ordinances pursuant to 7-5-135, but the court declined on grounds that: (1) the proposed ordinances were legislative rather than administrative and therefore valid under the Montana Constitution; (2) 7-5-135 did not vest a District Court with jurisdiction to determine the constitutionality of an ordinance prior to adoption; (3) a suit is not a method by which a party may have a District Court prematurely consider the constitutionality of the subject matter of a proposed initiative or referendum prior to placement of the measure on the ballot; (4) ruling on a proposed ordinance would force the court to issue an advisory opinion on constitutionality in the absence of any defined basis for a constitutional attack; and (5) under Hardy v. Progressive Specialty Ins. Co., 2003 MT 85, 315 M 107, 67 P3d 892 (2003), a preliminary ruling would allow the county to avoid the burden of showing the unconstitutionality of a legislative enactment beyond a reasonable doubt. The county appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. The burden of proof requirement articulated in Hardy applies to constitutional challenges to existing statutes, not to proposed initiatives and referenda. Although the constitutionality of an enacted legislative statute is prima facie presumed, there is no presumption of validity of a proposed statute. Under the plain meaning of 7-5-135, a District Court must, after conducting any appropriate briefing and factfinding, determine whether a proposed ordinance would be constitutional and valid if passed. The case was remanded for substantive District Court review of the proposed ordinances. Ravalli County v. Erickson, 2004 MT 35, 320 M 31, 85 P3d 772 (2004).

Sufficient Allegations for Pursuit of State Claim for Violation of Federal Wage Standards Absent Remedy Under Federal Davis-Bacon Act: Plaintiff construction workers on a public works project brought a state action against a school district for alleged violation of wage standards established by the federal Davis-Bacon Act. The District Court held that before the workers could maintain a private cause of action in state court, the four-part test in St. Medical Oxygen & Supply, Inc. v. Am. Medical Oxygen Co., 230 M 456, 750 P2d 1085 (1988), must be met. The first prong requires a showing that the Davis-Bacon Act created a federal right in favor of plaintiffs. The District Court held that it did but then found that because there was no indication in the Act that Congress intended to create a remedy against the owner of the project and that implying such a remedy was inconsistent with the Act, a state action could not be maintained. The Supreme Court disagreed and reversed. Absent both a federal wage provision and a federal contracting party, the workers could invoke no federal regulatory remedy under 40 U.S.C. 3142(a), so a state court action was logical for pursuit of a remedy. Because the workers were not seeking a remedy under the Act, analysis under St. Medical Oxygen was unnecessary and inappropriate. The allegations in the workers' state claim were sufficient to survive the school district's claim for dismissal and to vest the District Court with subject matter jurisdiction, so the case was remanded to allow the workers to proceed with their negligence and breach of contract action against the school district. Herrmann v. Wolf Point School District, 2004 MT 10, 319 M 231, 84 P3d 20 (2004). See also Favel v. Am. Renovation & Constr. Co., 2002 MT 266, 312 M 285, 59 P3d 412 (2002).

Common-Law Recognition and Sovereignty of Little Shell Tribe — Suit Against Tribal Officials Barred: Plaintiffs were candidates in an election of the Little Shell Tribe of Indians and sued in Montana District Court for tort damages and injunctive relief against the incumbent candidates, claiming that plaintiffs had won the election. The District Court dismissed on grounds of lack of jurisdiction, and plaintiffs appealed. The Supreme Court noted that the tribe had been pursuing federal tribal recognition since the 1930s, but as yet, the tribe is not recognized by the federal government. Nevertheless, Montoya v. U.S., 180 US 261 (1901), establishes criteria for common-law recognition of a tribe. The court examined the Montoya criteria and held that the Little Shell Tribe satisfied each element of the test for common-law recognition, so the tribe is entitled to sovereignty. Tribal members are of the same or similar race, are united in a community, exist under one leadership or government, and inhabit a particular though sometimes ill-defined territory. Further, under Santa Clara Pueblo v. Martinez, 436 US 49 (1978), Indian tribes and their officials enjoy sovereign immunity from suit unless expressly limited by Congress. Thus, because the tribal officials in this case were acting in their official capacities, suit against them in state court was barred under the doctrine of sovereign immunity. Dismissal of the action by the District Court for lack of jurisdiction was affirmed. Koke v. Little Shell Tribe of Chippewa Indians of Mont., Inc., 2003 MT 121, 315 M 510, 68 P3d 814 (2003).

Error in Montana Court's Declination of Jurisdiction to Washington Court — Inconvenient Forum: Following several incidents of partner abuse over the years, the mother moved to Washington state and then requested that the Montana court decline jurisdiction as an inconvenient forum in order to allow the Washington court to assume jurisdiction. The request was denied, and the mother appealed. Under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act, a Montana court has jurisdiction to make child custody determinations if Montana is the child's home state, as defined in 40-7-103, and Montana will continue to have exclusive continuing jurisdiction unless the Montana court declines to exercise its jurisdiction. In this case, the parties conceded that Montana was the home state. Jurisdiction may be declined at any time if the Montana court determines that it is an inconvenient forum and that a court of another state is a more appropriate forum to make custody determinations. The factors in 40-7-108 must be considered when evaluating a motion to decline jurisdiction, and the Act places domestic violence at the top of the list of factors to be considered. Although this factor alone is not dispositive, the Supreme Court held that, given the high propensity for recidivism in domestic violence, when a court finds that partner abuse or child abuse has occurred or that a party has fled Montana to avoid further violence or abuse, the court is authorized to consider whether the party and the child might be better protected if further custody proceedings are held in another state. Here, the District Court abused its discretion by failing to consider which forum would best protect the mother and children. The Supreme Court then went on to discuss the other statutory factors and concluded that the protection of the parties, the years that the children have resided in Washington, the significant distance between the courts, the parties' disparate financial circumstances, the location of evidence and convenience of witnesses, and the familiarity factors all supported the Montana court declining jurisdiction. None of the jurisdictional factors mitigated against declination, and no factor outweighed the concern for safety raised by the history of domestic violence. Thus, the Supreme Court ordered the District Court to decline jurisdiction as an inconvenient forum and arrange to transfer the case to Washington. In re Marriage of Stoneman v. Drollinger, 2003 MT 25, 314 M 139, 64 P3d 997 (2003).

Following remand, the District Court held that the issue of child support should be transferred to Washington state in conjunction with the custody and parenting issues. Nevertheless, the wife filed a cross-appeal in 2007 arguing that under 40-5-149 (renumbered 40-5-1012), Montana retained jurisdiction over the child support issue. However, the Supreme Court dismissed the claim as untimely. Under Rule 4, M.R.App.P., notice of appeal must be filed within 30 days of judgment or order, but the wife's notice of cross-appeal was filed more than 11 months after the District Court's order that finally settled the matter. In re Marriage of Stoneman & Drollinger, 2008 MT 448, 348 M 17, 199 P3d 232 (2008).

Venue Versus Jurisdiction — Failure to Move for Change of Venue at Initial Appearance Constituting Waiver of Right to Later Object to Venue: A mother filed in District Court in Judith Basin County for review of a child support modification consent order by the Department of Public Health and Human Services Child Support Enforcement Division (CSED) reducing the father's child support obligation. CSED moved for dismissal, claiming that the mother had failed to exhaust her administrative remedies. The District Court granted the motion based on lack of jurisdiction, concluding that the petition should have been filed in a different county. The mother appealed, contending that the court confused the concepts of venue and jurisdiction and contending that dismissal of the petition for lack of jurisdiction was erroneous as a matter of law. The Supreme Court agreed and reversed. The District Court's interpretation of 2-4-702 as a requirement that a petition for judicial review must be filed in the correct venue for the court to obtain jurisdiction was incorrect as a matter of law. Jurisdiction is a court's authority to hear and determine a case that goes to the power of the court and cannot be waived or conferred by consent of the parties when there is no basis for jurisdiction under the law, while venue refers to the place where a case is to be heard or where the power of the court is to be exercised and is a personal privilege of defendant that may be waived and that is considered waived pursuant to former Rule 12(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), unless a motion to change venue is made at defendant's initial appearance. Thus, the mother's petition for judicial review vested the Judith Basin County District Court with jurisdiction under 2-4-702. Whether venue was proper in the county where the petition was filed was an entirely different issue. Section 2-4-702 also sets forth the proper place where a contested administrative decision can be heard, providing that the petition must be filed in the District Court for the county where the petitioner resides or has a principal place of business or where the agency maintains its principal office. Upon proper motion, the matter should have been transferred to the proper county, but CSED failed to move for a change of venue at the initial appearance, thereby waiving its right to later object to venue, opting instead to move to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction. Therefore, Judith Basin County was a proper place for trial absent agreement by the parties to transfer venue. In re Support Obligation of McGurran, 2002 MT 144, 310 M 268, 49 P3d 626 (2002).

Justiciable Controversy Created by Intervention of Child Support Enforcement Division With Continuing District Court Jurisdiction Over Child Support Orders: As part of a marriage dissolution, the District Court ordered that the husband pay monthly child support in a specific amount. The Child Support Enforcement Division (CSED) subsequently notified the court that it intended to modify the order pursuant to its authority in 40-5-272 and 40-5-273. The court, sua sponte, then enjoined CSED from modifying any child support orders issued by a Montana District Court, asserting that CSED's actions in modifying a court order violated the constitutional separation of powers clause. On appeal, CSED maintained that this case did not present a justiciable controversy, primarily because neither party to the dissolution action challenged the constitutionality of the statutes in question, and that the court was therefore without jurisdiction to decide the issue. The Supreme Court disagreed, finding that a justiciable controversy did exist. Once the original equitable jurisdiction of the District Court was invoked in the dissolution action, the court retained continuing jurisdiction following entry of the child support order. As a result, the court properly used its inherent authority to protect both its continuing jurisdiction and the husband's right not to be adversely affected by an act of CSED that the court considered unconstitutional. Further, the court had personal jurisdiction over CSED because CSED's notification that it intended to intervene interjected CSED into the ongoing matter, constituting a voluntary appearance into the case under former Rule 4B, M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), and vesting personal jurisdiction over CSED with the District Court. Seubert v. Seubert, 2000 MT 241, 301 M 382, 13 P3d 365, 57 St. Rep. 1006 (2000). See also In re Marriage of Harper, 235 M 41, 764 P2d 1283 (1988), and Gryczan v. St., 283 M 433, 942 P2d 112 (1997).

Statutes Granting Child Support Enforcement Division Judicial Power to Make and Enforce Child Support Orders Violative of Constitutional Separation of Powers: As part of a marriage dissolution, the District Court ordered that the husband pay monthly child support in a specific amount. The Child Support Enforcement Division (CSED) subsequently notified the court that it intended to modify the order pursuant to its authority in 40-5-272 and 40-5-273. The court, sua sponte, then enjoined CSED from modifying any child support orders issued by a Montana District Court, asserting that CSED's actions in modifying a court order violated the constitutional separation of powers clause. On appeal, CSED maintained that the statutes did not violate the separation of powers clause because: (1) the statutory scheme was merely a quasi-judicial function that did not threaten the institutional integrity of the Judicial Branch; (2) the statutes in question were a reasonable response to both the federal legal requirements for expedited child support modification and the sheer magnitude of child support collection in Montana; (3) CSED was empowered to modify a support order only if the facts changed; (4) every contested modification was subject to a hearing before an administrative law judge; (5) all modifications were subject to judicial review; and (6) the Legislature's grant of jurisdictional authority to CSED was not exclusive. The District Court responded that the statutes were an unconstitutional violation of separation of powers because: (1) they gave CSED judicial power that is exclusively reserved to the judiciary; (2) they gave CSED statutory authority to modify a child support order, file it with the District Court, and then enforce the order as a District Court judgment; and (3) the procedure for judicial review of a CSED modification was not automatic and was limited by the scope of the Montana Administrative Procedure Act. The Supreme Court concluded that 40-5-272 and 40-5-273 are an unconstitutional violation of the separation of powers clause to the extent that they grant CSED the judicial power to make and enforce child support orders without automatic and mandatory judicial review. Although appreciative of the magnitude of the agency's modification and enforcement tasks, the court found that that fact did not justify unbridled departure from constitutional norms respecting the autonomy of the individual branches of government. Seubert v. Seubert, 2000 MT 241, 301 M 382, 13 P3d 365, 57 St. Rep. 1006 (2000), distinguishing Chastain v. Chastain, 932 SW 2d 396 (Mo. 1996), and State of Iowa ex rel. Sara Allee v. Gocha, 555 NW 2d 683 (Iowa 1996).

Lack of District Court Jurisdiction Over Claims for Fees Incurred During Bankruptcy Proceedings: Watts filed a claim against Parsons in District Court for fees owing in a bankruptcy action, contending that the debt was incurred after the bankruptcy was discharged and closed and thus was not subject to review by the Bankruptcy Court. The District Court found that it had jurisdiction, based on Woodley v. Myers Capital Corp., 835 P2d 239 (Wash. Ct. App. 1992), and Metco, Inc. v. Huffman, 511 NW 2d 780 (Nebr. Ct. App. 1994), and granted Watts' request for fees. Citing In re Hathaway Ranch Partnership, 116 Bankr. Rep. 208 (Bankr. C.D. Calif. 1990), the Supreme Court noted that the burden of showing entitlement to fees was on Watts. Watts asserted that the parties entered into an agreement for payment of fees after the bankruptcy was discharged but that the agreement was never brought to the attention of or approved by the Bankruptcy Court. By withholding the terms of the agreement from the Bankruptcy Court, Watts denied Parsons the lawful protection of that court. The Supreme Court distinguished Woodley and Metco, noting that in the present case, Watts never submitted the question of fees to the Bankruptcy Court and that the District Court was not in a position to determine whether the fees were reasonable. Because the District Court did not have jurisdiction over the claim for professional fees incurred during the pendency of the bankruptcy action, the case was remanded to District Court with instructions to dismiss. Watts & Associates, Inc. v. Parsons, 1999 MT 56, 293 M 464, 976 P2d 984, 56 St. Rep. 237 (1999).

Standing to Bring Declaratory Judgment Action — Possibility of Prosecution Under Criminal Statute Held Sufficient: Gryczan and others, who were homosexuals, brought a declaratory judgment action against the state, seeking a determination of whether 45-5-505 (renumbered 45-8-218), proscribing deviate sexual conduct, was unconstitutional as applied, as a violation of their right to privacy. The plaintiffs alleged that they had in the past and intend in the future to engage in acts that violate the statute. The state contested the plaintiffs' right to bring the action, arguing that the statute had never been enforced. Relying upon Lee v. St., 195 M 1, 635 P2d 1282 (1981), and Helena Parents v. Lewis & Clark County, 277 M 367, 922 P2d 1140 (1996), the Supreme Court reviewed the criteria for standing generally and standing to challenge a criminal statute in particular and noted that it had never required a person to suffer arrest in order to challenge a criminal statute. Moreover, the Supreme Court noted that although it had never been enforced, the Legislature had amended the statute as late as 1991 and had even later rejected attempts to repeal the statute. The Supreme Court reviewed opinions decided by the U.S. Supreme Court and other federal courts and held that because the Legislature did not regard the statute as moribund and because the Attorney General had not foresworn the enforcement of the statute, plaintiffs had a legitimate and realistic fear of criminal prosecution along with other psychological harms. Noting that the plaintiffs are precisely the individuals against whom the statute is intended to operate, the Supreme Court held that the District Court did not err in holding that the plaintiffs had standing to challenge the statute. Gryczan v. St., 283 M 433, 942 P2d 112, 54 St. Rep. 699 (1997), followed in Mont. Envtl. Information Center v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 1999 MT 248, 296 M 207, 988 P2d 1236, 56 St. Rep. 964 (1999). (See 2013 amendments to 45-2-101 and 45-8-218.)

Damage Claim Not Available as Challenge to District Court Subject Matter Jurisdiction: Although the jurisdiction of courts can be limited by constitutional or statutory provisions on the basis of the amount in controversy or dispute between the parties, Montana District Courts are not constrained by such limits. Therefore, the amount and type of a damage claim in District Court may not be raised to challenge a District Court's subject matter jurisdiction. Day v. Payne, 280 M 273, 929 P2d 864, 53 St. Rep. 1400 (1996).

State Probate Jurisdiction of Federal Claim — Homestead Exemption — Priority of Liens: Creditor obtained a default judgment in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York against an Alaska resident and attempted to execute on property in Montana that had subsequently come under Montana's exclusive probate jurisdiction. While the federal court retained jurisdiction over claims impacting the estate, the court could not seize and control property in the possession of the state probate court. It was within the jurisdiction of the state court to determine that the real property was subject to family protection allowances and exempt from execution. Although the lien was attached prior to debtor's death, the lien was extinguished upon the exercise of the family protection allowances, and the homestead allowance was exempt from and had priority over all other claims against the estate. In re Estate of Wilhelm, 233 M 255, 760 P2d 718, 45 St. Rep. 1468 (1988).

No State Jurisdiction of Reservation Commercial Transactions — Preemption by Tribal Jurisdiction: A state District Court did not have primary subject matter jurisdiction over a civil debt action arising out of a commercial transaction on an Indian reservation and brought by a non-Indian creditor against an enrolled tribal member debtor, both of whom resided on the reservation. State assumption of such jurisdiction interfered with tribal sovereignty and the tribe's right of self-government. Therefore, the state court's jurisdiction over the commercial transaction was preempted by tribal jurisdiction. Geiger v. Pierce, 233 M 18, 758 P2d 279, 45 St. Rep. 1257 (1988), followed in Balyeat Law, PC v. Pettit, 1998 MT 252, 291 M 196, 967 P2d 398, 55 St. Rep. 1038 (1998) (the state has no jurisdiction over an action to collect a debt for medical bills arising out of transactions, either on or off the reservation, brought by a non-Indian creditor against an enrolled tribal member residing on a reservation whose spouse incurred the debt but who engaged in no significant off-reservation contacts so as to subject herself to state jurisdiction).

Jurisdiction of Offense of Selling Alcohol Without a License: The District Court was the proper court to try the offense of sale of beer or wine without a valid state license. St. v. Barnes, 232 M 405, 758 P2d 264, 45 St. Rep. 1150 (1988).

Standing to Sue Government in General — Annexation Proceedings in Particular: Before one has standing to sue a governmental entity, there must be a case or controversy. The plaintiff must clearly allege past, present, or threatened injury to a property or civil right, and the injury must be distinguishable from injury to the public in general, though it need not be exclusive to the plaintiff. In an annexation protest, annexation is a political matter exclusively for legislative control, absent a constitutional prohibition. The annexation must be void ab initio, and the challenger must be a property owner who would suffer a tax increase. The available remedy is an injunction, not monetary damages. A count of petition signatures for only one of many annexed areas, by a plaintiff who used his own criteria for the count, is insufficient to support a claim that the government entity inaccurately counted the signatures. Since plaintiff here had no standing to directly attack the annexation, he could not collaterally attack it by attempting to show negligence. O'Donnell Fire Serv. & Equip. Co. v. Billings, 219 M 317, 711 P2d 822, 42 St. Rep. 2051 (1985), followed in Knudsen v. Ereaux, 275 M 146, 911 P2d 835, 53 St. Rep. 83 (1996), and Lohmeier v. Gallatin County, 2006 MT 88, 332 M 39, 135 P3d 775 (2006).

Termination of Youth Court Jurisdiction — No Bar to Jurisdiction of District Court: The defendant was under 18 years of age when the crime of which he was accused was committed. When the defendant was 20 years old he confessed, and the County Attorney filed a petition in the Youth Court, seeking a declaration that the defendant was a delinquent youth and requesting authority to incarcerate him. The defendant turned 21 before the motion was ruled on. He then was charged with deliberate homicide in District Court. The defendant contended that when the Youth Court lost jurisdiction over him under 41-5-205, the District Court did not have jurisdiction because once jurisdiction has attached under 41-5-203, the District Court can never assume jurisdiction over the offense underlying the Youth Court's proceeding absent transfer under 41-5-206, which did not occur here. The Supreme Court held that on termination of Youth Court jurisdiction, there was no bar to the exercise of jurisdiction by the District Court under Art. VII, sec. 4(1), Mont. Const., 3-5-302, and 46-2-201, over felony proceedings against the defendant. Exclusive original jurisdiction of the Youth Court does not divest a District Court of jurisdiction over crimes committed by a juvenile defendant. St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985).

"Original Jurisdiction" Not Exclusive Jurisdiction: In cases pending before the Youth Court under the Youth Court Act (Title 41, ch. 5), two youths, ages 14 and 15, were charged with numerous felony counts. The State sought to arrest the proceeding in order to move that the youths be transferred to the jurisdiction of the District Court under 41-5-206. The State contends that the requirement for transfer contained in that statute effectively gives the Youth Court all jurisdiction over all felony cases if the youth charged is less than 16 years old and that this provision conflicts with this section of the Montana Constitution, which provides for District Court jurisdiction. The State further contends that this constitutional provision gives the District Court exclusive jurisdiction in all criminal cases amounting to a felony and that a youth under 16 years is legally capable of committing a felony. In denying the state's application for relief, the Supreme Court held that: (1) the term "original jurisdiction", as used in this section, does not mean exclusive jurisdiction; and (2) felonies may be prosecuted in the Youth Court because when it acts in jurisdiction the Youth Court is acting as a District Court. In re T.L.G. & M.E.H., 214 M 164, 692 P2d 1227, 41 St. Rep. 2388 (1984).

All Parties in Equity Court Entitled to Have Their Legal Claims and Counterclaims Tried by Jury: Although, in the past, the court has purported to permit a court of equity to rule on all questions in a case, the court has never held that a court sitting in equity may try those issues of fact raised by plaintiff in a legal cause of action. The modern merger of law and equity courts and the liberal joinder provisions of the Rules of Civil Procedure force reevaluation of the traditional justification for permitting an equity court to decide legal issues. Upon timely demand, all parties are entitled to have their legal claims and counterclaims tried by jury. Gray v. Billings, 213 M 6, 689 P2d 268, 41 St. Rep. 1910 (1984). (To the extent that Butler Bros. Dev. Co. v. Butler, 111 M 329, 108 P2d 1041 (1941), and its progeny have been interpreted to deny plaintiff a right to jury trial of his legal claims, the cases are overruled.)

Youth Legally Capable of Committing Crime — Jurisdiction When Crime Disclosed After Majority: The District Court has jurisdiction to try an individual charged at age 22 for felonies allegedly committed at age 15, as provided in the court's constitutional grant of jurisdiction over all felonies. The Youth Court Act does not contain any direct statement or implication that the Legislature intended to set the minimum age of criminal responsibility at 16, making a 15-year-old incapable of committing a crime. The primary purposes of statutes defining a "delinquent youth" and providing for transfer to District Court are to clarify that delinquency proceedings are noncriminal and to prohibit prosecution of youths in District Court while they are youths. State ex rel. Elliot v. District Court, 211 M 1, 684 P2d 481, 41 St. Rep. 1184 (1984).

Title to and Public Use of Dearborn River — Subject Matter Jurisdiction Found: Landowner along the Dearborn River claimed the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction over action for determination of the public's right to use the river, basing his claim on the presumption that he held title to the riverbed and that the State had no power to strip him of that title under the guise of determining navigability of the waters over the riverbed. The claim lacked merit because the State holds title to the riverbed and the water flowing over it, so that there was no question of the District Court's subject matter jurisdiction. Mont. Coalition for Stream Access, Inc. v. Curran, 210 M 38, 682 P2d 163, 41 St. Rep. 906 (1984).

District Court's Power to Order Payment of Expenditures Beyond Budget: District Court's fiscal year budget was overrun, and this stopped or threatened to stop the efficient and orderly administration of justice and court business, creating an emergency. As a court of competent jurisdiction, the District Court may issue orders for the payment of out-of-budget expenditures that are reasonable and necessary. Compliance with the orders by the members of the Board of County Commissioners or by any other officer in the exercise of his official duties is within the exception to personal liability of the officers provided in 7-6-2323 (now repealed). The officers may pass on the propriety of the claims but may not deny them on the basis that they are outside the budget if the court has duly ordered them paid. State ex rel. District Court v. Whitaker, 210 M 363, 681 P2d 1097, 41 St. Rep. 1104 (1984).

District Court Jurisdiction — Invoked by Probable Cause in Leave to File Information — Res Judicata After Appeal Process: The issue of subject matter jurisdiction cannot be waived or conferred by consent of a party and may be raised at any stage of a judicial proceeding or sua sponte by the court; but if the question of jurisdiction turns upon a finding of whether the affidavit of application for leave to file an information shows probable cause and the defendant has been found guilty and the judgment has not been appealed or has been affirmed on appeal, the issue of probable cause is res judicata. St. v. Davis, 210 M 28, 681 P2d 42, 41 St. Rep. 898 (1984). In St. v. Spreadbury, 2011 MT 176, 361 Mont. 253, 257 P.3d 392, the Supreme Court held that the issue of whether the information included allegations to establish probable cause is not a jurisdictional issue, and the court overruled statements to the contrary made in Davis and in St. v. Thompson, 243 Mont. 28, 792 P.2d 1103 (1990).

Jurisdiction of State Court Over Nonresident Federally Chartered Bank — Sufficiency of Evidence — Denial of Due Process and Equal Protection: Officers of the plaintiff corporation traveled to Reno, Nevada, to deposit money in the defendant branch bank in anticipation of business in Nevada and later brought an action in a Montana District Court against the defendant for unlawful dishonor of a check and associated charges. The District Court did not err in dismissing the action for lack of jurisdiction. Under the provisions of 12 U.S.C. § 94, a federally chartered bank may be sued, among other places, where it is "located". The U.S. Supreme Court in Citizens & S. Nat'l Bank v. Bougas, 434 US 35 (1977), construed the term "located" to mean wherever branch offices are found. Because there is no branch bank in Montana and there has been no business operation conducted by the defendant in Montana that would constitute a waiver of the protection of federal law, the District Court had no jurisdiction. There was, moreover, sufficient evidence before the District Court for it to make the determination that there was no voluntary waiver and the U.S. Supreme Court has held in Mercantile Nat'l Bank at Dallas v. Langdeau, 371 US 555 (1963), that Congress "unquestionably" has the authority to determine those situations in which national banks can be sued. Hamelly Int'l, Inc. v. First Nat'l Bank of Nev., 199 M 221, 648 P2d 282, 39 St. Rep. 1304 (1982).

State Jurisdiction Over Indian Contract: One licensed to practice law in this state cannot make a contract as an attorney to be performed both on and off the reservation and then use his status as an Indian to defeat state jurisdiction when he is sued on the contract involved. Crawford v. Roy, 176 M 227, 577 P2d 392 (1978).

Authority to Invalidate Labor Contract: Although a state court has the authority to construe and enforce collective bargaining agreements, it does not have the authority to invalidate a labor contract, proper on its face, because one of the parties has allegedly engaged in an unfair labor practice. Such a determination is exclusively a function of the federal system. Audit Serv., Inc. v. Elmo Rd. Corp., 175 M 533, 575 P2d 77 (1978).

Standing to Challenge Tax Deed Sale: In an action to have a tax deed sale declared null and void and to exercise right of repurchase because notice of sale placed an "unreasonably low value" on the property, the Supreme Court held, although urged for the first time on appeal, that plaintiffs were without standing to bring the action since they forfeited their preferential right of repurchase. Stewart v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 175 M 197, 573 P2d 184 (1977), followed in Sanders v. Yellowstone County, 276 M 116, 915 P2d 196, 53 St. Rep. 305 (1996), Bowen v. McDonald, 276 M 193, 915 P2d 201, 53 St. Rep. 343 (1996), and Helena Parents Comm'n v. Lewis & Clark County Comm'rs, 277 M 367, 922 P2d 1140, 53 St. Rep. 687 (1996), with Bowen distinguishing Kahle v. Smithers, 225 M 452, 733 P2d 844 (1987), and Hudson v. McDonald, 229 M 426, 747 P2d 221 (1987).

Jurisdiction Retained Upon Filing Reduced Charge: When District Court's jurisdiction is originally invoked by an information charging a felony, it is not lost by State subsequently reducing the charge to only a lesser included misdemeanor. St. v. Shults, 169 M 33, 544 P2d 817 (1976).

APPELLATE JURISDICTION

Federal Arbitration Act — Sophisticated Businessman — Appeal Timing of District Court's Order: The plaintiff was terminated by the defendant financial institution. The plaintiff sued his former employer and its CEO, alleging wrongful discharge under the Montana Wrongful Discharge From Employment Act. The District Court granted the defendants' motion to compel arbitration pursuant to the parties' employment agreement, and the arbitrator subsequently granted summary judgment to the defendants. The plaintiff appealed after the District Court denied his application to vacate, correct, or modify the arbitrator's award. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the District Court's order compelling arbitration and staying further proceedings was not final and appealable, that the parties had a valid agreement to arbitrate, that the provision in the employment contract was not unconscionable because the plaintiff was an experienced businessman, that the Federal Arbitration Act did not prevent the plaintiff from filing his application in state court, that which rules were applicable to the arbitration was outside the scope of its review, and that the District Court did not abuse its discretion when ruling on discovery issues. Tedesco v. Home Sav. Bancorp, Inc., 2017 MT 304, 389 Mont. 468, 407 P.3d 289.

Absent Trial De Novo, District Court's Appellate Review Sufficiently Safeguards Defendant's Due Process Rights: There is no basis to conclude that properly trained nonlawyer judges are incapable of making factual determinations or exercising discretion appropriately, or that a license to practice law would improve their ability to do so. Therefore, the defendant's right to due process of law was not violated by having a trial before a nonlawyer justice of the peace without the opportunity for a trial de novo in District Court. St. v. Davis, 2016 MT 102, 383 Mont. 281, 371 P.3d 979.

Proper Dismissal of Nonjusticiable Controversy — No Advisory Opinion by Supreme Court: Plaintiff filed an action to enjoin and declare unlawful the defendant airport authority's proposed lease of land adjacent to the airport. However, the potential lessee decided to not pursue the lease. The District Court suggested the lessee's decision would render the matter moot, but it ruled on the merits in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff appealed, and the Supreme Court concluded that the case was moot and did not present a controversy but rather called for an advisory opinion, which the Supreme Court does not render. Therefore, the appeal was dismissed as nonjusticiable. Plan Helena, Inc. v. Helena Regional Airport Authority Bd., 2010 MT 26, 355 Mont. 142, 226 P.3d 567. See also Kulko v. Davail, Inc., 2015 MT 340, 381 Mont. 511, 363 P.3d 430.

No Youth Court Authority to Expunge DUI Offenses — Elements of Judicial Estoppel Not Met: Following Darrah's completion of a Youth Drug Court program in 2004, the Youth Court ordered that Darrah's prior criminal record be expunged, including a previous minor in possession offense and a 2002 DUI. Darrah was subsequently charged in 2005 with second offense DUI, based on the prior 2002 DUI, and in 2006 Darrah was charged with third offense DUI. Citing the principle of judicial estoppel, Darrah asserted that because the Youth Court record had been expunged, the 2002 DUI should not count against him. The District Court disagreed and Darrah appealed. The Supreme Court applied the elements of judicial estoppel set out in Vogel v. Intercontinental Truck Body, Inc., 2006 MT 131, 332 M 322, 137 P3d 573 (2006), and determined that Darrah had failed to demonstrate that each element was met, so judicial estoppel did not apply. Further, there is no authority under which the Youth Court could order expungement of Darrah's DUI offenses. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Darrah, 2009 MT 96, 350 M 70, 205 P3d 792 (2009), following St. v. Chesley, 2004 MT 165, 322 M 26, 92 P3d 1212 (2004).

Elimination of Trial De Novo on Appeals From Justices' Courts of Record Not Unconstitutional: Hernandez contended that the elimination of trials de novo following appeals from Justices' Courts of Record in 3-10-101 violated Art. VII, sec. 4(2), Mont. Const., which requires District Courts to hear appeals from inferior courts as new trials unless otherwise provided by law. The Supreme Court held that the phrase "as otherwise provided by law" authorizes the Legislature to provide for something other than trials de novo in District Court and that elimination of trials de novo through the creation of Justices' Courts of Record is constitutionally permissible under Art. VII, sec. 4(2), Mont. Const. Hernandez v. Yellowstone County Comm'rs, 2008 MT 251, 345 M 1, 189 P3d 638 (2008).

Out-of-Time Appeal in Criminal Matters — Exclusive Jurisdiction With Supreme Court: Under 46-20-101, the only method for review in criminal cases is by notice of appeal. Time limits for filing an appeal are mandatory and jurisdictional. If a defendant takes no action to perfect an appeal within 90 days of judgment, the District Court loses its jurisdiction and the appeal is out-of-time. However, an out-of-time appeal is a remedy that may be available to a criminal defendant who, through no fault of the defendant, misses a deadline for filing an appeal. Although former Rule 21(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), precludes an out-of-time appeal in a civil case, the Supreme Court is not precluded from addressing a motion for an out-of-time appeal in a criminal case. Further, a District Court lacks jurisdiction to grant an out-of-time appeal. The Supreme Court has exclusive jurisdiction to grant a motion for an out-of-time appeal, and the motion is considered an original proceeding subject to the provisions of former Rule 17, M.R.App.P. (now superseded). Upon a showing that the failure to timely notice a criminal appeal was excusable under the circumstances, the Supreme Court may conclude that an out-of-time appeal is the appropriate remedy pursuant to former Rule 21(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded). In that event, the matter will be remanded to the District Court with instructions to vacate and reenter judgment to afford the defendant a second opportunity to act within the statutory timeframes for filing notice of appeal. St. v. Tweed, 2002 MT 286, 312 M 482, 59 P3d 1105 (2002).

Appeal to District Court Allowed Only After Trial in Lower Court, Not After Forfeiture of Bond — Exclusive Statutory Remedy for Appeals From Courts of Limited Jurisdiction: Kempin was charged in Justice's Court with seven fish and game violations but failed to appear for trial, so the appearance bonds that Kempin had posted were forfeited and Kempin's hunting, fishing, and trapping privileges were suspended for 10 years. Kempin appealed to the District Court within 10 days of the Justice's Court judgment, but the appeal was dismissed for lack of jurisdiction and because Kempin had no statutory right to appeal the forfeitures as a matter of law, so Kempin appealed to the Supreme Court. Under this section, District Courts must hear appeals from inferior courts as trials de novo unless otherwise provided by law, and appeal of a criminal conviction from a court of limited jurisdiction is governed exclusively by 46-17-311, which provides three circumstances under which a criminal defendant may appeal to District Court for a trial de novo: (1) when a defendant pleads guilty or nolo contendere but preserves legal issues raised by pretrial motion for appeal; (2) when a defendant files written notice of intention to appeal within 10 days after a judgment is rendered following a trial; and (3) when a defendant appeals revocation of a suspended sentence. Here, Kempin claimed that denial of a District Court trial by jury following forfeiture in Justice's Court violated his due process rights. However, Kempin raised no appealable pretrial issues, nor was the case an appeal of a suspended sentence, so the first and third circumstances did not apply. Kempin did appeal the judgment within 10 days, but there was no trial, so Kempin was not constitutionally entitled to a trial de novo when there had been no trial initially, nor is 46-17-311 unconstitutionally vague for not explicitly proscribing an appeal following a forfeiture. The Supreme Court agreed with the District Court's explanation in declining jurisdiction—that if a defendant was automatically entitled to a trial de novo on appeal without first having a trial in Justice's Court, a defendant could avoid Justice's Court altogether by not appearing and forfeiting the Justice's Court bonds and then pursuing a trial in District Court, which would render the Justice's Court system meaningless. Kempin's other due process arguments were also not compelling because Kempin waived his trial rights by failing to appear in Justice's Court to assert any constitutional rights and in light of his stated intention to forfeit the bonds and the advance notice of the suspension of the hunting, fishing, and trapping privileges. Absent any statutory basis for an appeal, dismissal of the appeal by the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Kempin, 2001 MT 313, 308 M 17, 38 P3d 859 (2001). See also St. v. Feight, 2001 MT 205, 306 M 312, 33 P3d 623 (2001), and St. v. Schulke, 2005 MT 77, 326 M 390, 109 P3d 744 (2005).

Improper Reliance by District Court on Justice's Court Proceeding Constituting Denial of Right to Trial De Novo — Reversal Warranted: Stedman was convicted in Justice's Court of criminal mischief and appealed to District Court for a trial de novo. During the District Court trial, the judge referenced the Justice's Court proceedings in several instances, which strongly suggested that the judge was unduly influenced by the Justice's Court proceedings, denying Stedman of the constitutional and statutory right to a trial de novo. The Supreme Court remanded for a trial de novo. St. v. Stedman, 2001 MT 150, 306 M 65, 30 P3d 353 (2001), distinguished in McDunn v. Arnold, 2013 MT 138, 370 Mont. 270, 303 P.3d 1279.

Limitation to One Jury Trial Held Unconstitutional: In 1997, the Legislature enacted the provisions codified at 46-7-102(1)(g), 46-17-201(3), and 46-17-311(1), providing that a person tried for a misdemeanor in Justice's or City Court who appeals to the District Court has the right to only one jury trial. Woirhaye was charged with misdemeanor DUI and requested a jury trial in Missoula County Justice's Court. Upon his conviction by the Justice's Court jury, Woirhaye appealed to the District Court for a trial de novo pursuant to 46-17-311 and subsection (2) of this section. Woirhaye asked that the District Court declare 46-17-201(3) unconstitutional, but the District Court denied his motion. Woirhaye then petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control, which was granted on the grounds that Woirhaye would otherwise be denied a fundamental right. The Supreme Court held that Woirhaye's right to a jury trial in both the Justice's Court or City Court and the District Court was a fundamental right guaranteed by Art. II, sec. 24 and 26, Mont. Const. The Supreme Court pointed out that the right to a jury trial is guaranteed by Art. III, sec. 2, clause 3, of the U.S. Constitution and the sixth amendment to the U.S. Constitution and also that even if that were not the case, Montana may, under the rationale of St. v. Bullock, 272 M 361, 901 P2d 61 (1995), provide rights in excess of those guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution. The Supreme Court noted, in response to the state's argument that Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., guarantees "a" jury trial, that the state's argument was not persuasive against the language of Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const. The Supreme Court also distinguished Ludwig v. Mass., 427 US 618 (1976), holding that subsection (2) of this section was not implicated in the case, and stated that any language in N. Cent. Serv., Inc. v. Hafdahl, 191 M 440, 625 P2d 56 (1981), indicating that a requirement for a jury trial applicable to Small Claims Court was satisfied if the right was granted at the District Court level, was dicta and could not be relied upon to support the state's case that only one jury trial was required. Consequently, the Supreme Court held 46-7-102(1)(g), 46-17-201(3), and 46-17-311(1) to be unconstitutional as violating Woirhaye's right to a jury trial. Woirhaye v. District Court, 1998 MT 320, 292 M 185, 972 P2d 800, 55 St. Rep. 1298 (1998), followed in Balyeat Law, P.C. v. Harrison, 1999 MT 144, 295 M 13, 983 P2d 902, 56 St. Rep. 566 (1999), and followed and clarified in St. v. Rensvold, 2006 MT 146, 332 M 392, 139 P3d 154 (2006).

Judgment and Sentence Prerequisite to Appeal to District Court — Misdemeanors: Except for misdemeanors listed in 3-5-302(2), a District Court is limited to appellate jurisdiction of misdemeanor cases. Imposition of sentence and entry of a final judgment by a Justice's Court or City Court are prerequisites to appeal to a District Court, and a party may not consent to subject matter jurisdiction or waive the want of jurisdiction. St. v. Hegeman, 248 M 49, 808 P2d 509, 48 St. Rep. 318 (1991), followed in St. v. Tweedy, 277 M 313, 922 P2d 1134, 53 St. Rep. 656 (1996), and St. v. Diesen, 1998 MT 163, 290 M 55, 964 P2d 712, 55 St. Rep. 655 (1998).

Legislative Provision for Judicial Review of Administrative Action Exclusive: Under this section, only the Legislature may provide for judicial review of administrative actions. Right of judicial review cannot be created by agency fiat. Nye v. Dept. of Livestock, 196 M 222, 639 P2d 498, 39 St. Rep. 49 (1982).

State Not to Appeal Justice's Court Dismissal: When a criminal cause in Justice's Court was dismissed because a witness subpoenaed by both parties testified for the prosecution and failed to appear for the defendant, the State had no right to appeal because 46-20-103 applies only to appeals from District Court and 46-17-311 allows appeals from Justice's Court only for the defendant. St. v. Sanchez, 187 M 434, 610 P2d 162 (1980).

Limitation of Judicial Review of Administrative Decisions to Particular Courts: The right of judicial review of decisions of administrative agencies may be denied or restricted to particular courts. Under 75-2-411, a final decision by the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Board of Environmental Review) to issue preconstruction permits under the Clean Air Act of Montana is appealable only to the District Court of the judicial district of the state that is the situs of the affected property. N. Plains Resource Council v. Bd. of Health & Environmental Sciences, 184 M 466, 603 P2d 684 (1979).

Review by Administrative Appeal: When the Legislature did not adopt legislation to provide for appeal to court from the decision of a school board, review pursuant to an administrative appeal statute was proper. School District v. Hughes, 170 M 267, 552 P2d 328 (1976).

REMOVAL AND SUBSTITUTION OF JUDGES

Conviction Overturned When Rule on Disqualification and Substitution of Judges Not Followed: No published local court rule was discovered, so the Supreme Court's rule on disqualification and substitution of judges applied. There was no evidence that Judge Freebourn (the original judge) specifically called in Judge Olsen or that Judge Olsen filed an acceptance of jurisdiction as required by the Supreme Court rule. Judge Olsen decided the case. The conviction was overturned because Judge Olsen was presiding in violation of the rule and did not have the power to hear the case. St. v. Daugherty, 184 M 474, 603 P2d 1041 (1979).

Distinction Between Motion to Dismiss and for Summary Judgment: The District Judge did not reverse the previously disqualified District Judge's denial of defendants' motion to dismiss by granting defendants' motions for summary judgment and thereby improperly exercise appellate jurisdiction because the latter motion was a decision on the merits while the former was merely a determination of the sufficiency of the allegations in the complaint. Granger v. Time, Inc., 174 M 42, 568 P2d 535 (1977).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION
ORIGINAL JURISDICTION

Divorce Proceedings: Proceedings for divorce undoubtedly are statutory, but jurisdiction in matters of divorce is constitutional and may not be abridged. Trudgen v. Trudgen, 134 M 174, 329 P2d 225 (1958).

Aggregation of Causes of Action to Meet Jurisdictional Amount: When there are several causes of action, each for less than the jurisdictional minimum for the court, they may be prosecuted in the court where their aggregate exceeds the jurisdictional minimum. Stokke v. Graham, 129 M 96, 281 P2d 1025 (1955).

"Cases" Construed: By "cases" and "controversies" is meant real controversies and not abstract differences of opinion or moot questions. Chovanak v. Matthews, 120 M 520, 188 P2d 582 (1948), distinguished in Helena Parents Comm'n v. Lewis & Clark County Comm'rs, 277 M 367, 922 P2d 1140, 53 St. Rep. 687 (1996).

Adoption Proceedings: If adoption proceedings do not constitute matters of probate, jurisdiction over which is conferred upon the court by Art. VIII, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const., they fall within the clause therein giving it jurisdiction over "all such special actions and proceedings as are not otherwise provided for". In re Hoermann's Estate, 108 M 386, 91 P2d 394 (1939).

Probate — General Jurisdiction:

When sitting in probate, the District Court is a court of record exercising general jurisdiction by virtue of the Constitution. It is not one of limited jurisdiction and in heirship proceedings has all the powers and jurisdiction made inherent in District Courts by the Constitution and statutes. In re Baxter's Estate, 101 M 504, 54 P2d 869 (1936).

"All matters of probate" and necessarily the administration of all laws relating thereto are now under the original jurisdiction of the District Courts. In re McFarland's Estate, 10 M 445, 26 P 185 (1891).

Venue — Real Property Actions:

In an action to adjudicate water rights on a main river and its tributaries, the District Court of a county in which plaintiff's lands lay and through which the main river flowed had jurisdiction to adjudicate the rights to waters of a tributary flowing entirely within another county. Whitcomb v. Murphy, 94 M 562, 23 P2d 980 (1933).

Article VIII, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const., did not require that an action as to real property must be tried in the county where the action was commenced when the property in question has been added to another county since the commencement of the action. Bookwalter v. Conrad, 15 M 464, 39 P 573 (1895).

Equity Jurisprudence: District Courts have original jurisdiction in all cases in equity. Thus, Montana has adopted the entire system of equity jurisprudence. The Legislature does not have the authority to restrict the powers of the court of equity. Link v. Haire, 82 M 406, 267 P 952 (1928); Burns v. Smith, 21 M 251, 53 P 742 (1898).

Nuisance: By Art. VIII, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const., the District Courts were clothed with general equity jurisdiction. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution and for many years before, courts of equity in England and America exercised jurisdiction for the suppression of nuisances, public as well as private. The right of the State to maintain these suits independently of statute cannot be questioned, but the State cannot act sua sponte. Someone authorized to do so must act on its behalf. State ex rel. Ford v. Young, 54 M 401, 170 P 947 (1918).

Contest of County Seat: In the absence of statutory provision authorizing a "contest" of a county seat selection alleged to have been the result of fraud and corrupt practices, Quo Warranto being available, the District Court has jurisdiction under its equity powers to hear and determine such a matter, until such time as the law shall provide the procedure. Poe v. Sheridan County, 52 M 279, 157 P 185 (1916).

Probate: The District Courts have exclusive jurisdiction in probate matters. State ex rel. King v. District Court, 42 M 182, 111 P 717 (1910).

Special Proceedings: Upon the organization of the state government, probate jurisdiction was given to the courts, and thereafter appeals to the Supreme Court from judgments and orders therein were possible only by classifying them under the head of special proceedings. In re Tuohy's Estate, 23 M 305, 58 P 722 (1899).

Action Against Estate: The District Court, sitting as a court of equity, has jurisdiction to try and determine an action brought against an estate of a decedent to enforce an agreement made by deceased to devise a certain share in his property. Jurisdiction in such cases is not confined to the District Court sitting as a court of probate. Burns v. Smith, 21 M 251, 53 P 742 (1898).

Filing of Information by County Attorney: When the County Attorney files an information against a person charging him with the crime of murder, the District Court has the capacity to entertain an information for that offense. State ex rel. Nolan v. Brantly, 20 M 173, 50 P 410 (1897).

Equity Power: The District Court, by virtue of its equity powers and independent of statute, can authorize the inspection and survey of a lode mining claim and the levels, shafts, winzes, and crosscuts therein and the prosecution of work to procure evidence, upon the motion of any party to the action. Blue Bird Min. Co. v. Murray, 9 M 468, 23 P 1022 (1890).

APPELLATE JURISDICTION

Review of Orders — Disqualified Judge: District Judge sitting for disqualified District Judge could not review validity of orders on the merits entered by disqualified judge since review amounted to attempt to exercise appellate jurisdiction in violation of Constitution. State ex rel. Highway Comm'n v. Kinman, 150 M 12, 430 P2d 110 (1967), distinguished in State ex rel. Stenberg v. Nelson, 157 M 310, 486 P2d 870 (1971).

Postconviction Relief: District Court has the jurisdiction to consider petition from inmates for postconviction relief if inmate was sent to prison from judicial district in which petition is filed. Gransberry v. St., 149 M 158, 423 P2d 853 (1967).

Appellate Powers: The District Court, sitting as an appellate court, is one of limited jurisdiction and may only proceed in the manner and to the extent provided by law. Clark v. Great N. Ry., 30 M 458, 76 P 1003 (1904).

Conference of Additional Jurisdiction: While the jurisdiction bestowed upon the District Court by the Constitution cannot be abridged by the Legislature, it may invest such court with additional jurisdiction in harmony with its character. Such additional jurisdiction is not a usurpation of the constitutional powers of any other court, and therefore the provision of the act to regulate the practice of medicine, approved February 28, 1899, allowing an appeal to the District Court by the aggrieved party in case of the revocation or refusal by the Board of Medical Examiners of a license to practice medicine, cannot be held to contravene Art. VIII, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const., providing that the District Court shall have appellate jurisdiction in all cases arising in Justices' Courts and other inferior courts, the latter provision not being prohibitory in form. State ex rel. Kellogg v. District Court, 13 M 370, 34 P 298 (1893).

WRITS

Prohibition — Ministerial Function: Article VIII, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const., did not give the District Courts the jurisdiction to issue a Writ of Prohibition to control the discretion of an administrative body in carrying out a ministerial function. State ex rel. Lee v. Livestock Sanitary Bd., 135 M 202, 339 P2d 487 (1959).

Correctness of Order — Appeal: When court denied Writ of Certiorari by contemnor in Justice's Court, the remedy left was appeal to the Supreme Court and not a Writ of Certiorari. State ex rel. Mercer v. District Court, 115 M 385, 145 P2d 527 (1943).

Habeas Corpus — Original Authority: In order that a judgment for contempt may be proof against an attack made by habeas corpus proceedings, the court rendering it must have had jurisdiction of the person and of the subject matter and must have possessed the power of authority to render the particular judgment it pronounced. In re Lockhart, 72 M 136, 232 P 183 (1924); In re Mettler, 50 M 299, 146 P 747 (1915), overruled on other grounds in State ex rel. Smith v. District Court, 210 M 344, 677 P2d 589 (1984).

Writ of Mandate to Officer in County Outside Judicial District: The District Court of one district or county has jurisdiction to issue a Writ of Mandate directed to an officer of another district or county to compel him to perform a ministerial act which the law especially enjoins as a duty resulting from his office. State ex rel. Carroll v. District Court, 69 M 415, 222 P 444 (1924), overruled on other grounds in USF&G v. St., 136 M 148, 345 P2d 734 (1959).

Injunction: A court of equity being possessed of jurisdiction to determine the questions presented in the action inherently has the authority to preserve the status quo, pending final determination. This may be done by a temporary injunction. Atkinson v. Roosevelt County, 66 M 411, 214 P 74 (1923).

Habeas Corpus — Limited to District: The jurisdiction granted to District Courts and their judges to issue the Writ of Habeas Corpus is exclusive. The power of a District Judge to inquire into the legality of the detention of persons in custody is confined to cases where the complainant, who seeks his release, is so detained within the boundaries of the district over which the judge presides. If such judge is absent and no judge temporarily presides over such court, the application should be made to the Supreme Court or a Justice thereof and not to a District Judge in another district. St. v. District Court, 35 M 51, 88 P 564 (1907). See In re Lewis, 51 M 539, 154 P 713 (1916).

Prohibition — Supreme Court Review: The District Courts have jurisdiction over the Writ of Prohibition. The Supreme Court has jurisdiction, on appeal from judgments and from orders made by District Courts, in proceedings of this nature instituted under the Code. State ex rel. Scharnikow v. Hogan, 24 M 379, 62 P 493 (1900).

LIMITATIONS ON JURISDICTION

Power of Legislature to Confer Jurisdiction: Within the limitations prescribed by Art. VIII, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const., the Legislature may confer jurisdiction in any class of cases upon either the District or Justice's Court. In re Sheehan, 100 M 244, 49 P2d 438 (1935); St. v. Wiles, 98 M 577, 41 P2d 8 (1935).

Jurisdiction Generally Limited to District: Primarily, though the Judge of the District Court is classed as a state officer, he is such only for the purpose of administering justice in his own district. Although the process of his court extends to all parts of the state, ordinarily the exercise of his power is limited to the territorial boundaries of his district. Whitcomb v. Murphy, 94 M 562, 23 P2d 980 (1933); State ex rel. Mannix v. District Court, 51 M 310, 152 P 753 (1915).

No Equity Powers in Criminal Cases: The power of the District Court, sitting in the discharge of its jurisdiction in a criminal case, to exercise powers known only to a court of equity is impliedly denied by the letter as well as the spirit of the Constitution. State ex rel. Stewart v. District Court, 77 M 361, 251 P 137 (1926).

Naturalization: District Courts possess concurrent jurisdiction with the federal courts (within the limitations prescribed by Congress) to naturalize aliens. Therefore, when such power is exercised by them the proceeding is a judicial and not a political one, and hence the Supreme Court may, on certiorari, review a judgment rendered in such a proceeding. State ex rel. Weisz v. District Court, 61 M 427, 202 P 387 (1921).

Probate — Matters of Equitable Cognizance: Though the District Court sitting in probate is without power, as a general rule, to determine questions of equitable cognizance, when a determination of such questions is a necessary incident to the carrying out of the powers expressly granted to it, it may take jurisdiction. In re Stinger's Estate, 61 M 173, 201 P 693 (1921).

Petty Cases: The District Court is a court of general jurisdiction. It therefore has power to hear and determine all classes of cases, except petty cases, of which Justices' Courts and police courts are by the Constitution given exclusive cognizance. Crawford v. Pierse, 56 M 371, 185 P 315 (1919).

Corrupt Practice Act:

Every power conferred upon the judges is judicial in character and insofar as the corrupt practice act seeks to make a judge a mere agent to gather evidence for the Legislature to consider in passing upon the qualifications of a member, that act is invalid. State ex rel. Smith v. District Court, 50 M 134, 145 P 721 (1914).

The Criminal Practice Act of 1887 (repealed), conferring upon the District and Justice's Courts concurrent jurisdiction in all misdemeanors, was in conflict with Art. VIII, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const., and did not become a law of the state upon the adoption of the Constitution. St. v. Myers, 11 M 365, 28 P 650 (1891).

REMOVAL AND SUBSTITUTION OF JUDGES

Disqualification of District Judges: The act providing for the disqualification of District Judges on the filing of an affidavit of prejudice is not in violation of the provision of Art. VIII, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const., conferring on District Courts original jurisdiction in "all" cases in law and in equity. State ex rel. Anaconda Copper Min. Co. v. Clancy, 30 M 529, 77 P 312 (1904).

Convention Notes

(1) Revises 1889 constitution by requiring one justice of the peace in each county instead of two in each township and allows legislature to set qualifications, training standards and salaries. Provision for "dignified surroundings" is new. (2) Deletes references in 1889 constitution to types of cases which may not be handled by a justice of the peace and provides that legislature may determine this except that they may not try felony cases. (3) No change except in grammar.

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

Original Court Jurisdiction Over Partner or Family Member Assault Charges, Misdemeanor or Felony: District Courts have original jurisdiction over felony partner or family member assault charges. District Courts and Justices' Courts have concurrent jurisdiction over misdemeanor partner or family member assault charges. St. v. Martz, 2008 MT 382, 347 M 47, 196 P3d 1239 (2008).

Agreement by County Commission to Pay Justice's Court Expenses — Failure to Object — Appeal Precluded: A Justice of the Peace requested approval of funds from the County Commission for employment of a temporary clerical assistant. The County Commission initially refused to approve the funds. The claim was then submitted for certification pursuant to Browman v. Wood, 168 M 341, 543 P2d 184 (1975), and was subsequently certified as an actual and necessary expense incurred in the performance of actual duties of the Justice's Court. When the bill was still not paid, the Justice of the Peace filed a petition for a contempt order against the County Commissioners for failure to pay the certified claim. The order was amended to include attorney fees. The County Commission then agreed to pay the claim and did not oppose the motion to amend, nor did it file a responsive brief. However, it later alleged error. The Supreme Court held that the County Commission waived the right to appeal by agreeing to pay the claim and then failing to object to the District Court order to pay the claim and taking no further action to challenge the claim. In re Certain Justice Court Expenses, 264 M 510, 872 P2d 795, 51 St. Rep. 372 (1994).

Initiating Felony Prosecution by Complaint in Justice's Court: Initiating a felony prosecution by complaint in Justice's Court is an established practice in Montana and is not prohibited by statute. St. v. Sor-Lokken, 247 M 343, 805 P2d 1367, 48 St. Rep. 142 (1991).

Authority to Issue Arrest Warrant: Defendant contended that issuance by a Justice's Court of an arrest warrant on a complaint charging a felony was a violation of Justice's Court jurisdiction as established by this section. Applying the rationale of St. v. Snider, 168 M 220, 541 P2d 1204 (1975), the Supreme Court concluded that initiating a felony prosecution by complaint in Justice's Court is an established practice in Montana that is not prohibited by statute. St. v. Sor-Lokken, 246 M 70, 803 P2d 638, 47 St. Rep. 2264 (1990).

Jurisdiction Retained Upon Reduction of Charge: When District Court's jurisdiction is originally invoked by an information charging a felony, it is not lost by State subsequently reducing the charge to only a lesser included misdemeanor. St. v. Shults, 169 M 33, 544 P2d 817 (1976).

Claim of Justice's Court for Unbudgeted Actual and Necessary Expenses: When Justice of the Peace filed claim to pay necessary extra clerical assistance, County Commissioners do not have discretion to disallow claim under 7-6-2324 and 7-6-2325 (both now repealed), as 3-10-103 prevails because where a specific statute conflicts with a general statute, the specific controls over the general to the extent of any repugnancy. State ex rel. Browman v. Wood, 168 M 341, 543 P2d 184 (1975). (Annotator's comment: In this case Supreme Court exercised supervisory powers to provide a procedure to prevent future actual or potential conflict between the Board of County Commissioners and Justices' Courts.)

Facilities Provided Justices' Courts: Article VII, sec. 5, Mont. Const., creates a duty on part of County Commissioners to approve actual and necessary expenses of Justice's Court, even though expense was unforeseen and not budgeted. State ex rel. Browman v. Wood, 168 M 341, 543 P2d 184 (1975).

Authority to Issue Search Warrant: The existing court system of Montana, whereby District Judges may serve several counties, leaving outlying counties without an available District Judge to issue a search warrant, supports a legislative intent to grant Justices of the Peace jurisdiction to issue search warrants. St. v. Snider, 168 M 220, 541 P2d 1204 (1975).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Penalty Assessments on Fines: Statute providing penalty assessments in addition to statutory fines was void for indirectly enlarging jurisdiction of Justices' Courts and police courts in terms of maximum fine which may be imposed for offense charged. State ex rel. Sanders v. Butte, 151 M 171, 441 P2d 190 (1968).

Actions Included Within Terms "Forcible Entry and Unlawful Detainer": Held, that it was intended under Art. VIII, sec. 21, 1889 Mont. Const., giving Justices' Courts jurisdiction of "forcible entry and unlawful detainer", that all actions at the time of the adoption thereof falling within the general category of "forcible and unlawful entry" and "forcible and unlawful detainer" were and are included within its terms, the words "forcible entry" being sufficient to comprehend "unlawful entry" and the words "unlawful detainer" comprehending "forcible detainer". State ex rel. Hamshaw v. Justice Court, 108 M 12, 88 P2d 1 (1939).

No Application to Forcible Entry and Detainer Actions: Article VIII, sec. 20, 1889 Mont. Const., denying jurisdiction to the Justices' Courts "where the debt, damage, claim or value of the property involved exceeds the sum of three hundred dollars", has no application to forcible entry and detainer actions. State ex rel. Hamshaw v. Justice Court, 108 M 12, 88 P2d 1 (1939), following Cashman v. Vickers, 69 M 516, 223 P 897 (1924).

Power of Legislature to Confer Jurisdiction: Under Art. VIII, sec. 21, 1889 Mont. Const., discretion was vested in the Legislature to confer jurisdiction in misdemeanor cases on either the District Court or the Justice's Court. Ex parte Sheehan, 100 M 244, 49 P2d 438 (1935).

Scope of Authority in General: Within the limitations prescribed by the Constitution the Legislature has power to confer jurisdiction upon Justices' Courts in any class of cases; but these courts, being thus constituted courts of special and limited jurisdiction, are without power to hear and determine any case where such power is not, specifically or by clear implication, conferred by the statute defining their powers. St. v. Wiles, 98 M 577, 41 P2d 8 (1935); State ex rel. Matthews v. Taylor, 33 M 212, 83 P 484 (1905); Oppenheimer v. Regan, 32 M 110, 79 P 695 (1905).

Errors Not Objected to Waived: Although a Justice's Court is one of limited jurisdiction, errors during the proceeding must be objected to. Otherwise, they are waived. State ex rel. Gen. Oil Corp. v. Kelly, 94 M 445, 23 P2d 555 (1933); Hosoda v. Neville, 45 M 310, 123 P 20 (1912).

Jurisdiction Limited to Claims Under $300: The Writ of Prohibition is appropriate only when the lower court is acting without or in excess of jurisdiction and when the relator has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law. Boucher v. St. George, 88 M 162, 293 P 315 (1930).

Forcible Entry and Unlawful Detainer: A Justice of the Peace has jurisdiction of an action by a landlord against a tenant holding after default in payment of rent, both under the forcible entry and unlawful detainer laws and by virtue of this section, whereby Justices' Courts are clothed with concurrent jurisdiction with the District Courts in cases of forcible entry and unlawful detainer. Doggett v. Johnson, 72 M 443, 234 P 252 (1925); State ex rel. Carter v. Votaw, 13 M 403, 34 P 315 (1893).

Issuance of Search Warrant: Under the rule that where the Legislature confers jurisdiction upon a Justice's Court where none existed before, it must be exercised in the manner and within the limits stated, held, that a search warrant issued by a Justice of the Peace under Ch. 116, L. 1923 (since repealed), without the approval of the County Attorney was void, that chapter providing that the approval of that officer must first be obtained. State ex rel. Skrukrud v. District Court, 71 M 570, 230 P 1089 (1924).

"Concurrent Jurisdiction" Defined: "Concurrent jurisdiction", within the meaning of Art. VIII, sec. 21, 1889 Mont. Const., conferring concurrent jurisdiction with District Courts upon Justices' Courts, means that Justices' Courts are authorized equally with District Courts to try such actions at the choice of the suitors. Cashman v. Vickers, 69 M 516, 223 P 897 (1924).

Money Demands: Held, that the provision of Art. VIII, sec. 21, 1889 Mont. Const., conferring upon Justices' Courts concurrent jurisdiction with District Courts in cases of forcible entry and unlawful detainer actions, is not limited by the provision of section 20 of that article, declaring that Justices' Courts shall not have jurisdiction in any case where the debt, claim, etc., exceeds the sum of $300, but that as to forcible entry and unlawful detainer actions their jurisdiction is unlimited insofar as money demands are concerned. Cashman v. Vickers, 69 M 516, 223 P 897 (1924).

Violation of Prohibition — Original Jurisdiction: Held, under the decision in St. v. Bowker, 63 M 1, 205 P 961 (1922), that the District and not the Justice's Court has original jurisdiction in criminal actions for violations of the prohibition laws. St. v. Sorenson, 65 M 65, 210 P 752 (1922).

Limited Powers and Jurisdiction: Justices' Courts are of limited jurisdiction and have only such powers as are conferred upon them by statute. Miller v. Miller, 47 M 150, 131 P 23 (1913); Hosoda v. Neville, 45 M 310, 123 P 20 (1912); Jenkins v. Carroll, 42 M 302, 112 P 1064 (1910); State ex rel. Collier v. Houston, 36 M 178, 92 P 476 (1907); State ex rel. Matthews v. Taylor, 33 M 212, 83 P 484 (1905); Oppenheimer v. Regan, 32 M 110, 79 P 695 (1905); State ex rel. Kenyon v. Laurandeau, 21 M 216, 53 P 536 (1898), overruled on other grounds in State ex rel. King v. District Court, 24 M 494, 62 P 820 (1900); Layton v. Trapp, 20 M 453, 52 P 208 (1898).

Pleading Fraud — No Conversion to Equity: A Justice's Court has no equity jurisdiction; but defendants properly substituted in an action by the assignee of a labor claim cannot deprive the Justice of jurisdiction by the interposition of the defense of fraud in the assignment, since such defense does not convert the cause into an equitable one. Mettler v. Adamson, 38 M 198, 99 P 441 (1909).

Pleadings: The fact that a plaintiff formulates his pleadings on the theory that he is entitled to equitable relief does not deprive a Justice's Court of jurisdiction, if upon any theory of his pleadings he is entitled to other relief. Anderson v. Red Metal Min. Co., 36 M 312, 93 P 44 (1907).

Sheriff — Nonperformance of Duty: Section 3-10-301, enacted in pursuance of Art. VIII, sec. 20 and 21, 1889 Mont. Const., does not clothe a Justice of the Peace with jurisdiction to entertain an action against a Sheriff for damages for nonperformance of an official duty and a penalty imposed by law for such nonperformance. Oppenheimer v. Regan, 32 M 110, 79 P 695 (1905).

Examining Court in Cases of Felony: Article VIII, sec. 21, 1889 Mont. Const., provided that a Justice's Court shall have jurisdiction as an examining court in cases of felony, and the statute provided the method of procedure; but that jurisdiction must, of course, be properly invoked. St. v. Lagoni, 30 M 472, 76 P 1044 (1904).

No Equity Jurisdiction in Justices' Courts: Justices' Courts have no equity jurisdiction and cannot entertain actions involving matters of equitable cognizance. An action by a claimant to establish his claim for services, insofar as it seeks to establish and foreclose a lien on the attached property of the debtor, is a proceeding equitable in its nature and hence not within the jurisdiction of a Justice of the Peace as limited by Art. VIII, sec. 21, 1889 Mont. Const. Where a Justice of the Peace had no jurisdiction of a suit to enforce a lien for services as a preferred claim over the claim of attaching creditors, the District Court acquired no jurisdiction to enforce such lien by an appeal from the Justice's judgment. Shea v. Regan, 29 M 308, 74 P 737 (1903).

Misdemeanor: Jurisdiction of the misdemeanor of assault and battery reside in the Justice's Court, as having been "provided by law". St. v. Myers, 11 M 365, 28 P 650 (1891).

Attorney General's Opinions

Number of Justices of the Peace for 1974 Elections: Only one Justice of the Peace will be elected in each county in the 1974 elections unless otherwise specified by action of the 1974 Legislature. Only the Legislature may provide for additional Justices of the Peace, and no such power lies with the County Commissioners. 35 A.G. Op. 28 (1973).

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

District Court's Failure to Comply With Notice — No Violation of Due Process — Plaintiffs Had Actual Notice: The plaintiffs argued that the District Court did not provide them with proper notice of a retired judge's assumption of jurisdiction, in violation of both 3-1-804 and their constitutional right to due process, and that the retired judge therefore should have granted their motion for substitution. On appeal, the Supreme Court determined that the District Court failed to comply with either 3-1-804 or the Chief Justice's order by not serving on the plaintiffs' counsel notice of the retired judge's assumption of jurisdiction when the order was issued. However, the Supreme Court reasoned that this procedural irregularity did not prejudice the plaintiffs because they had actual notice of the retired judge's involvement in the case. The plaintiffs could not reasonably have concluded, based on these facts, that anyone other than the retired judge presided over their case. The court record at all relevant times clearly identified the retired judge as the presiding judge, and no other judge participated in any hearing or entered any rulings. The purpose of the notice rule in 3-1-804 is to ensure that parties are informed when a new judge assumes jurisdiction. As applied, the District Court's failure to comply with 3-1-804 did not prejudice the plaintiffs, because the plaintiffs had actual notice when the retired judge assumed jurisdiction in the case. Absent prejudice, the Supreme Court would not disturb the District Court's denial of the plaintiffs' motion for substitution. Labair v. Carey, 2017 MT 286, 389 Mont. 366, 405 P.3d 1284.

Retired Judge — Proper Authority of Appointed Interim Retired Replacement to Rule on Summary Judgment: A retired District Court Judge was directed by the Chief Justice of the Montana Supreme Court to assume temporary judicial authority over 16 of a retiring judge's pending cases. In addition, the Chief Justice ordered the judge to assume full judicial authority over all proceedings required by law. Pursuant to this direction, the District Court Judge had the proper authority to rule on a motion in a case outside of the 16 cases. Capital One, NA v. Guthrie, 2017 MT 75, 387 Mont. 147, 392 P.3d 158.

Jurisdiction of Retired District Judge: A retired District Judge called into judicial duty during a judicial vacancy has complete jurisdiction of the District Court in all civil matters and cases at law. In re Marriage of Manus, 225 M 457, 733 P2d 1275, 44 St. Rep. 398 (1987).

Appointment of Defeated District Judge: Judge Sykes, a retired judge who was defeated for reelection, was appointed by the Chief Justice to hear several cases. A party to one of the cases appealed the appointment of a defeated judge. The court held that Judge Sykes is a member of the "pool" of retired judges and can be called in by the Chief Justice to preside under the provisions of Art. VII, sec. 6, Mont. Const. Section 3-5-201, which requires District Judges to be elected, does not overcome the constitutional power given to the Chief Justice. Judge Sykes was not appointed pursuant to 19-5-103, and it is therefore not applicable. State ex rel. Welch v. District Court, 209 M 397, 680 P2d 327, 41 St. Rep. 783 (1984).

Judge's Reappointment to Finish Case Started Before Retirement: That trial Judge retired prior to his issuance of orders in the case at issue did not make the orders void. Under the recent decision in State ex rel. Wilcox & Bradley v. District Court, 41 St. Rep. 397 (1984), the trial Judge had authority to perform all functions of an active District Judge, including the issuance of final orders and judgments. In re Pegg's Estate, 209 M 71, 680 P2d 316, 41 St. Rep. 558 (1984).

Retired Judges Eligible for Assignment for Temporary Service: The term "other judges" in subsection (3) of this section includes retired judges. This subsection empowers the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, upon request of a District Judge, to assign retired judges for temporary service to any judicial district or county in Montana. Further, this provision is a constitutional grant of power exclusive of any statutory grant by the Legislature. State ex rel. Wilcox v. District Court, 208 M 351, 678 P2d 209, 41 St. Rep. 397 (1984), followed in St. v. Holmes, 212 M 526, 687 P2d 662, 41 St. Rep. 1535 (1984).

Disqualification of Judges: Statutory provisions providing for substitution of a disqualified District Judge are not in conflict with subsection (3) of Art. VII, sec. 6, Mont. Const., which provides that the Chief Justice may temporarily assign a District Judge for duty in another district. State ex rel. Lane v. District Court, 167 M 53, 535 P2d 174 (1975).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

"Any Judge of the District Court May Hold Court for Any Other District Judge" — Defined: The provision of Art. VIII, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., that "any judge of the District Court may hold court for any other District Judge", does not, in the absence of constitutional or statutory provision giving District Judges concurrent jurisdiction, empower a Judge acting for another to exercise out of court the judicial power of the Judge whose court he is holding; and an order of injunction issued by such Judge in chambers, when the Judge of the District Court was present in his district and discharging his duties, is void. State ex rel. Mannix v. District Court, 51 M 310, 152 P 753 (1915); Wallace v. Helena Elec. Ry., 10 M 24, 24 P 626, 25 P 278 (1890).

Purpose of This Provision: In adopting Art. VIII, sec. 12, 1889 Mont. Const., the convention had three purposes in view: (1) to provide for the division of the state into districts; (2) to provide for District Judges and to fix their term of office; and (3) by way of exception, to fix the term of office of those first elected, so that they would hold until the general election in 1892 and until their successors should be elected and qualified. But for the exception, those first elected would also have held for the term of 4 years. The purpose of it was to so adjust the term of those first elected that thereafter the election would fall regularly upon presidential years and be uniform throughout the state. State ex rel. Patterson v. Lentz, 50 M 322, 146 P 932 (1915); State ex rel. Jones v. Foster, 39 M 583, 104 P 860 (1909).

Act Providing for the Disqualification of District Judges — Not Violative of This Provision: The act of December 10, 1903, amending section 180 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1895 (section 93-901, R.C.M. 1947, now repealed), so as to provide for the disqualification of a District Judge on the filing of an affidavit of prejudice, thereupon disqualifying him to further act in the case except to arrange his calendar, notify another judge to try the case, or if he fails to do so within 30 days, to change the place of trial, etc., and amending section 615 of the same Code (25-2-201), so that if another judge is called in within such time, the change of venue shall not be granted, is in harmony with Art. VIII, sec. 12, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Anaconda Copper Min. Co. v. Clancy, 30 M 529, 77 P 312 (1904).

Section 7. Terms and pay.

Convention Notes

(1) No change except in grammar. (2) Supreme Court justice terms increased from six to eight years, district court judges from four to six and justices of the peace from two to four years. [Note — See Terms During Transition Period compiler's comment to this section.]

Terms During Transition Period: Section 4 of the Transition Schedule implementing the 1972 Montana Constitution provided: "Section 4. Terms of judiciary. Supreme court justices, district court judges, and justices of the peace holding office when this Constitution becomes effective shall serve the terms for which they were elected or appointed."

The convention note to section 4 of the Transition Schedule provided: "Since the proposed constitution changes the length of terms of office of judges this provision makes it clear that all judges may serve to the end of the term for which they were elected."

Former Constitutional Provisions: Subsection (1) of this section is similar to Art. VIII, sec. 29, 1889 Mont. Const. Subsection (2) of this section is similar to Art. VIII, sec. 7, 12, and 20, 1889 Mont. Const.

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

Election of Judicial Nominees — Necessary Only After Senate Confirmation: The District Court held that Art. VII, sec. 8, and this section require judicial nominees currently filling positions to stand for election at the general election preceding the expiration of the term to which nominated, even though the Senate had not been in session and therefore had not confirmed the nominations. The Supreme Court relied on the decisions in Jones v. Judge, 176 M 251, 577 P2d 846 (1978), and Keller v. Smith, 170 M 399, 553 P2d 1002 (1976), as well as transcripts of the Constitutional Convention, in interpreting those constitutional provisions and in resolving the ambiguity in Art. VII, sec. 8(2), Mont. Const. The court decided that the general constitutional rule is that appointees and nonappointees must stand for contested and uncontested elections at the general election prior to the expiration of each judicial term. The exception to the rule is that when the Senate has not had an opportunity to confirm a nominee, the nominee must stand for election for the first time at the next election following Senate confirmation. State ex rel. Racicot v. District Court, 244 M 521, 798 P2d 1004, 47 St. Rep. 961 (1990).

Impairment of Contract and Diminution of Salary — Preventing Legislative Meddling in Judicial Decisions: Plaintiff contended 3-2-104 and 3-5-212 (now repealed), which imposed sanctions on judges if decisions were not reached or opinions were not written within the procedural constraints and time limits set by the statutes, were unconstitutional. The penalty provisions of both statutes required a 1-month salary forfeiture in the event of a violation. Plaintiff contended the penalty violated the impairment of contract and diminution of judicial salary provisions of the Montana Constitution. Defendant contended that since the judiciary imposed the sanctions, the constitution was not violated. The constitutional prohibition against diminution of salaries is designed to prevent lawmakers from exerting control over the judiciary. Even if the court were to allow the indirect violation by allowing the Legislature to mandate a scheme administered by the courts, the statutes would violate the impairment of contract prohibition. Public employment gives rise to certain obligations protected by the contract clause of the constitution. Promised compensation is one such protected right. Once vested, the right to compensation cannot be eliminated without unconstitutionally impairing the contract obligation. Coate v. Omholt, 203 M 488, 662 P2d 591, 40 St. Rep. 586 (1983).

Entitlement of Judges to Actual and Necessary Expenses: Statutory travel expenses as applied to District Judges and Supreme Court Justices are unconstitutional, as Judges are entitled to their actual and necessary expenses for travel, subsistence, and lodging to meet constitutional mandate that their salaries shall not be diminished during their term of office. In re Actual Necessary Expense of Judges, 168 M 170, 541 P2d 345 (1975).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Payment for Reporting of Decisions: The Legislature is authorized to fix and change salaries of Justices of the Supreme Court, and therefore section which placed the duty of reporting the court's decisions upon the Justices and fixed a salary of $1,500 per year for those services was constitutional. Tipton v. Sands, 103 M 1, 60 P2d 662 (1936).

Taxation of Judge's Salary: The imposition of tax upon the net income derived from the official salary of a District Judge did not constitute a diminution of such salary and did not offend against Art. VIII, sec. 29, 1889 Mont. Const. Poorman v. St. Bd. of Equalization, 99 M 543, 45 P2d 307 (1935).

Order Filed After Expiration of Judge's Term of Office Void: When an order is made before term ends but is not filed with clerk until after term had ended, it is void. Marcellus v. Wright, 61 M 274, 202 P 381 (1921).

Successor — Right to Pay Increase: While a District Judge elected prior to and serving at the time of the passage of an act increasing the salary of the office would not have been entitled to the increase, his successor appointed to fill the vacancy created by the former's resignation some 7 months after its passage could rightfully demand the enlarged compensation. State ex rel. Jackson v. Porter, 57 M 343, 188 P 375 (1920).

Justice of the Peace: The term of office of a Justice of the Peace is 2 years and no more. State ex rel. Jones v. Foster, 39 M 583, 104 P 860 (1909).

Limitation of Term: Under Art. VIII, sec. 12 and 18, 1889 Mont. Const., the terms of District Court Judges and Clerks of the District Court are strictly limited to 4 years, and the words "and until their successors are elected and qualified", as used in this section, refer to those officers only who were first elected after the adoption of the Constitution and have no application to those thereafter chosen. State ex rel. Jones v. Foster, 39 M 583, 104 P 860 (1909).

Limitation on Legislative Power: Article VIII, sec. 29, 1889 Mont. Const., embodied an express restriction upon the powers of the Legislature. Lloyd v. Silver Bow County, 11 M 408, 28 P 453 (1891).

Attorney General's Opinions

Length of Term of Newly Created Judgeships to Be Six Years: Chapter 293, L. 1983, increased the number of judgeships in several judicial districts and provided that the new judgeships could be initially filled at either the 1983 or 1984 general election. According to this section and 3-5-203, the length of term of a District Court Judge is 6 years. In response to the question of the length of term of judges elected to positions created by Ch. 293, L. 1983, the Attorney General ruled that the term was 6 years because: (1) neither the constitutional provision nor the governing statute was altered by Ch. 293, L. 1983; (2) a provision in the original draft of the bill that altered the length of the term was deleted from the final version of the bill; and (3) assuming that the first election for new judgeships is compared to the filling of vacancies in office, it would be arbitrary to choose 1989, the year contained in the deleted provision of the original bill, as the year in which the terms of the new "vacant" offices expire. 40 A.G. Op. 13 (1983).

Justice of the Peace — Reduction From Full-Time Status: Absent a voluntary waiver by the incumbent, the proper time at which to reduce a full-time Justice of the Peace position to a part-time position is before the next election. 38 A.G. Op. 90 (1980).

Justice of the Peace — When Pay Raise May Be Diminished: Any pay raises given a Justice of the Peace must stand for the remainder of the term, and only at the beginning of the next term may such raises be diminished. 38 A.G. Op. 90 (1980).

Salary Diminution Prohibited for Justices of the Peace: The reduction of a full-time Justice of the Peace to a part-time Justice of the Peace with a salary commensurate to the workload and office hours constitutes a prohibited salary diminution within the language of Art. VII, sec. 7, Mont. Const. 38 A.G. Op. 90 (1980).

Compensation of Judges Other Than Annual Salary Improper: District Court Judges may not receive a fee for writing, research, and lecturing under programs funded by the Board of Crime Control. 35 A.G. Op. 32 (1973).

Section 8. Selection.

Convention Notes

Revises 1889 constitution. Contested election of judges is not changed, however if a judge in office does not have an opponent in an election his name will be put on the ballot anyway and the people asked to approve or reject him. If rejected, the governor appoints another judge. When there is a vacancy (such as death or resignation) the governor appoints a replacement but does not have unlimited choice of lawyers as under 1889 constitution. He must choose his appointee from a list of nominees and the appointment must be confirmed by the senate—a new requirement.

Compiler's Comments

1992 Amendment by Referendum: Constitutional Amendment No. 22, proposed by Ch. 475, L. 1991, and approved at the general election held November 3, 1992, substituted current text for former text that read: "(1) The governor shall nominate a replacement from nominees selected in the manner provided by law for any vacancy in the office of supreme court justice or district court judge. If the governor fails to nominate within thirty days after receipt of nominees, the chief justice or acting chief justice shall make the nomination. Each nomination shall be confirmed by the senate, but a nomination made while the senate is not in session shall be effective as an appointment until the end of the next session. If the nomination is not confirmed, the office shall be vacant and another selection and nomination shall be made.

(2) If, at the first election after senate confirmation, and at the election before each succeeding term of office, any candidate other than the incumbent justice or district judge files for election to that office, the name of the incumbent shall be placed on the ballot. If there is no election contest for the office, the name of the incumbent shall nevertheless be placed on the general election ballot to allow voters of the state or district to approve or reject him. If an incumbent is rejected, another selection and nomination shall be made.

(3) If an incumbent does not run, there shall be an election for the office." Amendment effective November 3, 1992. (See text of referendum in final volume of 1993 Laws of Montana.)

Former Constitutional Provision: This section revises Art. VIII, sec. 6, 8, 12, and 34, 1889 Mont. Const.

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

Election of Judicial Nominees — Necessary Only After Senate Confirmation: The District Court held that Art. VII, sec. 7, and this section require judicial nominees currently filling positions to stand for election at the general election preceding the expiration of the term to which nominated, even though the Senate had not been in session and therefore had not confirmed the nominations. The Supreme Court relied on the decisions in Jones v. Judge, 176 M 251, 577 P2d 846 (1978), and Keller v. Smith, 170 M 399, 553 P2d 1002 (1976), as well as transcripts of the Constitutional Convention, in interpreting those constitutional provisions and in resolving the ambiguity in subsection (2) of this section. The court decided that the general constitutional rule is that appointees and nonappointees must stand for contested and uncontested elections at the general election prior to the expiration of each judicial term. The exception to the rule is that when the Senate has not had an opportunity to confirm a nominee, the nominee must stand for election for the first time at the next election following Senate confirmation. (See 1992 amendment.) State ex rel. Racicot v. District Court, 244 M 521, 798 P2d 1004, 47 St. Rep. 961 (1990).

Constitutionality of Judicial Nomination Procedure: The established procedures for filling judicial vacancies in Montana are constitutional and not repugnant to applicable provisions of the Montana Constitution. Jones v. Judge, 176 M 251, 577 P2d 846 (1978).

Meaning of "Incumbent":

An "incumbent" judge, for the purposes of Art. VII, sec. 8, Mont. Const., is one who is in office and who seeks to remain a District Court Judge. Yunker v. Murray, 170 M 427, 554 P2d 285 (1976).

The language of the second sentence of subsection (2) of Art. VII, sec. 8, 1889 Mont. Const., is ambiguous, but the intent of the constitutional delegates collectively in using the word "incumbent" was that it apply to all unopposed District Judges and Supreme Court Justices irrespective of how they originally attained their judicial offices. Keller v. Smith, 170 M 399, 553 P2d 1002 (1976).

All Judges to Be on Ballot: All unopposed District Judges and Supreme Court Justices running for election or reelection are required to be placed on the general election ballot to allow the voters to approve or reject them. Keller v. Smith, 170 M 399, 553 P2d 1002 (1976).

Constitutionality of Provisions for Retention of Incumbent Judges: Statutory provisions for placing the names of incumbent judges whose positions are uncontested on the ballot and which were enacted to enforce the provisions of Art. VII, sec. 8, Mont. Const., are not unconstitutional as being in conflict with that section. Keller v. Smith, 170 M 399, 553 P2d 1002 (1976).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Vacancies: Retirement of a District Judge under the provisions of sections 68-101 through 68-1313, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), creates a vacancy which must be filled by the Governor. State ex rel. Jardine v. Ford, 120 M 507, 188 P2d 422 (1948).

Term of Office of Appointees: In every instance of appointment to fill a vacancy in an elective office, unless an exception be made in the office of County Commissioner, Art. VIII, sec. 34, 1889 Mont. Const., specifically limits the tenure of the appointee to the next general election or "until his successor is elected and qualified"; and this phrase is literally construed by the concluding sentence of the above section, for if an appointee holds for the residue of the term, then there could never be "a person elected to fill a vacancy" if an appointment had been made. That sentence is intelligible only upon the theory that the appointee holds only until the next general election or until the person elected for the residue of the term qualifies. Bailey v. Knight, 118 M 594, 168 P2d 843 (1946); State ex rel. McGowan v. Sedgwick, 46 M 187, 127 P 94 (1912).

Intention of This Provision: The general policy of the state government is that election to office, when it may be conveniently done, is the rule, and that appointment to fill vacancies shall be effective only until the people can elect. That this was the intention of the Constitutional Convention is clearly indicated by the last two sentences of Art. VIII, sec. 34, 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Patterson v. Lentz, 50 M 322, 146 P 932 (1915).

Election of District Judges: Under Art. VIII, sec. 12, 1889 Mont. Const., the right to nominate and elect District Judges belongs to the electors of the district, and no action of a state convention can validate a nomination for the office of District Judge, where the convention making it does not properly represent the electors of the district. State ex rel. Scharnikow v. Hogan, 24 M 383, 62 P 583 (1900).

Attorney General's Opinions

Term of Judge Nominated When Senate Not in Session: If the Governor nominates an individual to fill a vacancy in the office of District Court Judge when the Senate is not in session, the individual serves until the end of the next legislative session. If confirmed at the next session, he or she continues to serve until the next general election for which the statutory filing deadline has not passed. (See 1992 amendment.) 42 A.G. Op. 31 (1987).

When Judicial Appointee to Run for Election: An individual appointed by the Governor to the office of District Judge need not run in the general election in the year in which Senate confirmation takes place if, at the time of confirmation, the filing date for judicial candidates has passed. 41 A.G. Op. 52 (1986).

Appointment of Judges: The Senate confirmation of an individual appointed by the Governor to the office of District Judge is required before that office may be placed on the ballot for election. (See 1992 amendment.) 37 A.G. Op. 115 (1978).

Required Form of Ballots for Justice of the Peace: In an election for Justice of the Peace, the ballot must be the same in form as the ballot used to elect District Court Judges, including the form of ballot used by an incumbent who shall run against himself, if unopposed. 35 A.G. Op. 61 (1974).

Section 9. Qualifications.

Convention Notes

(1) Revises 1889 constitution by making residency requirements for candidates for district court judgeship the same as for supreme court and by deleting age requirements. Requirement for five years of law practice new. (2) Revises 1889 constitution by specifically allowing travel expense. (3) Only change specifically prohibits a judge from holding office in a political party. (4) No change except in grammar.

1988 Amendment by Referendum: Constitutional Amendment No. 19, proposed by Ch. 459, L. 1987, and approved at the general election held November 8, 1988, substituted second sentence of (4) concerning residency of District Court Judges and Justices of the Peace for former second sentence that read: "Every other judge shall reside during his term of office in the district, county, township, precinct, city or town in which he is elected or appointed" and inserted last sentence providing for residency requirements for other judges. Amendment effective July 1, 1989. (See text of referendum in final volume of 1989 Laws of Montana.)

Former Constitutional Provision: Subsection (1) of this section revises Art. VIII, sec. 10 and 16, 1889 Mont. Const. Subsection (2) of this section revises Art. VIII, sec. 30, 1889 Mont. Const. Subsections (3) and (4) of this section are similar to Art. VIII, sec. 35 and 33, respectively, 1889 Mont. Const. See also Art. VIII, sec. 31, 1889 Mont. Const.

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

Admission Eligibility Requirement — Inactive Status: The defendant was admitted to the State Bar of Montana in 2005 and was licensed as an active member in 2005, 2006, and 2013 and as an inactive member in 2007 through 2012. In 2014, he filed as a candidate for the Montana Supreme Court. Three former delegates to the 1972 Montana Constitutional Convention filed a complaint alleging that the defendant was not eligible to seek election because the time during which he was inactive precluded him from fulfilling the 5-year eligibility requirement under this section. The Supreme Court held that the defendant's time of admission, regardless of his choice to take inactive status, fulfilled the requirement that he be "admitted to the practice of law in Montana for at least five years". Cross v. VanDyke, 2014 MT 193, 375 Mont. 535, 332 P.3d 215.

Preelection Challenge to Legislative Referendum — Constitutional Amendments by Statutory Referendum — Justiciable Where Proposed Law Facially Defective: The Legislature passed a bill to put a referendum on the ballot to change elections for Supreme Court justices from statewide to regional. Prior to the election, citizens from each of the seven proposed regions filed an action against the Secretary of State, seeking a declaratory judgment that the proposed referendum was unconstitutional as well as an injunction to bar the Secretary of State from putting the measure on the ballot. The District Court granted the plaintiffs summary judgment and the state appealed. The Supreme Court agreed with the District Court that the matter was justiciable even though the voters had not yet passed the referendum. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court concluded that preelection consideration of the appeal was appropriate because the proposed law was facially unconstitutional. The measure sought to amend the Montana Constitution by means of a statutory referendum, in clear violation of constitutional provisions. Therefore, the Supreme Court agreed the matter was justiciable and affirmed the District Court's granting of summary judgment. Reichert v. St., 2012 MT 111, 365 Mont. 92, 278 P.3d 455.

Municipal Ordinance Prohibiting Outside Employment by Municipal Judge Void: The city of Bozeman passed municipal ordinance 2.06.050 prohibiting the Municipal Court Judge from obtaining outside employment. The city contended that under 3-6-202, it was allowed to enact an ordinance governing the qualifications of the judge, as long as the ordinance did not violate this section, and also argued that the ordinance was consistent with 3-1-604, which precludes a Municipal Court Judge from practicing law in that judge's own court. The Supreme Court agreed with the District Court that the ordinance was void because it conflicted with 3-1-604 when read in conjunction with 3-1-601. The legislative history also demonstrated that the statutes are intended to allow Municipal Court Judges to practice law in courts other than their own in order to supplement their income. Although the constitutional provision prohibits a District Court Judge from the outside practice of law and 3-6-202 requires a Municipal Court Judge to have the same qualifications as a District Court Judge, qualifications should not be confused with restrictions. Although 3-1-604 does not affirmatively declare that Municipal Court Judges can practice law outside their own courts, its intent is clear. The ordinance conflicted with the statutes and was therefore void. Carlson v. Bozeman, 2001 MT 46, 304 M 277, 20 P3d 792 (2001).

Entitlement of Judges to Actual and Necessary Expenses: Statutory travel expenses as applied to District Judges and Supreme Court Justices are unconstitutional, as Judges are entitled to their actual and necessary expenses for travel, subsistence, and lodging to meet constitutional mandate that their salaries shall not be diminished during their term of office. In re Actual Necessary Expense of Judges, 168 M 170, 541 P2d 345 (1975).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Judicial Officers Ineligible for Constitutional Convention: Supreme Court Justices and District Court Judges may not serve as delegates to state Constitutional Convention, since a delegate holds public office. Forty-Second Legislative Assembly v. Lennon, 156 M 416, 481 P2d 330 (1971), distinguished in Mahoney v. Murray, 159 M 176, 496 P2d 1120 (1972).

Payment for Reporting Decisions: Section providing for payment to Justices of Supreme Court for reporting court's decisions held not to violate Art. VIII, sec. 30, 1889 Mont. Const., because the Legislature had authority to increase the salaries in that manner. Tipton v. Sands, 103 M 1, 60 P2d 662 (1936).

Additional Qualifications: The Legislature could not impose any additional conditions to those enumerated in Art. VIII, sec. 16, 1889 Mont. Const., as a prerequisite to any man's holding the office of District Judge who might be elected or appointed to that office. State ex rel. Anaconda Copper Min. Co. v. Clancy, 30 M 529, 77 P 312 (1904).

Disqualification Statutes: The act of providing for the disqualification of a District Judge by the filing of an affidavit of prejudice was not in violation of Art. VIII, sec. 16, 1889 Mont. Const. The qualification therein enumerated was limited to qualities necessary to render the person eligible to the office, without application to his qualifications to try particular cases. State ex rel. Anaconda Copper Min. Co. v. Clancy, 30 M 529, 77 P 312 (1904).

Limitation on Legislative Power: Article VIII, sec. 30, 1889 Mont. Const., embodied an express restriction upon the powers of the Legislative Assembly. Lloyd v. Silver Bow County, 11 M 408, 28 P 453 (1891).

Prohibition Against Practice of Law: Article VIII, sec. 31, 1889 Mont. Const., which prohibited judicial officers from the practice of law, was a prohibition directed against the District Judge. St. v. Jackson, 9 M 508, 24 P 213 (1890).

Attorney General's Opinions

County Residency Not Required of Acting Justice of the Peace: An acting Justice of the Peace who is called to act pursuant to 3-10-231 and who is otherwise qualified to serve under 3-10-202 need not be a resident of the county where the court sits. 43 A.G. Op. 51 (1990).

Residency for Justice of the Peace Serving as City Judge: A Justice of the Peace may not be appointed to serve as a City Judge in a town in which he does not reside without violating Art. VII, sec. 9, Mont. Const. 41 A.G. Op. 82 (1986). (See 1988 amendment.)

Ineligible Judicial Candidate — No Certification for Ballot: The Secretary of State should not certify to election administrators for the primary election ballot the name of an individual who cannot possibly meet the eligibility requirements of Art. VII, sec. 9, Mont. Const., for the office of Supreme Court Justice or District Court Judge. 41 A.G. Op. 55 (1986).

Compensation of Judges Other Than Annual Salary Improper: District Court Judges may not receive a fee for writing, research, and lecturing under programs funded by the Board of Crime Control. 35 A.G. Op. 32 (1973).

Section 10. Forfeiture of judicial position.

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

Jurisdiction of Montana Courts Over Tribal Member: The phrase "elective public office" does not include the tribal office of Crow tribal chairman. A tribal member who held the state office of justice of the peace did not violate this provision by becoming a candidate for election as tribal chairman. Judicial Standards Comm'n v. Not Afraid, 2010 MT 285, 358 Mont. 532, 245 P.3d 1116.

Right of Sitting Judge to Run for Another Judicial Office Without Resigning: Article VII, sec. 10, Mont. Const., providing that one holding a judicial position forfeits that position by filing for an elective public office other than a judicial position, requires a Judge to forfeit his judicial office if he files for either a legislative or executive office. While it does not affirmatively declare that a Judge does not forfeit his judicial office by filing for another judicial office, that is its intent as shown by the minutes of the Constitutional Convention and that is what it means. Sections

3-1-607 and 3-1-608 forbid what Art. VII, sec. 10, Mont. Const., authorizes and are therefore unconstitutional as being in direct conflict with Art. VII, sec. 10, Mont. Const. The Comm. for an Effective Judiciary v. St., 209 M 105, 679 P2d 1223, 41 St. Rep. 581 (1984).

DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Judges as Constitutional Convention Delegates: Supreme Court Justices and District Court Judges may not serve as delegates to state Constitutional Convention, since a delegate holds public office. Forty-Second Legislative Assembly v. Lennon, 156 M 416, 481 P2d 330 (1971), distinguished in Mahoney v. Murray, 159 M 176, 496 P2d 1120 (1972).

When Applied to Leave for Military Service: Law allowing certain elected officers leave for military service, thereby avoiding a vacancy in the office, was not invalid as a whole as class legislation because Art. VIII, sec. 37, 1889 Mont. Const., excluded judicial officers from its operation. Gullickson v. Mitchell, 113 M 359, 126 P2d 1106 (1942).

Attorney General's Opinions

City Judge Not to Hold Office as Community College Trustee: The provisions of this section apply to all judges, including City Judges. Because the position of trustee of a community college district is considered an elective public office, a City Judge is constitutionally prohibited from holding office as an elected trustee of a community college district. 44 A.G. Op. 21 (1991).

Effect When Judge or Justice Seeks New Position — Retirement Fund: A District Court Judge or Supreme Court Justice who runs for an elective public office other than a judicial position is not entitled to receive an involuntary retirement allowance under 19-5-503. A District Court Judge or Supreme Court Justice who runs for another judicial position that would entitle him to membership in the judges' retirement system and loses the election is entitled to receive an involuntary retirement allowance under 19-5-503. 39 A.G. Op. 24 (1981).

Section 11. Removal and discipline.

1984 Amendment by Referendum — Coordination: Constitutional Amendment No. 13, proposed by Ch. 85, L. 1983, and approved at the general election held November 6, 1984, in (3)(b) after "duties" inserted "violation of canons of judicial ethics adopted by the supreme court of the state of Montana". Amendment effective November 6, 1984. (See text of referendum in final volume of 1985 Laws of Montana.)

Section 4, Ch. 85, L. 1983, provided: "If HB 629, introduced in the 48th legislature, is passed and approved, the date "November 8, 1983" in sections 2 and 3 of this act is changed to "November 6, 1984"." House Bill No. 629 was passed and approved as Ch. 603, L. 1983.

1980 Amendment by Referendum: Constitutional Amendment No. 9, proposed by Ch. 463, L. 1979, and approved at the general election held November 4, 1980, in (2) at end of first sentence deleted "and keep its proceedings confidential" and inserted (4) relating to confidentiality of proceedings except as provided by statute. Amendment effective January 1, 1981. (See text of referendum in final volume of 1981 Laws of Montana.)

Case Notes

District Court Judge's Comments — Erosion of Public Confidence in Judiciary — Public Censure — Suspension Without Pay: Prior to sentencing a 47-year-old teacher for having sexual intercourse without consent with a 14-year-old student, the District Court judge spoke from the bench and stated the victim was "a troubled youth, but a youth that was probably as much in control of the situation as [the teacher], one that was seemingly, though troubled, older than her chronological age". The teacher was then sentenced to 15 years in the state prison, with all but 31 days suspended. In explaining the sentence to the press, the judge explained that it "was horrible enough as it is just given her age, but it wasn't this forcible beat-up rape". The Judicial Standards Commission received numerous complaints after a public outcry regarding the judge's statements. The judge then attempted to increase the sentence, but the Supreme Court blocked the attempt based on lack of authority under Montana law to revise a sentence that was already imposed. In reviewing the complaints, the Judicial Standards Commission accepted the judge's admission that he violated Rule 1.2 of the Code of Judicial Conduct, which requires judges to act in a manner that promotes public confidence in the independence, integrity, and impartiality of the judiciary and avoids impropriety or the appearance of impropriety. Subsequently, the Supreme Court ordered the judge to appear at a public censure and he was suspended without pay for the last 31 days of his term in office. Inquiry re Judicial Standards Comm'n v. Baugh, 2014 MT 149, 375 Mont. 257, 334 P.3d 352.

Judicial Standards Commission Authority to Investigate Justice of the Peace: A tribal member was subject to the commission's authority once the tribal member became a state official and took a constitutional oath of office to support, protect, and defend the Montana Constitution. Judicial Standards Comm'n v. Not Afraid, 2010 MT 285, 358 Mont. 532, 245 P.3d 1116.

Jurisdictional Challenge to Judicial Standards Commission's Authority to Recommend and Supreme Court's Authority to Impose Costs and Attorney Fees in Judicial Discipline Case: In Harris v. Smartt, 2002 MT 239, 311 M 507, 57 P3d 58 (2002), Smartt was ordered to pay all costs of a judicial ethics proceeding. Pursuant to the order, the Judicial Standards Commission assessed Smartt $52,539.02. Smartt challenged the assessment. The Commission contended that Smartt was precluded from challenging the award because he failed to object to the Commission's recommendation or to the court's order. The Supreme Court disagreed. A party can never waive or consent to subject matter jurisdiction when there is no basis for the court to exercise jurisdiction. Thus, a jurisdictional challenge cannot be waived and may be raised at any time, so Smartt's challenge was allowed. Harris v. Smartt, 2003 MT 135, 316 M 130, 68 P3d 889 (2003). See also Balyeat Law, PC v. Pettit, 1998 MT 252, 291 M 196, 967 P2d 398 (1998), and In re Estate of Big Spring, 2011 MT 109, 360 Mont. 370, 255 P.3d 121.

No Authority of Judicial Standards Commission to Recommend and Supreme Court to Order Payment of Costs and Fees in Judicial Discipline Case: In Harris v. Smartt, 2002 MT 239, 311 M 507, 57 P3d 58 (2002), Smartt was ordered to pay all costs of a judicial ethics proceeding. Pursuant to the order, the Judicial Standards Commission assessed Smartt $52,539.02. Smartt challenged the assessment on grounds that it exceeded the Commission's authority because the constitution does not grant the Commission authority to adopt rules to assess costs and fees. Smart also asserted that the Supreme Court exceeded its limited constitutional authority in matters of judicial discipline by awarding costs and fees. The Supreme Court agreed. The constitution is very explicit as to what sanctions the Supreme Court may impose upon recommendation of the Commission and does not authorize the imposition of the prosecution's costs and legal fees. Rather, the essential functions of the Commission must be paid by the state. Thus, the prior order requiring Smartt to pay the costs of prosecution was vacated. Harris v. Smartt, 2003 MT 135, 316 M 130, 68 P3d 889 (2003).

Conduct of Justice of the Peace Violative of Canons of Judicial Ethics — Costs Associated With Sanction Attributed to Justice of the Peace: The Supreme Court found clear and convincing evidence that a Justice of the Peace violated the Canons of Judicial Ethics by knowingly accessing sexually explicit images on a county computer and by engaging in inappropriate behavior with a person with outstanding warrants. The conduct had a negative effect on the public's perception of the judiciary, and the court held that the appropriate sanction was to suspend the Justice of the Peace from the performance of judicial duties without pay for the remainder of the term of office, and to assess the Justice of the Peace with the costs of the sanction proceedings. Harris v. Smartt, 2002 MT 239, 311 M 507, 57 P3d 58 (2002).

Judicial Standards Commission Proceedings Not Violative of Constitutional Confidentiality Provisions: Records of the Judicial Standards Commission are confidential until the filing of a formal complaint. After a formal complaint is filed, certain papers, proceedings, and records of proceedings become accessible to the public. In order to protect the reputation of innocent judges wrongfully accused of misconduct, to maintain confidence in the judiciary by avoiding premature disclosure of alleged misconduct, and to encourage retirement as an alternative to costly lengthy formal proceedings and to protect Commission members from outside pressures, a complaint against a judicial officer is confidential until the Commission finds good cause to order a hearing, at which time the Legislature has determined that the public's right to know outweighs the individual judge's right to privacy. In this case, defendant argued that the Commission unlawfully provided copies of an investigation file to its members and the prosecutor, who in turn filed it as an exhibit during the formal hearing, making the matter a public record. The investigation file was never admitted into evidence during the hearing; however, it was included in the bound volume of prosecution exhibits. Defendant did not object at the hearing to inclusion of the file with other admitted exhibits, and thus waived any argument on appeal concerning a breach of privacy. Harris v. Smartt, 2002 MT 239, 311 M 507, 57 P3d 58 (2002).

No Error in Failure to Grant Continuance of Formal Hearing: Defendant requested a continuance of a formal hearing before the Judicial Standards Commission because there were dispositive motions pending in District Court and because the prosecution's witness list, provided

2 weeks before trial, included 15 previously undisclosed witnesses. A continuance was denied, and the Supreme Court found no error. The witness list was provided to defendant within the time limit set at the scheduling conference. Further, there is nothing unusual about preparing for a hearing while dispositive motions are pending, and defendant's failure to do so was not the fault of the Commission. Harris v. Smartt, 2002 MT 239, 311 M 507, 57 P3d 58 (2002).

Noninvestigatory, Work-Related Entry Into Judge's Chamber Not Considered Search: Smartt, a Justice of the Peace, left his office computer on after work hours. A county employee and another judge entered Smartt's chambers to shut down the computer so that a network backup could be performed and discovered pornographic images displayed on the computer screen. They reentered the chambers to note websites from the computer history file and took digital photographs of the long-term history of internet activity on Smartt's computer. The information was turned over to the FBI, and Smartt's computer was confiscated and searched. Smartt contended that the evidence seized from his chambers was obtained through an unlawful search, violated the right to privacy, and should be suppressed. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under St. v. Boyer, 2002 MT 33, 308 M 276, 42 P3d 771 (2002), the Supreme Court considers three factors when determining whether there has been an unlawful government intrusion into one's privacy: (1) whether the person has an actual expectation of privacy; (2) whether society is willing to recognize that expectation as objectively reasonable; and (3) the nature of the state's intrusion. When no reasonable expectation of privacy exists, there is neither a search nor seizure. Although the Montana Constitution affords broader protection than the federal constitution in cases involving searches of and seizure from private property, a person may not expect the same degree of privacy in public that is afforded in the privacy of one's home. In this case, entry into the judge's chambers was for a legitimate, noninvestigatory, work-related purpose. Irrespective of whether Smartt had any expectation of privacy with regard to the computer images, the nature of the intrusion did not rise to the level of a search, and denial of the motion to suppress the evidence was proper. Harris v. Smartt, 2002 MT 239, 311 M 507, 57 P3d 58 (2002), distinguishing Gryczan v. St., 283 M 433, 942 P2d 112 (1997). See also St. v. Scheetz, 286 M 41, 950 P2d 722 (1997).

Standard of Review of Commission Proceedings: The proceedings of the Judicial Standards Commission are reviewed de novo by the Supreme Court. Recommendations of the Commission are not binding on the court; rather, the court will consider the evidence and exercise independent judgment. Harris v. Smartt, 2002 MT 239, 311 M 507, 57 P3d 58 (2002), followed in Judicial Standards Comm'n v. Not Afraid, 2010 MT 285, 358 Mont. 532, 245 P.3d 1116.

Form of Complaint Not Critical to Investigation of Judicial Misconduct — Dismissal of Writ of Prohibition Proper When Judicial Standards Commission Acting Within Authority: A Justice of the Peace obtained a writ of prohibition barring further proceedings by the Judicial Standards Commission based on an unverified complaint. The complaint was subsequently verified, and the District Court dismissed the writ. The Justice of the Peace objected that his formal verified complaint was not submitted on the standardized form set forth in the Commission's rules, was drafted by the Commission's attorney, and did not identify the specific sections of the Canons of Judicial Ethics that were allegedly violated. The Justice of the Peace also maintained that the Commission violated its authority in investigating the complaint, so dismissal of the writ was in error. The Supreme Court disagreed. The form of a complaint is not critical to the Commission's fulfilling of its constitutional mandate, and nothing in policy, statute, or Commission rules was abrogated by the Commission's attorney by assisting in the drafting of the complaint. Further, a writ of prohibition is an extraordinary remedy available to enjoin a judicial entity from an inappropriate exercise of jurisdiction when no other plain, speedy, and adequate legal remedy exists. Thus, the District Court did not err in dismissing the writ because the Commission acted within its jurisdiction throughout the investigation. State ex rel. Smartt v. Judicial Standards Comm'n, 2002 MT 148, 310 M 295, 50 P3d 150 (2002).

Judicial Standards Commission Authority to Institute Investigation — Investigation Based on Report of Criminal Investigation Within Commission Authority: A written, unverified complaint was filed with the Judicial Standards Commission against a Justice of the Peace, alleging judicial misconduct. The Justice of the Peace obtained a writ of prohibition barring further proceedings based on an unverified complaint. Subsequently, a report was obtained from a Department of Justice investigation of criminal charges against the Justice of the Peace. The Justice of the Peace claimed that the Commission overstepped its authority by obtaining a copy of the report and further investigating the allegations when no complaint had been filed with the Commission regarding the allegations in the report. Under 3-1-1106, a written complaint by any Montana citizen may initiate an investigation of judicial misconduct, and only when the initial investigation indicates that additional proceedings are warranted must the complaining citizen sign a verified complaint. Further, Commission rules provide that a complaint is not a prerequisite to Commission action. The Commission may act on its own motion as well, so the Commission did not exceed its jurisdiction in obtaining a copy of the report by court order and undertaking its own investigation of the subsequently verified allegations. State ex rel. Smartt v. Judicial Standards Comm'n, 2002 MT 148, 310 M 295, 50 P3d 150 (2002).

Judicial Standards Commission Investigation of Justice of the Peace — Writ of Prohibition Properly Modified to Cure Ministerial Defects: A written, unverified complaint was filed with the Judicial Standards Commission against a Justice of the Peace, alleging judicial misconduct. The Justice of the Peace obtained a writ of prohibition barring further proceedings based on an unverified complaint. Subsequently, information was obtained from a Department of Justice investigation of criminal charges against the Justice of the Peace. The Commission sought to vacate the writ. By the time that the hearing was held, the complaint was verified, so the District Court modified the writ, allowing the Commission to proceed on the basis of the verified complaint. The Justice of the Peace appealed the modification that allowed the Commission to cure defects before commencing formal proceedings. The Supreme Court affirmed. The function of a writ of prohibition is to halt proceedings that are "without or in excess of the jurisdiction" of the entity exercising judicial functions. The writ here was to continue in force only until verified complaints were received. A procedural error, such as the failure to verify a complaint, will not be allowed to subvert the constitutional mandate of the Commission to investigate judicial misconduct. Because the complaint was verified by the time that the District Court considered modification of the writ, the court did not err in modifying the writ and allowing the Commission to proceed based on the verified complaint. State ex rel. Smartt v. Judicial Standards Comm'n, 2002 MT 148, 310 M 295, 50 P3d 150 (2002).

Constitutional Right to Equal Protection Not Violated by Confidentiality Provisions in Rule 13 Regulating Complaints Against Attorneys: Formal complaints against two attorneys were filed with the State Bar Commission on Practice, which recommended disciplinary actions against the attorneys. In their appeal, the attorneys contended that Rule 13 of the Rules on Lawyer Disciplinary Enforcement violated their rights to equal protection under the law, making a comparison with the constitutional provision in this section and statutes concerning the Judicial Standards Commission under which a judge responding to a disciplinary complaint may waive confidentiality. The Supreme Court found the argument inscrutable and unworthy of consideration. The attorneys failed to establish that they were treated differently under the Rules on Lawyer Disciplinary Enforcement from than any other attorney facing disciplinary charges. In re Goldstein & Albers v. Comm'n on Practice, 2000 MT 8, 297 M 493, 995 P2d 923, 57 St. Rep. 31 (2000), following In re Wyse, 212 M 339, 688 P2d 758, 41 St. Rep. 1780 (1984).

Misconduct in Office — Intemperate Language in Judicial Opinion: Statements in a dissenting opinion calling the majority opinion "intellectually dishonest" and accusing the majority of being "slippery with the facts" do not constitute misconduct in office. Unless profane, vulgar, or insulting language that offends good morals is used in writing the opinion, there can be no misconduct. State ex rel. Shea v. Judicial Standards Comm'n, 198 M 15, 643 P2d 210, 39 St. Rep. 521 (1982).

Misconduct in Office — What Constitutes: Misconduct in office, as required by this section, means conduct in or arising out of the duties or responsibilities of office and does not apply to alleged misconduct outside of office. Any involvement by a Supreme Court Justice in the incurrence of multiple parking tickets is conduct outside of office. State ex rel. Shea v. Judicial Standards Comm'n, 198 M 15, 643 P2d 210, 39 St. Rep. 521 (1982).

Necessity of Verified Complaint: The Judicial Standards Commission initiated an investigation upon receipt of a letter from a retired District Judge, contrary to its own rules and the statute requiring that such investigations be initiated by a verified complaint. It argued that because the Constitution prescribed its investigative authority and granted rulemaking power to implement its authority, the Legislature was without power to specify the procedure by which it exercised such authority. The court disagreed, finding that under Art. V, sec. 13(1), Mont. Const., the Legislature has broad powers relating to removal of public officers and that there can be no inhibition of the legislative power, irrespective of rulemaking authority granted to the Commission, to make suitable provision not in conflict with the constitutionally granted powers of the Commission, including the requirement that the Commission may act only upon a verified complaint. State ex rel. Shea v. Judicial Standards Comm'n, 198 M 15, 643 P2d 210, 39 St. Rep. 521 (1982).

Supreme Court Jurisdiction Over Actions of Judicial Standards Committee: Despite the constitutional status of the Judicial Standards Commission, the Supreme Court has power to issue a Writ of Prohibition to enjoin the Commission when acting in excess of its authority, where relator's remedy by appeal is inadequate and he has no other plain, speedy, or adequate remedy. State ex rel. Shea v. Judicial Standards Comm'n, 198 M 15, 643 P2d 210, 39 St. Rep. 521 (1982).

Disqualification of Judges: The intent of this section was to provide for the removal of Judges who, because of disability or bad habits, do not perform their work properly, and statutory provisions for the disqualification of District Judges are not unconstitutional as being in conflict with this section. State ex rel. Lane v. District Court, 167 M 53, 535 P2d 174 (1975).

Attorney General's Opinions

Chief Water Judge Not Subject to State Leave Policies — Executive Branch Not to Supervise Judicial Branch: Although the Chief Water Judge is appointed and not elected, the Chief Water Judge is a judicial officer and is not subject to the vacation leave policies of the Department of Administration. This interpretation of the statutes is also required by the application of the separation of powers clause of the Montana Constitution. To hold otherwise would subject a judicial officer to control by the Executive Branch of state government and not to the control of the Montana Supreme Court or the Judicial Standards Commission. 48 A.G. DECISIONS UNDER 1889 CONSTITUTION

Nonresident Contractors' License Fee Unconstitutional: Chapter 277, L. 1965, providing for nonresident contractors' license fees, was invalid under Art. XII, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const., since, by imposing a 1% tax on gross receipts rather than on profits, it was arbitrary and unreasonably discriminatory. State ex rel. Schultz-Lindsay Constr. Co. v. Bd. of Equalization, 145 M 380, 403 P2d 635 (1965), distinguished in Peter Kiewit Sons' Co. v. St. Bd. of Equalization, 161 M 140, 505 P2d 102 (1973).

Prohibitive Tax Unconstitutional: Chapter 153, L. 1961, which discriminatorily restrained the use of trading stamps or other redeemable devices in retail business by imposing an unreasonably high and prohibitive tax, was unconstitutional under Art. XII, sec. 1, 1889 Mont. Const. Garden Spot Market, Inc. v. Byrne, 141 M 382, 378 P2d 220 (1963).

License Tax — Purposes for Which License Tax May Be Levied: It was not the intention, in authorizing the Legislature to impose a license fee, to differentiate between the license tax, so-called, and the license fee extracted in regulatory matters but rather to refer the general subject of licenses to the Legislature. Mont. Milk Control Bd. v. Maier, 140 M 38, 367 P2d 305 (1961).

Income Tax:

Article XII, sec. 1(a), 1889 Mont. Const., did not impose an affirmative duty to replace property taxes entirely with income taxes. St. v. Toomey, 135 M 35, 335 P2d 1051 (1958).

The mere fact that the income tax law does not operate simultaneously upon the incomes of persons, firms, and corporations does not make it invalid. St. v. Toomey, 135 M 35, 335 P2d 1051 (1958).

The provisions of 15-30-111 (renumbered 15-30-2110), before the 1955 amendment, relating to adjusted gross income, did not violate Art. XII, sec. 1(a), 1889 Mont. Const. State ex rel. Anderson v. St. Bd. of Equalization, 133 M 8, 319 P2d 221 (1957).

License Fees: The provisions of the 1889 Montana Constitution relating to taxation had no application to license fees or taxes imposed for regulatory purposes as distinguished from property taxes. State ex rel. St. Aeronautics Comm'n v. Bd. of Examiners of St., 121 M 402, 194 P2d 633 (1948), overruled on other grounds in State ex rel. Ward v. Anderson, 158 M 279, 491 P2d 868 (1971).

DECISIONS UNDER 1972 CONSTITUTION

City Gross Revenue Franchise Fee on Facilities Using Public Right-of-Way Illegal Tax on Goods and Services: The city of Billings by ordinance established a franchise fee on several public utilities and telecommunications corporations with facilities located in the public right-of-way, and the utilities challenged the fee. The District Court held that the fee constituted an unlawful tax, and the city appealed. Despite the fact that the ordinance was subsequently rejected by voters, rendering the issue moot, the Supreme Court noted that the issue was capable of repetition and therefore accepted jurisdiction of the issue as appropriate in order to finally settle the legality of such fees in case similar ordinances were brought forth in the future. The fee in question was characterized as a franchise fee based on 4% of gross annual revenue generated by each utility that occupied the public right-of-way within the city. However, money collected was not earmarked for right-of-way maintenance or regulation, but was to be used to reduce general property taxes and to fund transportation improvement projects, public safety operations, and park maintenance, and the fee was separate from the city's police power over streets and alleys. The Supreme Court agreed that the unilaterally imposed, revenue-generating gross revenue fee, which was unrelated to the use or occupancy of the right-of-way, was in fact a tax based exclusively on the sale of a product or service within the city and was thus prohibited pursuant to 7-1-112. Mont.-Dak. Util. Co. v. Billings, 2003 MT 332, 318 M 407, 80 P3d 1247 (2003), distinguishing State ex rel. Malott v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 89 M 37, 296 P 1 (1930). See also St. Louis v. W. Equal Protection Analysis of Vocational-Technical School Levy — Rational Basis Test Applied: Plaintiffs challenged the constitutionality of 20-25-439, asserting that the tax levy for vocational-technical schools resulted in an unequal tax burden on five counties where the schools are located, even though the schools are part of the statewide University System. The state contended that the levy is not unconstitutional because it is rationally related to a legitimate government purpose. The District Court found that the levy is constitutional because it is rationally related to the legitimate government interest of supporting the schools, in that the schools provide specific benefits to their individual counties. The Supreme Court agreed that the rational basis analysis applied. The constitutional tax provisions in section 3 and this section are broad directives whose specifics are left to the Legislature, so no constitutionally significant interests are implicated that require greater than a rational basis analysis. A tax classification under the rational basis test will be upheld if it is reasonable and not arbitrary and if it applies equally to all who fall within the same classification. A classification is not reasonable if it confers particular privileges or imposes particular disabilities on a class of persons arbitrarily selected from a larger number of persons, all of whom stand in the same relation to privileges conferred or disabilities imposed. Neither the uniformity doctrine nor equal protection prevent the state from making classifications that result in different state taxes among the various counties as long as the classifications are rationally related to a legitimate government purpose. Simply because other state taxes for education funding are assessed in every county does not mean that the Legislature is prohibited from creating subclasses for tax purposes. Attendance at vocational-technical schools by local residents and course offerings related to local interests serve as a rational basis for putting the five counties in a separate class for purposes of the levy. Counties with vocational-technical schools are not arbitrarily selected from the rest of the state because those counties do not stand in the same relation to the greater privileges conferred on those counties by the schools than the rest of the state, so the disability of the levy is rationally imposed. The constitutionality of 20-25-439 was affirmed. Kottel v. St., 2002 MT 278, 312 M 387, 60 P3d 403 (2002), following Leuthold v.
